After his departure the Venetians ſpoyled all that part of Archadia which was ſubiect to the Turks, requiting him with like iniuries as he had done them before. Not long after, Lauretanus the Venetian Admirall had the Iſland of Lemnos deliuered vnto him by one Cominius a famous pyrat, who had ſurpriſed the ſame, and taken it from the Turks; but diſtruſting how he ſhould be able to keepe the ſame, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians. Shortly after, Vrſatus Iuſtinianus, a great Magnifico amongſt the Venetians, was ſent to ſucceed Lauretanus their D Admirall: but whileſt he was ſcouring the Ægeum with a fleet of two and thirtie great Gallies, Andreas Dandalus Generall of their forces at land, inconſideratly encountering with the Turks horſemen betweene Mantynia and Pytheme, was by them ouerthrowne and ſlaine, and with him diuers other gentlemen of great account: in which skirmiſh fifteene hundred of the Venetians were ſlaine alſo with their Generall. And as Fortune is neuer more conſtant, than in miſchiefe, ſo at the ſame time Vrſatus Generall at ſea, landing his men in the Iſland of Lesbos, beſieged the citie of Mitylene, & gaue thereunto two great aſſaults, wherein he loſt fiue thouſand men: and vnderſtanding that the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the citie, raiſed the ſiege, and ſailed into Eubœoa, and from thence paſſed ouer into Peloponeſus, where he ſhortly after died for ſorrow and griefe of mind. In whoſe place the Venetians ſent another fa- E mous Captaine called Iacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians well conſidering the great power of the Turkiſh Emperour, laboured by their Embaſſadours, to draw as many of the Chriſtian Princes as they could into the fellowſhip of this war; but eſpecially the great Biſhop, by whoſe means they were in good hope to be greatly ſtrengthned. Pius the ſecond of that name was then the great Biſhop; who at firſt anſwered the Venetian Embaſſadors, That he muſt take away the little Turke, before he had any thing to doe with the great: meaning thereby, Sigiſmundus Maletaſta Prince of Ariminum, whom he deadly hated, for that he tooke part with the French, againſt the Aragonians. Howbeit, the warres in Italie being well appeaſed, Pius ſtill ſolicited by the Venetians, made F great preparation againſt the Turks; giuing it out, That he would in perſon himſelfe go vnto thoſe warres: and by his authoritie (then much regarded) procured great aid out of Germanie, France, Spaine, and other countries alſo further off. At which time alſo voluntarie men in great numbers reſorted out of all parts of Chriſtendome into Italie, readie to aduenture their liues in thoſe religious warres. At the ſame time alſo the Venetians had with much adoo by the working of Paulus Angelus Archbiſhop of Dirrachium, perſuaded Scanderbeg to renounce nounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into armes againe: G which he preſently did, and ſpoyled the borders of the Turks dominions next vnto him. Wherewith Mahomet was no leſſe troubled, than with all the reſt of the great preparation of the Chriſtians againſt him: fearing that (as it was then reported) he ſhould be made Generall of the Chriſtian armie, which Mahomet feared might tend to the vtter ruin of his Kingdome; ſo dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg amongſt the Turks. Wherefore thinking it moſt conuenient for his affaires, to reconcile him if it were poſſible, by his Embaſſadour ſent for that purpoſe, wrot vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, vnto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and of the Epirots, Greeting. H

The Letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I haue alwayes had thy fidelitie and vpright dealing in great admiration, moſt noble Prince Scanderbeg: for which cauſe I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a Prince of ſuch an heroicall and Princely perfection, ſhouldſt ſo inconſideratly and without any occaſion break the faith and league which thou not long ſince ſolemnly contractedſt with me. For as I am aduertiſed, thou haſt entred into the confines of our dominion with a great armie, and with fire and ſword deſtroying all that thou couldeſt, haſt carried away with thee a great bootie. Of which thing I know right well, that the Venetians are the only cauſe, by whoſe counſell and perſuaſion thou haſt beene ſet on to doe this deed; and ſeduced by their allurements and ſubtill perſuaſions, haſt made war vpon me, and art become the faithleſſe breaker of thine owne league, and of the ſacred law of Nations. Yet doe I little or nothing blame thee therefore, regarding I more the cauſe of the ignominie, than the deſpight it ſelfe, and lay the blame vpon them who haue alwayes beene my foes and capitall enemies, rather than vpon thee. But alas, what is this vnto me (Scanderbeg) that thou haſt done, which poſſeſſe ſo many and ſo large Dominions? Diddeſt thou thinke to doe ſo great hurt vnto our Kingdome, by ſpoyling a little peece of our Countrey, and by ſtealing our Cattell, more like a Theefe and Robber, than an open Enemie? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an iniurie. But if thou thinke it ſo good, proceed in theſe thy doings: for I make more account of thy friendſhip and loue, than of whatſoeuer is to me deereſt; becauſe (as thou knoweſt) I haue alwayes borne vnto thee an eſpeciall fauour, and loued thee moſt entirely. And therefore as often as I call to remembrance our tender yeares and old familiaritie whileſt we liued together in my fathers court at Hadrianople, I cannot but thinke my ſelfe bound vnto thee in all courteſie. And therefore my K good Scanderbeg, I moſt heartily requeſt and entreat thee, That we renewing the former concluſions of peace, may of new confirme the ſame by ſolemne oath; wherewith if the former peace had bin eſtabliſhed, thou wouldeſt not haue ſuffered thy ſelfe to haue been now of the Venetians ſo circumuented or ſeduced. It is therefore needfull, that we now againe for euer confirme a league and peace betwixt vs by ſolemne and ſacred oath on both ſides: which if thou ſhalt doe, (as I hope thou wilt, and in this be aduiſed by me) thou with thy poſteritie ſhall vndoubtedly alwayes raigne in peace, and in ſafetie poſſeſſe whatſoeuer is yours. Whereas if thou ſhalt doe otherwiſe, beleeue me it will repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knoweſt alreadie my force, which whether thou be able to withſtand or not, thou wert beſt to be wel aduiſed. The poore Princes thy neighbours, the Venetians thy ſeducers, cannot deliuer thee from my forces and power. Doſt thou not ſee the Grecians almoſt al rooted out before thy face? the Emperors of Conſtantinople L and TrapeZond by vs depriued of their Empires? the Princes of Seruia and Raſcia deſtroyed? the King of Boſna put to death? and all the Kingdomes of Aſia, with many other Kings and Princes moe, vanquiſhed, and ouerthrowne, and made ſubiect vnto me? Wherefore Scanderbeg, I aduiſe thee in this to follow my counſell, keepe thy promiſe, and ſo beleeue me thou ſhalt not be deceiued. Concerning theſe matters, we haue giuen further commandement to our Embaſſadour and ſeruant Muſtapha, which commeth vnto thee: vnto whom doubt thou not to giue credence in any thing. Farewell. From our imperiall citie of Conſtantinople the ſeuenth of May, 1463.

Scanderbeg hauing by the aforeſaid meſſenger receiued theſe letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned anſwer as followeth: M

The Champion of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albaneſes and Epirots, to the moſt Excellent Mahomet King of the Turks, Greeting.

Scanderbeg his anſwere to the Letters of Mahomet.

You maruell (moſt Noble Mahomet) that my ſouldiers (as you ſay) contrarie to the League and the conditions

A conditions of our peace, haue entered into your confines, and from thence carried a great bootie. Of which thing (you ſay) the Venetians are the authours, whom you call your mortall enemies : inferring afterward, that you are little therewith offended, for that you are a moſt mightie Prince, and can eaſily diſgeſt ſuch vnkindneſſe, for the great loue you beare vnto me : and the rather, for that I did it deceiued (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) by others. All theſe things you can eaſily forgiue and forget, ſo that I will by ſolemne oath confirme the ſame conditions of peace that were in our former league betwixt vs agreed vpon. And thereunto you doe greatly vrge me, you admoniſh and counſell me to follow your aduiſe, as tending to the great profit and ſecuritie of me and my poſteritie, leaſt happily whileſt I ſeeke to pleaſe the Venetians, I incurre your heauie diſpleaſure. Beſides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon vp as it were in a Catalogue, the People, Nations, Kings, and Princes, by you ouercome and ſubdued. But what B is that which is ſo ſtrange (I pray you) and which you ſo much maruell at (moſt noble Mahomet ?) Is it not for that my ſouldiers did that in the confines of your dominions, whereof they were (of right) ſorrie; and had thereof to me complained, that your ſouldiers had before done the like in their goods and poſſeſsions. Wherefore if they alſo vpon a militarie brauerie (as is your maner of phraſe) haue made themſelues whole, and done one ſhrewd turne for another, reuenging iniurie receiued, and not inferring any of new : there is no cauſe that you ſhould either thinke it ſtrange or blame me. I would my ſelfe haue reſtrained my ſouldiers, although they were grieuouſly iniuried (I will plainely confeſſe vnto you a troth) I would haue appeaſed their angrie minds, enflamed with deſire of reuenge; if you (a Prince of all others moſt rich and bountifull) would either haue taken order, that full reſtitution might haue been made vnto them of all ſuch things as they had loſt, or elſe would with condigne puniſhment haue chaſtiſed the inſolencie C of your ſouldiers : which you would ſeeme to couer with the tearme of militarie wantonneſſe or brauerie; an excuſe ſcarce currant amongſt children. For although offences are in all places grieuous, yet ought they moſt of all ſo to be deemed in martiall affairs. What I pray you, would you haue me to take it for a laſciuiouſneſſe in your men of war ? eſpecially when I had receiued ſo great loſſe, when as you might with a word firſt haue reſtrained them from doing of it, and at your pleaſure corrected them after the deed was done. Wherefore (moſt excellent Mahomet) take you alſo in good part theſe our tearmes, which you haue accuſtomed hitherto moſt glorioſly to giue and ſell vnto vs, whileſt you alwaies couer your reach with ſome excuſe or ſhew of right. As for that in excuſing me, vnder colour of old acquaintance and friendſhip, you inuey againſt the Venetians, verily you doe them wrong : for why, thoſe good, iuſt, and vertuous Princes are not to be ſlandered by you, as ſeducers of me or others. Beſide, what need D that inuincible ſtate to enter into councell with me, or (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) to allure me to fall at ods with you, or to proſecute you as their enemie ? Who of themſelues, yea (I ſay) of themſelues alone, when occaſion ſhall require, are able to dare you in plaine battell; and to abate your pride. Furthermore, whereas you aduiſe me to reiect their friendſhip, your labour is therein but loſt; for what man is ſo deſperat, or hated of his ſubiects, that would not chuſe rather to erre with that moſt honorable Senat, than to be in the right with you ? eſpecially I, who haue of long time bin confederat with them, and am of all others vnto them moſt deare : which you for all that had no regard of, but (according vnto your vntruſtie dealing) breaking in ſunder the bonds of peace, ſpoiled and waſted their territorie in Peloponeſus. Neither can your great threats terrifie me, which you after the Turkiſh maner thunder & poure out againſt E me, except I will be ouerruled by you : for it is the part of an Albaneſe both to endure when need ſhall require, and alſo to do ſuch things as beſeeme a man of courage. You cannot make me afraid, being but a ſmall Prince, with my honorable friends the Venetians. And what are you ? ſo great an Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, as you vainly tearme your ſelfe ? Truly you make me ſmile, and other Chriſtian Princes laugh you to ſcorne, in vſurping falſly to your ſelfe the ſtately ſtile of the Emperour of the World. What poſſeſſe you in Aſia the greater ? verily nothing. Is all yours in Aſia the leſſer ? not ſo. What haue you in Europe ? except Thracia, Myſia, part of Grecia, and Peloponeſus, with the Iſle of Mytelene. As for Africke, you neuer ſet your foot therein. Is this to be Emperour of the World ? But ſuppoſe, ſuppoſe (I ſay) worthie Mahomet, that all from the fartheſt part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therefore ſo to ſwell, as to contemne all others. Ceaſe to boaſt, and learne F now (if you can) the ſpeciall, but true examples of humaine fragilitie. Where are now the Aſſyrians, which ſometime ſwayed the World ? where be the Medes ? Where the Perſians ? and to be ſhort, where are the Romains, the great commanders of all ? Verily, Tamerlane the Sythian King (called the terror of the world) was far greater than you : who in triumph, drew before his chariot thy great grandfather Baiazet in chains: who had before won ſo many victories, whom neuertheles he ouerthrew in the plaines of Armenia, with three hundred thouſand Turkes, hauing in his armie (as is reported) twelue hundred thouſand men, greater than Xerxes or Darius, whoſe armies couered the ſeas, and dried vp the riuers G before them as they went, yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they are all caſt out by him that caſteth out all nations, the finger of the Higheſt hath brought them all to nought. Wherefore learne to know your ſelfe to be a man alſo. Truſt not too much to the multitude of your ſoldiers, and ſtrength of your armies: for oftentimes great and puiſſant armies haue beene ouerthrowne with farre leſſe, as all hiſtories beare witneſſe: whereof it is commonly ſaid, Thou ſhalt not praiſe the valor of the Generall, before he be brought to the triumph. And doe you not thinke, Mahomet, that God will fauour the better cauſe? You know, you well know, that all your kingdome is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and vniuſtly poſſeſſed: for which cauſe I am not afraid not onely to withſtand you when you ſhall come, being ſo great a Prince; but alſo valiantly and couragiouſly to dare you into the field, and by the power of God, both to hope for and haue a notable victorie ouer you. We haue ſouldiers alſo, which know how to vſe their weapons, to march H before their enemies, and how to beare themſelues in the heat of the battell. Wherefore, to that you ſay vnto me for the new confirming of the former league, you labour now but in vaine to circumuent me with ſuch faire gloſes, I haue your faith in ſuch diſtruſt, and your friendſhip in deteſtation: foraſmuch as you cunningly and ſubtilly, after the manner of your anceſtors, whatſoeuer you do, or whatſoeuer you promiſe vnto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thruſt me out of my kingdome. Yet thus long I haue by Gods helpe well eſcaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in ſhort time be an end of all theſe matters, when all your ſleights and deuiſes ſhall not eaſe you, neither your working head or Turkiſh pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that ſo much ſtomacke you, there commeth after me a great number of Chriſtian Princes: behold, the whole chiualrie and glorie of the Chriſtian commonweale is in armes, and comming againſt thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of I Chriſtendome haue combined themſelues together, with the great Biſhop, againſt thy ſtate, and will in ſhort time be preſent to deſtroy thee and thy kingdome. Wherefore (worthie Mahomet) I haue thought it good in regard of our old friendſhip (although the ſame hath by you beene greatly empaired and violated) to forewarne you of all theſe things, that you might gather your wits together, and in time prouide for the ſafetie of your ſelfe and of your kingdome. You ſee the force and power of ſo many great Princes, from which whether you can eſcape or no, I know not: yet you may, if you wil follow my aduiſe, you may, I ſay, make both your name and empire of great, greater, of famous, moſt renowned, of fortunate, moſt happie and bleſſed; if caſting off from you the groſſe errours of the Mahometan ſuperſtition, you will embrace the faith and truth of Chriſt Ieſus, and at length haue regard of your ſoules health. And you which excel al your predeceſſors in highneſſe of ſpirit, and pregnancie of wit, ſuffer not your ſelf and your K ſubiects as it were by inheritance to be longer blinded in your wilfull errours: but doe that (as a wiſe Prince) of your owne accord, which otherwiſe you wil ſhortly of neceſſitie be conſtrained to do. To ſay, Had I wiſt, hath euer bin accounted a great diſgrace from the mouth of an Emperour. At length amend and meaſure your ſelfe. Behold, Almightie God doth offer you meanes, whereby you may quiet the whole ſtate of your kingdome, and all our Kings and Princes loue, honor, and reuerence you. Neither let the ambitious deſire of ſoueraigntie or immoderat care of thoſe things you poſſeſſe, trouble you from ſo doing: For whatſoeuer you haue vniuſtly and vnlawfully vſurped, the Chriſtian Princes will grant, confirme, and eſtabliſh vnto thee, as if they had bin your owne by antient inheritance. So ſhall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and raigne lawfully, if you ſhall embrace this Faith, and worſhip God aright: which ſo L ſoone as you ſhall feele the ſweetneſſe of, you will be ſorrie that you knew it no ſooner, you wil grieue at the time you haue loſt, and vtterly deteſt and abhorre all that filthie ſuperſtition which the moſt filthie falſe Prophet Mahomet hath left amongſt you. From our Campe the 26 of May, 1463.

With theſe Letters Scanderbeg diſmiſſed the Turks Embaſſador. About which time he receiued Letters from the great Biſhop, that he, accompanied with the Chriſtian Princes, would without delay come ouer into Epirus with a ſtrong armie of valiant Chriſtians, to ioine their forces with his, againſt the common enemie of the Chriſtian religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce war againſt the Turkiſh king. Which thing Scanderbeg moſt ioyfully vndertooke: and without delay with all his power brake into the Turks dominion, burning and deſtroying the countrey before him as he went: from whence he returned laden with the M ſpoile there gotten.

When Mahomet had peruſed Scanderbegs Letters, and certainly vnderſtood of the great preparation made againſt him in Italie, as alſo of the great ſpoyle of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholie, as a man much troubled in mind, which daily more and

A more increaſed: for that he ſaw not the wonted cheerfulneſſe in his men of warre, but all full of heauineſſe and deſpaire, as if they had bin men alreadie vanquiſhed. Neuertheleſſe, he ſpeedily tooke order for the leuying of a great armie; fortifying his cities and ſtrong holds, leauing nothing vndone that was poſſible, for the aſſurance of his ſtate. And to repreſſe the furie of Scanderbeg, ſent Seremet Baſſa with fourteene thouſand ſouldiers to lie vpon the borders of Epirus, with charge only to attend vpon him. Who mindfull of his charge, came into Macedonia, vnto the city Ocrida, now called Alchria, in the very confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his armie; ſome part thereof lodged in the citie, and the reſt in places more conuenient neere about the ſame.

The comming of the Baſſa, as alſo the manner of his lying, was not vnknowne to Scandebeg, who deſired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he ſecretly in the night B marched towards Ocrida with twelue thouſand ſoldiers, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay cloſe in ambuſh, & vpon the breaking of the day ſent out 500 horſemen towards the enemy, vnder the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captains, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded thē, that if the enemie did come forth to fight, they ſhould make but ſmal reſiſtance, but retire backe as if they had fled, and ſo to traine him on to the place where the armie lay. Which was ſo well performed by the two skilfull captaines, that the Baſſa with all his power was according as they could haue wiſhed, drawne into the field, and brought to the very place where Scanderbeg lay; who ſuddenly riſing vp with all his armie, aſſailed the Turkes on euery ſide, and ſlew them as Deere encloſed in a toyle. In this battell ten thouſand of the Turkes were C ſlaine, the Treaſurer of the armie with twelue other of great marke were taken priſoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were preſently ranſomed for fortie thouſand duckats.

Scanderbeg hauing obtained the victorie, returned with triumph into Epirus, dayly expecting the comming of the great armie out of Italie: But fatal Deſtinie, the mightie controller of mens higheſt deſignes, had not ſo appointed. For when Pius the great Biſhop had out of all parts of Chriſtendome aſſembled a great armie (whereof the greateſt part were voluntarie ſouldiers) & all things were now in ſuch readines, that he had put himſelf vpon the way, & was come to Ancona, a city vpon the ſea ſide (where Chriſtophorus Maurus duke of Venice came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to haue accompanied him in thoſe warres: and all men were now in expectation of ſome great matter to haue bin done) ſuddenly he fell ſicke of a feuer, D and died in the yeare 1464. Whereupon the armie was forthwith diſperſed, and all that great preparation fruſtrated, to the exceeding griefe of many Chriſtian Princes; and no leſſe ioy of the Turks, who now reioyced to ſee themſelues deliuered of ſo great a feare.

About this ſame time, Victor Capella chiefe perſuader of this war betwixt the Venetians & the Turks, was by the Senat ſent Generall of their forces at ſea, in ſtead of Lauretanus, whoſe yeare was then expired. He hauing receiued the charge from Lauretanus, and ſailing out of Eubœa, in ſhort time tooke from the enemie the citie of Aulis in Peloponeſus ouer againſt Chalcis, and alſo the citie of Larſum in the gulfe of Theſſalonica, with the Iſle of Himber. Afterwards landing his men by night at Pyræus, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the citie of Athens E (now called Sethina) ſometime the mother of learning, and moſt noble citie of Grecia; and from thence caried away with him into Eubœa al the people he there found, as his priſoners, together with the rich ſpoile of that citie. Whileſt he lay in Eubœa, he was perſuaded that the citie of Patras in Peloponeſus would be deliuered vnto him by the Chriſtians that dwelt therein, if he did but ſhew himſelfe before it. Wherupon he departed from Eubœa, and comming into the gulfe of Patras, landed 4000 footmen vnder the leading of Barbaricus, and 200 horſemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was captaine. Barbaricus marching toward Patras, was come within a mile of the citie; when many of the horſemen, and of the vnruly mariners, diſorderly ſcattering abroad, neglected the intended ſeruice, and ſought after pillage all about the countrey. The Turks garriſons taking this opportunitie, ſet vpon them with their horſe-F men, and ſo, eaſily ouerthrew them, being ſcattered and out of order. At the firſt encounter, Barboricus himſelfe was ſlaine; Ragius Captaine of the horſemen was taken, and aliue empailed vpon a ſharpe ſtake. Of all them that were landed, ſcarce a thouſand were left, who ſaued their liues by flying vnto the gallies. With this ouerthrow Victor the Venetian Admirall was greatly diſcomforted, yet hauing conceiued ſome hope of better ſucceſſe, in few

The Venetians attempting to win Patras, receiue great loſſe daies after attempted againe to haue taken Patras, but with like hap as before : for hauing loſt a thouſand of his men about the citie, and the reſt glad to take their refuge to the fleet, he was conſtrained with great diſhonor to depart thence. And ſo full of ſorrow and heauineſſe returning into Eubœa, oppreſſed with melancholy, there ſuddenly died.

The Venetians deceiued of the great hope they had conceiued of the generall preparation made againſt the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their warres againſt ſo mightie an enemie ; by their embaſſadours ſolicited Mathias, not long before choſen king of Hungarie, to ioyne in league with them, and to take vp armes againſt the common enemie, offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſumme of money, beſide a large yearely pention for the maintenance of thoſe warres : for which hee ſhould to his power by land defend all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique, againſt the inuaſion of the Turke.

This Mathias ſurnamed Coruinus, was the younger ſonne of the moſt famous captaine Io. Huniades, whoſe elder brother Vladiſlaus, a gentleman of ſuch courage as might well ſhew whoſe ſon he was, being not able to diſgeſt the iniuries and diſgraces done vnto him and his brother, by Vlricus countie of Cilie, and vnckle vnto Ladiſlaus the yong king of Bohemia and Hungarie ; for the deſpite he alwaies bare vnto their father Huniades, ſlew the ſame Vlricus at Alba Regalis, euen in the kings court. Which outrage the young king was glad for the preſent to winke at; and alſo to grant him pardon; as hauing taken away the man, whoſe immoderat power well ſtood not with the kings ſafetie : but indeed fearing the citizens of Alba, and the men of war, who exceedingly fauoured the ſons of Huniades for their fathers ſake. For all that, Ladiſlaus returning into Bohemia, cauſed both the ſons of Huniades vpon the ſudden to be apprehended, and moſt cruelly executed, Vladiſlaus being then about ſix and twentie yeres old. Mathias the yonger brother was kept in priſon, expecting nothing elſe but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune, as vndoubtedly he had. had not Ladiſlaus the yong king, vpon the ſudden, as he was vpon the top of his marriage with Magdalaine the French kings daughter, by vntimely death bin taken away. After whoſe death the Hungarians for the loue they bare vnto the remembrance of Huniades, by a militarie election, choſe this Mathias his yongeſt ſonne, then in priſon at Prague, to be their king. Wherof Pogebrache (who after the death of Ladiſlaus, of an old gouernor had made himſelfe the yong king of Bohemia) hauing ſpeedy intelligence as he was ſitting at ſupper, ſent for Mathias his priſoner, and when he was come, commanded him to ſit downe at the vpper end of the table : whereat the young gentleman, being then but about eighteene yeares of age, and ſore abaſhed, began to craue pardon. But when the King would needs haue it ſo, & that he was ſet, the king to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be of good cheere, for that he had good newes to tell him. Good newes, ſaid he, if it would pleaſe your maieſtie to grant me libertie. Yea that, ſaid the king, and more too : and then ſaluting him by the name of the king of Hungarie, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the generall conſent of the Hungarians, choſen their king. And ſo in few daies after, married to him his daughter : which done, he furniſhed him with all things fit for his eſtate, and royally accompanied him into Hungarie, where he was with great ioy and triumph receiued of the Hungarians : ouer whom he afterwards glorioſly raigned for the ſpace of eight and thirtie yeares. In which time he notably enlarged the kingdome of Hungarie, and became a farre greater terrour vnto the Turkes, than euer was his father Huniades. And therewithall (which is not to be accounted in the leaſt part of his praiſes) was alwaies a great fauourer and furtherer of good letters and ingenious deuiſes.

But to returne again vnto our purpoſe, Mathias hauing well conſidered of that the Venetians had requeſted, anſwered them, that they had many times before in like caſe refuſed to giue aid vnto the Hungarian kings his predeceſſours : yea, and that more was, thought it a thing not reaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands; foraſmuch as they then receiued no harme from the Turke, but were in league and amitie with him : ſo that the Hungarian kings wanting their helpe, had many times receiued greater loſſe from the Turke, than otherwiſe they ſhould haue done, if they had beene by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all ſuch vnkindnes, & to grant them what they had requeſted: promiſing the next Spring to inuade the Turks dominion, & according to their requeſt, to take into his protection all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique : which thing hee moſt honourably performed. For with the firſt of the Spring he paſſed ouer Danubius at Belgrade with a puiſſant armie, and raſed the forts which the Turks had built thereabouts; and ſo entring into Seruia, laid all the country waſt before him: and afterwards laden with ſpoile, returned home, carrying away with him twentie thouſand captiues. Neither ſo reſted, but with great good fortune maintained great warres againſt Mahomet during all the time of his raigne: and afterwards againſt Baiazet his ſonne alſo, wherein he moſt commonly returned with victorie: ſo that it is of him as truly as briefly written, That no Chriſtian king or chieftaine, did more often or with greater fortune fight againſt the Turkiſh nation, or had of them greater victories.

Mahomet deliuered of the great feare he had before conceiued of the generall preparation of the Chriſtian princes againſt him, determined now to worke his wil vpon ſuch as were neereſt vnto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late ouerthrow of Seremet with his armie in Epirus, ſtucke in his ſtomacke: in reuenge whereof, he now ſent vnto Balabanus Badera, a moſt valiant captaine, with fifteene thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot, to inuade Epirus. This Balabanus was an Epirot borne, a chorles ſonne of that country: and being of a boy taken captiue of the Turks, as hee was keeping of his fathers cattell, and of long time brought vp in ſeruitude amongſt them, framing himſelfe both to their religion and manners, after long ſeruice got the credit of a good common ſouldier. But when as at the taking of Conſtantinople, it was his fortune to be the firſt man of the Turks armie that gained the top of the wals, and entered the citie, he was for that peece of ſeruice euer afterwards of Mahomet greatly eſteemed: and beſide his other great preferments, now ſent Generall of his armie into Epirus. Who as ſoone as he was come to Alchria (a citie vpon the frontiers of that countrey) ſent many rich Preſents to Scanderbeg, making ſhew as if he had beene deſirous peaceably to lie vpon the borders committed to his charge, without farther purpoſe to trouble his countrey: yet indeed waiting nothing more than ſome notable opportunitie, ſuddenly to doe him the greateſt miſchiefe hee could. But Scanderbeg well ſeeing into the malice of the man, reiected his faigned friendſhip and gifts, and in deriſion ſent him a ſpade, a mattocke, a flaile, with other ſuch inſtruments belonging vnto husbandrie, willing him to take in hand thoſe tooles, and to follow his fathers trade of life, and to leaue the conducting of armies vnto men of greater skill and better place. Which diſgrace Balabanus tooke in exceeding euill part, purpoſing in himſelfe, if euer it lay in his power, to be thereof reuenged. Wherefore knowing that Scanderbeg with a ſmall power lay not farre off vpon the frontiers of his kingdome, he determined ſuddenly in the night to ſet vpon him before he were aware of his comming, and ſo if it were poſſible to ouerthrow him, but Scanderbeg hauing knowledge thereof by his ſcouts, ſet forward in good order to haue met him. When Balabanus perceiuing that he was diſcouered, ſtaid vpon the way, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbeg, who had then in his armie but foure thouſand horſemen, and one thouſand and fiue hundred foot, but all choiſe men, and moſt expert ſouldiers, and then lay in a large pleaſant valley called Valchal; At the farther end whereof Balabanus lay alſo encamped, neere vnto a rough and woodie hill which encloſed that part of the valley. Whileſt both armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well conſidering the ground the enemie had taken, and that it was like he would offer him battell, with cheerfull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiers: ſtraitly charging them vpon paine of his diſpleaſure, That if the enemie vpon the fortune of the battell, ſhould chance to flie or to retire, they ſhould not in any caſe purſue them farther than the ſtraits of the hill whereby the enemie lay: gheſſing too truly, that he would in ſo conuenient a place leaue part of his armie in ambuſh, as a ſure refuge to truſt vnto whatſoeuer ſhould befall. When hee had thus encouraged and inſtructed his ſouldiers, he riſe with his armie, and in good order retired vnto the riſing of an hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay: of purpoſe to haue the aduantage of the ground, if the enemy ſhould follow to giue him battel. Balabanus ſeeing him retire, and the ſmall number of his armie, thought verily that he had fled for feare: and therefore to ſtay him who ment nothing leſſe than to flie ſet forward in great haſte. The Turkes thinking vpon ſo great aduantage to haue found no great reſiſtance, followed after Scanderbeg as if they had, had him in chaſe; and by that time they were come to the place where hee ſtaied, were by their haſt greatly diſordered and out of aray. Scanderbeg his old truſtie ſouldiours nothing diſmaied with the haſtie comming and hideous clamour of the Turks,receiued G them with great courage ; ſo that there began a fierce battell , with much ſlaughter on both ſides,which for a great while ſtood doubtfull. Yet ſuch was the inuincible courage of Scanderbegs reſolute ſouldiers,that the Turks(who as then fought in great diſorder)were at laſt put to flight , and with much ſlaughter chaſed vnto the ſtraits of the mountain, where Scanderbeg had before commanded his men to ſtay. But certaine of his beſt and principall captaines forgetting what he had ſaid vnto them;and led on (whether with the heat & furie of the battell, or rather with ineuitable deſtinie is hard to ſay) vnaduiſedly purſued the enemie into thoſe ſtraits,whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they ſhould not enter : where they were on euery ſide beſet with their enemies, ariſing out of ambuſh : and after they had a long time deſperatly fought as wild beaſts encloſed with hunters,at laſt oppreſſed with multitude,were together taken and brought to Balabanus,by whom they were forthwith ſent to Mahomet to Conſtantinople. Who as ſoone as he heard of their taking,is reported with great reioycing to haue ſaid, Now am I ſure that the ſtrength of Scanderbeg is broken. The H names of the principall men which were there taken,was Moſes Golemus of Dibra,the greateſt captaine of Epirus next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe ; Giuriza Vladerius,Scanderbeg his kinſman ; Muſachius,Scanderbeg his nephew by his ſiſter Angelina ; Ginius Muſachius ; Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended Sfetigrade againſt Amurath ; Nicholaus Beriſius, Georgius Chucca,and Ginius Maneſius : whereof euery one of them was able to haue conducted a great armie, and might worthilie haue beene accounted amongſt the greateſt captaines of that age. The taking of theſe worthie men brought ſuch a generall ſorrow and heauineſſe vpon Epirus, that I the victorie was nothing accounted of,euery man lamenting the loſſe of ſuch notable leaders.

Scanderbeg carefull of their deliuerance ; preſently ſent an Embaſſadour to Mahomet, requeſting that hee might redeeme his priſoners , either by exchanging of others for them,or elſe for ſuch ranſome as it ſhould pleaſe him to ſet downe. But hee knowing them to bee Scanderbeg his beſt Captaines, would neither exchange them for others, nor graunt that they ſhould bée ranſomed for any Gold : But after hee had vſed them with all the diſpight hee could deuiſe, cauſed them all by little and little, to bee ſlaine quicke : in which miſerable torment they liued fifteene daies, and ſo died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than diſcouraged ; and in reuenge thereof, with fire and ſword entered into the Turkes dominion, ſparing nothing that hee could either burne, or poſſibly by any other K meanes deſtroy.

Moſes & other worthie captaines cruelly executed by Mahomet.

Mahomet glad of the taking of theſe notable men (although they were bought with the liues of many of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the onely man that knew how to fight againſt Scanderbeg:and in reward of his good ſeruice, ſent him diuers rich gifts,with commandement to repaire againe his armie, and to proceed in his warres ſo happily begun.
Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet truſting more vnto his policie,than his ſtrength, lying at Alchria, ſent againe diuers rich Preſents to Scanderbeg, as deſirous to liue in peace by him ; but ſeeking indeed to bring him into ſecuritie , and ſo ſuddenly (if it were poſſible) to entrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing, reiected his faigned friendſhip together with his Preſents,as ſent from a baſe peiſant. Wherupon Balabanus entred L into a new deuiſe, and by ſecret meanes, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg his ſcouts, whereof ſome were Balabanus his kinſmen,though it were to Scanderbeg vnknowne. By which practiſe,he had vpon the ſudden in the night oppreſſed Scanderbeg,lying encamped in Oronycheum, if Scanderbeg himſelfe (who commonly ſpent moſt part of the night in carefull watch) going about the campe, had not in the ſilence of the night a far off perceiued the comming of the enemie by the noiſe of his horſes : and thereupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his armie in ſuch order as he beſt could,was readie to receiue him ; and at laſt after a great fight, put him to flight : and hauing him in chaſe , ſlew moſt part of his armie , Balabanus himſelfe with a ſmall remnant hardly eſcaping.

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouerthrowne , and his armie loſt, M hee was in doubt, whether to ſend another Generall, or elſe againe to prooue the fortune of the old. But after hee had well conſidered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captaine, and one that well knew the countrey of Epirus,and withall a mortall enemie to Scanderbeg : he reſolued to ſtaie vpon him,and not to ſend any other. So committing to his charge foureteene thouſand horſmen and three thouſand foot, ſent him againe to inuade Epirus: and the more to A encourage him, promiſed to make him king of that countrey, if he could ſubdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with his armie comming to Alchria, and ſtill in vaine plotting how hee might circumuent his warie enemie; after his wonted manner ſent diuers preſents to Scanderbeg; which he ſtill ſcornefully refuſed. Three months he lay ſtill at Alchria, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts: but finding nothing that pleaſed himſelfe, he determined to aduenture by plaine force to ſubdue him. And vpon that reſolution marched with all his armie into the great plaines neere vnto Sfetigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his armie alſo, which then conſiſted of eight thouſand horſemen and fifteen hundred foot: with which ſmal power he refuſed not to ioyne battell with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they were come to handie blowes, to haue ſeene Scanderbeg his men fight, a man would haue B thought them rather to haue bin raging Lyons than men, they ſo furiouſly aſſailed their enemies, without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill gouerned that battel, carefully prouiding for euery danger: himſelfe valiantly fighting in the head of this battell, but not without care of the reſt, ſtill ſending ſpeedie releefe where moſt need was, and bringing in freſh ſupplies in ſted of them that were wounded or ſlain, performed all the parts of a moſt worthy cheefetaine and valiant ſouldier: where moſt peril was, there was he ſtraight, and at his preſence danger fled, as if victory had attended vpon him. But whileſt he thus fought in the midſt of his enemies, his horſe fortuned to be ſlaine vnder him, and falling downe with him, ſore bruiſed one of his armes, whereof he complained long time after. The Turks ſeeing him downe, preſſed on fiercely to haue ſlaine him: but he was quickly C reſcued by his owne ſouldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman, a great commander in the Turks armie, ſlew him in fight hand to hand: whereupon ſuch a terrour fell vpon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themſelues to plaine flight. Scanderbeg purſuing them with ſuch execution, that of that great armie few eſcaped with Balabanus to carrie newes home.

Balabanus now thrice vanquiſhed by Scanderbeg, and in the laſt battell hauing loſt what hee could looſe, except he ſhould haue loſt himſelfe, returned to Mahomet at Conſtantinople, of whom he was ſharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had ſo often receiued. At which time Balabanus at firſt gaue place to the kings furie: but afterwards when the heat was ouer, he with a large diſcourſe cunningly excuſed himſelfe, imputing all theſe miſhaps vnto the appointment D of God, and the fortune of war: and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vain to ſend ſuch ſmal armies into Epirus. But if it would pleaſe him at once to ſend two valiant captaines with a puiſſant and ſtrong armie, who diuiding the ſame betwixt them, and entering at one time into diuers parts of Epirus, might ſpoile the countrey before them, and encloſe Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he ſhould aduenture to giue either of them battell; being before reſolued neither of them to offer him battel, or yet to accept of the ſame being by him offered, except the other were alſo at hand: and ſo by mutuall conſent to vndertake him, but neuer ſingle. By which courſe he promiſed vnto him an eaſie and aſſured victorie: for as much as it were impoſſible for any man ſo beſet, and as it were on euery ſide coupt vp with his enemies, either to eſcape, or yet to make any great reſiſtance. This perſuaſion of Balabanus ſo wel E fitted the tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himſelfe to be the man to put his owne deuiſe in execution: giuing him commiſſion to leuie ſuch an armie as he ſhould thinke ſufficient for the performance of that ſeruice: and withall to aſſociat vnto himſelfe for his companion which ſoeuer of his captains he pleaſed. Balabanus according to his commiſſion, tooke muſters of the men of war, and made choice of fortie thouſand good ſouldiers, and choſe one Iacup Arnauth (otherwiſe called Iames the Epirot, becauſe he was alſo borne in Epirus, a valiant captaine) to be his companion: whom he ſent with ſixteene thouſand ſoldiers by the way of Theſſalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no caſe to ioine battel with Scanderbeg, vntill he himſelfe were alſo come into the country with the other part of the armie. And F ſo ſetting both forward, Balabanus taking the neerer way through Thracia and Macedonia, came firſt into Epirus with twentie thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, and encamped in the vally of Valchall. Scanderbeg both by his eſpials and letters from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, hauing certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpoſe, had in readineſſe againſt his comming a ſtrong armie of eight thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, all choiſe ſoldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus, & incamped in G Valchaal, ſent out three eſpials to diſcouer in what order he lay: one of which ſpies was Bala- banus his kinſman (but not ſo knowne to Scanderbeg) by whoſe perſuaſion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus his army, & ſhould haue returned to Scanderbeg to haue giuen intelligence of that they had ſeene, like falſe traitors went ouer to Balabanus, and diſcouered vnto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping therefore to receiue ſome great reward, as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maruelling that his eſ-pials returned not againe as they were appointed, and doubting that they had bin by the ene-mie intercepted, and vſing many times in matters of ſuch importance to truſt himſelfe beſt, preſently went out with fiue luſtie ſoldiers, & rid forth to diſcouer the maner of the enemies lying. Balabanus like a craftie fox, miſtruſting that Scanderbeg deceiued of his firſt ſpies would for like purpoſe ſend forth others, laied certain horſmen in ſecret ambuſh in diuers places, to intercept them if it were poſſible. Theſe horſmen lay not ſo couert, but that they were in good time deſcried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eies, pried into euery buſh & H thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger: and yet but ſo that he came to handie ſtroks, where Scanderbeg & his followers oppreſſed with multitude, were glad to flie as faſt they could into the next wood, the Turks horſmen following them at the heels.

It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old tree was fallen croſſe the way, which Scander- beg putting ſpurs to his horſe, leapt ouer with one of his men after him; the other foure not able to get ouer, turned back vpon the Turks, and there fighting were ſlaine. One of the Turks which ſo hardly purſued Scanderbeg being wel mounted, forced his horſe to leape the tree, and I ſtill followed after Scanderbeg: who looking backe and ſeeing but one, turned vpon him and ſlew him: the other Turks hauing ſlaine foure of Scanderbegs men which could not get ouer the tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came backe againe to his campe; and there with all ſpeed put his armie in readines to go againſt Balabanus before the comming of his companion, with the other part of his armie. Vpon which reſolu-tion, after he had with cheerfull perſuaſions encouraged his ſouldiers, and filled their mindes with hope of victorie, he ſet forward, and came with great ſpeed into the valley of Valchaal where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had diuided his army into foure ſquadrons; whereof Tanuſius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Peieus Emanu- el, and Scanderbeg himſelfe conducted the fourth. So ſetting forward, he ſent before certaine K companies of harquebuſiers, and archers, to prouoke the enemie and to draw him forth vnto battel. Balabanus alſo ſhewed himſelf with his army in ſeemly order before his tents, but there ſtood faſt & would nor ſtir, expecting continually the comming of his fellow. Which Scan- derbeg perceiuing, and that he ſought but to dallie out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had again retired his armie into the ſafetie of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him, continually skirmiſhing with ſuch as he ſent out, daring him to the field, & brauing him vnto his trenches, in ſuch ſort, as if he would haue forced the ſame, & by ſtrong hand haue ſet him out thence: wherat the Turks fretted and chaſed exceedingly, inſomuch that they were ready to riſe againſt their Generall, becauſe he would not lead them forth to battel, but ſuffer them to be ſo diſgraced. Balabanus mindful of that he had promiſed to Mahomet his great lord and L maſter, did what he might to haue deferred time; but when hee ſaw that his fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter; being ſo continually aſſailed & braued by Scan- derbegs ſouldiers, that his Turks therewith prouoked, were readie oftentimes to haue iſſued out without his direction, and now no remedie but that he muſt needs fight, placed his men in good order, and ſo went out of his trenches to giue battell, himſelfe leading the left wing thereof: where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both ſides.
But Scanderbeg ſtrengthned with the old gariſon of Croia, and the moſt expert ſouldiers of Di-bra, preuailed vpon the Turks & forced them to giue ground, yet ſtil keping their order. The fight was ſo great in this part of the battell, that in other places they ſtood almoſt ſtill as lookers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals: which thing Scanderbeg perceiuing, M drew certain troups out of the right wing, whereas he ſaw was leaſt danger, which ſpeedily fetching a compaſſe about, charged the ſide of the enemies armie; and againe withdrawing themſelues, and with wonderfull celeritie wheeling about, ſet vpon the backe of them that fought in the left wing: ſo that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by

A of Scanderbeg his armie, fell in other places with a great ſlaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainſtood his enemies, ſo long as there was any hope left: but when he ſaw the fortune of Scanderbeg to preuaile, and all about him to become deſperat, he made ſhift for himſelfe, and fled out of the battell as faſt as he could. The reſt of the armie being in other places, before troubled and diſordred, fled alſo, ſome one way, ſome another, euery man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus eſcaped: the reſt were for moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners.

Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well breathed himſelfe after this victorie, and diuided the ſpoyle amongſt his ſouldiers, but that newes was brought to him in Poſt from the ladie Mamiza his ſiſter, then lying at Petrella, That Iacuppe Arnauth was by the way of Belgrade come into Epirus B with an armie of ſixteene thouſand horſemen, burning and deſtroying the country before him, and then lay incamped in the plaines of Tyranna the leſſe. When Scanderbeg to prooue the minds of his ſouldiers, had cherefully imparted vnto them ſuch newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing diſmayed, but readie to follow him with ſuch cherefulneſſe of countenance and mind, as if they ſhould haue gone to ſome great feaſt or banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a diſcomfited armie. This cherefulneſſe of his ſouldiers, Scanderbeg tooke as an aſſured token of his good ſucceſſe; and hauing all things in readineſſe, preſently ſet forward, and in ſhort time came to the place where the enemie lay. Iacuppe hearing of his comming, remooued his campe into a corner of the plaine of Tyranna, neere vnto a little hill, as a place of more ſafetie for his armie C to lie in. Scanderbeg hauing taken the Plaine, incamped his Armie in the ſame place from whence Iacuppe was but a little before departed, where he reſted one whole day. The next morning, to terrifie his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he cauſed diuers of the Turks heads which were ſlain in the late battel (which he had brought for that purpoſe) to be caſt before the trenches of the enemie; and withall, diuers of them which were taken priſoners, to be ſhewne: which Iacuppe beholding, in great deſpaire ſayd, I ſee the euill hap of Mahomet. Immediatly after, Scanderbeg ſent forth 500 horſemen to skirmiſh with the Turks, commanding them, ſo ſoone as they were charged by the enemie, to retyre, if haply they might ſo be drawne into battell. Which fell out accordingly: for Iacuppe now ſeeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing alſo without further delay to trie his D fortune, came readily into the field, and began a fierce battell: which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiuing in what part of the armie Iacuppe was, bent his greateſt force that way, and ſingling him out, with his owne hand ſlew him. Wherewith the Turks being diſcouraged, forthwith betooke themſelues to flight, and in flying, were for moſt part ſlaine or taken. Thoſe which eſcaped the preſent furie of the ſword, ſtragling thorow the countrey by thicke woods and blind wayes, were by the country people either ſlaine or taken priſoners. In theſe two battels were ſlaine of the Turks 24000, and 6000 taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were loſt about a thouſand. Scanderbeg and his ſouldiers were ſo wearie of the ſlaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, That Balabanus was fled but with one cornet of E horſemen, and might eaſily be ſurpriſed if he were well purſued; he ſayd, O let ſome of our enemies liue to report their owne ſlaughter, and our victorie. After that Scanderbeg had in this ſort vanquiſhed theſe great captaines, he preſently entred into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure without reſiſtance, made hauocke of all that came in his way: and after returning to Croia with victorie, brake vp his armie, and gaue his ſoldiers leaue to depart, euery man to his owne dwelling.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to vndertake to kill Scanderbeg. Theſe traitors came vnto Scanderbeg as fugitiues, making ſuch ſhew of the deteſtation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall gouernment, and vaine ſuperſtition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others, reputed to be in deed the men, they deſired to be accounted: and ſo after they had learned the principles of the Chriſtian religion, were by F their owne deſire baptiſed. But treaſon againſt Princes whom God hath in his moſt mightie protection, cannot be long couered; much leſſe, without his great ſufferance performed. So fortuned it, that theſe two falſe diſſembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunitie to performe their diueliſh deuice, vpon ſome occaſion fell at variance betwixt themſelues, and in their heat let ſome ſuch words fall, as being taken vp by ſome there preſent, drew them both into ſuſpicion: and thereupon being ſtraitly examined, it was at laſt by them confeſſed, That they were ſent by Mahomet, of purpoſe to haue ſlaine Scanderbeg: for which their treaſon they were both preſently executed, as they had right well deſerued. When Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouercome, Iacup ſlaine, and both their Armies almoſt quite deſtroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almoſt franticke: and afterwards calling together his great Baſſa's, reſolued by their aduice, not to ſend any more Generals againſt Scanderbeg, but to go himſelfe in perſon, with ſuch an armie as ſhould at once make an end of his wars in Epirus for euer. Hereupon commiſſions were directed thorow all his kingdome, and an army raiſed of two hundred thouſand men. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing certaine aduertiſement, fortified all his cities and ſtrong holds, eſpecially the citie of Croia, vpon the fortune whereof depended the whole ſtate of his kingdome. Into this citie he put a ſtrong garriſon of his moſt valiant & faithfull ſoldiers, & throughly furniſht the ſame with all things neceſſarie for the enduring of a long ſiege: and left one Balthazar Perduci (a graue and worthie captaine) gouernor thereof. With like care he prouided for the ſafetie of his other cities, and tooke order that the countrey people were either receiued into the ſtrong townes, or elſe conueyed into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the countrey for the Turks to prey vpon; as he had in like caſe done long before, at the comming of old Amurath to the ſiege of Croia, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had ſet all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with fourescore thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his armie) was entred into Epirus, and ranging ouer the country two dayes, came and ſate downe before Croia: vpon whom the gouernor at his firſt comming made many braue ſallies. In few dayes after came Mahomet with his huge armie, and there incamped alſo: who at his firſt comming ſummoned the city, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him, vpon ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as it pleaſed himſelf, (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthie gouernor returned him no other anſwer, than by continuall thundring ſhot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet cauſed ſuch ordnance as he had to be planted for batterie; and commanded other new to be caſt, of ſuch mettall as he had for that purpoſe brought in maſſe: all which, he did rather to ſtrike a terrour into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the citie by force: knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almoſt impregnable. Whileſt Mahomet was thus buſied, & little or nothing preuailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods & mountaines, with a ſmall armie of moſt valiant and couragious ſouldiers, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomets armie, and ſuch as brought in victuall or neceſſaries for his campe: and manie times in the night ſuddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great camp with great ſlaughter, and with continuall alarmes neuer ſuffered them to reſt in quiet. Mahomet ſeeing his armie to decreaſe dayly, and no hope of winning the citie but by famin, which would require a long ſiege: and fearing alſo to make that ſame place againe famous by ſome notable miſchance which might happen vnto himſelfe vnder the walls of Croia, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himſelfe to Conſtantinople, and to leaue Balabanus with a great part of his armie to continue the ſiege. Vpon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the ſiege, to Balabanus, ioyning vnto him eight of his moſt expert captaines; yet ſo, as that they ſhould be all at Balabanus his command. And ſo leauing with him three and twentie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and with euery one of the other eight Captaines ſeuen thouſand moe, departed himſelfe with the reſt of his armie from Croia, towards Conſtantinople. But by the way as he went he tooke from Scanderbeg certaine ſmall forts, and with faire promiſes corrupting the Gouernour of a place called Chidna, wherein eight thouſand of Scanderbeg his ſouldiers lay, had the ſame deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before giuen, That all the ſouldiers with the reſt of the people ſhould in ſafetie depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promiſe, he cauſed them all moſt cruelly to be cut in pieces, ſparing neither man, woman, nor child, to the great griefe and weakning of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued ſo great a loſſe. And after he had ſo raged, he in great melancholie returned vnto Conſtantinople.

Scanderbeg diſdaining to haue his chiefe citie beſieged by Balabanus, (ſomtime one of the baſeſt of his fathers ſubiects) and yet finding himſelfe vnable to relieue the ſame, for as much

A as the ſouldiers were with continual wars ſore waſted,and his warie enemies lay ſo encamped, as that they were not but by a ſtrong armie to be remoued, ſent vnto the Venetians and other the confederat princes of Albania, Illyria,and Dalmatia,praying of them aid now at his need againſt that enemie, which preuailing againſt him,would forthwith ſet vpon them. All which princes promiſed forthwith to ſend their ſuccours. At the ſame time alſo he paſſed ouer into Italie ſecretly,and diſguiſed in ſimple attire,came to Rome,to craue aid of Paulus the ſecond of that name, then great Biſhop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; ſo cold was his deuotion: onely at his departure he gaue vnto Iunetrio,Scanderbeg his treaſurer,a poore almes of three thouſand duckats.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus,found all ſuch aid ready as was promiſed from the confe- B derat princes,but eſpecially from the Venetians, which was for moſt part drawne out of their garriſons of Scutari,Driuaſto, Alyſſa,and Dirrhachium: ſo that he had in few daies in his armie thirteeene thouſand foure hundred choice ſouldiers. With this ſtrength he marched towards Croia: but vnderſtanding by the way,that Ionima was within a daies iourny,comming with a new ſupplie to his brother Balabanus, he drew out certaine troupes of his beſt horſemen,and coaſting ouer the country in the night,ſuddenly came vpon the Turks,and put them to flight: where amongſt others, Ionima himſelfe,with his ſonne Hedar, were taken priſoners; whom he ſhewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit ſo happily performed,he with all ſpeed returned to his armie: and ſo marching to Croia, by plaine force driue the Turks from the mountaine Cruina, their greateſt ſtrength, and neereſt to the citie of Croia. C Which thing when Balabanus ſaw, he with certaine troups of horſemen rid euen to the gates of the citie,perſuading the defendants to yeeld the citie,making them in the name of his maſter ſuch offers and promiſes as he thought might moſt moue them. But they nothing regarding his words,but rather incenſed with his preſumption,ſallied out vpon him, and inforced him to retire: but he therewith enraged,and halfe mad for anger,came vpon them with a freſh charge, thinking by plaine force to haue driuen them backe into the citie. In which skirmiſh he was by one Georgius Alexius,with a bullet,ſhot quite thorow the throat; and feeling himſelfe mortally wounded,ſetting ſpurres to his horſe,ran as faſt as he could to his campe,where he preſently fell downe from his horſe and died. The Turks diſcouraged with the death of their General,& the comming of Scanderbeg,roſe the ſame night,& with great ſilence retired D themſelues vnto the plaine of Tirana,about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forſaken tents of the Turks,found therin great ſtore of corne and other victuals,which he cauſed to be forthwith conueyed into the city,& in triumph followed after himſelfe,to the great ioy and comfort of his late beſieged ſubiects: whom hee highly commended for their fidelitie,and bountifully rewarded according to their deſerts. The ſame day he ſent certaine companies of ſouldiers to take the ſtrait paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe in their returne out of Epirus: which when the Turks vnderſtood,they ſent two meſſengers to Scanderbeg (who ſeemed to be men of good account in the armie) offering in the name of the reſt of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horſes and armes, ſo E that they might in ſafetie depart with their liues. Which their requeſt Scanderbeg propounding to his counſellors and captains,was by them diuerſly digeſted. In concluſion,they receiued this anſwer from Scanderbeg himſelfe, That as they came into his countrey, without his commandment,ſo ſhould they not by his leaue depart thence. The Turks receiuing this ſhort anſwer by their meſſengers,& conſidering that they muſt needs in that bare country in ſhort time periſh,either with famin or with the ſword,the ſame night departed from Tiranna, and in the dead time of the night entering the aforeſaid ſtraits,by plain force deſperatly brake thorow and eſcaped, but not without their great loſſe: for whoſe eſcape the common ſouldiers murmured grieuouſly againſt Scanderbeg,and were not without much adoe appeaſed. In ſhort time after, Scanderbeg recouered al ſuch places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put F to ſword the ſoldiers he had left for the keeping of the ſame: which done, he brake vp his armie,retaining only two thouſand horſmen & a thouſand foot for the defence of his frontiers.

1466 The Turkiſh tyrant hearing of the euil ſucceſſe of his affaires in Epirus, as that his Generall was ſlaine,Croia relieued,his armie diſcomfited,and al that he had done,brought to nought, fretted thereat exceedingly,& was therewith ſo much grieued,that he could not for a ſeaſon eat or drink,or take reſt,his diſcontented thoughts ſo much troubled him. In the end,to reme-die the matter, he reſolued the next Spring to go again in perſon himſelfe with a moſt puiſſant G armie into Epirus, and ſo if it were poſſible, to make a full conqueſt thereof: of which his purpoſe Scanderbeg vnderſtanding, prouided for his comming, as hee had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former reſolution, with a mightie armie entred into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour & charge, firſt repaired or rather re-edified the old ruines of the citie of Valmes, wherein he left a ſtrong garriſon, of purpoſe to trouble that part of the country. From thence he marched to Dirrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnum) a city vpon the ſea coaſt, then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman empire, but eſpecially for the flight of the Roman Se-nat thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the ciuil wars betwixt Caſar and Pom-peius. This city Mahomet thought to haue taken vnprouided, & ſo vpon the ſudden to haue car- H ried it, but was therein much deceiued, finding it ſtrongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there ſpent ſome time, & to his great loſſe in vain attempted the citie, he riſe vpon the ſudden: & retiring into Epirus, came and ſat down againe before Croia, of purpoſe by his ſudden comming to haue terrified the citizens: and vainly perſuaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Dirrachium, for that in the aſſailing thereof he had diſcouered many of Stunderbegs men, and thereby ſuppoſed him to haue bin there alſo; the greateſt cauſe why he ſo ſuddenly riſe and came to Croia. At his firſt comming he offered great rewards and large priuiledges vnto the citizens, if they would forthwith yeeld vp their citie; otherwiſe hee threatned vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart thence before he had it: wherunto he receiued no other anſwer out of the citie than was ſent I him by the mouth of the cannon, or brought him by many moſt braue ſallies. Scanderbeg in the mean while continually moleſting his campe, & euery night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what ſmall purpoſe it would be for him to lie there long, riſe with his armie, and marched againe to the ſea ſide, to a place now called the head of Redon vpon the gulfe of Venice, not far from Dirrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new citie called Chiurill, not yet finiſhed: which Mahomet in deſpight of the man, raſed downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the mountaines, hee went to ſeeke them out, and was with great loſſe by thoſe mountaine people repulſed: Scanderbeg ſtil following them at the heels, and awaiting all opportunities, K daily cut off part of his armie. So that at laſt the tyrant deſpairing of any good to bee done in that expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, hauing atchieued nothing worth his com-ming, and ſo, full of diſcontentment and melancholie returned into Conſtantinople.

After all theſe great troubles, Scanderbeg rid ouer moſt part of Epirus, to view the ſtate of his kingdome, and ſo at laſt came to Lyſſa (a citie of the Venetians, which he had alwaies ſpecially liked) there to confer with the Venetian legat and other the confederat princes, of matters concerning their ſtate in generall, as his manner was: but more particularly how they might take the citie of Valmes, which Mahomet had the laſt yere built in the ſeignorie of Ary-annites Comynat, and much troubled that part of Epirus. But whilſt he lay there, he fel ſicke of a feauer, which daily ſo increaſed vpon him, that he became ſicke euen vnto death: and now L perceiuing his end to draw nigh, ſent for his wife and ſon, with the princes & lords his confe-derats, & the embaſſadors of the Venetians, into his bedchamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably diſcourſed of his troubleſome life led among them, than he had before paſſed the ſame, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to enſue, he earneſtly exhorted them to continue in vanitie & concord, and vliantly to ſtand in defence of their religion, country, and liberty. And afterwards turning his ſpeech to his wife & his ſon, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians: who by the articles of the confederation betwixt him and them, were in honor bound to protect his ſon and kingdome, during the time of his minoritie, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the ſame. In fine he willed his wife after his death to paſſe ouer with her ſonne into Apulia, where they might in ſafety and quiet liue vpon ſuch poſſeſſions as he there held by the gift of King Ferdinand. And M ſo after hee had with moſt feruent prayer commended his ſoule into the hands of Almightie

His dead bodie was with the generall lamentation of all men roially buried in the cathedrall church of S. Nicholas at Lyſſa: where it reſted in peace, vntill that about nine yeares after, the Turks comming to the ſiege of Scodra, by the way tooke the citie of Lyſſa, and there with great deuotion digged vp his bones, reckoning it in ſome part of their happineſſe, if they might but ſee or touch the ſame: and ſuch as could get any part thereof, were it neuer ſo little, cauſed the ſame to be ſet, ſome in ſiluer, ſome in gold, to hang about their necks, or weare vpon their bodies; perſuading themſelues by the wearing thereof to be partakers of ſuch good fortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himſelfe whileſt he liued: B which is not vnaptly by Gabriel Fairnus of Cremona, thus in verſe expreſſed.

SCANDERBEGVS EPIRI PRINCEPS ATHLETA CHRISTI OBIIT ANNO 1466

Paulus Iouius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib 3.

Turcarum clades, Othomanni nominis horror, Epiri tutela, illo iacuere ſepulchro:
Quo quondam inuicti cubuerunt oſſa Georgi.
Nunc & membra viri, & diſſectum in fruſtra ſepulchrum Interijt, ſparſi manes, conciſa vaguntur Oſſa, nec in gelida nunc ſaltem morte quieſcunt.

Namque vt is aſſertum toties cum laude paternum Imperium, exactâ moriens ætate reliquit: Illicet immanes tenuerunt omnia Turcæ.
Tum clari Herois venerati nobile buſtum, Oſſaque, marmoraque, inuictum condentia corpus, Abſtulerant, ſibi quiſque in partes ſecta minutas, Tanquam ijs bellica vis, & Martius ardor ineſſet: Et genium præſtare bonum, ſortemque valerent.
Sic quæ alijs tumulum virtus parat, abſtulit illi: Atque eadem diro venerandum præbuit hoſti.

In Engliſh thus:

The bloudie bane of faithleſſe Turkes, and terrour of their name, Epirus ſtrong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame:
Within that tombe wherein long ſince, Great Caſtriotus lay;
But now thoſe limbes and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away.
The remnants of that worthie wight out of his graue were torne, And being dead, could find no reſt, but were for Iewels worne.
For after he, farre ſpent with age, gaue place to fatall doome, And left his fathers kingdome, got and kept with great renowne; Forthwith the cruell Turks preuail'd, and all things there poſſeſt:
Who worſhipping his ſtately tombe, and place of quiet reſt, Dig'd vp his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine:
And glad was he that could thereof ſome little part obtaine.
As if in them ſome martiall force, or vertue great had beene:
Or fortune rare, ſuch as before in him was liuing ſeene.
So vertue, which to others giues a ſepulture and graue, Bereft it him, yet for'ſt his foe in honour it to haue.

Mathias king of Hungarie, taketh the kingdome of Boſna from the Turks.

Moſt part of the times of thoſe wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by ſea and the Hungarians by land, kept the Turks throughly buſied. Mathias Coruinus King of Hungarie (according to his promiſe made vnto the Venetians) entered into the kingdome of K Boſna, where by force he ouerthrew the ſtrong forts which the Turkes had built for the defence of their frontiers, and manfully draue them out before him vntill he came to Iaziga (of ſome called Iaitze) the chiefe citie of Boſna, which he at length took: & following the courſe of his victorie, ſcarcely ſuffered the Turkes to breath, vntill he had by force wreſted all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieued, in great fury came with a ſtrong armie into Boſna, and laid hard ſiege to Iaziga, which was by the Chriſtians right valiantly defended, vntill Mathias with a puiſſant armie came to the releefe thereof: who ſo troubled the Turks campe with continuall skirmiſhes on the one ſide, and they of the town with deſperat ſallies on the other; that at length the proud Turke was driuen to ſuch L extremitie, that he was glad ſecretly to ſteale away by night with all his armie into Seruia; and for haſt to leaue behind him both his tents & great ordnance, which (the Turks hiſtories report) he cauſed to be caſt into the riuer, becauſe it ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies, and relieued his city, followed the Turks into Seruia, and took part of that country alſo, which together with Boſna he vnited to the kingdome of Hungarie. In theſe warres, Mahomet had ſuch proofe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great ſtomacke to prouoke them farther: for why, the name of Mathias was now become vnto the Turks no leſſe dreadfull, than was ſometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the ſame time alſo with their gallies ſcoured the ſeas, & landing their men M ſometime in one place, ſometime in another, did great harme in many places of the Turks dominion neere vnto the ſea coaſt. Amongſt other their Generals at diuers times ſent from that ſtate, one Nicholas Canalis ſucceeding Lauretanus (whom we haue before ſpoken of) as ſoone as he had receiued his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of Salonichi, and landing his men, burnt diuers townes and villages alongſt the ſea ſide: And afterwards returning into Pelo-

A poneſus, he fortified the towne of Legoſticium in the gulfe of Patras; which worke the Turks with their often skirmiſhes laboured to haue hindred, but in deſpite of all they could doe, it was brought to perfection, and a ſtrong garriſon therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned againe to Eubœa. Shortly after, he with the ſame fleet put to ſea againe; and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Macédonia and Thracia, ſurpriſed the citie of Ænus which ſtandeth vpon the mouth of the riuer Meritza, called in antient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the famous cities Andrianople, and Philippopolis are alſo ſcituate. Canalis after hee had taken the ſpoyle of the citie, returned to his gallies, carrying away with him two thouſand captiues into Eubœa. At the ſame time alſo, the Venetians giuing aid vnto Nicholas Duchaine againſt his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principalitie of Zadrima, neere vnto the riuer of Drino in Epirus, gaue a great ouerthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrell of B Alexius.

Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done vnto him by the Venetians, and perceiuing that the Iſland of Eubœa (now called Nigroponte) was for the commodious ſcituation and ſtrength therof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all theſe wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a moſt ſure place of refuge; determined with himſelfe at once to be euen with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by ſea and land for the gaining of that place. This Iſland of Eubœa is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth ouer againſt that part of Græcia which was of old called Bæotia, from whence it is ſeparated with a narrow ſtrait of the ſea: it aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, fruit, & wood fit for ſhipping. The chiefe city thereof, was in antient time called Chalcide, and of latter time C Nigroponte, by which name alſo the whole Iſland was knowne: albeit the Turks now call it Egribos; a populous, rich, and ſtrong citie; ſo fortified with wals and bulwarkes, that (in moſt mens judgement) it ſeemed a place impregnable. Vnto this ſtrong citie, Mahomet reſolued to lay ſiege, knowing well, that vpon the fortune thereof depended the ſtate of the whole Iſland. Wherefore he aſſembled a mighty army, and made great preparation both by ſea and land: and when all things were in readineſſe, ſent Mahomet (the great Baſſa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other ſmall veſſels well furniſhed with ſouldiers, mariners, and all things neceſſarie, by ſea into Eubœa: and with a great army marched himſelfe by land through Achaia, vntill he came ouer againſt the citie of Chalcis. The Venetian Admirall hearing of the comming of the Turks fleet, ſet forward to haue met them neere vnto the ſtraits of D Helleſpontus: but after he had by his eſpials deſcried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himſelfe too weake, ſhaped his courſe to the Iſland of Sciros. The Baſſa comming out of the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, couered the ſea with his fleet, & holding on his intended courſe without let came to Eubœa: where at his firſt landing, he tooke Stora and Baſilicon, two ſmal townes, which he raſed to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As ſoone as this great fleet was there ariued, Mahomet cauſed a great bridge to be made of his ſmaller veſſels ouer the ſtrait betwixt Achaia and Eubœa; whereby he paſſed all his armie, and ſo belaied the citie round both by ſea and land. And after he had planted his batterie, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals: wherein he had in ſhort time made faire breaches, and the ſooner, for E that one Thomas of Liburnia (chiefe canonier of the citie) before corrupted by the Turks, by ſignes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakeſt: whereby they ſo aptly planted their batterie, as if they had taken view on the inſide of the wals. Which foule treaſon was at length perceiued, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little preuailed the tyrant thereby; for ſuch was the induſtrie of the defendants, that whatſoeuer he had by the furie of his great ordnance beat down by day, that they with reſtleſſe labor repaired again by night. Thus was the ſiege continued thirtie dayes, in which ſpace many a ſharpe aſſault was giuen by the Turks, to their great loſſe; and the citie ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtians. At length the Venetian Admirall (to the great comfort of the beſieged) came with his fleet within view of the city, making ſemblant as if he would haue giuen F the Turks battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to haue raiſed his ſiege, and haue got himſelfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians ſhould with their gallies haue broken the bridge, and ſo haue ſhut him vp into that Iſland: which thing it was thought the Admiral might haue done to his great praiſe, if he would as a couragious chiefetaine haue aduentured the matter, as he was earneſtly requeſted by the captaines of euery priuate gallie; who generally grieued to ſee him ſo great a commander, to let ſlip ſo faire an opportunitie. But he fearing to come any neerer, came to an anchor and moued not, neither gaue any ſigne of comfort or reliefe to the beſieged. Which thing the Turkiſh King quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged: hauing now in diuers places beaten downe the wals, and made them ſaultable, brought on his men to the breaches, promiſing them the ſpoile of the city, with many other great rewards and hie preferments according to their particular deſerts, whereof he ſaid, he would himſelfe be an eye-witnes. Hereupon the Turks gaue a moſt fierce and furious aſſault; which the defendants with inuincible courage receiued, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that the ditches were fill'd, & the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turks. But ſuch was the number of that populous armie (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks) that the liuing little felt the loſſe of the dead: Mahomet continually ſending in new ſupplies of freſh men, in ſtead of them that were ſlaine or wounded: ſo that one could no ſooner fall, but two or three ſtept vp in his roome, and ſo ſucceſſiuely, as if new men had ſprung out of the bodies of the dead. Twiſe they had euen woon the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull ſlaughter beaten out againe. This deadly and dreadful aſſault, was maintained a whole day and a night without intermiſſion. At length the defendants being for the moſt part ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the town now aſſaulted almoſt round, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like reſolute men, ſold their liues at a deere price vnto the Turks. Amongſt the ſlaine Chriſtians, were found the dead bodies of many notable women, who ſeeing the ruine of the citie, choſe rather to die with their friends in defence thereof, than aliue to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

Chalc is taken by the Turks.

Mahomet being now become Lord of the citie, and hauing loſt fortie thouſand of his Turks in that ſiege, in reuenge thereof cauſed all the men that were found in the citie aliue, to be put to moſt cruel death, eſpecially the Italians, vpon whom he ſhewed his tyrannie with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments. Paulus Ericus gouernor of the citie, with a few others, who with him were fled into the caſtle, without reſiſtance deliuered the ſame vnto him, vpon his faithfull promiſe, that they might in ſafetie depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The Gouernors daughter a maiden of incomparable beautie, was amongſt the reſt taken priſoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke hir preſented to Mahomet as the mirror of beauty: The barbarous tyrant greedie of ſo faire a prey, ſought firſt by flattering words and faire perſuaſion, to induce her to conſent to his deſire: but when he could not ſo preuaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to ſhew himſelfe in his owne nature, threatning her with death, torture, and force, worſe than death it ſelfe, if ſhe would not otherwiſe yeeld vnto his appetite. Whereunto the conſtant virgin (worthie eternall fame) anſwered ſo reſolutely, and ſo contrary to the tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be preſently ſlaine. The horrible and monſtrous crueltie, with the filthie outrages by that beaſtly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that citie, paſſeth all credit. Chalcis thus woon, the reſt of that fuitfull Iſland without further reſiſtance yeelded vnto the Turkiſh ſlauerie, vnder which it yet groaneth. This calamitie happened vnto the Venetian ſtate, or rather (to ſay truly) to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale, in the yeare of our redemption, 1470.

The fruitfull Iſland of Eubœa taken by the Turks.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the ſiege, had in the ſight of the citie lien at anchor as a looker on, fearing now that the citie was loſt, to be ſet vpon by the Turkes fleet, hoiſed ſaile, and laded with diſhonour returned in haſte vnto Venice, where he was by the commandement of the Senat committed to priſon, and afterward with all his familie exiled to Vtinum.

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his army out of Eubœa, and his fleet returned to Conſtantinople: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the citie, a little before loſt. But Mahomet had therein left ſo ſtrong a garriſon, that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their gallies, and to forſake their Iſland.

Chalcis thus loſt with all the Iſland of Eubœa, the Venetians choſe Petrus Mocenicus, a valiant and diſcreet gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in ſtead of Canalis: and by their embaſſadours ſolicited Sixtus the fourth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, and Ferdinand King

A of Naples, with Lewis king of Cyprus, and the grand maſter of the Rhodes, to ioyne their forces together with theirs againſt the great and common enemie: which thing all the aforeſaid Chriſtian princes promiſed them to do. And the more to intangle the Turke, they at the ſame time ſent Caterinus Zenus their embaſſadour with rich preſents vnto Alymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes, the great king of Perſia, to incite him on that ſide againſt the Turke: in which negotiation Zenus ſo well behaued himſelfe, that the next yeare following, that great king tooke vp armes againſt Mahomet, and had with him mortall wars, as ſhall be in conuenient place hereafter declared.
Mahomet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, & that they did what they might to ſtir vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were poſſible) into hatred with the whole world: and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the Chriſtian princes with the cruelty he had of late vſed againſt them of Chalcis, thought it not B beſt as then further to prouoke them, and ſo happily to bring all at once about his eares; but for a ſeaſon to lie ſtill at Conſtantinople, as if he had beene deſirous now to liue in peace, not meaning further harme: hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them (which indeed he was not deſirous of) yet that tract of time might mittigat the hainouſnes of the fact, and coole the heat of their diſpleaſure; whereby it came to paſſe as he wiſhed; that nothing worth the ſpeaking of was that yere attempted againſt him: and becauſe the Perſian king was the man of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, he ſought by his embaſſadors to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Chriſtians: requeſting him, if it were for nothing els but for the communitie of the Mahometan religion, wherin they well agreed; and were thereby the profeſſed enemies of the Chriſtians, to withdraw his hand, and in their C cauſe to ceaſe to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it ſo ſtood with his purpoſe) the zeale of religion, whereas otherwiſe he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian embaſſadour lying continually in the Perſian court, ſo wrought the matter with Vſun-Caſſanes, that he told the Turks embaſſadours plainly, That he could not nor would not longer endure the manifeſt iniurie and wrong done vnto him by the Turkiſh king: and farther, that he had made a faithfull league with the Chriſtian princes, and therefore would to the vttermoſt of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectually performe what thing ſoeuer hee had promiſed: and ſo diſmiſſed them, now no leſſe diſcontented than were before the Perſian embaſſadours at ſuch time as they returned from the Turkes court, hauing obtained nothing they then requeſted concerning the Emperour of Trapezond.

The Venetians aided by King Ferdinand, the Biſhop of Rome, and the great maſter of the Rhodes, doe the Turks great harme all alongſt the coaſt of the leſſer Aſia.

D The yeare following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arriued in the Iſle of Lesbos, where he did great harme. From thence hee paſſed the bay of Adramittium into the leſſer Aſia, and ſore ſpoiled the countrey about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cnidus vpon the coaſt of Caria, where he tooke a great bootie: and ſo hauing done the Turks exceeding much harme in Aſia all alongſt the ſea coaſt oppoſite to Græcia, hee returned laden with ſpoile towards Peloponeſus. In his returne about the promontorie of Malea, vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, he met with Richaienſis comming vnto him with 17 gallies from King Ferdinand: by whom he was certified, that the great Biſhops fleet was ready to come forth alſo. After mutuall gratulation, as the maner at ſea is, the Admirals ioyning their fleets in one; E landed at Methone, now called Modon, then a citie of the Venetians in Peloponeſus: where after they had well refreſhed their ſouldiers, and taken in freſh victuals, they put to ſea againe; and ſailing through the Iſlands, landed in Aſia, where they were at their firſt landing encountered by the countrey Turks, whom at laſt they put to flight, and by the ſpace of foure dayes tooke what pillage they could in the countrey: where the ſouldiers found great ſtore of rich bootie, eſpecially of Turkie carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they ſailed to Halicarnaſus, which is part of Caria (where ſometime ſtood the ſtately tombe which Queene Artemeſia built for her husband Mauſolus, accounted amongſt the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull ſpoile. There came vnto them Nicholas Biſhop of Modruſſa, with twentie gallies ſent from the great Biſhop: whom the other two Generalls F welcomed with great ioy. At the ſame time alſo came thither two gallies from the great maſter of the Rhodes. With this fleet of eightie fiue gallies, they ſailed to the Iſle of Samos ouer againſt Epheſus (ſometime a place of great fame, but then altogether deſolate and vnpeopled) there to conſult for their further proceedings in thoſe warres. Looſing from Samos, they took their courſe alongſt the ſea coaſt of Aſia, and landed at Attalia, the chiefe city

of Pamphilia, a place of great traffique: where they found in the ſubburbes of the citie great ſtore of many rich commodities, brought thither out of Ægypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleaſed them, and burnt the reſt together with the ſubburbs. Vnto the citie it ſelfe they began to lay ſiege, but perceiuiug that it was not without great loſſe of their men to be taken, they departed thence: & running all alongſt the coaſt of Pamphilia, burnt and deſtroied what came in their way, and ſo returned backe againe to Rhodes: where they met an Embaſſador from Vſun Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the Biſhop and the Venetians, for great ordnance, whereof that ſo mightie a Prince was altogether vnfurniſhed. Of this Embaſſadour they vnderſtood, that Vſun Caſſanes was entred into league with the Chriſtian Princes, and now buſie in making preparation againſt the Turke. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians with no leſſe harme in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Aſia: for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily preuailed vpon the weake princes of Epirus and Albania, with the countries adioyning. The Chriſtian fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the country of the Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great ſpoile returned to the Iſland of Naxos, one of the Cyclades: from whence King Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich ſpoile; for now the yeare was far ſpent. Yet after the departure of the Kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legat returned backe againe into Aſia, and there landing their men tooke the famous citie of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire. At which time alſo they did great harme about Clazomene, not farre from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now faſt on, they returned, laded with the rich ſpoiles of Aſia; the Legat into Italie, and Mocenicus into Methone.

The inſatiable deſire of Soueraigntie, whereunto the Turkiſh king was naturally inclined, had continually armed him, not onely againſt the Chriſtian princes, but againſt others alſo euen of his owne ſuperſtition: making no great difference betwixt the one and the other, if ſo he might extend his dominion. He had long before vnder the pretence of a friendly parley craftily circumuented the King of Myſia, a counttey in Aſia, and hauing got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, & by force ſubduiug his kingdome, left not one of the kings bloud aliue. After that he inuaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Caſſambet raigned, and draue them both out of Cilicia: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Vſun-Caſſanes; Caſſambet the younger aſſiſted by his old friends, ſought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turkes poſſeſſed, and was beſieging certaine townes vpon the ſea coaſt, which being taken from the Turks would eaſily draw all the reſt of the kingdome after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the firſt of the Spring come vpon the coaſt of Cilicia, at the requeſt of Caſſambet, landed certaine companies of his men vnder the leading of Victor Superantius, and certaine peeces of great artillerie, wherewith he ſo battered the wals of Sichinum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yeeld vp the citie: which he deliuered to Caſſambet. In like manner he tooke the citie of Corycus, which he alſo reſtored to Caſſambet. At laſt he laied ſiege to Seleucia, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great, diſtant from the ſea about fiue miles: the Gouernor of this city diſcouraged with the ſight of the great artillerie, deliuered the city to the Venetian captaine, who by the appointment of the Admirall reſtored the ſame to Caſſambet. Who by this meanes brought againe into his kingdome, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promiſing both for himſelfe and for his brother to be alwaies frinds vnto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from Cilicia, landed his men in Lycia, and harried that countrey alongſt the ſea coaſt. And this Mocenicus ſailed into Cyprus, to appeaſe a great inſurrection there raiſed againſt the Queene, who was by her husband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the decree of the Senat appointed Admirall, and alreadie come into Peloponeſus, he with as much ſpeed as he could haſted thither, to giue vp his charge, and ſo to returne home againe to Venice,

About this time the great Perſian King Vſun-Caſſanes began to make war vpon the Turkiſh emperor Mahomet, for the better vnderſtanding wherof, it ſhal not be from our purpoſe briefly to ſhew by what means this Vſun-Caſſanes, of a ſmall prince aſpired to the kingdome of Perſia, and ſo in ſhort time grew to that greatneſſe, that he was iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt monarchs of the world then liuing; as appeareth by theſe warres betwixt him and the great

A Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet. This Vſun-Caſſanes of whom we now ſpeake, was the ſonne of that Tachretin, who with other poore princes was driuen into exile by the violence of Baiazet the firſt, great grandfather to this Mahomet the great, Emperor of the Turks, and was againe reſtored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Baiazet. By the death of Tachretin, his ſon Vſun-Caſſanes (of ſome called alſo Aſymbeius) obtained that ſmall territorie which his father had in Armenia: nothing anſwering vnto the greatneſſe of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with ſuch poſſeſſions as was from his father diſcended vnto him, he began to ſhoulder for more roome, with ſuch weake princes his neighbors as he thought he might beſt deale withall; wringing one prouince from this prince, another from that, and thruſting ſome others quite out of all that they had: and in ſhort time ſo inlarged his dominion, that he had B got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mightie and fortunate prince. Inſomuch that Calo Ioannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whoſe power altogether anſwered not to the greatneſſe of his ſtile, being for moſt part ſhut vp within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, whoſe name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbour princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Deſpina in marriage, by ſuch allyance to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Turkiſh tyrant, if need ſhould require. At which marriage it was agreed, That Vſun-Caſſanes ſhould in the right of his wife enioy all the kingdome of Pontus, after the death of Calo Ioannes her father, and of Dauid his brother: and that Deſpina ſhould ſo long as ſhe liued haue the free exerciſe of her Chriſtian Religion. By this woman, Vſun Caſſanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that ſhe was the mother of Hyſmael, afterwards the great king of Perſia, commonly called C Hyſmael the Sophy; of whom more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the life of Selymus. Vſun-Caſſanes honoured with this marriage, and ſtrengthned with this new allyance, ceaſed not, after his wonted manner, daily to incroach vpon his neighbor Princes; and proceeded ſo far, that at length he began to lay hand vpon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Perſian King. Zenza (whom ſome call Tzokies, which was indeed the name of his father) raigning then in Perſia, by his Embaſſadors admoniſhed, and in ſort commanded Vſun-Caſſanes to hold himſelfe content with his owne, or at leaſt, with that he had alreadie wrongfully taken from others, & not to preſume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threatning otherwiſe to take him as an enemie to his ſtate, and to turne his forces vpon him. With which D embaſſage Vſun-Caſſanes being much offended, gaue the Embaſſadors no entertainment, but commanded them with ſpeed to get them out of his Kingdome, and to tell their Maſter, That he would ſhortly himſelfe in perſon come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud anſwer from ſo meane a prince the Perſian king moued, leuied ſuch an armie for the inuading of him, as was thought to haue beene ſufficient to haue ſubdued a farre greater prince: and ſo appointed, ſet forward toward Armenia. Vſun-Caſſanes much inferiour to this great king in wealth and number of men, but not in haughtines of mind, and valiantnes of courage, ſtayd not to expect the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemie, but full of hope ſet foward to meet him, and by great journeys ſought to come vpon him before he could haue any knowledge of his comming: yet had he then in his army ſcarcely one man to ten, but al armed with E couragious hearts, and conducted by a moſt fortunat chiefetaine which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with the great army of the Perſians, with whom he preſently ioyned battell, and after a long and cruell fight ouerthrew them in the plaine field, with ſuch a ſlaughter as might well haue weakned the forces of a right great kingdome. The great king more inraged than diſcouraged with his ouerthrow, raiſed a far greater army than before, the verie ſtrength of his kingdome: reſoluing now, not to ſend any more his lieutenants, but to go in perſon himſelf againſt ſo deſperat an enemie. All things being in readineſſe, he ſet forward, and at length met with the Armenian prince, whom he found as ready to giue battel as he was at the firſt. So being both deſirous to trie their fortune, they ioyned battel; wherein the Perſians were againe diſcomfited and put to flight, and mo of them ſlain in that battell, than were F brought into the field in the firſt armie. Zenzes the Perſian king was there ſlain with Vſun-Caſſanes his owne hand, and Cariaſuphus his ſon taken priſoner: whom the Armenian prince vſed with the greateſt honor could be deuiſed, giuing vnto him the honor and title due to the Perſian king, taking to himſelfe the bare name of the protector of the Perſian ſtate. Which he did only to pleaſe the Perſians, and to keepe them quiet vntill he had got ſome more aſſured poſſeſſion of that kingdome. But after he had in the two former battels broken their greateſt ſtrength, and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernor got into his power the regall citie of Tauris, with the reſt of the cities and ſtrong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues; he ſecretly diſpatched out of the way the poore titular king his priſoner, (the laſt of the poſteritie of the mightie Tamerlane) and tooke vpon himſelfe the higheſt place, which admitteth no partner. Whileſt this reſtleſſe Prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well ſetled in his new gotten kingdome, Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor, no leſſe ambitious than himſelfe, had ſcornefully reiected the Embaſſadors and Preſents which Vſun-Caſſanes had ſent; and hauing ſhamefully put to death Dauid the Emperor of Trapezond, his alyance, had conuerted all the kingdom of Pontus (which Vſun-Caſſanes of right claimed as his wiues dowrie) into the forme of a prouince, and ſo vnited it vnto the Turkiſh Empire. Which ſo manifeſt a wrong, Vſun-Caſſanes in the newnes of his ſo late atchieued greatneſſe, durſt not aduenture to addreſſe: but after that he was ſurely ſeated, and had with the courſe of time ouercome all dangers at home, being daily prickt forward with the remembrance of the former iniuries (ſtill ſuggeſted by the importunitie of his wife Deſpina, and the ſolicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by ſolemne promiſe bound himſelfe) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to trie his forces vpon his proud enemie the Turkiſh Emperour. Hereupon he raiſed a great armie, and being well appointed of all things neceſſarie, paſſing through Armenia toward Pontus, neere vnto the riuer Euphrates was encountred by Muſtapha) Mahomets eldeſt ſon, a young prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Baſſa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing ſuch a matter) had ſent before with a ſtrong army out of Europe, to ioyne with ſuch forces as Muſtapha had alreadie raiſed in Aſia, ſo to withſtand the inuaſion of the Perſian. Theſe two great Commanders Muſtapha and Amurath ioyning battell with Vſun-Caſſanes, were by him in the plain field ouerthrowne; where Amurath the great Baſſa himſelfe, with thirtie thouſand Turks were ſlaine; Muſtapha with the reſt of the armie by ſhamefull flight ſauing themſelues.

Two huge Armies of the Turks and Perſians in field together.

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Amurath was ſlaine, and his armie diſcomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled: but purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of new forces; ſo that at the time by him appointed, was aſſembled a great and mightie army of 320000 men. Vſun-Coſſanes in like manner was in the field with an armie, nothing in number inferior vnto his enemie. Theſe two Mahomitan Kings, drawing after them their huge armies, met together neere the mountaines of Armenia, where at the firſt encounter one of the Turks great Baſſa's was ſlaine, with 40000 Turks. With which hard beginning the proud tyrant was ſo daunted, that he could hardly be perſuaded to proue his fortune any further, but contenting himſelfe with that loſſe, was about to haue retyred; and had vndoubtedly ſo done, if ſome of his moſt expert and valiant captaines which might be bold with him, had not ſharpely reproued him, that hauing ſo populous an armie as ſcarcely felt that ſmall loſſe, he ſhould once thinke of returning without victorie. With which their comfortable perſuaſions he was againe encouraged to giue battel. Yet for his more ſafetie he withdrew his armie into a ſtrait betwixt two mountaines, and with his carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench: behind which carriages he placed his great ordnance, and on either ſide his archers. The Perſians, as men of great valor, & thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to haue charged the Turks euen in their ſtrength; preſenting their whole armie before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks artillerie; which ſuddenly diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of them, brake their ranks, and tooke away a number of them. Beſides that, the Perſian horſes terrified with the vnacquainted and thundring report of the great ordnance, were not to be ruled by their riders, but ſtarting back, ran ſome one way, ſome another, as if they had felt neither bit nor rider. Which their confuſion Mahomet perceiuing, preſently tooke hold of the occaſion offered, and with his horſmen fiercely charged them, being now by themſelues intangled and out of order. Neuertheleſſe the Perſians made great reſiſtance, and ſlew many of the Turks: but ſtill fighting confuſedly and out of order, they were at the laſt inforced to flie: in which flight a great number of them were ſlaine, and their tents alſo taken. Zeinal, Vſun-Caſſanes his eldeſt ſonne, labouring to ſtay the flight of the Perſians, was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turkes: yet had they no great cauſe to bragge of their winnings, hauing

A loſt in that battell fortie thouſand ſouldiers: whereas of the Perſians fell not aboue ten thouſand. Mahomet contenting himſelfe with this deere bought victorie, returned homewards: and Vſun-Caſſanes leauing another of his ſonnes with his army for the defence of Armenia, returned likewiſe to Tauris. But whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were in their greateſt expectation, what might be the euent of theſe warres betwixt theſe two mightie Mahometane Kings; they vpon the ſudden concluded a peace, and confirmed the ſame with new affinitie, excluding the Chriſtians quite out of the ſame. This laſt battell betwixt Mahomet and Vſun-Caſſanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474, about foure yeares before the death of Vſun-Caſſanes, who died the fifth of Ianuarie, in the yeare 1478.

In the time of theſe wars died the noble Muſtapha, Mahomet his eldeſt ſon, at Iconium, hauing ſpent himſelfe with reuelling amongſt his paragons, or as ſome write, commanded to B die, by his father, vpon this occaſion. This youthful Prince vpon a time comming to the court to ſee his father (or as they terme it, to kiſſe his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baſſa, a ladie of incomparable beauty, & daughter to Iſaac Baſſa, the chiefe men in the Turkiſh empire, next vnto Mahomet himſelfe: but finding no meanes to compaſſe her in whom his ſoule liued, he awaited a time when as ſhe (after the manner of the Turkes) went to bathe her ſelfe; and there as he found her all diſroabed, ſhamefully forced her, without regard either of his own honor, or of hers. Of this ſo foule an outrage, Achmetes her husband, with his cloathes and hat al rent for madneſſe, came and grieuouſly complained to Mahomet, crauing vengeance for the ſame. Vnto whom Mahomet againe replied, Art not thou thy ſelfe my ſlaue? and if my ſon C Muſtapha haue knowne thy wife, is ſhe not my bondſlaue he hath had to doe withall? Ceaſe therefore thus to complaine, and hold thy ſelfe therewith content. Neuertheleſſe he in ſecret ſharpely reprooued his ſonne for ſo hainous and diſhonorable a fact by him committed, and commanded him out of his ſight: and as he was of a ſeuere nature, cauſed him within a few dayes after to be ſecretly ſtrangled. Neuertheleſſe, the wrong done vnto the Baſſa, ſunke ſo deepe into his haughtie mind, as that he would neuer admit excuſe therefore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Baſſa Iſaac his father in law; and in fine, the verie cauſe of his vtter deſtruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Baiazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian king, was now at good leiſure to imploy all his forces againſt the Chriſtians. D And bearing a deadly hatred againſt the Princes of Epirus and Albania, with a wonderful deſire to extend his Empire vnto the Ionian and Adriaticke, that he might from thence but looke toward Italie, which he began now to long after; he determined with himſelfe, firſt to ſubdue thoſe countries, as ſtanding in his way, both for the inuaſion of Italie, and of the territories of the Venetians. And foraſmuch as the ſtrong citie of Scodra (otherwiſe called Scutarie) then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, for the commodious ſcituation thereof ſeemed to giue him the beſt entrance into the countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to ſuch cities as the Venetians held alongſt the ſea coaſt, he reſolued there to begin his warres.

This citie was of great ſtrength, as well for the naturall ſcituation thereof, as for the ſtrong E fortifications therein made by the hand of man: which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of, but preſuming of his owne ſtrength and power, vainly perſuaded himſelfe, that no place was now able long to hold out againſt him. Wherfore hauing prepared all things fit for the beſieging thereof, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch (whom he made his lieutenant generall in Europe, in the place of Amurath Baſſa, before ſlain by Vſun-Caſſanes) with 80000 ſoldiers to beſiege Scodra. This great Baſſa according to his charge came, and with great pompe incamped round about the citie, the 25 of May. Shortly after hauing planted his batterie, he began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the walls, and ceaſed not by all means he could deuiſe, to trouble the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon done what he could, gaue diuers ſharpe aſſaults vnto the citie, but was ſtill with great loſſe valiantly repulſed by them of the Citie. F Long it were to declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Baſſa Mahomet, his chiefe captaine, attempted to haue woon the citie: as alſo to ſhew how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy gouernor Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themſelues & their citie: nothing was omitted that the enemie could doe or deuiſe for the gaining thereof; but all his deuices and attempts were ſo met withall by the defendants, that they ſerued him to no other purpoſe but to the deſtruction of his people. Whileſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of

Scodra, Mocenicus hauing receiued ſuch commandment from the Senat, came and joined himſelfe to Grittus the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the citie of Scodra ſtandeth. Theſe two great Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull conſent did what they might for the furtherance of the Common good, a thing not common: firſt they put ſtrong garriſons, with all things neceſſarie, into Colchinum, Lyſſa, Dirrhachium, and other cities of their ſeigniory vpon the ſea coaſt. After that, they went vp the riuer Boliana with certaine gallies, and came within ſight of Scodra, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants, as with an aſſured promiſe of reliefe: which thing it grieued the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to haue ſhut in thoſe ſame gallies with a great chaine drawne croſſe the riuer, where it was narroweſt betwixt them and the ſea: but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies ſlew 500 of the Turks, and wounded diuers others, and ſo returned againe to ſea. It was afterward attempted by the aforeſaid Admirals, if a new ſupply might haue bin put into the citie: but the enemy had ſo beſet the ſame that it was not poſſible to be done. In the mean time, Mathias king of Hungarie (receiuing a great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries againſt the Turk) hearing that Scodra was beſieged, began to make ſuch ſpoyle in the Turks dominions bordering vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Baſſa from the ſiege of Scodra, to defend his own frontiers. So the Baſſa after he had lien three months with his great armie at the ſiege, and loſt 14000 of his men, whereof the greateſt part died of ſickneſſe taken by long lying in the rotten mooriſh ground neere vnto the riuer, by commandement from his Maſter, roſe with his armie and departed. The Venetians alſo, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the ſame contagion: Triadanus Grittus died thereof, & Mocenicus the other Admiral fell therof dangerouſly ſicke, but being ſomwhat recouered, returned home, and was ſhortly after for his good ſeruice choſen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being then dead. With this diſhonour taken at Scodra Mahomet was ſo diſcontented, that he appointed a yearely fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the ſiege of Scodra.

The ſame yeare that this great Baſſa Solyman had in vain beſieged Scodra, he was afterward ſent with a great armie into Valachia, where he was ſo intangled in the woods and fennes, by Stephanus the Vayuod, that he loſt all his armie, and with much adoo eſcaped himſelfe, by the wonderfull ſwiftneſſe of a mare whereon he rid.

The yeare following, which was the yere 1476, Mahomet ſent out a great fleet to ſea, vnder the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chiefe counſellor and man of war, (whoſe verie name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to haue by treaſon ſurpriſed the Iſland of Crete: but that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceiued, the traitors executed, and he of his purpoſe diſappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpoſe for Crete, and ſent the ſame Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turks call it, the blacke ſea) to beſiege the rich citie of Caffa. This citie was in antient time called Theodoſia, ſcituate in the country of Taurica Cherſoneſus, faſt by the ſea ſide, and had of long time bin in poſſeſſion of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great trade, vntill that this great Emperor Mahomet hauing taken Conſtantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his ſtrong caſtles built vpon the ſtraits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus, taken away both the traffique of merchants into thoſe ſeas, and all poſſible meanes for the Genowaies to ſend ſuccour to that citie: yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant captaine vndertooke to carrie his companie (in number not aboue one hundred and fiftie men) by land from Genoa to Caffa, not much leſſe than two thouſand miles, and worthily performed what he had vndertaken. Achmetes comming thither with his fleet, encloſed the citie both by ſea and land: which diuided in it ſelfe by reaſon of the diuers diſpoſition of the Inhabitants, being of diuers Nations, ſome Genowaies, ſome Greeks, ſome Armenians, but moſt Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in ſhort time giuen vp to the Baſſa, vpon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both in number many, and exceeding rich, might in ſafetie depart thence with their wealth: Which promiſe the Baſſa performed not, but when he was poſſeſſed of the citie, ſent ſuch as he thought good, to Conſtantinople, and commanded the reſt vpon paine of death, not to depart thence, or to conuey away from thence any part of their ſubſtance. In ſhort time after, the whole Countrey of Taurica Cherſoneſus yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance. At which time alſo the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenſes and Deſtenſes, terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turke, cowardly yeelded themſelues as tributaries vnto him; euer ſince which time they haue liued a moſt ſeruile and troubleſome life, ſubiect to euery command of the Othoman Emperor; for whom they haue done great ſeruice many times in their warres, againſt the Perſians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Germanes, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie well appeareth; and as the aforeſaid nations their neighbors, with others alſo further off, haue euen of late to their great loſſe felt.

Although the Venetians had in theſe late warres loſt the great and fertile Iſland of Eubœa, with the ſtrong citie of Chalcis, the ſureſt harbour for their gallies; yet held they ſtill diuers ſtrong towns and commodious hauens by the ſea coaſt, both within Peloponeſus & without, as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactum, & others: which ſtanding as it were in the boſome of his Empire, Mahomet ſore longed after. And therefore to ſatisfie his ambitious deſire, ſent Solyman (the great Baſſa of Europe) with a ſtrong fleet into Peloponeſus. Who entering the gulfe of Corinth, at his firſt comming layd ſiege to Naupactum, now called Lepanto, a citie ſtanding in the gulfe of Corinth, in the countrey of Ozolæ neere vnto Locris, ouer againſt Peloponeſus. Antonius Lauretanus (for his late good ſeruice done in defending of Scodra) made Admirall for the Venetians, came with ſpeed to Naupactum, and in deſpight of the enemy ſo furniſhed the citie both with men and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull, that the Baſſa now out of hope to win the citie, roſe vpon the ſudden with his armie, and in a great furie departed, after he had lien there foure moneths. In this fret returning towards Conſtantinople, he put certaine companies of his men to ſhore in the Iſland of Lemnos, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the citie of Coccinum: but as they were about to haue entered, they were contrarie to their expectation, manfully reſiſted by ſuch Chriſtians as by chance were next the gate: where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that Citie) was much commended; who ſeeing her father ſlaine in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably reuenged his death, deſperatly fighting in defence of her countrey, with thoſe few which were there at the firſt; and ſo kept the Turks out, vntill the reſt of the citiſens (mooued with the alarme) came to the gate, and forced them, not without ſome loſſe, to retyre againe to their gallies. Not long after, Lauretanus came thither with his fleet: but before his comming, the Baſſa was departed thence for Conſtantinople, hauing in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands.

Mahomet after the death of Scanderbeg ceaſed not from time to time by one of his great captaines or other to inuade Epirus, and the other parts of Albania; and ſo gaining ſometime one part, and ſometime another, had ſubdued moſt part thereof. And about this time his army lay at the ſiege of Croia: for reliefe whereof, the Venetians (in whoſe protection it was) ſent Franciſcus Contarenus, a noble gentleman, their lieutenant, with ſuch forces as were ſufficient for the raiſing of the ſiege. He finding the Turks in the plaine of Tyranna, gaue them battell, which a great while ſtood doubtfull: at length victorie inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie; after whom the Venetians made no great purſuit, but contented to haue put them to flight, tooke their tents, with ſuch forts as they had raiſed againſt the citie. Thus whileſt the Venetians thinke themſelues in ſure poſſeſſion of the victory, & out of feare of their enemies, they were through their owne too much ſecuritie, by and by themſelues ouerthrowne: For whilſt the common ſoldiers hauing their minds more ſet vpon the ſpoile, than vpon the purſuit of the enemie (the battel as yet ſcarce ended) ſcatter themſelues, & the captains were conſulting, whether they ſhould lodge that night (which began then to approch) in the enemies tents, or not; in the middeſt of their conſultation, the Turks hauing perceiued their diſorder, ſuddenly returned againe vpon them, and without great reſiſtance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thouſand of them fell, amongſt whom Contarenus the Generall, and diuers others of good place and calling, were ſlaine alſo. This ouerthrow the Venetians tooke a great deale better than that which ſhortly after followed in the confines of Italie, at the riuer of Sontium.

Mahomet hauing conquered a great part of Albania, and dayly incroaching vpon the Chriſtians, made diuers incurſions into the countries of Dalmatia, Hiſtria, and Carniola; yea, and ſometimes went ſo far, that he and his Turks entred into the prouince of Friuli, called in antient time Forum Iulij, a part of the Venetian ſeigniorie, and ſo carried away with them many priſoners, with much ſpoile. For remedie whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and G wonderful labour fortified alongſt the riuer of Sontium, from Goritia, to the fens of Aquilea, the ſpace of twelue miles, and there built two Forts, wherein they continually kept ſtrong garriſons for the defence of the country. Whereby the countrey people thinking themſelues now in ſafetie, began to fall into ſecuritie (the dangerous ſickneſſe of all commonweales) neglecting by their carefull watch to foreſee a farre off the enemies comming, as they had before vſed. It fortuned at this time, that Aſa-beg (whom ſome call Marbecke) one of the Turks great captains, vpon the ſudden when no ſuch thing was feared, came and ſhewed himſelf in an euening vpon the further ſide of the riuer of Sontium, with 1000 horſemen: vpon the ſight of whom, an alarme was raiſed in both forts, and euery man put himſelfe in readineſſe, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battell: but it was ſo nigh night, as that nothing could as then be done; yet the Venetian garriſons ioyning themſelues together, watcht all that night in arms. There was at that time in both theſe forts, 3000 horſemen, and ſome few companies of footmen, all vnder the command of Hieronimus Nowel Countie of Verona, a famous captain H of that time: who with the reſt of the captaines reſolued if they could, to keepe the Turkes from paſſing the riuer; if not, then to giue them battel. Marbecke Generall of the Turks armie, taking good view of the place, in the night time ſecretly conueyed a thouſand of his beſt ſoldiers ouer the riuer, foure miles off, in ſuch a place as the Venetians feared leaſt, deeming it impoſſible for any man, there to haue paſſed ouer. Theſe men he appointed to lie cloſe in ambuſh behind a great hil, in ſight, not far from the other ſide of the riuer, and vpon a ſigne giuen, preſently to diſcouer themſelues and charge the enemie. The next morning verie early, he I ſent certaine troups of his readieſt horſmen ouer the riuer, which by offering to skirmiſh with the Venetians, might draw them into the field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flie, to tole them on to the place where the ambuſh lay. The Venetians had diuided themſelues into three battalions; whereof the Generall himſelfe had the leading of the firſt, who ſeeing theſe diſordred troups comming to skirmiſh with him, encountred them fiercely, and eaſily put them to flight (being ſo determined before) & in that flight earneſtly purſued them; eſpecially the Counties ſon, a valiant yong gentleman, who with others like himſelfe, thought by that dayes good ſeruice to gaine vnto themſelues great honour. When the Turks General ſaw that the Venetians following the chaſe, were gone a great way from the riuer, he forthwith paſſed ouer with the reſt of his armie, and followed the Venetians at the heeles: which K the Turks which before fled, now beholding, turned againe vpon their fierce enemies, and valiantly withſtood them. At which very inſtant the other Turks vpon ſigne giuen ariſing out of ambuſh, came downe from the hill Licinis, with ſuch violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith diſcouraged, would haue fled if they could haue told which way: but they were on euery ſide ſo beſet, that there was no way left for them to eſcape; but were there all ſlaine, except ſome few which yeelded themſelues, and ſo were ſaued. The other two battalions of the Venetians, diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of the firſt, fled incontinently, and in flying were many of them ſlaine. In this battell the Countie himſelfe, with his ſonne, and many other notable gentlemen, and halfe the horſemen, were loſt. The Turks incouraged with this victorie, the next day ſpoyled all the country of Friuli, betwixt the riuers of Sontium, (otherwiſe called Liſonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cruelly burnt all the country before them; ſo that L at once 100 country vilages were to be ſeen on a light fire together, which ſtood ſo thick, that it ſeemed as if one continuall fire had wholly couered all the face of the country. The barbarous Turks laden with the ſpoile of that rich country, and driuing before them great numbers of miſerable captiues, as if they had bin flocks of ſheepe, returned to Sontium. But when they had paſſed the riuer, and had trauelled homeward one days journey, and all men thought they had now bin quite gone, they ſuddenly returned backe again, and poſting thorow the country they had before ſpoyled, came to the riuer of Tiliauentũ, which they deſperatly paſſed, & did no leſſe harme on that ſide the riuer, than they had before on the other: and ſo carrying away with them what they pleaſed, returned by the ſame way they came, hauing filled all that part M of Italy with terror and feare. This ouerthrow of Sontium the Venetians account amongſt the greateſt loſſes which they receiued from the Turks in all theſe their long warres.

1478. The next yeare about Harueſt the Turks came againe with a farre greater power: and paſſing the riuer of Sontium, came before the Forts of Gradiſca, where Carolus Fortebrachius lay

A lay with a ſtrong garriſon of rhe Venetians, offering him skirmiſh, ſo to haue drawne him into the field. But the wary captaine conſidering the great ſtrength of the enemie, and the loſſe receiued the yeare before, would not be drawne out of his ſtrength, but ſtood vpon his guard, expecting to take the enemie at ſome more aduantage: which thing the Turks fearing, durſt not diſperſe themſelues abroad for the ſpoile of the countrey, leauing ſo ſtrong a garriſon of the enemies behinde them. And therefore when they had gone about foure miles into the countrey, they turned their courſe vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alpes) towards Germanie, and there grieuouſly ſpoyled the mountainie people; ſtrangely paſſing through thoſe abrupt and high mountaines with their horſes, where men could hardly either goe or ſtand on foot without ſomthing to ſtay vpon. And ſo when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compaſſe about, returned home another way.

B Mahomet remembring the ſhamefull repulſe he had about foure yeres before receiued at Scodra, and hauing the name of that citie daily ſounding in his eares, determined now once againe to gage his whole forces vpon the winning thereof, and ſo to giue peace to his ambitious deſires. And becauſe he would not againe be diſhonored with that he purpoſed to take in hand, he gaue out order into al parts of his dominions, both in Europe and Aſia, for the aſſembling of his beſt ſouldiers and men of war. Now when all things were in readineſſe, and ſuch an armie aſſembled as he ſeldome or neuer had a ſtronger; firſt he ſent forth Aly-Beg (Warden of the frontiers of his kingdome alongſt the riuer Danubius) with eightie thouſand of the ſouldiers called Achanzij, towards Scodra. Theſe Achanzij are horſemen, which for their good ſeruice, according to their deſerts, haue certaine lands giuen them by the king to liue vpon during C their liues; for which they are of dutie bound to ſerue vpon their owne charge, as the forerunners of the Turke his armie, whenſoeuer he goeth to beſiege any place: theſe be they which firſt enter into the enemies countrey, burning and ſpoiling what they can, vntill they come vnto the place appointed: and haue this priuiledge, That ſo ſoone as all the armie is come vnto the place to be beſieged, they may then at their pleaſure either depart or ſtay.

Vid. Marinum Barletium de expug. Scodrenſi.

The Gouernor of Scodra vnderſtanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turks deſignes, with all care and diligence fortified the towne, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemie had been already preſent; and plentifully prouided all things neceſſary for the enduring of a long ſiege. The aged and vnneceſſarie people, he ſent out of the city into other places of more ſafetie farther off: in whoſe ſtead he tooke D in great numbers of ſtrong and able men which dwelt in the countrey round about: amongſt whom were many mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like qualitie, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of Scodra, luſtie bodies enured to hardneſſe, who in the long ſiege following did great ſeruice.

Whileſt this preparation was making in Scodra, behold, the mountaines a far off Northward from the city, began to ſhine with many great fires, and all the country was couered with thicke ſmoake, which euerie houre ſeemed to draw neerer and neerer; when within ſhort time after, the poore country people (which as yet were not all fled) with ſuch traſh as they could well carrie, came running for life all ouer the countrey to the ſtrong cities vpon the ſea ſide, E crying out that the Turks were come.

The poore countrey people flie for feare of the Turks.

The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eightie thouſand Achanzij, came into the ſuburbs of the citie, and there encamped; ſo that none could goe in or out of the gates: which was not the leaſt part of his charge. To him, by the commandement of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg Gouernor of Boſna, and Malcotius with ſeuen thouſand horſemen, ioined themſelues vpon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Auguſtus) that the maieſtie of his countenance, with the reſplendant beames iſſuing out of his eyes (as if it had been the rayes of the Sunne) were of ſuch piercing brightneſſe, that no man was able with immoued and fixed eye long to behold the ſame. Theſe horſemen (the forerunners, as I ſaid, of Mahomets great armie) the Chriſtians much troubled, with often ſallies and ſhot, out of the towne, F and ſlew many of them with little or no loſſe vnto themſelues.

When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the citie ten dayes, came Taut Gaiola the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople with fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiers, and about twelue thouſand camels, for moſt part laden with metall in maſſe, for to make great Ordnance of, and other neceſſaries for the campe. The Baſſaes great and ſtately Tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon the top of an high hil called the Baſſaes hill, becauſe in that place Solyman Baſſa had lien in the G formerſiege about foure yeares before: the Baſſaes armie lay encamped betwixt the ſame hill and the towne. This Taut Gaiola, was borne in Epirus of baſe parentage, and was from thence by the Turks carried away young to Conſtantinople; where for his ſharpneſſe of wit and rare actiuitie, he grew into ſuch fauour, firſt with Mahomet, and afterward with Baiazet his ſonne, that he was by them promoted to the greateſt places of honor, next vnto themſelues: wherein he became ſo popular, and had ſo poſſeſſed the hearts of the people, that it was ſuſpected of ſome, he would haue aſpired to the Turkiſh empire himſelfe. Preſently after the comming of this great Baſſa, workmen were ſet a worke about the caſting of the great ordnance, and making readie of other things for the ſiege. The Chriſtians alſo were no leſſe buſie about their fortifications, the Gouernor appointing vnto euery man his charge, and which part of the wal to defend: yet keeping continually in the maket place certaine companies (with the enſignes of S. Marke, and S. Stephen) to ſerue as freſh ſupplies, as need or occaſion ſhould require. Whilſt the great ordnance was in caſting, the Baſſa caſued a great bridge of timber to be made ouer H the riuer, that ſo he might at his pleaſure paſſe ouer his men, and command both ſides of the riuer. The Chriſtians in the meane time with vigilant eye ſo attending the Turks, that none of them could ſtirre within ſhot, but he was forthwith ſet off and ſlaine.

The thirteenth of Iune, Muſtapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Aſia (commonly called the great Baſſa of Natolia) came alſo in great pompe to the ſiege with thirtie thouſand ſouldiers brought out of Aſia; perſonable men, but not accounted ſo good ſouldiers as they of Europe: for it is a common ſaying among the Turks, That the men of Europe, and the horſes of Aſia I doe beſt ſeruice. This great Baſſa was honorably met and welcomed by the other great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, and was quartered vpon another ſide of the citie, where his rich pauillion (all of Greene) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the towne. Muſtapha to proue the courage of his ſouldiers, propounded a reward to which ſoeuer of them, as durſt aduenture but to goe and touch the wals of the citie: vpon which occaſion, two of his ſouldiers paſſing well mounted, attempted to haue performed that enterpriſe. But making what haſt they could poſſibly, they were both ſlaine from the wall, and one of their bodies recouered by certaine valiant ſouldiers which ſallied out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was vpon a launce ſet vpon the wals for the Turks to behold.

The fifteenth of Iune, 5600 Ianizaries came into the campe, with foure white enſignes: at K whoſe comming all the ſouldiers of both the Baſſaes camps gaue a wonderfull ſhout, & welcomed them with great ioy. Theſe are the great Turks guard and beſt ſouldiers, in whom the greateſt ſtrength of his kingdome conſiſteth, and are called the ſons of the great Sultan. After whoſe comming, Mahomet himſelfe was daily expected. Three dayes after, came two other great men, attended vpon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reuerance done vnto them by the reſt of the Turks, ſeemed to be men of great place and authoritie: theſe men deſired, that they might with ſafetie ſpeake with the Gouernour of the citie, and the reſt of the captaines, to deliuer vnto them ſuch a meſſage, as they had for their good (as they ſaid) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their requeſt being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words ſet forth the power of his maſter, and L what he had done to other great cities, with their Princes; and further ſhewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they ſhould long ſtand vpon their defence: he began to perſuade them to yeeld vp the citie, aſſuring them of all kind vſage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwiſe, they were to expect nothing but extreme miſerie & moſt ſhamefull death. Whereunto anſwer was in the name of them all giuen by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a graue and worthie citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatnes of Mahomet, or of any thing hee had done, or could doe: and that he ſhould find it hard to inforce them, but impoſſible to perſuade them to deliuer their citie: and therefore that he might at his pleaſure vſe his forces againſt men fully reſolued rather to yeeld vnto nature her laſt due, than to hearken to any compoſition: and in concluſion told them, that if they ſhould at any time after M make any ſuch motion, they ſhould not expect any other anſwer than from the mouth of the Canon. With which ſhort anſwer theſe great men departed, not a little diſcontented.

At this ſame time the ſtrong city of Croia (which the worthy Scanderbeg had liuing ſo honorably defended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and poſſeſſion of A the Venetians)hauing holden out a yeares ſiege, after that all the kingdome of Epirus and moſt part of Albania was loſt, for lacke of victuals was yeelded vp vnto the Turke, vpon condition, That the hungerſtarued defendants (who then ſeemed rather ghoſts than men) might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart: which agreement the faithleſſe Turke brake and without mercie put them al to the ſword. This heauy news was deliuered to them of Scodra by certain Chriſtians in the Turks campe: wherwith they were much grieued, but nothing at all diſcouraged.

Whiles the Turks thus lay at the ſiege, the watermen, of whom a great number liued vpon the great lake of Scodra (being in circuit about one hundred miles) came many times downe the riuer by night, and did much harme in the Turks campe: for remedie whereof, they were inforced to build certaine ſmall gallies to keepe them in, who for all that, many times ſtole B ſecretly vpon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of Iune, the Turks mounted two great peeces of ordance vpon the top of the hill whereon the Baſſa lay; whereof the one carried a bullet, made of an hard kind of round ſtone, of three hundred pound weight, and the other a bullet of foure hundred, wherewith they began to batter the towne foure daies: after that, they placed a third peece of artillerie at the foot of the ſame hil, which deliuered a bullet of foure hundred pound weight: and the next day they planted a fourth peece, greater than the reſt, about the middle of the ſame hill; which carried a ſhot of ſix hundred and fiftie pound weight. In this while, eight thouſand of the Turks ſoldiers, called Aſapi (which are knowne from the Ianizaries by their red caps, whereas the Ianizaries weare white) came into the campe. And ſhortly after came C Mahomet himſelfe with all his armie to the riuer of Drimon, whither the two great Baſſaes of Aſia and Conſtantinople went with great pompe and triumph to meet him.

The ſecond of Iuly, Mahomet with all his armie before the riſing of the Sun came to the campe before Scodra: where after he had well viewed the ſcituation thereof, he is reported to haue ſaid, O what a faire and ſtately place hath the Eagle choſen out for her ſelfe to build her neaſt, and to hatch her young ones in. Diuers rich pauillions were ſet vp for Mahomet himſelfe, but one far greater than the reſt, diſtant from them about a flight ſhoot, which was the place wherin he held his counſell; the other were for his one priuat vſe. Round about theſe his tents, lay the Ianizaries incamped, a good diſtance off, yet ſo cloſe one to another, as if it had bin a perpetuall rampire or ſtrong trench, wherinto was but one entrance, continually guarded with a moſt D ſtrong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the reſt of the armie encamped: ſo that al the countrie as farre as a man could ſee was couered, and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered ouer with a deepe ſnow: and ſtill more people reſorted to the campe daily; ſo that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his armie of al ſorts of people, about 350000 men, al gaping to deuoure that poore city: a ſight of it ſelfe ſufficient to haue daunted the courage of right valiant men: but what can be terrible to them that feare not to die? Againſt this terror of the enemie, the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable perſuaſions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus, a preacher, (ſometimes one of the worthie Scanderbegs ſouldiers) who afterwards giuing himſelfe to the ſtudie of diuinitie, became a zealous preacher, and in this ſiege did notably comfort the Chri-E ſtian defendants againſt the terror of ſo great an armie of miſcreants. All this while the batterie was ſtil maintained; and the fifth of Iuly the Turks mounted two other great peeces, wherof the one was like vnto the former before mounted, but the other placed vpon the middle of the Baſſaes mount, was of an incredible greatneſſe, diſcharging a ſhot of twelue hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes peece, in whoſe name it was with much cunning and induſtrie made: with which huge peece, the Turks euen from the beginning of the ſiege had threatned the beſieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes Peece. The next day they planted vpon the ſame mount a ſeuenth peece, which carried a ſhot of fiue hundred and fiftie pound weight: from which time they battered the citie with the aforeſaid ſeuen great peeces, and ceaſed not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to caſt great bals of wild fire into the city, ſo to haue ſet it on fire: wherby diuers of the citizens were inforced to vncouer their houſes couered with ſhingle, & by men appointed for that purpoſe, to watch the fal of ſuch fire works, & ſo to quench the ſame: which they ſo carefully looked to, as that the deuiſe of the enemy tooke no effect at all. At the ſame time alſo the Turks out of their ſhort mortar peeces, caſt huge great ſtones of incredible weight, which falling from hie, did moſt terribly cruſh in peeces whatſoeuer thing they light vpon, wherewith the defendants G were wonderfully troubled. In few daies after, the enemie mounted three other great peeces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a bullet of thirteen hundred weight: from which time they daily battered the citie with ten ſuch peeces, as the like hath ſeldome times beene heard of; and the arrowes fell ſo thicke into the citie, as if it had bin continuall ſhowers of haile, ſo that no man could goe or well ſtirre in the ſtreets without hurt. Yet in the midſt of all theſe dangers the Chriſtians valiantly defended the city, and with their deadly ſhot from the wals and mounts exceedingly annoyed the enemie. The eleuenth of Iuly the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Baſſa's mount, and the ſame day battered the wals with a hundred ſeuentie eight ſhot of this huge artillery.

Mahomet hauing by the furie of his great ordnance, beaten downe a great part of the wall, H and that now nothing ſtood in his way but ſuch ſimple repaires as the defendants had made of timber & planks, with earth caſt in betwixt, was in good hope in ſhort time to become maſter of the towne: and therefore ſent certaine companies of his Ianizaries and other ſoldiers (which he with continuall ſupplies of freſh men ſtil relieued) to aſſault the breaches, ſo if it were poſſible to enter the town, or at leaſtwiſe to burn ſuch fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which ſeemed vnto him at firſt ſo eaſie, he found in execution ful of difficultie & danger: for the Turks approching the breach, found there reſolute men, a ſurer defence than any wall: whoſe valiant courage ſerued in ſtead of a ſtrong bulwarke. So whilſt the Turks deſperatly ſtriue in the face of the breach either to enter or to ſet fire vpon the new fortifications made for moſt part of timber, and the defendants with no leſſe reſolution doe I what they may to the vtmoſt to repulſe them, many were on both ſides ſlain, but eſpecially of the aſſailants. Which Mahomet wel perceiuing, & that by that manner of aſſault he gained nothing but notable loſſe & ſpoile of his beſt men, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & his battery to be again forthwith renewed, euery day ſhaking the wal with 160 or 180 moſt terrible great ſhot, and one day with 194, the greateſt batterie that he made in one day during that ſiege.

After this great batterie, the tyrant cauſed a freſh aſſault to be giuen, but with little or rather worſe ſucceſſe than before: for though diuers of the defendants, and among them, ſome of good place, as Franciſcus Patauinus, Franciſcus Scorbaro, two Italian captains, and ſome other of the better ſort of the citizens were there ſlaine with the great ſhot, whereof the enemie that day diſcharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater loſſe enforced againe K to retire, and with ſhame to giue ouer the aſſault.

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no leſſe furie than before, ſtill ſought by force of his artillerie to open a way into the citie: and the third day after the former aſſault, gaue a more furious and deſperate attempt vnto the citie than before; inſomuch that the Turks were in the breaches come to handy ſtrokes with the Chriſtians, and there made a moſt cruell and deadly fight, wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks moſt; yet were there many of the Chriſtians alſo ſlaine, eſpecially with the Turks great ordnance. It was a right ruthfull ſight to haue ſeene the rampiers at the great gate of the citie beaten downe flat to the ground, and to lie full of the rent bodies of the Chriſtians: at which L place the enemie ſo preuailed, that he was euen now readie to haue entered; for the Turks ſo furiouſly aſſailed the defendants, and the murthring ſhot from the Baſſaes mount fell ſo thicke and ſo terribly into the breach, beſide the infinit number of arrowes, that there was ſcarce any of the Chriſtians which defended that place, but they were either ſlaine or grieuouſly wounded. But when all ſeemed now almoſt deſperat and forlorne, and the greedie enemie euen readie to deuoure his prey, a new ſupplie of luſtie ſouldiers well armed, came couragiouſly to the breach, and as Lyons encountering the enemie, draue him downe againe, and ſo enforced him with great loſſe to retire. Mahomet grieued with this repulſe, in his furie cauſed [illegible] great ſhot to be diſcharged into the citie, and afterwards ſending for his great Baſſaes and other his principall men of war, declared vnto them his mind, as followeth. M

I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthie ſouldiers) that now it is the third moneth ſince this citie hath by vs beene moſt ſtraitly beſieged, and with all manner of Artillerie and engines of warre impugned, aſſaulted, and on euery ſide aſſailed, the wals thereof vtterly ſubuerted, and the bulwarkes layed flat with the ground, and (as you ſee) as good as raſed: beſides that, ſo oft as we haue yet ſet

A vpon their fortreſſes, ſo often we haue prouoked them of Scodra to fight, and haue alſo much vexed them with aſſaults. Laſt of all, as you know, we haue left nothing vnproued, nothing vnattempted, which could be deuiſed, the eaſilier to ouercome them, being wearied, worne out, and their ſtrength ſpent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but euen to morrow before the enemie can recouer his ſtrength or repaire his breaches, let vs encloſe the citie round, and giue them a generall and terrible aſſault: and therefore euery one of you make your ſelues readie, and exhort your ſouldiers in the campe, that they euery one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and wel appointed for the winning of the citie. Now will I prooue and know them that are worthie of my pay. Thou the Baſſa of Conſtantinople, with thy ſquadrons and certaine companies of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard, giue charge vnto the breach: in the meane time, let the Baſſa of Aſia with his B power aſſault the other parts of the citie: let euery man make readie and bring with him what ſo is needfull for this generall aſſault; my mind giueth me, that to morrow before this time we ſhall winne the citie: for who is there can reſiſt vs? The towne (as you ſee) is bared both of wall and of all other defence: the bulwarkes and ditches are laied euen, and an eaſie way for vs to come vnto it: the citizens themſelues wearie with ſo many fights and aſſaults faint and want ſtrength; whereas we are ſtill freſh and luſtie: they in number few, we almoſt innumerable: beſides that, we farre paſſe them in the force of our artillerie, wherewith many of them ſhall periſh in the defending of the breaches. Who then can gaineſay, but that they of Scodra are alreadie our priſoners? Where, vpon ſuch as remaine aliue, I will at my pleaſure vſe the law of armes and captiuitie. On therefore couragious hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hatefull vnto vs? For which of you doth not with great diſdaine call to remembrance the death of your parents, or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly ſlaine vnder theſe C wals? Can you digeſt your hatred againſt them of Scodra? And ſo many ſlaughters of your friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harmes receiued from them long ſince, let vs but looke vpon our late ſlaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding: it is not yet full foure yeares ſince that we made warre with theſe men of Scodra, wherein ſo many thouſands of our people fell, that their ſlaughter is yet almoſt obiects to our eyes, and their bloud crauing reuenge. This very hill whereon we ſtand, and the ſtones yet ſeeme beſprinckled and polluted with their bloud. Wherefore haſte you as men of courage: Take vp armes, valiantly mount the hill, aſſault the towne, and reuenge your old iniuries. Glut your ſelues to the full in the effuſion of the Chriſtian bloud, whereunto our lawes doe ſo much exhort vs, and doe what you may with force and ſword, that not one of them of Scodra may bee left aliue: which D you may eaſily bring to paſſe, hauing all things thereunto needfull: for there is nothing to withſtand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the victorie. All things are prepared, all things are readie: an eaſie matter it is for a ſtrong man to ouercome the weake and feeble, that wanteth, ſtrength as doe they.

This ſpeech of the barbarous tyrant, was receiued with great applauſe & good liking of the hearers: and now was Scodra to be with all might & maine aſſaulted, and not a man there left aliue. Hereupon proclamation was made throughout the campe, That euery man vpon paine of death ſhould be readie againſt the appointed time: and the great captains and commanders of the armie departing from Mahomet, went vp to the top of the hil wheron the Baſſa lay, and E from thence taking view of the citie, and laying their heads together, conſulted how they might beſt giue the aſſault. The defendants on the other ſide alwaies expecting their enemies houering ouer their heads, left nothing vndon that they could poſſibly deuiſe, for the defence of themſelues & the citie. Now vpon the top of the Baſſaes mount, was a royal pauillion erected, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the aſſault: who with the dawning of the day (being the 22 of Iuly) entering the ſame, the Turkes who in the couert of the night had conueied themſelues, as neere vnto the wals as they could vpon the ſignall of battell giuen by a tire of ordnance diſcharged from the Baſſaes mount, ſuddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as bees, in hope by their ſudden approch to haue taken the Chriſtians at ſome aduantage, wherin they were much deceiued. F For they alwayes doubting ſuch a matter, & carefully obſeruing the leaſt motion of the enemie, were alwaies in readines to meet with their attempts: ſo that the Turks deſperatly ſtriuing to gain the breaches, and the Chriſtians valiantly defending the ſame, there was in diuers places begun a moſt cruell and mortall fight: but eſpecially neere vnto the great gate, where the furie of the cannon had made the wals moſt ſaultable. There the enemie was come to fight hand to hand, and pre-

uailing vpon the defendants, had ſet vp one of the Turks enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers; which Mahomet beholding, reioyced exceedingly, thinking the citie now as good as taken. But the Chriſtians ſeeing the danger, ſpeedily repaired thither with new ſupplies, and by plaine force draue the enemie out again, & beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them alſo that were comming vp, they caſt downe peeces of timber, great ſtones, wildfire, pots of lime, and ſuch other things as might moſt annoy them: as for ſhot, none fell in vaine by reaſon of the wonderfull multitude of the Turkes, who ſtood ſo thicke, that a man could hardly haue caſt down a graine of muſtard ſeed from the wall but it muſt needs haue light vpon ſome of them: by which means the Turks were notably repulſed, their enſigne pluckt down, and they enforced to retire from the wals. Which ſudden alteration Mahomet perceiuing, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commanded his great ordnance, with greater fury than euer, to be diſcharged into the breach: and with great words commanded the two chiefe Baſſaes which ſtood by him vpon the mount, to goe preſently downe and enforce the ſoldiers which were already retired, to returne again vnto the aſſault. Theſe great commanders ſeeing the tyrant in ſuch a fret, forthwith deſcended from the hill, and where perſuaſion would not ſerue, with their drawne ſwords enforced the ſoldiers to returne backe againe to the aſſault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the eye of their king, and in the preſence of their greateſt commanders, ſtriue with might and maine to win the rampiers: for in that place, the wals of the citie were beaten downe to the ground, ſhaken before this aſſault with 2539 ſhot of the cannon or other peeces of no leſſe force. The Chriſtians likewiſe in defence of themſelues and their citie, with inuincible courage oppoſed themſelues againſt the Turks: ſo that a more deſperat fight than there, was hardly euer to be ſeen; deſperat men with deſperat band aſſailing one another; and the more to increaſe the terror of the day, the thundering ſhot, with the clamor of men, and noiſe of the inſtruments of warre, was ſo great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently fallen together; and arrowes falling into the citie as if it had bin ſhowers of rain, oftentimes darkened the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight, many of the defendants were ſlain; but of the Turks, twenty to one. Neere vnto that gate where this terrible aſſault was giuen, were certaine loupes hewen out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all alongſt that ſide of the citie, out of which the Chriſtians with their murthering ſhot made lanes amongſt their enemies, and ſlew them without number. For all that, the mightie Baſſaes and great captains, one while by perſuaſion, another while by threatning, forced them ſtil forward, and if any turned backe, preſently ſlew him: ſo that the Turks ſeeing no leſſe danger in retiring than in fighting againſt the enemie, like deſperat men thruſt forward by heapes, and were ſlaine without number. Yet ſtill preſſing on ſo long as life laſted, and others ſtepping forward in ſtead of them that were ſlaine, they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for moſt part either ſlaine or hurt) and againe recouered the top of the rampiers, and there aduanced the Turks enſignes. Then began the tyrant to lift vp his head, making ſure account that the city was now his owne. But as the common ſaying is, He that reckoneth without his hoaſt, muſt reckon twiſe, ſo chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the ſiege left in the market place readie for all euents, & oftentimes wiſhing for ſome occaſion wherein to ſhew themſelues, being now in good time aduertiſed of the imminent danger, came with ſpeed to the place of the aſſault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and forced the reſt from the rampiers; and plucking downe their enſignes before ſet vp, in ſtead of them placed their owne. With which repulſe the Turks were ſo diſmaied, that they quite forſooke the aſſault, and in deſpight of their imperious commanders, not expecting any ſigne of retrait, in haſt retired to their campe. Mahomet fallen from ſo great an hope, and grieued aboue meaſure with this ſhamefull repulſe, returned into his pauillion fretting & fuming as a man halfe mad, where two daies he tormented himſelf with his own paſſions, not admitting any man to his preſence. The Chriſtians afterwards tooke the ſpoile of the dead Turks, and cutting off diuers of their heads, ſet them vp vpon poles round about the citie, to the terrour of their fellowes. In this aſſault were 12000 of the Turkes ſlaine, and many moe wounded. Of the Chriſtians were loſt 400: and of them that came to the breach eſcaped none, but he was wounded more or leſſe.

Twelue thouſand Turkes ſlaine in the laſt aſſault.

After that Mahomet had two daies diſgeſted the laſt repulſe, the ſhame wherof grieued him more than the loſſe it ſelfe; hee ſent for both the great Baſſaes of Conſtantinople and Aſia,

A and other two of his chiefe Counſellors, with whom he reſolued to giue another aſſault,and thereon to gage his whole forces: for they were all of opinion with him, That the defendants were ſo weakned & waſted with the former aſſault,that they could not poſſibly hold out another.
Whereupon ſtraight commandment was giuen thorow the campe,that euery man without exception ſhould be readie to go to the aſſault whenſoeuer they were called vpon: & the more to incourage the ſoldiers,great rewards and preferments were promiſed to them which in time of the aſſault ſhould performe any eſpeciall piece of ſeruice. The firſt appearance of the new Moone (which the Turks worſhip with great deuotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this generall aſſault: in the mean time he ſpared not to poure out his furie againſt the walls and rampiers of the town,by the mouth of the canon. The Chriſtian defendants B on the other ſide,firſt by heartie prayer commended themſelues and their Citie to the protection of the Almightie,and afterwards with reſtleſſe labour and no ſmall perill, ſpeedily repaired and new fortified whatſoeuer the furie of the artillerie had ouerthrowne or ſhaken; omitting nothing that could be done or deuiſed for the defence of themſelues and their citie.
Now as ſoon as the new moon began to ſhew her ſelfe,the Mahometan prieſts going about the armie,gaue the ſoldiers knowledge thereof (as their manner is) by ſinging of a ſong in manner of a proceſſion; whereunto the whole armie anſwered with a ſhort reſponde, but with ſuch a terrible noiſe as was wonderfull to heare; and at the ſame time bowing themſelues to the ground,ſaluted the Moon with great ſuperſtition. All their fond ceremonies performed,they began to draw nigh the citie ſo thicke,and in number ſo many,that all the ground for the ſpace C of a mile round about Scodra,was thicke coueted with men. The Chriſtians expecting euerie houre to be aſſailed,were readie vpon the walls and rampiers of the citie, to repulſe the enemie: but eſpecially at the great gate where moſt danger was feared, for that the Turkes with their great Ordnance had made that place of all others moſt ſaultable. Here Iacobus Moneta a noble captain,with his brother Moncinus a valiant gentleman,tooke vpon them to receiue the firſt aſſault, which is commonly of all others moſt terrible: for the Turks vſe in their aſſaults to giue three attempts,whereof the firſt is moſt furious and dangerous,as performed by their beſt ſoldiers: the other two are of leſſe force; but if they faile in all three, they forſake the enterpriſe as men diſcouraged. Whileſt both the aſſailants and the defendants ſtood thus in readines,the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went D vp to the top of the Baſſa's mount,from whence he had before beholden the former aſſault: at whoſe comming there were preſently 11 canons diſcharged,and 12 ſmaller Pieces (the ſignal appointed for the aſſault.) The Turks vpon this ſigne giuen,with exceeding tumult & moſt hideous outcrie (as their manner is) began to aſſaile the citie round,and with ſuch wonderful agilitie of bodie and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice ſet vp one of their enſignes,which was forthwith pluckt vp by Moneta, & the Turks with great ſlaughter driuen down,where many of them were ſlain with ſtones, timber, fire,& ſuch other things caſt down vpon them; beſide a great number ſlain or wounded with ſhot,arrows,and darts,whereof none fel to the ground in vain,by reaſon that the Turks ſtood E ſo thicke,that they violently preſſed one another forward, in ſuch ſort that the formoſt could by no means ſhun any danger,were it neuer ſo great or terrible. In this ſort the aſſault was with great ſlaughter of the Turks continued vntil it was day; they ſtriuing to win the breach, and the Chriſtians moſt valiantly defending the ſame. Moneta himſelf in this fight receiued diuers wounds,and was twice beaten down to the ground; yet ſtill recouering himſelfe,incouraged his ſoldiers,and worthily repulſed the enemie. Mahomet ſeeing his ſouldiers beaten from the breach,cauſed a tyre of his great ordnance to be diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians which ſtood therein thicke for the defence thereof, by force whereof many of them were rent in pieces, and the reſt ſore diſmayd: which the Turkes quickly perceiuing,and therewith encouraged, came on again with a freſh charge,forcing themſelues to the vtmoſt to haue entred. But the valiant F captain nothing diſcouraged either with the loſſe of them that were ſlaine,or the danger of himſelfe, valiantly withſtood the furious enemy, & maintained the place till new ſupplies came to relieue him,and departed not thence,nor ſuffered any man to depart,til the aſſault was ended. Many were ſlain on both ſides; yet nothing troubled the defendants ſo much as the great ordnance,which being diſcharged from the Baſſa's mount, into the breach, when as the Turks were driuen back,ſlew many of the Chriſtians, leauing the breach almoſt cleere: ſo giuing uing occaſion for the Turks to haue entred, had not other couragious ſoldiers ſtept vp in ſtead of them that were ſlain, who manfully repulſed the enemy. The tyrant from the mount ſeeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but fully reſolued now or neuer to haue it, commanded all his forces to be drawn from all other parts of the citie, to the great gate, there to renew the aſſault; ſtraitly charging his captains, neuer to return thence vntill they had taken the citie. Hereupon the greateſt part of that hugie army was forthwith in the ſight of himſelfe brought to the appointed place, and there gaue a ſharpe and cruel aſſault at the breach, with ſuch deſperat fury, that in ſhort time they had ſlain moſt of the defendants there preſent, and aduanced diuers of their enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the Mount, rejoiced exceedingly, making ſure account, that the city was now his own: but by that time he had well conceiued this hope, new ſupplies of freſh and couragious men (of purpoſe reſerued for all euents) came to the place of danger, and with great reſolution incountring the wearied Turks, draue them backe, cleared the breach, and ouerthrew the enſignes. Which ſo ſudden an alteration in the breach, wrought no leſſe alteration in the proud tyrants mind, his hope was turned into diſpaire, and his joy into choler: inſomuch that in his furie he commanded all his great artillerie to be at once diſcharged into the breach, whereby many of his forward and couragious ſouldiers were ſlaine togither with the defendants. At the ſame time, the great commanders & captains knowing themſelues to be in the eye of their imperious lord and maſter, with their drawn ſwords forced the poore ſoldiers again forward to the breach; & the more to encourage them, aduentured themſelues alſo among them: whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turks were there ſlaine; yet ſuch was the force and multitude of them which ſtill ſtept vp in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew ſo thicke, that the defendants oppreſſed with multitude, and ouerwhelmed with ſhot, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for moſt part either ſlain or wounded. Wherupon a great crie ran apon the ſudden thorow the city, that euery man without exception ſhould forthwith repaire to the breach. Which was with ſuch cherefulnes done, that in leſſe time than was to haue bin thought, a wonderful multitude of all ſorts of people was there met togither, encouraging one another againſt the preſent danger; who all as men reſolued to lay down their liues in defence of their country, valiantly encountred the Turks vpon the top of the rampiers, and ſo hardly laid vnto them, that notwithſtanding their great number, they began now again to wauer and ſhrinke back. Which thing the tyrant perceiuing from the mount, in great rage commanded his canoniers, as faſt as they could to diſcharge the great ordnance into the breach, without regard of his own men, ſo that together with them he might alſo kil ſome of the Chriſtians: and withall imperiouſly commanded his captaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the aſſault, threatning them with moſt horrible death, if they returned without victorie. Hereupon the aſſault was again renewed, euery man (in ſhew at leaſt) ſet downe there to doe his laſt deuoire. But the great ordnance ſtill playing vpon the breach, ſlew many of the Turks, as well as of the Chriſtians. Thriſe the great ſhot fell amongſt the Turks themſelues, and rent in ſunder a great number of them which were formoſt, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt: whereof the tyrant had ſmall regard, ſo that togither with them he might alſo diminiſh the number of the defendants. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the deſperat furie of the enemie, that the citie was in no ſmall danger to haue been preſently taken, had not freſh ſupplies come from other parts of the city which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage reſiſted the enemie. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number (and freſh men continually ſtepping vp in ſtead of them which lay by heapes vnder their feet, and ſerued them in ſtead of ſteps to get vp to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordnance alſo ſore annoyed the defendants, ſo that with one ſhot (whereby the greatneſſe of the harms done at other times may be gathred) eighteen of the Chriſtian defendants were ſlaine. As for arrowes, they flew as thicke as haile into the citie, ſo that they obſcured the light of the day, and lay in moſt places of the ſtreet a ſpan thicke: ſo that for the ſpace of a moneth after, the inhabitants vſed no other fuell to burne, but Turkiſh arrowes. It was a ruthfull ſight, to haue ſeene the bodies of the valiant Chriſtians rent in ſunder with the great ſhot, and peeces of them cleauing vpon euerie wall thereabout, euery ſtreet was ſtained with their bloud, the great ordnance continually thundred, Churches and houſes came ratling downe, yea the heauie countenance of the

The aſſault renewed againe fiercely by the Turks.

A wofull ſight.

A aire it ſelf ſeemed to bewaile the miſerie of the poore Chriſtians: beſides, the noyſe of trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of warre, with the horrible crie of the helliſh Turks, was ſo great and hideous, that it ſeemed as if heauen and earth ſhould haue gone together: nothing was to be heard but the verie terror of the eare; nothing to be ſeene but death, and the verie inſtruments of death. And now in this extremitie a fearefull crie ran through the citie, That without preſent helpe all would be loſt at the great gate: whereupon not onely they which were whole, (which were the feweſt in number) but they alſo which lay wounded or ſicke in their beds, chering vp themſelues, with weapons in their hands ranne with ſpeed to the place where the danger was; chuſing rather there to die, than to be ſlain in their beds. Thus whileſt the Chriſtians of all ſorts, and from all parts of the citie, ran deſperatly to the gate, the Turkes B were on euerie ſide hardly preſſed, and in great number ſlain; yet freſh men ſtill comming vp, as if they had ſprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them ſtill maintained: for the Turks on the one ſide, for feare of the tyrant, laboured with might and main to win the citie; and the Chriſtians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they ſhould be ouercome, with no leſſe reſolution defended the ſame. In this obſtinacie of mindes many fell on both ſides; ſometimes the Turks ſeemed to haue the better, and were ſtraitway by the Chriſtians put to the worſe. Which manner of mortall fight, with doubtfull euent, was continued moſt part of that day; vntil that at length many being on both parts ſlaine, and the reſt for the moſt part ſore wounded and hurt, the furie of the aſſault began to aſſuage: for the Turkes now wearie of that long and deadly fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great ſtomacke to mount vp the rampiers, where they ſaw no hope to preuaile, but all things threatning C present death. Mahomet beholding the wonderfull ſlaughter of his men, and that hauing done what was poſſible for men to doe, they now fought as men diſcouraged; and in deſpaire of victorie himſelfe, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, which the Turkes no ſooner heard, but that they left the aſſault, and without order ran to their tents, as men halfe feared out of their wits.

A doubtfull fight.

Of this victorie, the Chriſtians (as they had good cauſe) reioyced greatly: yet was this joy mingled with much ſorrow and heauineſſe, for the loſſe of ſuch worthie men as were ſlaine in that aſſault, many of whoſe bodies they were glad to gather vp by piecemeale, ſome here, ſome there, ſome cleauing on this wall & ſome on that: which they, as the time would giue D leaue, honorably buried with the reſt of the ſlain. At which time alſo, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in ſuch readineſſe, as if they ſhould haue preſently receiued a freſh aſſault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieued with the ſhamefull diſhonour and great loſſe he had receiued at the laſt aſſault, repented himſelfe that euer he had taken the matter in hand, wiſhing that he had neuer heard of the name of Scodra: and in his choler and franticke rage moſt horribly blaſphemed againſt God, moſt wickedly ſaying, That it were enough for him to haue care of heauenly things, and not to croſſe him in his worldly actions: in which furie he deſcended from the Mount, and got him into his tent, where he againe tormented himſelfe with his melancholie paſſions by the ſpace of two dayes; wherein he would neither be ſpoke withall, or E admit any man to his preſence. Vpon the third day he called a generall Councell of his commanders and beſt ſouldiers, and thereupon openly before them all ſayd, That he was determined to giue the enemie a freſh aſſault, for that being weakened with ſo many aſſaults, he could not poſſibly be able to hold out another; and therefore hoped for an eaſie victorie. But he had no ſooner ſo ſayd, but that all they that heard him, cried out with one voyce to the contrarie; ſaying, That it was not by any meanes to be attempted, for as much as his beſt ſouldiers were alreadie ſlaine, and the greater part of them that were left, either ſore wounded, or brought to that weakneſſe, that they were not able to doe any more ſeruice; and that therefore it were better for them to kill one another, or elſe himſelfe to kill them one by one, than to expoſe F them to be ſo ſhamefully butchered by the Chriſtians. In this diuerſitie of opinions, Achmetes Baſſa the great champion of the Turkes (a man reuerend and of great authoritie, for his birth, yeares, and rare experience in martiall affaires, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) ſtanding vp, with pleaſing ſpeech calmed his furious mind, and with ſubſtantiall reaſons perſuaded him to deſiſt from that his intended purpoſe, and to take another ſurer courſe, as followeth:

Your great valour and worthie praiſes, inuincible Emperour (ſayd he) who is able to expreſſe? the G greatneſſe whereof the mind of man cannot conceiue, and my dull ſpirit but wonder at; my tongue faltereth to ſpeake of them, neither would this time ſerue ſo much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honour (moſt dread Soueraigne) when a Prince hath receiued a Kingdome from his Anceſtours, to be able in ſafetie to keepe and defend the ſame: greater than this is it, honourably to increaſe and augment it, ſo left: but of a ſmall thing, by worthie proweſſe to bring it to the higheſt type of worldly honour, is of all other things the greateſt. Which moſt rare excellencie, all men worthily aſcribe vnto your perfection and felicitie: and I, of all others, can thereof bring the moſt aſſured teſtimonie, who haue oftentimes heard it of mine Anceſtours (which following the Othoman Princes out of Aſia into Europe) that your worthie predeceſſors at their firſt comming into Europe (without offence H be it ſayd) poſſeſſed but a corner thereof: to whom you afterward by diuine appointment ſucceeding, haue adioyned ſo many prouinces, kingdomes, and Empires, as were tedious to rehearſe them. For who can worthily expreſſe, how you haue in Europe ſubdued Conſtantinople, the Imperiall citie of the Eaſt Empire, with all Thracia, Achaia, Grecia, Peloponeſus, Bæotia, Thebes, and the noble citie of Athens the Mother and Nurſe of all good learning. The Empire of Trapezond, with the Emperour thereof is by you ouerthrowne: The Kingdomes of Seruia and Boſna, with the Princes of Peloponeſus, are by you gloriouſly vanquiſhed. You haue at your command twelue kingdomes in Aſia the leſſer; Pontus, Bythinia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Lycia, Caria, Lydia, Phrygia, Nicomedia, and Nicea, with the famous citie of Pruſa. Beſides theſe, Ionia, Doris, Smyrna, Colophon, Epheſus, Miletum, Halicarnaſſus, Pergamus, with the Countrey of Taurica, are vnder your ſubiection. The great coun- I trey of Armenia hath felt your force: The Iſlands of Lesbos, Chios, and Eubæa, are parts of your Empire. What ſhould I ſpeake of infinite people and Nations, by you moſt victoriouſly vanquiſhed? This may ſuffice for all, That you haue gained from the Chriſtians twentie Prouinces, and two hundred great Cities. For it were too long to rehearſe the Mahometane Kings and Princes by you alſo vanquiſhed: In all your expeditions all things haue yet giuen place to your fortune. The antient Monuments may now ceaſe to extoll the praiſes of Cæſar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and other Chiefetaines of Rome and forraine Nations: for why, they are all inferiour to you, both for victories and countries ſubdued. The Othoman Familie is vndoubtedly fatall for ſoueraigntie: all the world ſhall in ſhort time come vnder your gouernment, and all Nations ſhall ſerue you. As for this towne of Scodra, let it not ſo much grieue you: worldly things (as you know) doe oftentimes deceiue our expectation; in K them Fortune beareth great ſway. Yet for this matter quiet your ſelfe; for I dare gage my Faith vnto your Imperiall Majeſtie, that I will in ſhort time find meanes, that this citie ſhall ſtand at your deuotion. Did not I of late bring into your ſubiection the impregnable citie of Croia, which you ſo long deſired? But whereas you would now againe forthwith attempt to win it by aſſault, I therein craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of that opinion, but muſt needs thinke far otherwiſe: for to attempt war, and to be ouerthrowne, is an eaſie matter for euery one to do; but to vanquiſh the enemy, and to carry away the triumph, that right few men know. He that conſulteth of ſuch great and waightie matters, ought to be free both from furie and deſire, both euill Counſellors. The Chriſtians of Scodra are not in my opinion to be againe aſſaulted, for in ſo doing you ſhall but loſe your labour. For if you could not ſubdue them, your Armie being then freſh and ſtrong, how ſhall you now ouercome them with much fewer, and they L wounded, weake, and feeble? I haue viewed the whole camp, and ſearched euery tent; and found no place, no tent, yea ſcarcely any cabin, without groaning, ſighing, weeping, or wailing; in euery place was heauineſſe, ſorrow, mourning, and death it ſelfe: for in the laſt aſſault you loſt thirtie thouſand and more, of your beſt ſoldiers: many moe are grieuouſly wounded and maimed; none, but he carrieth about him ſome ſigne that he was there: few or none there be that dare againe mount the hill to giue a freſh aſſault, they are all ſo affraid and diſcouraged. Whom when I demanded, how ſo great a feare was come vpon them, and what was the cauſe they had ſo loſt their wonted courage? they anſwered me, That it was the looke, euen the verie looke of them of Scodra, whoſe eyes did ſeeme vnto them, to burne and ſparkle with fire: their ſterne and terrible countenances (ſaid they) haue ſtrooke this terror into vs. Wherefore I thinke it not good to giue a freſh aſſault with men ſo diſmayed; but rather to vſe policie and delay, againſt ſuch M reſolute enemies. This Citie of Scodra is the eye and head of all this Prouince, which the Venetians haue notably fortified, and planted with ſtore of ordnance, and of all things elſe neceſſarie for defence thereof; but eſpecially with moſt valiant Souldiers, of purpoſe choſen out of many their Garriſons, for defence of this Citie. You haue not now to doe with the weake and effeminate people of Aſia, but with the hard and rough people of Epirus. And you know (moſt mightie Emperour) the ſtrength and courage of this Nation: it is now thirtie yeares that you haue made warre againſt this People, and haue not yet altogether ſubdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this warre hath beene vnto you, who knoweth not? It is now ſix moneths ſince we came firſt before this Citie; we haue intrenched our ſelues round about it, we haue day and night layd hard ſiege vnto it, we haue battered it of long with eleuen Cannons: I ſpeake not of other ſmaller Pieces or engines of warre, with all kinds of ſhot and fire-works, and whatſoeuer elſe we could deuiſe. We haue many times to our coſt aſſaulted it; what could be done by force, ſtrength, or multitude of valiant men, is alreadie done in the former aſſaults: Nothing hath bin left vnattempted, no policie, no direction hath wanted in your Leaders, neither courage in your ſouldiers. What ſhould I recount the innumerable great ſhot, or ſpeake of our arrowes and darts, deliuered into the citie as ſhowers of haile? Did all this, or any thing elſe we could doe, any thing terrifie theſe Defendants? Were they not, nay are they not ſtill readie with great aſſurance and courage at all aſſayes to encounter vs? You take a wrong courſe, by force to conſtraine them: they haue taken vpon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be remooued, there ſhall you be ſure ſtill to find them either aliue or dead: and what account they make of their liues, you ſee, they will ſell them vnto vs deere for their countrey, and preferre an honourable death before a ſeruile life. Wherefore againſt men ſo ſet down, policie is to be vſed; and them whom we cannot by force ſubdue, let vs by delay and time ouercome. If you will winne Scodra, blocke it vp, build ſtrong Forts in places conuenient round about it, and furniſh them with good ſouldiers; make a bridge ouer Boliana, with a ſtrong Caſtle on either ſide, to ſtop the paſſage: which done, beſiege the other weaker Cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the limmes of Scodra; and ſubdue the Countrey round about, which will be no hard matter for you to doe, being maſter of the field: ſo muſt Scodra at length of neceſſitie yeeld vnto you, as of late did Croia, inforced thereunto by famine. Thus may you in ſafetie without ſlaughter of your people, come to the full of your deſires.

The wholeſome counſell of the Baſſa ſo well pleaſed Mahomet himſelfe, and the reſt there preſent, that the aſſault was layd aſide, and preſent order taken for the ſpeedie execution of that which was ſo well by him plotted. Whereupon the Baſſa of Conſtantinople with his Forces was ſent to Zabiache, a citie in the borders of Dalmatia, ſtanding vpon the lake of Scutarie, not farre from Aſcriuium, which in few dayes was yeelded vnto him. The Baſſa poſſeſſed of the citie, thruſt out all the inhabitants, and leauing therein a garriſon of Turks, returned againe to the campe at Scodra. At the ſame time the great Baſſa of Aſia was alſo ſent by Mahomet againſt Driuaſto a citie alſo of the Venetians: which when he had beſieged and ſore battered by the ſpace of ſixteene dayes, the great tyrant came thither in perſon himſelfe, and the next day after his comming tooke the citie without any great reſiſtance. Such as he found vpon the walls, he put to the ſword; of the reſt he tooke three hundred away with him to the campe at Scodra, and there in the face of the citie cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlaine, of purpoſe ſo to terrifie the defendants. The next day after, he ſent the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople to Lyſſa, called alſo Aleſſa, a citie of the Venetians, ſcituated vpon the riuer Drinus, about thirtie miles from Scodra. The Baſſa comming thither, found the citie deſolate, (for the citiſens hearing of his comming, were for feare before fled) for which cauſe he ſet the citie on fire. Here the Turks digged vp the bones of the worthie Prince Scanderbeg, for the ſuperſtitious opinion they had of the vertue of them; and happie was he that could get any little part thereof to ſet in gold or other iewell, as a thing of great pride, (as is before declared.) All theſe things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the ſiege of Scodra, vnto the diſcretion of Achmetes; by whoſe perſuaſion he leauing a great power for the continuing of the ſiege, departed thence himſelfe with fortie thouſand ſouldiers for Conſtantinople, curſing and banning by the way all the countrey of Epirus, all the inhabitants therein, and euery part thereof, their corne, their cattell, and whatſoeuer elſe was fruitfull, but aboue all other things, the citie of Scodra, with all that therein was, for that he had neuer receiued greater diſhonour or loſſe, than there.

Lyſſa taken by the Turks, and the bones of Scãderbeg digged vp by them, & had in great reuerence.

After his departure, which was about the ſeuenth of September, the two great Baſſa's of Conſtantinople and Aſia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the riuer Boliana, and on either ſide a ſtrong caſtle, to the intent that no reliefe ſhould that way be brought into the city. Which worke when they had brought to perfection, & furniſhed both caſtles with garriſons, ordnance, and all things neceſſarie, they left Achmetes Baſſa with fortie thouſand ſouldiers to continue the ſiege, and returned themſelues, the one to Conſtantinople, the other into Aſia. The warie and politique Baſſa mindfull of the charge he had taken vpon him, tooke ſuch order, that no reliefe could poſſibly be brought vnto the citie either by land or by water: and ſo lying ſtill before it a long time, he brought it at length into ſuch a diſtreſſe and want of all things, that the poore Chriſtians were fain to eat all manner of vnclean and loathſome things; horſes were daintie meat, yea, they were glad to eat dogs, cats, rats, and the skinnes of beaſts ſod: it exceedeth all credit, to tell at what exceeding great price a little mouſe was ſould, or puddings made of dogs guts. All theſe bare ſhifts and extremities the poore Chriſtians were content to endure euen vnto the laſt gaſpe, rather than to yeeld themſelues into the hands of their mercileſſe enemies.

Whileſt Scodra thus lay in the ſuds, the Venetians wearie of the long and chargeable war they had to their great loſſe now maintained againſt ſo mightie an enemie by the ſpace of ſixteene yeares, and hauing no meanes to relieue their diſtreſſed ſubiects in Scodra, thought it beſt to prooue if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. For which purpoſe they ſent Benedictus Triniſanus, a great Senator, and a man of great experience, to Conſtantinople: who ſo well vſed the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a peace was concluded; whereof the chiefe capitulations were, That the Venetians ſhould deliuer vnto Mahomet the citie of Scodra, the Iſland of Lemnos, and the ſtrong caſtle of Tenarus in Peloponeſus, and pay him yearely eight thouſand duckats; that they might freely after their woonted manner traffique into the Euxine by the ſtraits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus Thracius, and other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citiſens of Scodra, it was compriſed in the ſame peace, That it ſhould be at their owne choice, either to liue there ſtill vnder the gouernment of the Turkiſh Emperour, or elſe at their pleaſure to depart in ſafetie with their goods whither they would. Triniſanus hauing in this manner concluded a peace, in his returne homeward, the fourth of Aprill found the Venetian Admirall riding at anker in the mouth of Boliana, from whence they both by letters certified the Gouernor and citiſens of Scodra, in what manner the peace was concluded with the Turke, and what prouiſion was therein made for them. Vpon receit of which letters, the Gouernor calling together the citiſens, declared vnto them how the caſe ſtood; and there with them entred into conſultation vpon this hard queſtion, Whether they would remaine there ſtill in their natiue countrey vnder the Turkiſh tyrannie; or forſaking the ſame, liue amongſt other Chriſtians in perpetuall exile? But after that the matter had beene throughly debated, and many reaſons on both parts alledged; at length it was by generall conſent concluded; That they ſhould all forſake the citie and the houſe of bondage, as dangerous both to their ſoules and bodies, and liue as it ſhould pleaſe God amongſt other Chriſtians. So the Turks giuing pledges for the ſafe departure of the Chriſtians in Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the citie, and were by the Venetians carefully tranſported into other parts of their territorie in Italie, where they liued in peace. The Turks (who had now beſieged the citie a whole yeare) after the departure of the Chriſtians entred the citie with great joy and triumph; which, with manie others thereabout, hath euer ſince, to the great ruth of all Chriſtendome, remained in the poſſeſſion of the faithleſſe Infidels. Thus was the ſtrong citie of Scodra loſt, and the long wars ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians, which hapned in the yeare 1478.

Mahomet now at peace with the Venetians, ſent the ſame Achmetes Baſſa (by whom he had but a little before taken in Scodra) with his fleet of gallies againſt one Leonard Prince of Neritus, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Iſlands neere vnto Peloponeſus: where the Baſſa arriuing, eaſily tooke the ſame Iſlands, the poore Prince for ſafegard of his life being glad to flie into Italie with his wife and treaſure, to King Ferdinand, whoſe nigh kinſwoman he had married.

About the ſame time Alis Beg, ſyrnamed Michael Ogli, Iſa Beg the ſon of Caſſanes, and Balis Beg, ſyrnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongſt the Turks, and moſt honourably diſcended) entred into Tranſyluania with a great army of an hundred thouſand men, and brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the countrey, that Stephanus Batore the Vayuod, was glad with all ſpeed to flie vnto Matthias king of Hungarie, to declare vnto him the danger of his countrey, and to craue his ayd. Matthias at the ſame time lay ſicke of the gout: neuertheleſſe he tooke ſuch order by his captains, Stephanus Cherepetrus, and Paulus Kiniſius Countie of Temeſware, that the Turks were encountred not far from Alba Iulia, and there in a great and bloudie battell ouerthrowne: wherein Iſa one of their great Captaines was ſlaine, with thirtie thouſand Turks mo. Neither was this victorie gained by the Chriſtians without loſſe, Bator the Vayuod himſelfe being ſore wounded, and eight thouſand men ſlaine.

Mahomet in his ambitious humor, had long time deſired to haue in his ſubiection the Iſland of the Rhodes. For why, it grieued him that ſo ſmal an Iſland ſhould lie ſo nie his great dominions in Aſia, holden by a few Chriſtians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Mediteranean, beſide many other harmes daily from thence receiued, and to haue no feeling of his greatneſſe. But foraſmuch as the winning of that place was thought to bee a matter of great difficultie, and in former times vnfortunatly attempted by ſome of the Mahometan princes: he purpoſed now with good aduiſe to take this enterpriſe in hand. Whereſore calling together his graue counſellors and moſt expert men of war, after he had declared vnto them the manifold iniuries receiued from them of the Rhodes; he propounded the matter, Whether it were beſt to attempt the winning of that Iſland or not? Some forward men perſuaded him to reuenge thoſe iniuries done by thoſe Chriſtians, and to ſubdue that Iſland, which for the neereneſſe vnto Caria, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion, & not to forbeare that enterpriſe for feare of repulſe, foraſmuch as he was able to bring mo men to aſſaile it than were ſtones in the wal about it. Others better aduiſed, declared the ſtrength of the Iſland, with the valor of the defendants; men alwaies brought vp in armes, and as it were choſen out of all parts of Chriſtendome: ſo that it was (as they ſaid) like to proue a matter of more difficultie than was by ſome ſuppoſed; whereof ſome of the Mahometan princes had to their no ſmall diſhonor, alreadie made ſufficient triall: alleadging farther, that that ſmall Iſland which ſcarcely appeared in the ſea, was not of that worth, as that he ſhould thereon gage his honor, with the liues of ſo many good men, and moſt valiant ſouldiers as might ſerue for the conqueſt of a kingdome. For all that, Mahomet prickt forward with the ſpurs of ambition, and continuall ſolicitation of Anthonius Meligalus, a fugitiue knight of the Rhodes, reſolued to follow the counſell of them which perſuaded the war. This Meligalus was a knight of the Order, which when he had prodigally conſumed his ſubſtance, which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his own qualitie and diſpoſition, fled vnto the Turkiſh Emperor; preſenting vnto him a perfect plot of the citie, with all the ſtrength both of it, and the Iſle wherin it ſtood, and which way he might with moſt eaſe win it. In which ſeruice they frankly offered to ſpend their liues: but hoping indeed, by ſuch foule treacherie to repaire their broken eſtate. All things being now in readineſſe, Mahomet appointed Meſithes Paleologus, one of his chiefe Baſſaes (the neere kinſman of Conſtantinus Paleologus the laſt Emperor of Conſtantinople) Generall for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that ſo great an action. Meſithes embarking his armie, in number eightie thouſand, and throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the ſiege, ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and with a pleaſant gale of wind, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Aſia the leſſe, towards the Rhodes: where by the way he called vnto him Demetrius (one of the fugitiue knights) to learne of him the beſt means for the ſafe landing of his army. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chiefe authour of this warre, he was fallen ſicke vpon the way; and in the extremitie of his ſickneſſe, growing both troubleſome and loathſome vnto the Turks that were with him in the ſame gally, was by the marriners throwne ouer boord aliue, crying out in vaine for helpe, no man vouchſafing to haue any compaſſion vpon him: and ſo ſwallowed vp of the ſea, receiued amidſt the waues, the iuſt guerdon of his treacherie.

Mahomet longeth after the Rhodes.

A death right worthie ſuch a traitour.

At this time Peter Damboyſe a Frenchman, an Auergnoies, a man of ſingular gouernment, was Great Maſter of the Rhodes; whoſe vigilancie was ſuch, that commonly once in eight daies he had certain intelligence what great matters paſſed in the Turks court: and therewith of ſuch deepe iudgement, that he was ſeldome or neuer ouertaken, or deceiued with any falſe aduertiſements. This carefull Grand Maſter, was not ignorant of all theſe great preparations, neither of the comming of the Baſſa; and therefore had before ſtrongly fortified the city, and ſo ſtored the ſame with all things needfull, as might wel haue ſerued for many yeres ſiege: but eſpecially with ſuch ſhot and powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an eſpeciall meanes whereby the citie was afterward preſerued. At the ſame time, many noble and valiant gentlemen hearing of the Turkes deſignes, repaired thither out of Italie, France, Spaine, Germanie, manie, and other places of Chriſtendome, cheerfully to aduenture their liues, in defence both of the place, and of the Chriſtian religion, againſt the common enemie of Chriſtianitie. The Great Maſter taking a generall view of all the forces he had, to oppoſe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, found that he had in the citie ſixteene thouſand able men: in which number were reckoned many Iewes and other men of ſeruile condition; who in the ſiege following, did right good ſeruice. The great Baſſa conducted by the falſe traitor Demetrius, ſafely landed both his armie and artillerie in the Iſland the two and twentieth day of Iune, not far from the citie. At which time the Great Maſter conſidering that the ſafetie of the Citie conſiſted more in the liuely valour of the defendants, than in the ſtrength of the dead wals, or other warlike prouiſion; thought it requiſit, as a part of his dutie, by cheerfull perſuaſions to encourage them, valiantly to withſtand the force of their enemies. And therefore calling them all together, ſpake vnto them as followeth.

The oration of the Great Maſter to the reſt of the knights and ſouldiers, to encourage them valiantly to withſtand the Turkes.

At length valiant ſouldiers and fellowes at armes, we ſee the Turkes our mortall enemies (as we were before aduertiſed, as well by Letters from our friendes, as by common fame) breathing after our deſtruction; in readineſſe to deſtroy our Churches, our Oratorries, our Altars, our Religion, and whatſoeuer elſe we account ſacred or religious; ſeeking the ruine of this noble Citie, and the cruell death of vs all; gaping at once, to deuoure our liues, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly as I cannot denie but that the chance of warre is doubtfull, and the euent thereof vncertaine: So when I conſider your valiant courage and cheerfulneſſe of mind, I preſently conceiue a moſt aſſured hope of victorie. They haue entered into armes againſt vs, not ſo much for any deſert of ours, or vpon any other quarrell, as for the vnſatiable deſire of rule, and the great deſpite they beare againſt vs and the Chriſtian religion. But to withſtand their furie, and to fruſtrate their deſignes, we want neither weapons nor artillerie, nor prouiſion for many yeares; we haue a moſt ſtrong garriſon of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germaines, Engliſh, and others, the verie chiualrie of Chriſtendome: and that which more is, Chriſt Ieſus our Captaine and Generall, by whoſe power, we ſhall no doubt eaſily repulſe the vaine force of our moſt wicked and graceleſſe enemies. The care we haue for the defence of the Chriſtian Faith, whereunto we are by ſpeciall profeſſion bound, will animate and encourage vs, againſt them, which ſeeke for nothing more than to extend their wicked and groſſe superſtition, to the great diſhonour of God, and of his ſonne Chriſt Ieſus. Beſides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germaines, and other worthie Chriſtians: they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadocia, and the other delicate countries of Aſia; effeminat perſons brought vp to pleaſure. I ſay it not to draw you into any manifeſt or ineuitable danger, neither to feed you with vaine hope, or to fill your eares with windie wordes: but this I promiſe and aſſure you of, that if this ſiege ſhall continue long, hither will come ſuch ſtrong ayde out of France, Italie, and Spaine, as will ſerue not onely to raiſe the ſiege, but to recouer againe the Empires of Conſtantinople and Trapezond. Then ſhall our enemie ſee no good end of their councels; but all their deuiſes ſo confounded, as that they ſhall hardly be able by ſpeedie flight to ſaue themſelues. But ſuppoſe the hardeſt ſhould happen, which I feare not, would not any man account his life moſt happily and honourably ſpent, in defence of a good conſcience, and the quarrell of Chriſt Ieſus? Truly my great yeares and courſe of life now almoſt ſpent in defence of the Chriſtian religion (as I euer deſired) doth call me forth, as one ſo aſſured of that good layed vp for me in heauen by Chriſt Ieſus (whoſe battell we are to fight) that I no whit feare any enemies force or future chance: which for all that, I haue as farre as I could, and to the vttermoſt of my power ſo prouided for, as that we will not (I hope) be therewith ouerwhelmed. Be you therefore of good cheere and comfort (as I know you are) and ſhew your ſelues valiant and couragious, which reſteth wholly in your ſelues: and as for all the reſt, time, and our deſcretion, ſhall right well prouide I doubt not.

The valiant men & worthie ſouldiers, reſting vpon the aſſurance of their aged gouernor, departed euery man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Baſſa landed his great armie, and ſent Demetrius the traiterous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certaine troupes of horſemen and ſome foot, to view the ground, where he might beſt encampe with his armie. Demetrius in great pride riding about the citie, was knowne by Anthonie Damboyſe, the Great Maſters brother; by whoſe leaue, he ſallied out with a troupe of gallant horſemen, and skirmiſhed with them: but the Turks being moe in number, caſt about to haue incloſed them; which Anthonie perceiuing, turned vpon them that were comming behind him, and that with A ſuch force,that he ſlew or wounded moſt part of them. In this hot skirmiſh, Demetrius hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe ouerthrowne, was there troden to death vnder the horſes feet: an end too good for ſo falſe a traitor. Muratius a French knight,vnaduiſedly diſpoiling his dead bodie,was by the Turks ſlaine, and his head preſented vnto the Baſſa in ſtead of Demetrius.

The Baſſa approching the city,at the firſt comming tooke a great orchard,which the Great Maſter had ſtrongly intrenched,and therein placed certaine companies of ſoldiers,with ſome ſmall peeces of ordnance: which place if it could haue bin kept, might fitly haue ſerued the defendants to haue at their pleaſure ſallied out vpon the enemie. But they which were appointed to the keeping thereof,either terrified with the ſight of ſo great an armie,or els B doubting to be able to hold it againſt ſo great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the citie; leauing the great ordnance behind them for haſt. In this place,the Baſſa by the counſell of George Frapaine (a Chriſtian fugitiue of the Rhodes,and now maſter of his ordnance)began to plant his batterie, and from thence to batter the tower called Nicholea, or S. Nicholas his tower,diſtant from the citie three hundred paces. But againſt this place, Damboyſe had ſo aptly mounted two great Baſiliskes, that he made him glad quickly to forſake the ſame: yet finding no other place more conuenient for his purpoſe, ſhortly after hee neere vnto the ſame place planted againe his batterie,of far greater force than before. Wherin,beſide the ordnance of greateſt charge,he had three hundred ſmaller peeces for batterie: wherewith at the firſt he did ſmall harme,for that this George Frapaine repenting himſelfe (as was thought) of his foule C treaſon,beſtowed the ſhot to ſmall purpoſe; for which cauſe the Baſſa began to haue him in diſtruſt: which Frapaine perceiuing, fled by night againe vnto the Rhodes, and diſcouered vnto the Great Maſter all the ſecrets of the Turks campe. The Turks continuing the batterie, had ſore ſhaken the aforeſaid tower called S. Nicholas, and beaten downe ſome part thereof: which the Chriſtians with great induſtrie,ſpeedily repaired in beſt ſort they could:for all that the Turks gaue thereunto a fierce aſſault,by the ſpace of ſix houres, forcing themſelues to the vttermoſt to haue taken it: but perceiuing that it preuailed them nothing,they retired,hauing loſt eight hundred of their men, with many others drowned in the ſea, of whom the number was not knowne,and a thouſand others ſore wounded.

Meſithes diſappointed of his former purpoſe,bent his artillerie againſt the wals of the city, D and with continuall batterie had made a faire breach. But Damboyſe foreſeeing the danger,had with great labour caſt vp ſuch rampiers with a countermure before the breach, that the Baſſa durſt not in any caſe aduenture to enter the breach hee had made. For performance of this ſo neceſſarie a worke,the captaines themſelues refuſed not to put too their helping hands: by whoſe example,all the reſt of the people which were able to do any thing,being moued,willingly imployed their labour vntill the worke was fully finiſhed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing,Caly-Baſſa the younger (a great courtier) was ſent from Mahomet to ſee with what ſucceſſe the ſiege went forward. Vpon whoſe arriuall,it was giuen out through all the Turks campe,That Mahomet was in perſon himſelfe comming to the ſiege, E with 100000 men, and 150 peeces of great ordnance. Theſe newes (of purpoſe deuiſed to the terror of the defendants)being blowne out of the campe into the citie,ſtrucke an exceeding great feare into the minds of ſome of the defendants, and ſo diſcouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh neighbours that came from Nauar,that they began openly to reaſon in their conuenticles, That it was not poſſible for the citie to be defended againſt ſuch a power; and therfore after an inſolent manner,deſired leaue to be gone, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt. The Great Maſter vnderſtanding of their doings, ſent for theſe mutinous Spaniards: and after he had ſharpely reproued them both of diſorder and cowardiſe, promiſed to ſhip them away forthwith out of the Iſle, ſaying, That he doubted not,right well to defend the citie againſt the greateſt power of the Turk,without the help of ſuch baſe minded cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to ſurceaſe from their mutinous talke, threatning otherwiſe F to make them examples to others,what it is ſo much to forget themſelues. But theſe Spaniards ſhortly after, better conſidering of the matter, and what a diſhonour it would be both to themſelues and their nation, if they ſhould ſo diſhonourably bee ſent away, repenting themſelues of that they had done, came and craued pardon of the Great Maſter: and to redeeme their former fault,in all ſallies & ſeruices during that ſiege,ſhewed themſelues moſt valiant & forward men : for all that, the Great Maſter would neuer afterwards truſt them in any ſeruice G alone. The Baſſa attempting much and preuailing little, thought it would much further his deſignes, if he could by any meanes take the Great Maſter out of the way, by whoſe careful pollicie he ſaw all his deuiſes ſtill countermanded: wherefore to bring this his purpoſe to paſſe, he practiſed by the means of one Ianus a Dalmatian, to poyſon him. This Ianus hauing conceiued this treaſon from the Baſſa, was receiued into the citie of the Rhodes, as a Chriſtian fugitiue fled from the Turkes : where hee acquainted himſelfe with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiaritie with Marius Philelphus (of late Secretarie vnto Damboyſe, but as then out of fauor and in diſgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutinie.) Ianus by the means of Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, ſought after Philelphus, H who then as he right well knew, liued diſcontented, as a fit inſtrument wherby to worke this treaſon; for that he was a man well acquainted with the cookes and butlers, and other ſeruitors in the Great Maſters houſe, and himſelfe (yet) there very conuerſant alſo. Pythius preſuming of his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philelphus, and waiting vpon his melancholie humor, began to perſuade him to reuenge the diſgrace he liued in, and withal to ſhew him the meanes how to do it, by poyſoning of the Great Maſter : which might (as he ſaid) fal out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making ſemblant as if he had not diſliked of the motion, was deſirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby ariſe to him, more than reuenge. To whom Pythius forthwith ſhewed the Baſſaes Letters to Ianus, whereby hee aſſured him, that whatſoeuer hee ſhould promiſe vnto any man for the furthe- I rance of the practiſe, he would to the full performe the ſame. Philelphus hauing got full vnderſtanding of the treaſon, preſently diſcouered the ſame to Damboyſe. By whoſe commandement, Ianus and Pythius were ſtraight waies apprehended, and being examined, confeſſed the treaſon: for which Ianus loſt his head, and Pythius (as he had well deſerued) was ſhamefully hanged. Philelphus for his fidelitie, was pardoned his former errour, and againe receiued into the Great Maſters fauour.

Treaſon againſt the great maſter diſcouered, and the traitours executed.

The Baſſa vnderſtanding that the treaſon was diſcouered, and the traitours executed, was much grieued therewith. Neuertheleſſe, he ceaſed not with continual batterie to ſhake the citie, but eſpecially the tower of S. Nicholas, for the aſſailing whereof, he made wonderfull preparation. Amongſt other things, he had framed a great bridge, ſtaied with ſtrong ropes and cables, K ouer a ſhort fret of the ſea, betwixt the place of his batterie and the ſame tower, whereon ſix men might march abreaſt: in which deuice he repoſed great hope. But as the Turks were making faſt this bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the worke to a good perfection; Gernaiſe Rogers an Engliſhman of great courage, and very ſkilful in ſea matters, found meanes by night to cut and breake in ſunder all the ropes and cables wherewith the bridge was ſtaid; which now looſe, was by the violence of the ſea quickly carried away, and the Turkes diſappointed of their purpoſe. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great Maſter honorably rewarded, and of him in publicke audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious batterie by the Baſſa ſtill maintained, and a new bridge framed vpon ſmall boats and lighters, faſt moored with cables and anchors; and diuers peeces of great ord- L nance placed in fuſts and gallies. So that the the tower was at one time battered both by ſea and land, the defendants aſſailed with ſmal ſhot and arrowes innumerable, and the tower at the ſame inſtant deſperatly ſcaled. But Damboyſe had ſo placed his great ordnance, that with the force thereof the bridge was broken in ſunder, foure of their great fuſts ſunke, with great ſtore both of men and ordnance: the defendants alſo in the tower, with ſhot, timber, ſtones, & other ſuch like things prouided for that purpoſe, grieuouſly ouerwhelmed the Turks that were ſcaling the wals and beat them down with great ſlaughter. This hot aſſault was deſperatly maintained by the Turkes, from three a clocke in the morning vntill ten: when the Baſſa ſeeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the aſſault, hauing therein loſt aboue 2500 men; whoſe dead bodies ſhortly after driuen on ſhore, were ſpoiled by the Chriſtians. The ſame night two mercinarie ſouldiers of Crete, going about to haue fled vnto the enemie, were apprehended and put M to death. And George Frapaine, who in the beginning of the ſiege fled from the Turkes, now againe vehemently ſuſpected of treaſon, was executed alſo.

Two thouſand fiue hundred Turks ſlaine in the aſſault.

Thus neither force nor treaſon preuailing, the Baſſa becauſe he would leaue nothing vnproued that might better his cauſe, ſent certain meſſengers vnto the Great Maſter, offering to him in

A in the name of the Turkiſh Emperor, great rewards, with many honorable preferments, if he would yeeld vp the citie, which he could not (as they would haue perſuaded him) long hold againſt ſo mightie an enemie: wiſhing him now in his declining eſtate not to refuſe ſuch honorable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards conſtrained to accept of far worſe, or els through his deſperat wilfulneſſe plunge himſelfe and his people into ſuch extreme peril, as ſhould be impoſſible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the Great Maſter in briefe anſwered, That he would not willingly in his ſure eſtate vſe the counſell of his enemy: neither in his greateſt diſtreſſe refuſe cheerfully to yeeld his life vnto Almightie God, to whom he did owe it; and that with far better will than to yeeld vp the citie vpon any conditions, beare they neuer ſo faire a ſhew of honor or profit. The meſſengers perceiuing his conſtant reſolution, rather to die than to yeeld his citie, began (according to inſtructions before giuen them by the Baſſa) to temper B with him another way, and to perſuade him to yeeld vnto the mightie Emperour ſome ſmall yerely tribute or other homage, as an acknowledgment of his greatneſſe, and ſo to liue as his friend in peace. But the Great Maſter knowing by the wofull example of others, that in that ſmall requeſt lay included the beginning of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauery, vtterly refuſed to pay him the leaſt tribute, or to doe him the leaſt homage that could be deuiſed. With which anſwer the meſſengers returned, hauing obtained nothing of that they were ſent for.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter, reported by the aforeſaid meſſengers vnto the Baſſa, troubled him exceedingly; for though he had ſmall hope by force to win the citie, yet he was alwaies in hope vntill now, at his pleaſure, to forſake the ſiege with ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition as might ſtand with his honor. But ſith nothing remained now, but by plain C force to conſtrain his enemies, he reſolued for the ſafegard of his honor, in that extremetie to vſe that extreme remedie: wherefore beſide the great peeces of batterie he had already planted againſt the wals, he mounted diuers ſmaller peeces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the defendants, by beating downe of their churches and high built houſes. His ordnance thus placed, he battered the citie day and night for the ſpace of foure daies together without intermiſſion: during which time, the Chriſtians out of the city ſpared not, liberally to beſtow their ſhot among their enemies alſo: ſo that the aire ſeemed to grow thicke, and the light of the day to be darkned with the ſmoke of the great ordnance, and the great ſhot came ſo thicke into the citie, that the fearfull women and children were glad to ſhroud themſelues from the danger therof, in cellars and caues vnder ground. So long continued this great batterie, that at D length the ſtrength of the wall gaue place to the fury of the cannon, & a faire breach was laid open for the enemie to enter: which was no ſooner made, but that with the firſt ſhew thereof the Turks gaue thereunto a deſperat aſſault; and preuailing by reaſon of their multitude, had vpon the ſudden recouered the top of the wals, & there ſet vp ſome of their enſignes: but the Chriſtians ſpeedily comming in on euery ſide to the defence of the breach, they were againe quickly repulſed & beaten down into the diches, out of which moſt of them neuer riſe more. At which time the Turkes in another place with their ſcaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there aduanced their enſignes alſo, and were now fiue hundred of them entred the citie and come into the ſtreet called the Iew ſtreet: where they were encountered by the E Great Maſter and his followers, and all ſlaine that were already entered, and their enſignes that ſtood vpon the wals throwne down. The reſt yet ſcaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewiſe beaten from the wals, and with wonderful ſlaughter reiected. So that the Baſſa not able longer to indure the ſlaughter of his men, being in both places repulſed, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and left the aſſault; wherein he had loſt of his moſt forward men about fiue thouſand, with ſmall loſſe of the Chriſtians. In this aſſault, the Great Maſter himſelfe receiued fiue wounds, whereof one vnder his right pap was thought to haue bin deadly: which yet afterward was very well cured with the reſt.

After that the Baſſa had by the ſpace of three months to ſmal purpoſe ſpent all his forces and deuices vpon the city, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raiſe his ſiege & F depart, or to tarrie & expect ſome better fortune, which in al his former actions had ſeemed almoſt to haue waited vpon him; to forſake the ſiege, was diſhonorable; and to continue it without hope, preſented no leſſe danger. Beſides that, in the former aſſaults he had already loſt nine thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and all the reſt of his armie was filled with heauineſſe and deſpaire, to heare the wofull ſighing and groning of their fellows, of whom fifteen thouſand lay diſperſed in the campe ſore wounded, and readie many of them to giue vp the ghoſt: and alſo G but euen a little before, two great ſhips ſent from Ferdinand King of Naples with men and munition, were in deſpight of all the Turks gallies ſafely arriued at the Rhodes, to the great ioy and encouragement of the beſieged, and no leſſe diſcontentment of the Turkes. Whileſt the Baſſa was thus deliberating what courſe to take, a rumour was raiſed in the campe, That the Chriſtian Princes were comming with great power to relieue the towne: with which newes the whole armie was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raiſed his ſiege. Some others ſay, that Mahomet hearing of the euill ſucceſſe of his armie in the Iſland of the Rhodes, with the difficultie of the ſiege, and now readie to goe in perſon himſelfe againſt the Sultan of Ægypt, ſent for the Baſſa, and that ſo the ſiege was raiſed. Howſoeuer it was, the Baſſa before his departure cauſed all the vines and trees growing in that part of the Iſland, to be cut downe and H ſpoiled: and ſo after he had poured foorth his furie vpon the ſenceleſſe creatures, which hee could not according to his deſire exerciſe vpon the people, againe embarked his armie, and with ſhame departed, the ſeuenteenth of Auguſt.

At the ſame time that the Rhodes was thus beſieged, Mahomet ſent his old and moſt expert captaine Achmetes Baſſa, with a great fleet and a ſtrong army to make an entrance into Italie (for no kingdome was ſo ſtrong, which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now command) and hauing long before conquered Conſtantinople, otherwiſe called new Rome, was ſtill dreaming (I wot not what) of the conqueſt of Old Rome alſo. The miſchieuous Baſſa according to his great maſters deſignes, embarked his armie at Vallona (otherwiſe called Aulona) a ſea towne in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence paſſing I directly ouer that narrow ſea, which is in breadth about ſixty miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of Italie, called in antient time Apulia (now Puglia) neere vnto the old and famous citie of Hydruntum, at this day called Otranto: where as ſoone as this warlike Baſſa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich country alongſt the ſea coaſt and tooke ſuch infinit ſpoile as might wel haue ſatisfied the greedie deſire both of himſelfe and of his hungarie ſoldiers: all which rich bootie he cauſed to be conueyed into his gallies. So when he had at his pleaſure ranged vp and downe the countrie by the ſpace of fourteene dayes, and ſaw that none made head againſt him, he laid ſiege to Otranto, the chiefe citie of that countrey, and as it were the key of that part of Italie: and hauing with ſuch ordnance as hee tooke out of his gallies, made a breach, eaſily entred the ſame, & ſo without any great loſſe tooke the citie. A K thing not greatly to be maruelled at, foraſmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether liuing in ſecuritie in the midſt of their wealth and pleaſure. The Archbiſhop, with Zurlo the Gouernor, and the chiefe men of the city, for ſafegard of their liues fled into the great Cathedral Church, as into a Sanctuarie, where they were all together moſt miſerably ſlain. The reſt of the citizens, whoſe hard fortune it was to eſcape the ſword (as people reſerued to moe miſery) were afterward ſhipt ouer into Grecia, & there ſold for ſlaues. The landing of the Turks in Apulia, with the taking of Otranto, brought a generall feare vpon all Italy, inſomuch that Sixtus Quartus, then the great Biſhop of Rome, forgetting al things ſaue himſelfe, was about to haue forſaken the citie for feare. Now after the Turks had at their L pleaſure ranſackt Otranto, Achmetes cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly fortified (as the ſure footing of the Turks in Italie) and victualled for eighteen moneths, and there leauing eight thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers in garriſon, returned himſelfe with the reſt to Vallona, and ſo by land to Conſtantinople to know his great Maſters further pleaſure: but purpoſing with himſelfe, with the firſt of the next Spring to haue returned with greater forces againe to Italie for the proſecuting of his former victorie. Which if he had done, it was greatly to haue been feared, that all that goodly countrey, ſometime miſtreſſe of the World, but then and yet alſo rent in ſunder by the diſcord and ambition of the Chriſtian princes, had in ſhort time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turke for euer.

Achmetes landeth his armie in Apulia neere to Otranto, and ſpoileth the countrie.

Otranta taken by the Turkes.

But whileſt the great Baſſa (in his life time the great ſcourge of Chriſtendome) thus proudly M plotteth the ruine and deſtruction of faire Italie, God, in whoſe hands the hearts of Kings are, put an hook in the great tyrants noſe, and led him quite another way. For at the ſame time, the Caramanian king, aided by the Perſian & the Sultan of Ægypt, had in a great battel ouerthrowne Baiazet (Mahomets eldeſt ſonne then liuing) and ſlaine moſt part of his army: in reuenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raiſed a great and puiſſant armie, and taking

A Achmetes with him as his chiefe man of war, reiecting the wars of Italie vnto a more conuenient time, paſſed ouer into Aſia: where vpon the way, about a dayes journey ſhort of Nicomedia a citie of Bithynia, at a place called Geiuiſin he fell ſicke, and there for the ſpace of three dayes grieuouſly tormented with an extreame paine in his bellie (which ſome ſuppoſed to be the collicke) died; but being indeed, as moſt men thought, poyſoned; when he had liued about 52 yeares, and thereof raigned 31, in the yeare of our Lord 1481. His bodie was afterwards magnificently buried in a chappel neere vnto the great Mahometan temple, which he himſelfe firſt built at Conſtantinople.

Mahomet dieth at Geiuiſen in Bythinia, not without ſuſpition of poyſon.

He is buried at Conſtantinople.

The death of this mightie man (who liuing troubled a great part of the world) was not much more lamented by thoſe that were neereſt vnto him, (who euer liuing in feare of his crueltie, hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who euer in doubt of his greatneſſe, were glad B to heare of his end. He was of ſtature but low, and nothing anſwerable to the height of his mind, ſquare ſet, and ſtrong limmed, not inferior in ſtrength (when he was young) vnto any in his fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg onely: his complexion was Tartarlike, ſallow and melancholie, as were moſt of his anceſtors the Othoman Kings; his looke and countenance ſterne, with his eyes piercing, hollow and a little ſunke as it were into his head, and his noſe ſo high and crooked, that it almoſt touched his vpper lip. To be briefe, his countenance was altogether ſuch, as if Nature had with moſt cunning hand therein depainted and moſt curiouſly ſet forth to view the inward diſpoſition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable.
He was of a verie ſharpe and apprehenſiue wit, learned, as amongſt that nation, eſpecially in Aſtronomie, and could ſpeake the Greeke, Latine, Arabicke, Chaldee, and Perſian C Tongues. He delighted much in regarding of Hiſtories, and the liues of worthie men, eſpecially the liues of Alexander the Great, and of Iulius Caeſar, whom he propoſed to himſelfe as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and thereto verie fortunate; a ſeuere puniſher of injuſtice, in them eſpecially to whom he had committed the adminiſtration of juſtice.
Men that excelled in any qualitie, he greatly fauoured and honourably entertained: as he did Gentil Bellin a Painter of Venice, whom he purpoſely cauſed to come from thence, to Conſtantinople, to draw the liuerie counterfeit of himſelfe, for which he moſt honorably rewarded him. He ſo ſeuerely puniſhed theft, as that in his time all the wayes were ſafe, and a theefe ſcarcely to be heard of. But theſe good parts were in him obſcured with moſt horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligeous, and of all others moſt perfideous, D ambitious aboue meaſure, and in nothing more delighted, than in bloud; in ſo much that it is probably gathred, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thouſand men: craft, couetouſneſſe, and diſſimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in compariſon of his greater vices. In his loue was no aſſurance, and his leaſt diſpleaſure was death: ſo that he liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iſſue three ſonnes, Muſtapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bajazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of ſome called Zizimus, competitor of the Empire with his eldeſt brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his raigne, ſo that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which opportunitie (by God himſelfe no doubt offered for the ſafegard of Italie) Alphonſus E Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne) taking hold vpon, with all the power hee could make in Italie, beſieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many ſharpe skirmiſhes, wherein he loſt diuers of his great Captaines and Commanders, as the Countie Iulio de Aquaina, Loys de Capua, and the Countie Iulio de Piſa, with others, and was ſtill by the ſtrong garriſon of the Turks put to the worſe; vntill ſuch time as being ſtrengthened with aid out of Spaine and Portugal, (but eſpecially with certaine companies of moſt valiant ſouldiers ſent from Matthias Coruinus out of Hungarie; whoſe forces the Turks moſt feared) he began to cut them ſhort, and ſtraitly beſieged the citie both by ſea and land: vntill at length the beſieged Turks hearing of the death of their great Emperour, and now hardly preſſed with the dangers of a ſtrait ſiege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall, (then readie F to haue come to their reſcue with fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiers) yeelded vp the city vnto the Duke, vpon compoſition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terrour of all Italie holden that ſtrong citie by the ſpace of a yeare. And ſo was that rich countrey rather by the mercie of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preſerued, than by the ſtrength or policie of the Like earth-borne brethren, Baiazet and Zizimus in armes, Seeke for the Turkiſh Empire great, the one by th'others harmes.

Vntill that Baiazet preuail'd, and Zizimus was faine To flie to Rhodes, from thence to Rome, whereas he caught his baine.
Great ſtormes endured Baiazet in peace and bloudie broyles:
A man both happie and accurſt, amongſt his richeſt ſpoyles.
But now forworne with trembling age, and ciuill diſcord new, Thruſt from his Empire by his ſonne, died poyſoned by a Iew.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SECOND EMPEROR OF THE TVRKES.

Vpon the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, great troubles began to ariſe about the ſucceſſion in the Turkiſh empire; ſome of the Baſſa's and great captaines ſeeking to place Baiazet, the eldeſt ſon of Mahomet, in the Empire; and others with no leſſe deuotion labouring to C. preferre Zemes, or Gemes, otherwiſe called Zizimus, Baiazet his yonger brother. By occaſion whereof there aroſe two great and mightie factions, which in few dayes grew to ſuch heat, that many great tumults and hot skirmiſhes were made in the imperiall citie, betwixt the fauourits of both factions, and great ſlaughter committed. In theſe broyls the proud Ianizaries for an old grudge ſlew Mahomethes one of the foure great Baſſa's, a man by whoſe graue counſel moſt of the weightie affaires of the Turkiſh empire had been managed during the raigne of the late Emperour: and proceeding further in their accuſtomed inſolencie, ſpoyled all the Chriſtians and Iewes which dwelt amongſt them, of all their wealth and ſubſtance; at which time the rich merchants and citiſens of Conſtantinople D which were naturall Turks themſelues, eſcaped not their rauenous hands, but became vnto them a prey and ſpoyle alſo. The other three Baſſa's of the court, Iſaac, Meſithes, and Achmetes, (lately returned from the winning of Hydruntum in Italie) although they ſecretly maligned and enuied one at the greatneſſe of another, yet to appeaſe theſe ſo dangerous troubles, and to aſſure their owne eſtates, ioyned hands together, and by their great authoritie, and multitude of followers and fauourits, found meanes that Corcutus (one of the younger ſonnes of Baiazet, a young Prince of eighteene yeares old) was as it were by generall conſent of the Nobilitie and ſouldiers, ſaluted Emperour, and with great triumph and ſolemnitie placed in the Imperiall ſeat. In whoſe name, the aforeſaid Baſſa's at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Baiazet or Zemes, then both abſent, the one at Amaſia, and the other E at Iconium in Lycaonia. For the jealous Turkiſh Kings neuer ſuffer their ſonnes to liue in court neere vnto them, after they be growne to yeres of diſcretion; but ſend them to gouerne their prouinces far off: where they are alſo vnder the command of the Emperors lieutenants generall in Aſia or Europe, and may not depart from their charge without great danger, not ſo much as to viſit their father without expreſſe leaue and commandement. So jealous are thoſe Tyrants, yea euen of their owne ſonnes.

Diſſentiō among the Turkes about the ſucceſſion.

Baiazet and Zemes hearing of the death of their father, and of the troubles in the imperial citie, haſted thitherward with all ſpeed, where Baiazet being the neerer, firſt arriued: but finding the empire alreadie poſſeſſed by Corcutus his yonger ſon, and himſelfe excluded, he in griefe of his heart poured forth moſt grieuous complaints before God and man, calling heauen and F earth to witneſſe of the great wrong and iniurie done vnto him by the proud Baſſa's. And what by tears and humble obteſtations, what by great gifts and greater promiſes, but moſt of all by the earneſt labour and ſolicitation of Cherſeogles Viceroy of Grecia, and the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, both his ſons in law, preuailed ſo much with the great Baſſa's & ſoldiers of the court, that Corcutus being of a mild and curteous diſpoſition, ouercome by their intreatie and the reuerence of his father, reſigned vnto him the imperiall gouernment, which he preſently tooke vpon him with the generall good liking of the people, and made Corcutus Gouernor of Lycia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleaſant and rich countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yerely penſion for the better maintenance of his eſtate, with promiſe alſo of the empire after his deceaſe: and ſo ſent him away to his charge, where he moſt pleaſantly liued during the raigne of his father Baiazet, giuing himſelfe wholly to the ſtudie of Phyloſophie, which made that he was afterwards leſſe fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of war.

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and vnderſtanding by his friends how all things ſtood at Conſtantinople, and that Baiazet was alreadie poſſeſſed of the empire; returning with great ſpeed, raiſed a puiſſant armie in the countries which were vnder his command, and marching through the heart of Aſia the leſſe, by the way as he went, tooke into his poſſeſſion ſuch cities and ſtrong places as he thought beſt; and ſo entring into Bithynia, tooke the great citie of Pruſa, the antient ſeat of the Othoman Kings. Purpoſing in himſelfe, that as Baiazet had ſhut him out of Europe, ſo he would alſo in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkiſh empire which is beyond Helleſpontus in Aſia, & to make himſelf lord therof. Wherein fortune at the firſt ſeemed vnto him moſt fauourable, all the people whereſoeuer hee came yeelding vnto him obedience as vnto their Prince and Soueraign: ſo that in ſhort time he ſeemed both vnto himſelfe and to others, in ſtrong poſſeſſion of that part of the Empire.

Baiazet goeth againſt Zemes.

Of theſe his proceedings Baiazet hauing intelligence, and perceiuing the greater part of his empire now in danger to be loſt, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious minde would hardly reſt therewith long contented; for remedie of ſo great a miſchiefe leuied a ſtrong and puiſſant armie, wherewith he paſſed ouer into Aſia, and came to Neapolis a Citie of Anatolia, neere whereunto Zemes lay with his armie ſtrongly incamped. As Baiazet was vpon the way againſt his brother, Achmetes the great Baſſa (in the confeſſion of all men the beſt man of war and moſt expert Captaine amongſt the Turks, and of all others moſt entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, and vnarmed preſented himſelfe vpon his knees before Baiazet, his ſword hanging at his ſaddle bow: to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to ſee ſo worthie a Chiefetaine of ſo great place in time of ſeruice, without any apparent cauſe, in ſuch humble manner to appeare before his Soueraigne, as if he had had nothing to do with armes. It chanced many yeares before, in the mortal warres betwixt Mahomet the late and great Emperour of the Turks, and Aſſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes the King of Perſia, that Baiazet hauing the leading of the right wing of his fathers Armie, had not martialled it in ſo good order as was to Mahomet his good liking: for which cauſe he commanded this Achmetes to goe and ſet that part of the battell in better order. Which his Soueraignes command whiles hee moſt skilfully performed, Baiazet taking it in euill part, as tending to his owne diſgrace, in great choler threatened the Baſſa, to finde a time when he would be reuenged vpon him. But hee being a man of great ſpirit, and one that durſt both doe and ſay much, perceiuing his meaning, bid him doe what pleaſed him; and laying his hand vpon his ſword, ſolemnly vowed, That whenſoeuer he came to command as Emperour, he would neuer weare ſword in field: the remembrance whereof was the cauſe that he then came in manner aforeſaid, readie to ſerue if he were thereto commanded, or otherwiſe to endure what ſo his Princes pleaſure was. Baiazet perceiuing that the vnkindens ſo long before conceiued, was not yet diſgeſted, in token of grace ſtretched out to him his ſcepter; and taking him vp, commanded him to girt his ſword vnto his ſide, and not to remember that which hee had long before both forgiuen and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a moſt valiant and expert captaine, made him General of his armie, to the great contentment of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the army; who ſo ſoone as they ſaw him, gaue out diuers great ſhouts for joy, as if victorie had moſt aſſuredly attended vpon him. Achmetes taking vpon him the charge, came and incamped ſo neere as he could to Zemes, and ſo lay by the ſpace of ten dayes: during which time, many ſharpe skirmiſhes were made with diuers fortune; ſometime the one ſide preuailing, and ſometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell; wherein after a long and cruell fight, and great ſlaughter on both ſides, the fortune of Baiazet, conducted by the policie of Achmetes, preuailed againſt Zemes. Who ſeeing his Armie ouerthrowne, betooke himſelfe to flight, and came to Iconium: in which flight many of Zemes his followers were taken priſoners; whom Baiazet would haue pardoned and enlarged, but that by the perſuaſion

Achmetes made Generall of Baiazet his armie.

A ſion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others ſuffered them all to be put to the ſword.

Zemes flieth into Syria.

Zemes doubting after this ouerthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means to make head againe: when he had ſtaied three daies at Iconium, cauſed his treaſure, plate, iewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be truſſed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a ſonne and a daughter, accompanied with a ſmall retinue, fled into Syria; then part of the dominion of Caytbeius, commonly called the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Baiazet came thither with his armie, to haue ſurpriſed him: but vnderſtanding of his flight, hee took order for the peaceable gouernment of that part of his empire. And ſo hauing ſuppreſſed that dangerous rebellion, and again reduced that troubled part of his empire to his obeiſance, B returned with victorie to Conſtantinople.

The diſtreſſed prince Zemes trauelling through Syria, came at length to Ieruſalem: where he ſtayed a good ſpace, deuoutly viſiting the monuments of that moſt antient and famous citie. From thence he trauelled into Ægypt; where at his firſt entrance into the countrey, hee was met by diuers of the greateſt nobilitie of that kingdome, ſent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to Caire, and there preſented to Caytbeius, of whom he was graciouſly welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, he declared the cauſe of his comming, as followeth:

If it were not to me certainely knowne (moſt victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, C or from whence deſcended, or with what iniurie enforced, after long and painfull trauell I am here arriued; it would much concerne me to vſe another manner of beginning of my ſpeech, and with greater proteſtation of words to ſeeke your gracious fauour. But foraſmuch as all theſe things are vnto your moſt royall Maieſtie ſufficiently knowne, as I doe well perceiue in this, that your infinite clemencie hath entertained me with farre greater kindneſſe, than I in ſuch my aduerſe fortune durſt wiſh for much leſſe requeſt: Now nothing remaineth for me to ſay, more than iuſtly to complaine vnto your inuincible Maieſtie, of the wrong and iniurie done vnto me by Baiazet, whom I may more iuſtly tearme my cruell enemie, than kind brother. For he not contented to haue taken vnto himſelfe my fathers Empire by great tumult and ſlaughter, hath with all hoſtilitie and force of armes perſecuted me his brother, excluded out of the Imperiall Citie, and then liuing in Bythinia, troubleſome neither to him, nor any of D his people, and neuer reſted vntill he had chaſed me out of the bounds of my fathers Empire. Neither hath the iealous deſire of Soueraigntie (whereof my father whileſt he liued, had him alwaies in diſtruſt) ſo much moued him vnto this ſo cruell fact, as a certaine vnnaturall crueltie towards all his kindred in generall, and mortall hatred againſt me his brother in particular: for he which is alreadie poſſeſſed of the Empire, and doth with all hoſtilitie perſecute a priuate perſon, ſubiect and expoſed to his iniurie, that man thirſteth not after Soueraigntie, but after bloud; neither deſireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles aroſe in Conſtantinople, and many bloodie skirmiſhes were fought betwixt the fauourites of both of vs, it cannot with any truth be laied to my charge, as done by mine aduiſe or counſell, I being at the ſame time ſo farre from thence. Neither am E I iuſtly to be blamed, if that after my fathers departure I put my ſelfe vpon the way towards Conſtantinople, eſpecially being ſent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and qualitie: but his fortune preuailing, I gaue place, and leſt my comming to the imperiall Citie might haue been the occaſion of new troubles, I returned aſide into Bythinia, and ſo to Pruſa, with purpoſe there to haue reſted in quiet, if my brother would haue giuen me leaue. But ſo far was he from that, to ſuffer mee there to reſt, as that I was by him moſt cruelly aſſayled as an open enemie: and had I not by ſpeedie flight withdrawn my ſelfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers kingdome, I muſt haue yeelded my ſelfe, my blood, and life, as a ſacrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me ſo mortall an enemie, or thirſteth after my life ſo much for feare, as for very hatred and malice: for what is there in me to feare? Verily nothing: Conſtantinople is his, the fauour of the great Chiefetaines and men of warre is his, the treaſure and regall riches are all his; wherefore he F hateth his brother, but feareth him not. He will ſway all things alone, he will haue all that belongeth to the Othoman familie alone, and he, yea none but he, muſt liue alone. Xerxes was a mightie King, and yet in that great and large Kingdome he not onely preſerued his brethren in ſafetie, but had them alſo in great honour and eſtimation. What did Alexander the Great? Who not onely tooke pleaſure in his brother, but had him alſo as a companion of his moſt glorious expedition: and many other famous Kings of forreine Nations, and of our owne familie, haue ruled both more ſafely, and better ſtrengthened, with the counſell and aid of their moſt louing brethren, rather than with others. But Baiazet is of a farre other minde, reputing violence and haughtineſſe of heart to be his greateſt and ſureſt defence: herein his fierce nature delighteth, more than in the lawfull courſe of nature, iuſtice, and equitie; he had rather haue his brother his enemie than his friend, and to driue him into exile, than to make him partaker of his counſels. But I beſeech thee moſt puiſſant Monarch, the faithfull keeper and maintainer of our Law and Religion, by the ſacred reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou haſt at Hieruſalem and Mecha, ſuffer me not, a Kings ſonne, to liue in baniſhment and exile, poore and miſerable, a ſcorne of his brothers crueltie, farre from home, farre from his countrie and kingdome; but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, lift vp the afflicted and oppreſſed, and by the great authoritie which you haue, bridle domeſticall wrong; or if that will not take place, reuenge it with thy ſword, and ſuffer not our Empire, with ſo great trauell founded, by the crueltie or follie of one wilfull man to be ouerthrowne: which ſhould be no more grieuous and lamentable to vs, than dangerous to your moſt high eſtate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your ſelfe vnderſtand right well, what deadly enemies the Chriſtian Princes are vnto the Turks: and doe you thinke, that if any great warre (which I wiſh not) ſhould ariſe of this our diſcord, that they would long reſt in quiet, and as idle beholders ſtand looking on vntill it were of it ſelfe appeaſed? Or rather hauing ſuch an opportunitie preſented, would not with might and maine ſuddenly inuade our kingdome, before ſhaken with ciuile warres, and ſeeke the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the ſame? Which their deſire, if that hatefull people could bring to paſſe (which thing Mahomet turne vpon themſelues) my mind abhorreth to thinke how far that miſchiefe would runne: For the Othoman familie once rooted out, there is none of our Religion, (your Maieſtie onely excepted) which is able to withſtand their power: wherefore you muſt then ſtand for your ſelfe and all the reſt, you alone muſt withſtand the force of the Chriſtians, you muſt maintaine that warre with much loſſe, aad greater charge, and moſt vncertaine ſucceſſe. Wherefore, inuincible Monarch, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, that pittying our eſtate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedie is yet to be had, to deale with Baiazet by your Embaſſadours, That though he will not receiue me his brother as partner of the Empire, yet at leaſt to admit me into ſome ſmall part of my fathers kingdome: Let him raigne and rule, let all things be at his command; let it be lawfull for mee poore man but to liue in reſt and quiet ſomewhere, poſſeſſing but ſo much as may ſuffice mee honeſtly to lead a priuate life. Which thing if he ſhall refuſe to grant, although he neither feare the Lawes of God or man, yet as I haue at Hieruſalem, ſo will I alſo ſhortly at Mecha (if by your leaue I may) complaine vnto the great Prophet, of the iniuries done vnto mee by my cruell and vnnaturall brother; and afterwards make proofe of your compaſſion towards mee, all which I hope ſhall much auaile. But if (which I would not) I ſhall prooue al theſe things in vain, ſith deſparation enforceth men to all extreamities, I will goe with fire, ſword, and ſlaughter, by ſecret and open force, by right and wrong; and hated, will vex my hateful brother by all manner of miſchiefe, by all manner of reuenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, vntill I bee either receiued into part of the Empire, or elſe together with my life leaue thoſe deſperate and loſt things for him alone to enioy. For I deeme it much better, quickly to die, than with diſgrace and infamie to protract a lingring loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the diſtreſſed prince, willing him to be of good cheere, and patiently to beare his preſent hap: foraſmuch as it became a man borne in ſo high fortune, not to be diſcouraged with any miſchance, or diſmaid if things fell out otherwiſe than he looked for: commending him withall, for that he ſaw in him no leſſe courage than might well haue becommed his better eſtate; & willing him to liue ſtill in hope, promiſed to doe what in him lay, to reconcile him to his brother, & to perſuade him that he might be receiued into ſome part of the kingdom: and to that purpoſe ſhortly after diſpatched away an honorable embaſſage to Baiazet. Zemes in the meane while, by the ſame Sultans leaue, vpon a ſuperſtitious deuotion trauelled into Arabia, to viſit the Temple of Mahomet at Mecha, and his ſepulchre at Medina. Vpon his returne to Caire, the embaſſadours before ſent, returned alſo, but not hauing obtained any thing they deſired: for Baiazet would not giue eare to any agreement, but ſeemed altogether to contemne and deſpiſe his brother. Wherfore Zemes more vpon ſtomacke & deſire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the empire, determined with

A himſelfe to make open war vpon him; repoſing ſome good hope in his ſecret friends, and in the reuolt of ſome of the great captaines, who diſcontented with the gouernment of Baiazet, ſecretly wiſhed for his returne.

Whileſt he was thus plotting theſe weightie matters, a meſſenger with letters came fitly from the King of Caramania, offering with all the power he could make, to joyne with him, if he would take vp armes againſt his brother. This poore titular King then liued in Armenia, and being able by his friends to make ſome good force, was in hope by joyning with Zemes, to recouer ſome part of the Caramanian kingdome, from whence his father was not many yeres before driuen by the force of the late Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet the Great, Baiazet his father. It is hard to ſay, whither of theſe diſtreſſed and exiled Princes gaue the greater B encouragement to the other, to take this deſperat war in hand, being both together far vnable by all the friends they could make, to encounter with the great power of Baiazet. But what is ſo dangerous or deſperat, which aſpiring minds will not attempt in hope of a kingdome? whoſe brightneſſe ſo dazeleth their eyes, that they can ſee nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes hauing receiued great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promiſe of aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earneſtly perſuading him to the contrarie) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King vpon the borders of Aſia the leſſer: where they concluded to joine together ſuch Forces as they had, and to inuade Baiazet. Which they accordingly did: for raiſing all the power they could, they entred into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joyning their armies together, incamped betweene Iconium and Larenda. C Neither did Baiazet in time of ſo great a danger ſit ſtill; not ſo much fearing his brothers power, as the reuolting of his captaines and ſouldiers, whom he knew either to loue, or at leaſt not to hate the young Prince his brother. Wherefore he raiſed a great armie, and ſent Achmetes (the great man of war) before with the one part thereof, himſelfe following after with a far greater ſtrength: for at that time he had vnder his enſignes two hundred thouſand men.

As he was marching with this great armie, a rumor was raiſed in the campe, That ſome of his chiefe captaines had conſpired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the ſouldiers ſecretly fauouring Zemes, would vpon the joyning of the battell forſake him, and take part with his brother. Which report ſo troubled Baiazet, that he ſtood in doubt what to doe, or whom to truſt: but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common D ſoldier more, than the Generals bountie, he forthwith cauſed a wonderfull maſſe of mony to be diuided amongſt the captains and ſoldiers, loding their minds with ample promiſes of far greater rewards, for their fidelitie and valour to be ſhewed in that preſent ſeruice. Hauing thus aſſured himſelfe of the wauering minds of his ſouldiers, he began to draw neere to Iconium, where his enemies lay incamped: and by gloſing letters and flattering meſſengers made ſhew openly, as if he had been verie deſirous to come to ſome good agreement with them, but ſecretly went about to ſtop all the ſtraits and paſſages, in ſuch manner as that it ſhould not be poſſible for them againe to retyre backe into Syria: for he doubted nothing more, but leſt they being few in number, & in ſtrength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon ſo great diſaduantage hazard the fortune of a battell, but retyre themſelues into Syria, and ſo to his E exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract the warre.

Zemes perceiuing his brothers ſubtill drift, and ſeeing no ſuch reuolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him bin promiſed; and weighing with reaſon his owne weake forces, retyred in good time vnto the ſtraits of the mountain Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria. Here, deſpairing of all good ſucceſſe in the enterpriſe he had taken in hand, he perſuaded the Caramanian king his confederate to giue place vnto the time, and to reſerue himſelfe vnto his better fortune: and ſo breaking vp his armie, with a few of his followers came down to the ſea coaſt of Cilicia; where he hired a tall ſhip to attend in readineſſe, that if any ſudden danger ſhould ariſe, he might go aboord, and ſo ſaue himſelfe by ſea. In the mean time he ſent a meſſenger vnto Damboys Great Maſter of the Rhodes, certifying him, That F foraſmuch as he had no place of ſafetie left amongſt his owne people, wherein he might ſhroud himſelf from the fury of his brother, ſtill ſeeking after his life, he would vpon his ſafe conduct come to him into his Iſland of the Rhodes. Which his requeſt the Great Maſter eaſily granted, deeming the flight of ſo great a Prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Chriſtian Commonweale: and thereupon he preſently ſent forth certaine gallies to fetch him from the troubleſome coaſt of Cicilia. But before theſe gallies were come, Zemes was inforced by the ſudden acceſſe of his enemies, for the auoiding of preſent danger, to go aboord on that ſhip which he had prouidently before prepared to be in readineſſe for ſuch purpoſe. And hauing put a little from the ſhoare, ſhot backe againe an arrow with letters made faſt vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

Zemes his letters to his brother Baiazet.

Thou knoweſt (moſt vnkind and cruell brother) that I flie not vnto the Chriſtians, the mortall enemies of the Othoman Familie, for hatred of my religion or nation; but enforced thereunto by thy iniurious dealing, and dangerous practiſes which thou inceſſantly attempteſt againſt me, yea euen in my extreame miſerie. But this aſſured hope I carrie with me, that the time will come when as thou the authour of ſo great wrong, or thy children, ſhall receiue the iuſt guerdon of this thy preſent tyranny againſt thy brother.

It is reported, that when Baiazet had read theſe letters, he was ſo troubled in mind, that for certaine daies he gaue himſelfe wholly to mourning and heauineſſe, and would in no wiſe bee comforted: inſomuch, that he was brought into the campe by the Baſſaes, as a man halfe diſtraught of his wits, ſhunning for a ſeaſon all mens ſpeech and companie.

Zemes flieth to the Rhodes.

Zemes ſailing to the Rhodes, was there honorably receiued of the Great Maſter, and all the reſt of the Knights of the Order: to whom in their publicke aſſemblie three daies after, hee openly declared the cauſes of the diſcord betwixt his brother and him: alledging for the color of his rebellion, That although Baiazet were his elder brother, yet that he was born whilſt his father yet liued in priuat eſtate, vnder ſubiection and command, long before he poſſeſſed the kingdome, and ſo no kings ſonne: whereas he himſelfe was the firſt borne of his father, beeing an Emperour, and ſo not heire of his fathers priuat fortune (as was Baiazet) but of his greateſt honour and empire; and yet not of ſuch an hautie mind, but that he could haue beene content to haue giuen place vnto his brother, ſo that he could haue bin contented likewiſe to haue granted him ſome ſmall portion of the empire, wherein he might ſafely haue liued as a poore Prince, and his brother: but that ſuch was his pride, as that he would not vouchſafe to ſuffer him to liue ſo much as a poore priuat life in any corner of ſo large an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyranous dealing, enforced to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes. Of whom (forſomuch as he had alwaies heard much honour) he was in good hope to find ſuccour and reliefe in that his diſtreſſed eſtate: proteſting vnto God and the world, that if euer it ſhould be his good fortune by their means and helpe to obtaine the empire, he would neuer be vnmindfull of ſo great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetuall and inuiolable peace, and ſo to reſt their faſt friend for euer. The Great Maſter on the other ſide comforting him with cheerfull ſpeeches, promiſed to keepe him in ſafetie from the furie of his brother; and farther to commend his cauſe to the other great Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome.

The deſcription of Zemes.

This exiled Prince Zemes, was about the age of eight and twentie yeares when he came to the Rhodes; of ſtature tall, ſomewhat corpulent and well limb'd, gray eyed, but looking ſomething aſquint, hooke noſed, and in the middle riſing, in ſuch maner as the Perſians commend in their kings: of colour browne, ſpare of ſpeech, and by nature cholericke: a great feeder, ſo that he ſeemed rather to deuoure his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in ſwimming, and to lie abroad in the night; penſiue and melancholie, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer merrie but in the companie of the grand Maſter; a religious obſeruer of the ſuperſtition, from which he could neuer be drawne during the long time he liued in exile; learned as among the Turks, ſo that he wrot the hiſtorie of his fathers life. But leauing him in ſafe keeping with the grand Maſter of the Rhodes, let vs againe returne to the courſe of our hiſtorie.

Baiazet hauing now the ſecond time chaſed away his brother, after he had wel quieted that part of his troubled kingdome in Aſia, returned againe to Conſtantinople, carefully attending when ſome new motion ſhould be made by his brother, to his farther diſquiet. But after he vnderſtood that he was with the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, hee ſent certaine of his Baſſaes (amongſt whom Achmetes the great ſouldier is reported to haue bin one) vnto the Great Maſter, requeſting him to deliuer vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderfull ſum of mony. Which diſhonorable requeſt, when it could by no meanes be obtained, the ſame Embaſſadors in the name of their maſter, concluded a peace very commodious for the Rhodians: wherein among other things it was agreed, That the Great Maſter ſhould keepe Zemes in ſafe cuſtodie, ſo that hee ſhould no more trouble the Turkiſh Empire: in conſideration whereof, and for his honourable

A notable vſage, Baiazet ſhould yearely pay vnto the Great Maſter thirtie thouſand duckats the firſt of Auguſt, which was afterward accordingly paied.

It fortuned that whileſt Achmetes the great Baſſa (emploied in matters abroad) was abſent from the court, Baiazet diſcourſing with the other Baſſaes his graue counſellors, vpon his late expedition into Aſia againſt his brother, ſeemed to be highly offended with the vntruſtineſſe & doubtfull faith of ſome of his greateſt captains & ſoldiers; yet vpon whom he might iuſtly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it ſeemed by his talke, he ſhould ſomewhat diſtruſt the great captaine Achmetes. Hereupon Iſaac the moſt antient Baſſa of the court, and of greateſt authoritie next vnto Baiazet himſelfe (whoſe daughter, a ladie of exceeding beautie, Achmetes had long before married, but doubting that ſhe had yeelded her honour to the B wanton luſt of Muſtapha the eldeſt ſonne of Mahomet the late Emperor, had put her from him, and would by no meanes be reconciled; for which cauſe there was a ſecret hatred euer after betwixt thoſe two great Baſſaes) perceiuing the Emperors diſcontented and ſuſpitious humour, and deſiring nothing more than the deſtruction of Achmetes, tooke hold vpon his opportunity, and by all meanes he could deuiſe, encreaſed the ſuſpition of the treaſon, which had already too much poſſeſſed the iealous Emperor: ſometimes craftily imagining, intelligence to haue paſſed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authoritie, which (as he ſaid) was ſo great with the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court, that they by reaſon of his often imployments, were wholly at his deuotion; ſo that he might at his pleaſure do more in Zemes his quarrell, than ſhould ſtand with the ſafetie of Baiazet; a matter well to C be conſidered of, and alſo carefully preuented. For remedie of which dangers, it was thought neceſſarie, that Achmetes at his returne to court, ſhould be taken away and ſlaine.

Achmetes fearing nothing leſſe than that which was contriued againſt him, came after his wonted maner to the court; and was with the other great Baſſaes inuited to a ſolemne ſupper which BaiaZet had commanded to be prepared, to ſolace himſelfe after his trauels (as it was giuen out) with his chiefe Baſſaes. To this royall ſupper came Achmetes with the reſt of the bidden gueſts, miſtruſting nothing, and was there ſumptuouſly feaſted by Baiazet: who to make his gueſts the merrier, dranke wine plentifully himſelfe, cauſing them alſo to drinke in like manner; ſo that they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet dayly more and more vſed, eſpecially by their great men in their feaſts. Supper now ended, and D the night far ſpent, Baiazet in token that they were welcome, and ſtood in his good grace, cauſed certaine rich robes of pleaſing colours to be brought forth, & to be caſt vpon euery of his gueſts one, giuing beſide vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was caſt a gowne of blacke veluet, which among the Turks may well be called the mantle of death, being ſo ſure a token of the Emperours heauie indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the Emperors commandement ſo caſt. Achmetes ſeeing himſelfe now vnder the ſhadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercie, as he was a man of great ſpirit, brake forth and ſaid, Oh cachpogly (which is as much as to ſay, thou ſonne of a whore) ſith thou entendedſt ſo much crueltie againſt me, why didſt thou not put it in execution before thou hadſt inforced me to drink E this impure and forbidden wine? and ſo caſting his eies vpon the ground ſat ſtill. The other Baſſaes hauing leaue to depart, giuing thanks to the Emperor, and crauing pardon for their exceſſe, kiſſed the ground at his feet and ſo departed: with whom Achmetes offered to haue gon out alſo, but was forthwith commanded to ſit ſtill, for that the Emperor had to talke with him in ſecret. The Baſſa's were no ſooner departed, but the terrible executioners of BaiaZet his wrath ſtept in, and laid hands vpon Achmetes to haue ſlaine him; when one of the Eunuchs in greateſt fauor with the tyrant, ſtanding by, aduiſed him not to be too haſtie in executing of ſo great a man, ſo entirely beloued of his beſt ſouldiers and men of war, but rather to ſtay his execution for a while, to ſee how the matter would be diſgeſted; and in the meane time by torture to wreſt it out from him what might be got, to make it in ſome ſort appeare, that he died F for his due deſert. Hereupon Baiazet deferred his execution to a farther time, and cauſed him there preſently to be ſtript, and carried away to be tortured.

Amongſt other gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Baſſaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his ſons, a gentleman of great hope; who miſſing his father among the reſt, began preſently to miſtruſt that all went not wel, & ſpeedily running from one of the Baſſaes to another, with much ado learned the hard eſtate of his father: whereof G he was alſo at the ſame inſtant aduertiſed by a ſecret friend neere about Baiazet. Hereupon this yong gentleman began forthwith piteouſly to lament his fathers miſhap, and to exclaim againſt the crueltie of Baiazet; called on the Ianizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his fathers great and manifold deſerts towards them, together with his imminent danger: and ſo running vp and down the city in the dead time of the night, had in ſhort ſpace raiſed vp all the Ianizaries in armes: who vnderſtanding of the danger of their antient commander, who they generally loued and honored as their father, came running by heaps from all parts of the citie vnto the court gate, there with terrible exclamation doubling and redoubling their Bre, Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly vſe in expreſſing their greateſt diſcontentment and fury) & did indeed ſo furiouſly beat at the court gate, that Baiazet fearing leaſt they ſhould H breake in by violence, cauſed the outer gate to be ſet open, and ſhewing himſelfe from aboue out at an yron window, demanded of them the cauſe of that tumult and vprore. To whome they inſolently anſwered, That they would by and by teach him as a drunkard, a beaſt, and a raſcall, to vſe his great place and calling with more ſobrietie and diſcretion: and among many other opprobrious words wherewith they ſhamefully loded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to ſay, Batchelor or Scholler) which amongſt thoſe martial men, contemners of all learning, is accounted a word of no ſmall reproch and diſgrace. And after they had in moſt deſpitefull manner thus reuiled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliuer Achmetes vnto them, or elſe to take that ſhould enſue thereof. Baiazet terrified with this inſolencie of the Ianizaries, & fearing ſome ſudden violence to be offred, commanded I Achmetes to be without delay deliuered vnto them: whch was done in ſuch haſt, that he was brought forth vnto them almoſt naked, bare legged, & bare headed, bearing in his body the manifeſt markes of his hard vſage. The Ianizaries receiuing him with great reioycing, ſupplied his want of apparell with ſuch habiliments, as they for that purpoſe vpon the ſudden tooke from Baiazets minions: and ſo taking him vpon their ſhoulders, with great ioy carried him out of the court, ſtill crying vnto him, How he did, and how he felt himſelfe? And ſo guarded him home, ready no doubt to haue ſlain Baiazet and rifled the court, if he would haue but ſaid the word. But he yet loyall, laboured with good words to appeaſe that tumult, and to pacifie their furie: excuſing that which Baiazet had done againſt him, to haue bin done onely to correct him, for that happily he had forgotten ſome part of obedience and dutie. Neuertheleſſe, K hereupon remained no ſmall heartburning betwixt Baiazet and the Ianizaries for a long time after: yet Baiazet for feare of them reconciled himſelfe to Achmetes, and in open ſhew had him in greater honour than before, promoting him euen vnto the higheſt degrees of honor, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the contiuuall inſtigation of the old Baſſa Iſaac: by whoſe perſuaſion, when it was thought that all had bin forgotten, hee was by Baiazets commandement as he ſat at ſupper in the court, thruſt through the bodie and ſlaine. This was the miſerable end of Achmetes, the great champion of the Turks, and one of the greateſt enemies of Chriſtendome that euer liued in the Turkiſh court: for by him, Mahomet ſubuerted the empire of Trapezond, tooke the great citie of Caffa (called in antient time Theodoſia) with all the countrey of Taurica Cherſoeneſus, the impregnable citie of Croia, L with all the kingdome of Epirus, the ſtrong citie of Scodra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and laſt of all Otranto, to the terror of all Italy: by him alſo, Baiazet vanquiſhed and put to flight his brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good ſeruices, he was by the tyrant (vpon a meere ſuſpition) thus cruelly and ſhamefully murthered. About this time alſo, Caigubus (Zemes his ſon, then but a childe) was by the commandement of Baiazet his vnckle, ſtrangled, in the new tower of Conſtantinople.

Baiazet for feare deliuereth Achmetes to the Ianizaries.

Achmetes ſlaine.

Baiazet now grieuouſly offended with the pride and late inſolencie of the Ianizaries, cauſed ſecret inquirie to be made, of them which were the authors of thoſe late ſtirs; & finding them to be the officers of their companies, and ſpecially thoſe which had before ſlain Mahomet Baſſa the great polititian, immediatly after the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, at which time M they had alſo raiſed great tumults, and done much harme in the citie; he vnder color of preferment, ſent away thoſe authours of ſedition into diuers parts of his Empire, appointing vnto them (as vnto old ſouldiers and men of good deſert) certaine lands & reuenues for their maintenance and preferment. But as ſoone as they were departed, he by ſecret letters commanded

A the gouernors and magiſtrats of thoſe places wherunto they were ſent, ſuddenly to apprehend them, and as traitors to put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Ianizaries of the court and about Conſtantinople, hearing what had hapned vnto their fellowes, became wonderfull diſcontented, and began to mutine in diuers places of the citie, vttering ſpeeches againſt the Emperor full of deſpight and reuenge. Which thing when Baiazet vnderſtood, and had wel conſidered the late danger he was in, together with the intollerable pride and inſolencie of thoſe his maſterful ſlaues; he ſecretly purpoſed in himſelfe for curing of ſo dangerous a diſeaſe, to vſe a moſt deſperat remedie: which was, ſuddenly to kill and deſtroy all the Ianizaries, eſpecially thoſe which were belonging to the court, or about Conſtantinople. This his purpoſe he imparted to diuers of his greateſt Baſſa's, charging them vpon paine of his heauie diſpleaſure not to diſcloſe it: and for the execution thereof, had ſent for great numbers of B thoſe ſoldiers which are called Acanzij, who are amongſt the Turks reputed for the beſt ſort of common ſoldiers. Moſt of all the Baſſa's to whom he had imparted this his cruell deuiſe, much diſliked thereof, as too full of perill and danger: yet ſeeing him fully reſolued for the performance thereof, would not, or durſt not ſay any thing to the contrarie. Only Alis & Iſbender Baſſa (both diſcended of the honorable family of Michael Ogli) diſſuaded him from attempting any ſuch thing: alledging firſt, That the Ianizaries were in number many, ſoldiers of great courage and experience, reſolute men, and ſuch as would ſel their liues deere: Then, admitting that he ſhould kill all them about the court and in Conſtantinople; yet for as much as all his ſtrong townes and caſtles, eſpecially in the frontiers and chiefe places of his dominions, were poſſeſſed and holden by ſtrong garriſons of other Ianizaries, fellows and friends of theſe (who C would vndoubtedly take vp arms in defence of themſelues, and reuenge of their dead friends) it were a thing very like to endanger himſelfe, together with the whole ſtate of his empire, beſide the great diſhonour which would grow vnto himſelfe thereby for euer.

Baiazet purpoſeth to deſtroy the Ianizaries.

This ſo dangerous an exployt, wherein the hands of ſo many were to be vſed, was not kept ſo ſecret, but that the vigilant and wilie Ianizaries had got an inckling thereof; and thereupon began daily more & more to ſuſpect the matter, both by the often & ſecret repare of the great men to the court, more than they had before ſeen, & alſo by the vnwonted multitude of thoſe Acanzij, which were daily brought vnto the imperial citie by great troups. Wherfore fearing to be ſuddenly ſurpriſed, they banded themſelues together, and openly ſtood vpon their gard: and by chance lighting vpon Alis Beg as he came from the court, (who was indeed their beſt D friend) after their barbarous manner, with many opprobrious & contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conſpired their deſtruction: and without more ado had preſently ſlain him, had he not (as a well ſpoken man) with great proteſtations and oathes perſuaded them, that he neuer conſented to any ſuch thing, or that they needed to feare any ſuch thing from him: and ſo with much adoe rid himſelfe out of their hands.

Baiazet ſeeing his purpoſe diſcouered, and that he could not without great bloudſhed, and danger both to his eſtate and perſon, worke his will vpon the Ianizaries; by the counſell and aduice of them that ſaw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open proclamation, That the Ianizaries and other his men of war (of whom he had a great E power now aſſembled at Conſtantinople) to be in readineſſe againſt a certain prefixed day, to go with him into Moldauia: as if he had raiſed that power for that purpoſe only. But when the time was come that he ſhould ſet forward, the Ianizaries put themſelues in order of battell by themſelues, and would in no wiſe joyne themſelues with the reſt of the armie, or receiue the Emperor into the midſt of their ranks, as they had alwayes before accuſtomed; but furiouſly ſhaking their weapons at him, told him plainly, that he had ſought their deſtruction; and bid him therefore if he thought it ſo good, to ſet his executioners to worke vpon them, whom he ſhould find both readie and able to defend themſelues. To pacifie their furie, Baiazet was glad to giue them good words, and to vſe all the means he could (by his great Baſſa's and other captains which were able to do any thing with them) to perſuade them to be quiet; ſwearing vnto F them by the holy ſoule of his father (a ſolemne oath amongſt the Turks) that he would not harme or wrong the meaneſt of them. So with much adoo they were at length appeaſed, and receiued Baiazet into the midſt of them, as their woonted manner was.

This dangerous tumult ſo quieted, Baiazet ſet forward, and paſſing ouer Danubius, entered into Moldauia, where he firſt layd ſiege to a ſtrong towne ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea, called of the Turks Kele, but in antient time Achilleia, which was at length deliuered vnto him by compoſition. From thence he went to Ac-girmen, otherwiſe called Aſprocaſtron, which after a moneths ſiege was alſo deliuered vp by compoſition: which two ſtrong places ſo woon, he returned againe to Conſtantinople.

Many great Princes ſue to the Maſter of the Rhodes for Zemes.

Many great princes deſirous of Zemes, labored by their Embaſſadors to haue obtained him of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes: firſt Baiazet his brother, fearing leſt he ſhould at one time or other againe breake forth vpon him, or elſe ſet vp by the Chriſtian Princes, trouble his eſtate, offered great ſums of mony to haue had him deliuered into his hands: and Charles the French king purpoſing the conqueſt of Naples, (which he in few yeares after performed) and after that to haue inuaded Grecia, thought Zemes a moſt fit inſtrument for the furtherance of thoſe his high deſignes, and was therefore wonderful deſirous to haue had him. Matthias alſo King of Hungarie (a fortunat Warriour againſt the Turke) perſuaded that the hauing of him might be vnto him a great furtherance in the courſe of his victories, ſought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time alſo Innocentius the eight of that name, Biſhop of Rome, no leſſe deſirous than the reſt, to haue in his keeping ſo great a pledge of peace and war (the bridle of the Turks furie, together with the large penſion he was ſure to receiue yerely from Baiazet for the ſafe cuſtodie of him) ſo wrought the matter by Lyonel Biſhop of Concordia, his cunning Legat, that the Great Maſter, fearing on the one ſide to be conſtrained by the great power of Baiazet, to grant that he had ſo often refuſed, and now ſo earneſtly ſolicited on the other ſide by the Biſhop, cauſed Zemes to be deliuered to him at Rome in the yere 1488: for which doing he was by the Biſhop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinall. So Zemes to the great profit of the Biſhop (who receiued from Baiazet a yerely penſion of fortie thouſand duckats) remained in ſafe cuſtodie at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and alſo of Alexander the ſixt his ſucceſſour: vntill that the French King Charles the eight, paſſing thorow the heart of Italie with a ſtrong armie againſt Alphonſus King of Naples, in the yeare 1495, and making his way thorow the citie of Rome, ſo terrified the great Biſhop (who altogether fauoured and furthered the title of Alphonſus) that he was glad to yeeld to ſuch articles and conditions as pleaſed the King: and amongſt the reſt, to giue in hoſtage vnto the King his graceleſſe ſonne Caſar Borgia Valentinus, and alſo to deliuer vnto him Zemes his honorable priſoner, as ſhall be afterwards in place conuenient at large declared.

In the beginning of Baiazet his raigne, whileſt he was buſied againſt his brother Zemes in Aſia, Iohn Caſtriot the ſon of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunatly ouerthrowne the Turke in a battell neere vnto Croia, recouered a great part of Epirus out of their poſſeſſion. At which time alſo Iohn Chernouich, a Chriſtian Prince of Albania, caſting off the Turkiſh yoke impoſed vpon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, ſuddenly tooke vp armes, and by the helpe of the Venetians valiantly repulſed the enemies out of that part of Albania; and ſo troubled Baiazet, that he was glad to ſuffer him peaceably to enioy all that he had by force recouered, and further to content himſelfe with a ſmall tribute for the reſt.

Baiazet inuadeth Caramania.

Baiazet highly offended with Abraham (whom ſome call Pyramet) the King of Caramania, for aiding his brother Zemes againſt him; in reuenge thereof raiſed a great armie both in Europe and Aſia, and marching alongſt Aſia the leſſe, through the countries of Phrygia, Myſia, Caria, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the King of Caramania hearing before of his comming, and knowing himſelf too weake to meet him in field, fortified the ſtrong cities and places of his kingdome, and retyred with his armie into the ſtraits of the mountain Taurus, where it parteth Cilicia from Syria; wherein he was in more ſafetie than in any of his ſtrongeſt holds. Baiazet finding no way to come to him, ſpent moſt part of the Summer in ſpoyling of the open countrey: but perceiuing his enemies could not ſo be drawne into the field, he laid ſiege vnto the famous citie of Tarſus, being the chiefe Citie of the champaine part of Cilicia (the natiue place of Saint Paul the Apoſtle) and in ſhort time ſo battered the walls of his citie with his great ordnance, that he had made them ſaultable. The Citiſens conſidering the danger they were in, offered to deliuer vp their Citie, their libertie, liues, and goods reſerued. Of which their offer Baiazet accepted, and moſt honourably performed his promiſe for their ſafetie; not permitting any of his ſoulders to enter the Citie, more than ſuch as muſt needs for the guard of his perſon, and ſafe keeping of the citie. And for as much as Winter began now to grow faſt on, he diſperſed his ſouldiers into the Countrey Tarſus in Cilicia yeeldeth to Baiazet.

A trey villages round about, not ſuffering the countrey people to till or ſow their land, or to doe any thing els which might turne to their profit or good; wherby they were inforced to yeeld themſelues wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian King ſeeing his people daily fall from him, & fearing to be at length forſaken of his ſoldiers alſo, in this his diſtres obtain'd aid both of men and mony from Caytbeius the great Sultan of Ægipt, and ſo with all the power he could make, tooke the field with the firſt of the next Spring, fully reſolued to trie the fortune of a battel, although in ſtrength and power he knew himſelf much inferior to his puiſſant enemy.

Baiazet glad to ſee his enemie ſo forward, ſpeedily aſſembled his armie, and without delay offered him battell: which the Caramanian king refuſed not. So betwixt them was begun a fierce and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage B of the ſoldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtfull victorie and great ſlaughter on both ſides, new ſupplies ſtill comming on in ſtead of them which were ſlaine. The day declining, the Caramanian king (whoſe fatall deſtinie had now appointed him vnto his laſt worke) ſeeing his wearied ſoldiers rather ouerlaid with multitude, than vanquiſhed by force, to begin to giue ground vnto their enemies; couragiouſly thruſt forward with his guard and other valiant ſoldiers about him, with ſuch furie, that he brake into the midſt of his enemies battaile: where being known, he was forthwith enuironed by the Turks, and ſo hardly charged on euerie ſide, that hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his owne hand ſlaine diuers of his enemies, he fell downe dead in the middeſt of them. His ſouldiers diſcouraged with his death, turned their backes and fled, and in flying C were for the moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners. After this victorie, Baiazet ſpeedily ouerran all that large countrey, and without reſiſtance in ſhort time brought vnder his obeyſance all the countrey of Cilicia.

There was at that time in that part of Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the ſea ſide, an antient Mahometan Prince who had vnder his command moſt part of that country, with the famous and populous city of Scandeloro, the chiefe place of his reſiance. This prince had of long time liued betwixt the Chriſtian Kings and the Kings of Caramania, as neuter, ſtil fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither: and had vntil then chiefly maintained his ſtate by the allyance he and his anceſtors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand Maſters of the Rhodes. Againſt this poore Prince, the only one now left in Aſia the leſſe, not D ſubiect vnto the Turkiſh Kings, began Baiazet now to turne his forces; purpoſing before he proceeded any further, to make a ful conqueſt of the leſſer Aſia, and ſo to make all ſure behind him. Of which his purpoſe the Prince hauing knowledge, and wiſely weighing his own ſmall power to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy; offered by his Embaſſadors to deliuer vnto Baiazet his chiefe citie of Scandeloro, with all the reſt of his territorie in Cilicia, vpon condition, that Baiazet ſhould giue vnto him other poſſeſſions for it, in ſome other part of Aſia the leſſer, to the like value. Which his offer Baiazet accepted, and ſo became lord of all the ſea coaſt, from the ſtraits of Boſphorus, vnto the confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the mountaine Taurus, he deſcended into Armenia the leſſe, and in ſhort time brought vnder his ſubiection ſo much of that E countrey, as alſo of Cappadocia, as was ſometime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Baiazet had thus ſlaine the Caramanian King, and ſubdued that moſt antient kingdome of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glorie and power of the Othoman Kings, he left Muſtapha, one of his great Baſſa's, at Iconium, with his Aſian armie, to keepe in obedience thoſe new woon countries: and as a triumphant conqueror returned himſelfe to Conſtantinople, where he was of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued.

After that Baiazet had thus inlarged his Empire with the kingdome of Caramania, and was now become an vnwelcome neighbour vnto the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria; he began to ſwell in diſdaine againſt that mightie Prince, for that he had giuen aid againſt him, firſt vnto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in theſe late wars: of which wrong F purpoſing to be reuenged, he ſhortly after appointed one Caragoſa Baſſa his lieutenant in Aſia, with Iſhender another of his great Captaines, with a ſtrong armie to inuade Syria, then part of the great Sultans Kingdome. Theſe two great Commanders well appointed for the purpoſe, when they were come to the vttermoſt parts of Cilicia, the new bounds of Baiazets Empire, were then to paſſe by the confines of Aladeules his kingdome, before they could paſſe the great mountaine Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladeules commanded as King ouer the rude and fierce people which dwelt alongſt that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan. He hearing of the approch of the Turks armie, with a great number of his mountaine people lay in ambuſh in the ſtraits whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe, of purpoſe to intercept them. Iſhender marching in the vauntgard with a great number of the voluntarie ſouldiers called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing leſſe, than to be ſet vpon by the mountaine King, before he was aware was come into the midſt of his enemies, and was by them ſo fiercely charged on euerie ſide for their places of aduantage, that he there loſt moſt part of his men, and forſaken of the reſt, which ſought by flight to ſaue themſelues, he with his two ſonnes and others were taken priſoners: Michael-beg the eldeſt of the two being faſt bound, was ſlaine by one of Aladeules his followers, whoſe brother he had ſlain in that skirmiſh: his head being cut off, was by the commandement of Aladeules carried to his father Iſhender, the more to grieue him: who diſdainfully willed the meſſenger not to ſhew it vnto him, but to bid his maſter eat it if he would. With which anſwer Aladeules was exceedingly mooued; neuertheleſſe pittying the old mans miſerie, he ſhortly after ſet Iaxis-beg the yonger brother at libertie: but Iſhender himſelfe he ſent priſoner vnto Caitbeius the great Sultan at Caire, where he remained in priſon fiue yeares after. Caragoſes the Baſſa diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo great a man, retyred with his armie backe againe into Cilicia, and from thence aduertiſed Baiazet what had hapned, by whom he was commanded to returne to Conſtantinople, as a man vnfit for ſo great an enterpriſe.

Achmetes being diſcomfited, is taken priſoner & ſent to Caire.

The next Spring following, Baiazet conſtant in his former reſolution for the inuaſion of Siria, ſent Achmetes another of his Baſſa's, with a far greater army than had Caragoſes, againſt the Sultan: who was no ſooner come to the further part of Cilicia, but he was there at a place called of the Turks, Tzucur Oua, encountred by the Ægyptians & Arabians, and there in a great battell ouerthrowne; wherein he himſelfe fighting moſt valiantly, loſt two of his fingers, and being taken priſoner was ſent to Caire.

Baiazet with this ouerthrow rather incenſed than diſcouraged, made great preparation the next yeare againſt the Sultan both by ſea and land, ſuch as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readines, ſent Alis Baſſa (of ſome called Calibeus) and Cherſeogles his ſonne in law, two notable captains, with a great and puiſſant armie by land, againſt the Ægyptian Sultan: at which time he requeſted of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, That he might by their good leaue, as occaſion required, refreſh his fleet (then readie to put to ſea for the inuaſion of Syria, as he ſaid) in their Iſland of Cyprus. Which his requeſt was by the generall conſent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State: yet wiſely doubting leſt Baiazet taking that deniall in euill part, ſhould ſeeke to haue that by force, which he could not obtaine by requeſt, they preſently ſent Franciſco Priuolo their Admirall, to ſea with thirtie gallies for the defence of that Iſland. He hearing that one fleet of the Turks gallies, lately come out of Helleſpontus, lay houering at the Iſland of Sciros, expecting a far greater from the coaſt of Ionia; and carefully conſidering how ſecret and ſudden the Turkiſh deſignements were, although it was giuen out, that al this great preparation was made againſt the Sultan: yet to prouide that they ſhould not ſuddenly ſurpriſe the Iſle, he ſpeedily ſent ſundrie companies of ſoldiers, eſpecially archers, out of Creta into Cyprus, for the better defence thereof; but ſtayed himſelfe with his fleet at the Iſland of Naxos, that ſo at hand he might be the readier to withſtand whatſoeuer the Turks intended. But when he vnderſtood that all their fleet was met, and now ſet forward, he hoyſed ſaile, & held his courſe directly for Cyprus. In the meane time the Turkiſh fleet ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their courſe vntill they came vpon the coaſt of Syria: by which time Calibeus and Cherſeogles were come with a mightie armie into Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus.

Caitbeius the Egyptian Sultan hauing before had certaine intelligence of the great preparation that Baiazet had made againſt him, had before ſent Vsbeg a moſt valiant and politicke captaine, with a ſtrong armie of his Mamalukes and other his moſt expert ſouldiers into Syria, to be readie at all times to withſtand the Turkes. This worthie chiefetaine vnderſtanding of the comming of the Turks armie, thought it greater policie, to carry the calamities which always wait vpon great armies, into the enemies countrey, than to receiue it into his own boſom. And

A therefore although he knew himſelfe to be for number far inferior vnto his enemies, yet ſupplying that want with the valour, courage, and aſſured confidence he had repoſed in the approued and inuincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the comming of the enemie into Syria, but paſſing ouer the mountaine Amanus, and ſo deſcending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarſus, in the ſame place (as it was thought) where Alexander the Great had long before in a great battell vanquiſhed Darius.

Theſe two puiſſant armies come from far out of diuers parts of the world, the one to finde the other, were no ſooner come together, but that with like cherefulneſſe they ioyned battell; and that with ſuch violence and furie, that the earth ſeemed to tremble vnder their feet, and a moſt preſent deſtruction threatned vnto them all: which terrible and cruel fight was maintained B all that day with doubtfull victorie, and exceeding ſlaughter on both ſides; the politique Generals with new ſupplies of freſh ſouldiers continually relieuing the moſt diſtreſſed parts of their battels; and they likewiſe as men prodigall of their liues, reſolutely offering themſelues to all dangers. When this moſt dreadfull fight had in this ſort endured the whole day, and many thouſands of valiant men of late aliue, lay now dead vpon the ground, the approching night brake off the battell, and both the armies ſore wearied and weakned (but eſpecially the Turks) retyred to their camps, where they reſted that night.

But the Ægyptians comming to their campe, found all their carriages with their prouiſion of victuals and other neceſſaries quite taken away and gone. Which thing (as ſome write) the bordering people of the country (for moſt part liuing vpon robbery) had done in time of the C battel, to pleaſe the Turks: or as ſome others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turks armie, and doubtfulneſſe of the battell, fled away; and taking their way along the ſea ſide, fel into the hands of the Turks which were put on ſhore out of the gallies, and ſo were of them ſpoyled. Howſoeuer it was, (for in ſo great vncertaintie I dare not affirme) certain it is, that the Egyptians were ſore troubled with the loſſe of their prouiſion, fearing that if they ſhould now ſtay longer in the countrey, they ſhould forthwith be driuen to great extremities for want of neceſſaries. Wherefore when they had euill reſted that night, the next day early in the morning they preſented themſelues in order of battell before their enemies, brauing them into the field, and daring them to battel. The Turks diſdaining to ſee any prouder in field than themſelues, after they had in goodly order ranged their battels, D ſet forward with enſignes diſplayd againſt their proud enemies. There began a moſt terrible and bloudie battell, fought with ſuch deſperat reſolution, as if they had ſolemnly vowed, either to ouercome or die in the place where they ſtood. A man would haue ſaid, that the former days furie had bin but a play in compariſon of this: many valiant ſoldiers couered with their dead bodies the ſame ground whereon they liuing ſtood, when they receiued the firſt incounter of their enemies. Of both thoſe great armies none was ſeen to giue ground, or once looke backe: the Turks Ianizaries, and the Ægyptians Mamalukes (the vndoubted ſtrength of the greateſt Mahometan Monarchs, ſoldiers for their valour much feared, and through the world renowned) there buckled together, and ſtanding foot to foot ſpent the vttermoſt of their forces E one vpon another; as if they would in that battell haue made it knowne vnto the world, which of them were to be accounted the better ſoldiers. Whileſt victorie ſtood thus doubtfull, and the day was now far ſpent, Vsbeg the Ægyptian Generall, with fifteene thouſand valiant horſmen (whom he had receiued for that purpoſe) gaue a freſh aſſault vpon the Turks ſquadrons, with ſuch force, that they had much adoo to keepe their order, and began now to giue ground; which was by and by made good again by other freſh men ſpeedily brought on by the Baſſa's. Then became the battell more fierce than before, euery man ſtriuing to the vttermoſt of his power, to ſell his life vnto his enemies as deere as he could. In which manner of fight all the reſt of the day was ſpent, vntill that after the going down of the Sun, the darkneſſe of the night comming faſt on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battel, and to F retyre themſelues into their camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turks Baſſa's taking view of the armie, and finding that of an hundred thouſand fighting men which they brought into the field, there was ſcarce a third part left, and moſt of them alſo maimed or hurt; & doubting to be ſet vpon againe the next morning by their reſolute enemies, fled away ſecretly the ſame night, leauing behind them for haſte their tents well ſtored with victuals and all other things needfull. The Ægyptians alſo hauing loſt one half of their armie (which was at the firſt ſeuentie thouſand) and wanting their neceſſarie prouiſion, were retyred alſo the ſame night into the mountaine Taurus, not knowing any thing of the flight of the Turks. And ſome of the ſouldiers paſſing quite ouer the mountaine without ſtay, into Syria, raiſed a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans armie was ouerthrown, and that the Turks had got the victorie: ſo vncertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battel, euen vnto them that were preſent therein. The Ægyptian lying that night vpon the ſide of the mountaine, had ſpeedie intelligence from Aladeules, of the flight of the Turks: which being alſo confirmed by his eſpials to be true, he preſently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turks campe, where he found plentie of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreſhing of his armie.

Aladeules the mountaine King, with the people called Varſacide, by whoſe confines the Turkes muſt needs in their returne paſſe, robbed and ſlew many of them in their diſordered flight; and had ſo ſtopped the paſſages, that they were in flying ouertaken by the Mamalukes, and ſlaine with ſo great a ſlaughter, that of all that great armie of the Turks few remained aliue to carrie newes home. Calibeius and Cherſeogles the Baſſa's, were in that flight both taken priſoners, and afterwards preſented to Caytbeius the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteene enſignes of the Turkes Sanzackes, which are great men amongſt them, hauing euery one of them the regiment and commaund of ſome one prouince or other, and are in degree next vnto the Baſſa's.

Neither was the fortune of Baiazet his nauie at ſea, better than that of his armie at land: for as it lay at rode vpon the coaſt of Syria at the mouth of the riuer Orontes, which runneth by the famous citie of Antioch, his gallies were by tempeſt and rage of the ſea put from their anchors, and in the ſight of their enemies ſwallowed vp of the ſea, or elſe driuen vpon the main, and there with the ſurges of the ſea beaten in pieces. Baiazet not a little troubled with theſe loſſes both by ſea and land, at length with much ado, by his Embaſſadors concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he reſtored all ſuch places as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan deliuered vnto him Calibeius, Cherſeogles, Achmetes, and Iſbender, with all the reſt of the Turks priſoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt theſe two great and mightie Princes, Caytbeius the Sultan died: who of a Circaſſian ſlaue, by many degrees of honour, and by the fauor of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich Kingdome of Ægypt, which he right worthily gouerned to his immortall praiſe by the ſpace of two and twentie yeares; commanding at one time the great and rich countrey of Ægypt, with all Affricke, as farre as Cyrene, Weſtward; and Iudea, with a great part of Arabia, and all Syria, vnto the great and famous riuer Euphrates, Eaſtward. In the latter end of his raigne he (ouercome with the importunitie of his wife Dultibe, an Arabian borne, a woman of an haughtie ſpirit) joyned his ſonne Mahomethes, a yong man of about foure and twentie yeres old, with him in the fellowſhip of his kingdome; that ſo poſſeſſed of it his father yet liuing, he might the better enioy it after his death. Contrarie to the cuſtom of the Mamalukes, who of long time had not vſed to haue their king by ſucceſſion, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choiſe, immediatly after the death of Caytbeius ſlew Mahomethes his ſon; and in a few moneths after, foure moe, who one after another without their good liking had aſpired vnto the kingdome: neither could they be contented, vntill ſuch time as that they had according to their wonted cuſtome ſet vp a Sultan of their own choice.

About the ſame time that the aforeſaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane Princes Baiazet and Caytbeius, Charles the French King was making great preparation againſt Alphonſus king of Naples; giuing it out, That after he had recouered that kingdom, he would forthwith from thence inuade the Turks dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughtie King was induced to take in hand, by the perſuaſion of diuers of his Nobilitie, but eſpecially the ſolicitation of Lodouicus Sfortia Duke of Millan: whereby the whole ſtate of Italie was in ſhort time after ſore ſhaken, and Sfortia himſelfe, authour of thoſe troubles, at laſt carried away by the French, miſerably ended his dayes as a priſoner in France. Alphonſus the Neapolitan King doubting the greatneſſe of the French King his enemie, entered into a confederation with certaine of the States of Italie, againſt the French, but eſpecially with Alexander the ſixt then Biſhop of Rome: for the better aſſurance whereof, he gaue

A his baſe daughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Biſhops ſon,and made him prince of Carinula : his other ſon Frances he entertained alſo in great pay to ſerue him in his wars. And by his embaſſadour Pandonius Camillus,lately returned out of France,gaue Baiazet to vnderſtand, what the French king had purpoſed againſt them both, requeſting him to aid him with ſix thouſand horſmen & as many foot againſt their common enemie,promiſing to giue them honorable entertainment during thoſe wars. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Biſhop ſent George Bucciarde,a Ligurian, ſkilfull in the Turkiſh language,embaſſador to Baiazet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by ſea and land, the yong French king (deſirous of honor and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to inuade Naples; and then, with what great power (after he had diſpatched his wars in Italie) he purpoſed to B paſſe ouer into Græcia,and that he had to that end earneſtly trauelled with him to haue Zemes his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he deſired to vſe as a moſt fit inſtrument for the troubling of his ſtate and empire, by reaſon of his many friends : yet that his Holineſſe (hauing the French in diſtruſt as a proud and ambitious people, as alſo carefull for the danger of the citie of Rome,and of the ſtate of Italie in generall)had entered into a confederation with Alphonſus king of Naples,with their vnited forces to withſtand that proud nation,both by ſea and land,wanting nothing more for the accompliſhment therof,than mony : by which means only,Baiazet might (as he ſaid) prouide for the ſafetie of his kingdome in Grecia,if he would put to his helping hand,to furniſh them with money for the entertainment of ſouldiers : foraſmuch as the citie of Rome,and the kingdome of Naples,were the ſureſt wals of that ſide of C the Othoman empire, if he not altogether refuſing the charge,would not ſpare for a little coſt to maintaine the war rather in that forreine countrey,than to receiue it, brought home to his owne doore,concluding,That it were much more commodious and eaſie with his treaſures to repreſſe his enemie in a ſtrange country a far off,than by dint of ſword and plaine battell in his owne. A thing by experience well knowne, That they which haue neglected and ſet at nought remote dangers,for ſparing of charge,haue afterwards bin inforced with greater danger to receiue the ſame into their owne boſomes,when as they were become deſperat & paſt remedie. Baiazet, who both by his eſpials and often letters and embaſſadors from Alphonſus, knew all this to be true,gaue great thanks to the Biſhop by his embaſſador, for that he ſitting in ſo high place,did ſo friendly and in ſo good time admoniſh him,both a ſtranger & of a contrarie D religion, of things of ſo great conſequence : yet for anſwer, he willed him to returne again vnto his maſter with one Dautius his embaſſador,who ſhould carrie with him both mony and other his ſecret reſolutions concerning thoſe matters. Among other things giuen him in charge,was an Epiſtle written in Greek,wherin the barbarous king with great cunning perſuaded the Biſhop to poiſon Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrarie to his : for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Baiazet ſtood in feare and doubt, leaſt hee ſhould by ſome chance eſcape out of priſon to the troubling of his ſtate. For the performance of this his requeſt,he promiſed faithfully to pay vnto the Biſhop,two hundred thouſand duckats, and neuer after ſo long as he liued, to take vp armes againſt the Chriſtians. Otherwiſe than had his father Mahomet,and his grandfather Amurath done,who both as deadly enemies E vnto the name of Chriſtians, neuer ceaſed by continuall warres to worke their woe.

Alphonſus king of Naples, and Alexander Biſhop of Rome craue aid of Baiazet againſt Charles the French king.

Baiazet ſendeth Dautius his embaſſadour to Alexander Biſhop of Rome.

But George the Biſhops embaſſador,and Dautius, trauelling towards Italie, and hauing now happily paſſed the Adriatike, as they were about to haue landed at Ancona were borded by Io.Rouereus, brother to Iulianus the Cardinall (a man of great account in thoſe quarters) and cleane quit of their treaſure and whatſoeuer elſe they had aboord. Rouereus pretending for the defence of the fact,That the Biſhop did owe him a great ſum of mony, due vnto him for his good ſeruice don in the time of Innocentius his predeceſſor,for which he now paied himſelfe.
Neither could the Biſhop, much troubled with that iniurie, euer after recouer one part therof,although he threatned vengeance with fire and ſword,and alſo ſought for recompence of the Venetians,whom it concerned to ſaue the Turks harmleſſe in thoſe ſeas : for why,Rouereus F bearing himſelf vp on the French,which were now vpon comming,whoſe faction he followed, kept the mony,and ſet at nought the Biſhops thundering curſes and vain threats. Dautius himſelfe, Baiazets embaſſadour beeing ſet on ſhore, was glad to goe on foot to Ancona; and ſo from thence paſſing vp the riuer Padus,came to Franciſcus Gonzaga, duke of Mantua,of whom for (the antient friendſhip betwixt him and Baiazet) hee was courteouſly entertained and

and furniſhed both with money and apparell, and ſo ſpoiled returned into Grecia, to carrie newes vnto his maſter how he had ſped.

When Baiazet vnderſtood by Dautius, the euill ſucceſſe he had in his late iourny, he forthwith ſent Muſtapha one of the Baſſaes of the court, vnto the great Biſhop Alexander, with like inſtructions as he had before giuen to Dautius: who with better hap arriued in Italy, and came to Rome in ſafetie; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great Maſter. But amongſt many other things, the life of Zemes was that he moſt ſought for at the Biſhops hands.

1495. At the ſame time, which was in the yeare 1495, the French king Charles the eight of that name, paſſing through the heart of Italie with a ſtrong armie againſt Alphonſus king of Naples: and taking his way without leaue through the city of Rome, ſo terrified Alexander the Biſhop who (as we haue before ſaid) altogether fauoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cauſe of Alphonſus; that he was glad to yeeld to all ſuch articles and conditions as it pleaſed him then to demand: not purpoſing in himſelfe at all the performance of any of thoſe things, which for feare he had with great ſolemnity promiſed, as the ſequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongſt other things, he was inforced to giue vnto the king his graceleſſe ſon Cæſar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hoſtage, for the performance of the other of his promiſes. Which diſgrace the craftie old Biſhop ſought to couer, by gracing his ſon with the title of his Legat: and with him he was alſo enforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Baiazets brother, his honorable priſoner; who to the great profit of the Biſhop and his predeceſſor, had remained in ſafe cuſtodie at Rome about the ſpace of ſeuen yeares. But Zemes within three daies after he was deliuered to the French, died at Caieta, being before his deliuerance poiſoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderfull whiteneſſe and pleaſant taſt; whoſe power was not preſently to kil, but by little and little diſperſing the force thereof, did in ſhort time bring moſt aſſured death: which pleaſant poiſon, Alexander the Biſhop, ſkilfull in that practiſe (corrupted by Baiazets gold, and enuying ſo great a good vnto the French) had cauſed to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes vſed to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead bodie was not long after ſent to Baiazet, by Muſtapha his embaſſador, who to the great contentment of his maſter, had thus contriued his death with the Biſhop. Not long after, this dead body ſo far brought, was by the appointment of Baiazet, honorably interred among his anceſtors at Pruſa. Cæſar Borgia alſo the Biſhops ſon, a little before giuen in hoſtage vnto the French king, deceiuing his keepers at Velitras, returned againe to Rome before the French king was come to Naples. This wicked impe come of an euil ſtrain, not worth the remembrance but by way of deteſtation (the very monſter of nature, if a man ſhould well conſider the courſe of his whole life) ſhortly after his eſcape, enuying at the honor of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the Biſhop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one time merrily ſupped with his ſaid brother, with their mother Vannotia, traiterouſly cauſed him to be vnawares murdred in the ſtreets as he was going home, & his dead body to be caſt into the riuer of Tiber. Then caſting off his prieſtly habit with his Cardinals robes, he took vpon him the leading of his fathers army in his brothers ſtead, & gaue himſelfe wholly to martiall affaires; a vocation beſt fitting his fierce and bloudy diſpoſition: and with exceeding prodigalitie, wherwith he exhauſted his fathers coffers and the treaſures of the church, bound faſt vnto him deſperat ruffians and ſoldiers (eſpecially Spaniards, his fathers countrey men) ſuch as he knew fitteſt to ſerue for the execution of his moſt horrible deuiſes. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were ſuch as all good men deteſted, yet did the old hypocrit his father winke therat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himſelfe, when it ſhould ſerue for his purpoſe. Now when he had thus ſtrengthned himſelf, & that he was become a terror to all the nobilitie of Rome and the ſeigniories thereabout, he by the deuiſe and help of his father (who deſired nothing more than to make him great) firſt draue the moſt honourable family of the Columnij out of the city, and afterwards out of Latium: and by moſt execrable trecherie, poiſoned or killed the honorable perſonages of the great houſes of the Vrſini & Caetani, taking to himſelfe their lands & poſſeſſions. With like cruelty he ſtrangled at one time four noblemen of the Camertes: & draue Guido Feltrius out of Vrbin. He took the city of Piſarum from Io. Sfortia, who with much difficulty eſcaped his bloudy hands: & draue the Malateſtaes out of Ariminum. The great lady Cathe- rine Sfortia he thruſt out of Forum Liuij and Forum Cornelij, & ſhamefully led her in triumph through Rome. And neuer ſatisfied with bloud, which he without meaſure ſhed, he tooke the citie of Fauentia from Aſtor Manfredus, a yong gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beaſtly tyrant had moſt horribly abuſed againſt nature, he cauſed to be cruelly ſtrangled, and his dead bodie to be caſt into Tiber. Hauing thus filled the meaſure of his iniquitie, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile moſt part of the Roman nobility, and purpoſing by the ſupportation of his father, to make himſelfe lord and ſoueraigne both of the citie, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts hee was by the hand of the moſt Higheſt attached and caſt downe, and that by ſuch means as he leaſt feared: for being with his father at a ſolemne ſupper in the Vaticane, of purpoſe prepared for the deſtruction of certain rich Cardinals and ſome other honorable citizens, they were both poiſoned by the fatall error of one of the waiters, who miſtaking of a flaggon, gaue the poiſoned wine to the accurſed Biſhop and his ſon, which was prepared for the gueſts; whereof the old Biſhop in few daies after died. But his ſon who had drunke the ſame more delaid with water, although he died not of long time after, yet preſently fel into ſuch an extreme ſickneſſe, that he was not able to help himſelfe, or to command his deſperat followers, whereof he had great ſtore: but lying ſicke, in ſhort time ſaw himſelfe of them forſaken, and two of his enemies, Pius the third, and Iulius the ſecond, one after another ſitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enioyed that pontificall dignitie but ſixteene daies: and Iulius ſucceeding him, cauſed this Cæſar Borgia (who of right had deſerued a thouſand deaths) to be ſhut vp in the caſtle called Moles Adriani, from whence he ſet him at libertie vpon the deliuerie of certaine ſtrong holds which were yet holden by his garriſons. After he had thus rid himſelfe out of Iulius the Biſhops hands, he fled to Oſtia, and ſo by ſea to Naples: where he was by the commandement of Ferdinand king of Spaine, apprehended by Gonſaluus the Great, and tranſported into Spaine, for feare leaſt hee, being of a moſt troubleſome nature, and much reſorted vnto by his old fauourits, ſhould raiſe ſome new ſtirs in Italie. He was no ſooner arriued in Spaine, but he was caſt into priſon in the caſtle of Medina, where after he had lien three yeres he deceiued his keepers, and with a rope which he had gotten, let himſelfe downe from an high tower of the caſtle: and ſo eſcaping, fled to the king of Nauar, whom he afterwards ſerued in his wars, and was in an hot ſkirmiſh againſt the kings enemies (wherein he had obtained the victorie) ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. Vnworthie after ſo many horrible villanies, to haue ended his days ſo honorably. His dead bodie was found ſtript, and ſo brought vnto the king vpon a bad beaſt, as if it had bin a dead calfe all naked; which was by his commandement honourably buried at Pamphilona.

The death of Cæſar Borgia.

The French king inuadeth Naples.

But to return again from whence we haue ſomething too long with this troubleſome body gone aſtray. The French King hauing thus loſt both his great hoſtages, Zemes the Turke by death, & the Cardinal Borgia by eſcape, held on his iourny towards Naples, & with wonderful ſucceſſe preuailed as he went, all places yeelding vnto him without any great reſiſtance. Alphonſus ſeeing himſelfe deſtitute of ſuch aid as he had in vaine requeſted both of the Turkiſh Emperour and of the Venetians, and now almoſt beſet with his mightie enemie, to whom ſo many ſtrong places had in ſhorter time bin deliuered than any man had before imagined; and withall conſidering with himſelfe, how that he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects (the ſtrongeſt defence of princes) for that moſt of the nobilitie, and eſpecially the Neapolitanes, hated him for his too much ſeueritie in puniſhing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the princes of Sarne and Salerne were chiefe; and the common people were no leſſe offended with the grieuous and heauie exactions, required of them for the maintenance of theſe wars, inſomuch that their murmuring ſpeeches came oftentimes to his owne hearing; as oftentimes it falleth out, That the hatred of the ſubiects againſt their Princes, which hath for feare of long time bin diſſembled during their proſperitie, more franckly & fiercely breaketh out in their declining eſtate: for theſe cauſes, Alphonſus fearing to be forſaken of his people, as a man in deſpaire, with abundance of tears openly in the ſight of al the Neapolitans, reſigned his kingdom of Naples to his ſon Ferdinand, when as he had as yet ſcarcely raigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father: and with foure gallies paſſed ouer to Mazerea, a city of Cicilia. His ſon Ferdinand a prince of rare perfection and ſingularly graced with all the vertues of true nobilitie, and thereto dearly beloued of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great ioy & acclamations ſaluted king; and ſo hauing performed formed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned preſently to his armie. By G this time the French King with all his forces was entred far into the kingdome of Naples, and hauing taken by aſſault certaine cities which truſted too much to their owne ſtrength, ſtrucke ſuch a generall terrour into the mindes of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now ſtrong enough to abide his batteries, or power ſufficient to incounter his forces. Ferdinand the yong king with his armie had taken the ſtraits of the forreſt of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further paſſage of the French king. But whilſt he was there buſied, he was ſuddenly aduertiſed, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into Campania, and ſo was marching towards him: wherefore doubting to be ſhut vp betwixt two ſtrong armies of the enemies, he retired ſpeedily to Capua, a ſtrong citie ſcituat vpon the riuer Vulturnus; purpoſing there by meanes of that deepe riuer, to ſtay the French from paſ- H ſing farther. But whileſt he lay there, newes was brought vnto him, That all the citie of Naples was in an vprore, and that the citizens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turne themſelues. Ferdinand not a little troubled with theſe bad news, commended the charge of his armie and the defence of the citie of Capua to his chiefe captaines, and rid himſelfe in poſt backe againe to Naples.

It is a ſtrange thing to tell, what a ſudden alteration enſued vpon his arriuall there: for ſuddenly all the tumult was appeaſed, euery man laid downe his armes, and welcomed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and inuincible courage, and of ſo comely a perſonage, as might eaſily win the hearts of his ſubiects, inſomuch, that when he earneſtly re- I queſted them, that they would not traiterouſly betray him to his barbarous & cruell enemies, being their naturall king, or rather their brother borne and brought vp amongſt them: they all with one conſent anſwered, That they would ſpend their liues and goods in his quarrel, ſo long as he ſhould keepe his armie whole, & defend the city of Capua: but if it ſhould ſo chance that the Aragonians ſhould be ouerthrowne, or els for feare abandon that city, and the French King, as victor, to approch the citie of Naples, he ſhould do both againſt reaſon and equitie, if by exacting fidelitie and allegeance of his ſubiects, apprehended with ſo iuſt a feare, he ſhould ſo expoſe that noble citie with the fruitfull countrey thereabout, to be ſpoiled and deſtroied by a mercileſſe and cruell enemie. Whileſt Ferdinand was thus buſied in appeaſing and confirming his wauering ſubiects at Naples, the French king had taken diuers cities, and was come K before Capua. The citizens of Capua although they were alwaies well affected to the Arogonian Kings, yet ſeeing the French King as a moſt violent tempeſt to beare downe all before him, began now to conſult amongſt themſelues of yeelding vp the city; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the ſudden reuolt of the great captain Triuultius with his followers; as alſo by the departure of Verginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who ſeeing themſelues forſaken of Triuultius, fled with their companies vnto the citie of Nola. In this diſcomfiture of King Ferdinands armie, the Frenchmen had entered into the ſuburbs of the citie; which thing Gothfredus and Gaſpar (two valiant German captaines) beholding, ſallied with their companies out of the citie, of purpoſe to abate the pride of the French, and to confirme the doubtfull citizens. Theſe worthie captaines, when they had with exceeding va- L lour repulſed the French, and thought to haue againe returned into the citie, could not be ſuffered to enter, but were by the citizens ſhut out of the gate, in danger to haue had their throats cut by the enemy. In which perplexity they were glad vpon their knees to intreat the cowardly citizens ſtanding vpon the wals, not in ſuch traiterous manner to betray their friends ready in their defence to beſtow their liues: and with much intreating, at length obtained of thoſe heartleſſe men, that they might by ten and ten in a companie be recieued in at one gate of the citie, and ſo put out at another, fartheſt from the danger of the enemie: in which ſort when they had paſſed through the citie, they tooke the way towards Naples: and vpon the way met with the king at Auerſa, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his abſence at Capua: who although he ſaw his armie diſperſed, and all things now deſperat, yet went he on forward, and came to the very gates of Capua, and there called vpon diuers of the chiefe men of M the citie, requiring to be let in. But when he ſaw there was none to giue him anſwer, & an enſigne of the Freuch king diſplayed vpon the wall, in token that the citie was become French, he returned to Naples: where he found the gates now ſhut againſt him, and all the citizens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receiue any of the ſouldiers which came from Capua, A more than the king himſelfe; for flying fame preuenting his return, had filled euery corner of the citie with report, That all the chiefe captains of his army were either gone ouer to the enemie, or els for ſafegard of their liues fled; That the whole army was broken vp, and Capua yeelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitans framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now alſo to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French, and to haue king Ferdinand in contempt: which he well perceiuing, and fetching a compaſſe farther off from the citie, came vnto the caſtle, whereinto he was receiued with his followers by his faithfull captains therein before left. But prouidently foreſeeing that he could not there long ſtay, but that he ſhould be beſieged by his enemies both by ſea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece vnto Alphonſus D'aualus, a moſt valiant captain, and departed himſelfe with 20 gallies well appointed vnto Ænaria, an Iſland not far from Naples, hauing in it a B commodious harbor and a ſtrong caſtle: where fortune, neuer firme but in miſerie, ſeemed againe to deride the poore remainder of his honor: for comming thither, the captain of the caſtle, vnworthily named Iuſtus, forgetting his duty towards his ſoueraigne, of whom he had before receiued many extraordinarie fauours, moſt traiterouſly now in his ſo hard diſtreſſe ſhut the gates of the caſtle againſt him at his landing, and vnkindly refuſed to receiue him. With which vnexpected ingratitude, the poore king was wonderfully perplexed & almoſt abaſhed: yet with earneſt intreatie & ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himſefle had in times paſt beſtowed vpon him, he preuailed ſo much with this vnthankful man, that he was content to receiue him into the caſtle, ſo that he would come C but himſelfe alone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king ſeemed to accept. So the captain hauing opned a port to receiue him in, was in the very entrance therof ſuddenly ſtabd to the heart with a dagger by king Ferdinand and ſlain in the midſt of his armed ſoldiers: which was done with ſuch a countenance & maieſty, that the warders with their weapons in their hands, diſmaid with his look, forthwith at his commandement opened the gate, and reciued him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the countenance of princes reſteth a certaine diuine maieſtie, in all fortunes aboue the common courſe of nature: which is of power to daunt the hearts of moſt diſloial traitors in the performance of their vnnatural treaſons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the caſtle of Naples, Charles the French king was receiued into the citie, with ſuch pompe, triumph, and acclama- D tion of the Neapolitans, as if they had euen then by the benefit of that forraine king, bin reſtored to perfect liberty, & deliuered out of ſome long & hard bondage. Shortly after, the caſtle of Naples, with all the ſtrong places thereabout were yeelded vnto the French, and embaſſadors ſent from all the princes & people of that kingdome, yeelding themſelues into the power of the French king. Then Ferdinand ſeeing all loſt and gone, departed from Ænaria, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and ſailed into Cicilia. Thus the houſe of Aragon in leſſe than fiue moneths, loſt the kingdome of Naples, about 63 yeares after that it was firſt taken from the French by Alphonſus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

A moſt reſolued act of king Ferdinand.

Charles the French king receiued into Naples.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this war, had long before filled the eares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in Europe; but when E they ſaw the French enſignes diſplayed vpon the wals of the caſtles, and ſtrong townes along the coaſt of Calabria and Salerne, ſuch a ſudden feare fell vpon the Turkes garriſons alongſt the coaſt of Epirus and Macedonia on the other ſide of the Adriatike, ouer againſt that part of Italie, that many of them forſooke their charge: the Chriſtians in thoſe places, as alſo in Grecia and Peloponeſus, beginning then to lift vp their heads in hope of their deliuerance, and to make the beſt preparation they could to ioine with the French againſt the Turks: but eſpecially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountaines called Acrocheraunij in the borders of Epirus, who preſently tooke vp armes, refuſing to be any longer tributarie vnto the Turkiſh Emperour.

F This proſperous and ſpeedie ſucceſſe of the French King in the conqueſt of Naples, filled the minds of moſt of the Chriſtian princes, as alſo of the Turkiſh Emperor, with a doubtfull expectation, whither his greatneſſe would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affected the empire of Rome, and to make himſelfe the ſole monarch of Italie. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Biſhop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperour. Baiazet alſo feared much, leaſt hee ſhould vpon the ſudden turne his forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his no ſmall diſquiet. And Ferdinand, the aduiſed King of Spaine, was no leſſe carefull for the G ſafetie of Silicia. Lodouicus Sfortia alſo (ſhortly after created Duke of Millan, the chieſe occaſion of the French Kings comming into Italie, and a great aider of him in thoſe warres) began now to conſider better of the matter, and to ſtand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceiued to make ſmall reckoning of his word or promiſe, ſo that he might thereby enlarge his dominions. And the Venetians, who in all theſe wars had ſtood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Arogonians and French had with long wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleaſure ſhare out ſomething for themſelues) were now in doubt with the reſt of the States of Italie to loſe ſome part of their owne territorie: for now there was no Prince or ſtate in Italie able to oppoſe themſelues againſt the French, but ſtood all as it were at his deuotion.

A great league made by diuers Chriſtian princes againſt the French king.

H Wherefore the aforeſaid Princes, namely Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Alexander Biſhop of Rome, the ſtate of Venice, and Lodouicus Sfortia, Duke of Millan, for the more aſſurance of their eſtates, by their embaſſadors ſpeedily ſent from one to another, concluded a ſtrong league among themſelues; whereof the chieſe capitulation was, That if any of theſe confederates ſhould vpon their owne accord make war vpon any other Prince, they ſhould doe it vpon their owne charges: but if any of them ſhould chance to be inuaded by any other, that then euery one of theſe confederats ſhould of their owne charge ſend foure thouſand horſe and ten thouſand foot in aid of their confederat ſo inuaded, vntill the warres were ended: which league was to indure for twentie yeres. The fame of this league was welcome to many other Princes, but eſpecially to Baiazet, who now feared nothing more, than the I forces of the French, and had therefore offered vnto the Venetians, to aid them both by ſea and land againſt the French, if their affaires ſhould ſo require. This league ſo much pleaſed not other Princes, but it troubled the French king more, as of purpoſe made againſt him, although it was by the confederats pretended to be made onely for their owne ſafetie. Wherfore he with all expedition placed his beſt captaines with ſtrong garriſons in all the cities and ſtrong holds of the kingdome of Naples, and left Mompenſer his viceroy in the city of Naples, and with the reſt of his armie returned into France; purpoſing by the way as he went to terrifie the diſſembling Biſhop, ſo if it were poſſible to draw him from the league; and afterwards to deale with Sfortia and the reſt as he might. But when he was come neere vnto Rome, the Biſhop for feare fled out of the citie to Peruſium, intending from thence to haue fled to Venice, K if the French king ſhould haue further purſued him. Charles deceiued of his purpoſe, in peaceable manner entered the citie, and there ſtayed three dayes, and ſo departed; vſing violence againſt none, but againſt ſuch as were well known to be of the Aragonian faction. From Rome he marched to Piſa, and ſo with much paine paſſing the Appenines, was at the riuer of Tarrus, not far from Parma, ſet vpon by Franciſcus Gonzago Duke of Mantua, Generall of a great army which the Venetians and Sfortia had raiſed vpon the ſudden to haue ſtopped his paſſage: in which battell he was in great danger to haue been taken or ſlaine, and there loſt his tents, with all the rich ſpoile gotten in the rich kingdome of Naples: yet hauing at length with great ſlaughter valiantly repulſed his enemies, he afterwards returned in ſafetie home.

Ferdinand recouereth his kingdome of Naples from the French, and dieth.

About the ſame time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the yong king Ferdinand, lately L driuen out of his kingdome by the French King, returned againe out of Cicilia to Naples: where he was ioyfully receiued of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his friends (but eſpecially of the great Gonſaluus, ſent in his aid by Ferdinand king of Spaine) in leſſe than a yeares ſpace recouered the kingdome of Naples againe from the French: and then dying without iſſue, left the ſame vnto his vnckle Fredericus. Wherin the vncertaintie of worldly honors, the chieſe felicitie of ambitious minds, is wel to be noted; whenas in that one kingdom the chieſe gouernment was ſix times changed in leſſe than the ſpace of three yeares: for firſt, Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his ſonne Alphonſus, at ſuch time as the French King was making preparation for thoſe wars: Alphonſus deſpairing of his owne forces, reſigned the kingdome to his ſon Ferdinand, when he had ſcarcely raigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in leſſe M than three moneths was driuen quite out of Italie by Charles the French king: Charles poſſeſſed of the kingdome, in ſhort time after was againe diſpoſſeſſed by the ſame Ferdinand: Ferdinand hauing with much trouble thruſt out the French, died within leſſe than a yeare: After whom ſucceeded Fredericus his vncle, no leſſe vnfortunat than the reſt: and Charles the French King

A king himſelfe liued not long after, but died ſuddenly as he came from playing at Tenniſe, being then but ſeuen and twentie yeares old, leauing the flouriſhing kingdome of France, with the troubleſome title pretended to the kingdome of Naples, vnto Lewis his ſucceſſor, who liued with great trouble to conquer the ſame, and with greater griefe to loſe it againe.

The Turkes inuade Podolia & Raſſia, and in their returne are for moſt part loſt.

But to returne againe to the courſe of our Hiſtorie, from whence the great occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpoſe) haue a little too far led vs. Baiazet deliuered of two great feares, firſt by the death of his brother Zemes, and after by the caſting out of the French out of Naples; began now to turne his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and by his lieutenant Bali-beg Sanzacke of Siliſtra, inuaded the countries of Podolia and Raſſia, being part of the Polonian kingdome, where the Turks did great harme, and carried away many priſoners.
B But comming again the ſecond time, and making ſuch like ſpoile as before, they ſtayed ſo long, that the cold of Winter (which in thoſe countries is verie extream) was now come on: and in their returne as they were about to haue paſſed through Moldauia, they were by Stephanus Prince of that Countrey, denied both paſſage and victuals, and forced to take the way alongſt the ſea coaſt: where many of them ſtragling from their Armie, were by the way cut off and ſlaine by the Moldauians; and the reſt, what by the extreamitie of the cold, what for want of food, and fouleneſſe of the way, periſhed: ſo that of that great Armie verie few returned home. The Turks hiſtories report, That in this expedition were loſt fortie thouſand Turks.

He ſent alſo Cadumes one of his Baſſa's into Illyria; who ſpoyling that country, with a part C of Croatia, was encountred by nine thouſand Croatians and Hungarians neere vnto the riuer Moraua, vnder the leading of Countie Bernard Francopaine; where after a cruell and bloudie fight, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and aboue ſeuen thouſand of them ſlaine; the reſt ſaued themſelues by flight through the mountaines and woods. Of the Chriſtians that were loſt, many were drowned in Moraua, chuſing rather ſo to end their dayes, than to fall into the hands of their cruell enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the Generall, who would needs giue the Turks battell in plaine field, although he was earneſtly entreated by Countie Io. Torquatus to haue kept the ſtraits of that country, whereby he might haue had great aduantage of the enemie. Torquatus himſelfe hauing loſt all his horſemen in that battell, and his horſe killed vnder him, fought valiantly on foot, vntil he was by the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed D and ſlaine. The Baſſa to giue Baiazet a ſure teſtimonie of the victorie, cauſed all the noſes of the ſlaine Chriſtians to be cut off and put vpon ſtrings, and ſo by waggon ſent them as a barbarous Preſent to Conſtantinople. After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the twelfth of that name hauing obtained that kingdome, wrot himſelfe alſo Duke of Millan, as diſcended of one of the daughters of Io. Galeatius firſt Duke of Millan: in which his ſuppoſed right hee was fully reſolued to make warre vpon Sfortia then Duke of Millan. And for his better ſucceſſe in thoſe wars, ſought by all meanes he could, to draw ſome other of the Princes and States of Italie into the fellowſhip of that intended war; but aboue all others the Venetians, as moſt commodious for his purpoſe: with whom he made a firme league, and for the E ayd they were to giue him, couenanted that they ſhould haue for their ſhare the citie of Cremona, with all the pleaſant countrey about Abdua, then part of Sfortia his dominion; which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sfortia vnderſtanding of this compact made againſt him, and knowing himſelfe farre too weake of himſelfe to ſtand againſt ſo puiſſant enemies; attempted firſt to ſet Maximilian the Emperor, with the States of Germanie, vpon the French King. But that not ſorting to his deſire, he ſought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his dukedome of him, by paying him a yearely tribute. After he had thus in vain proued all the means he could deuiſe, to haue appeaſed the French King, and prouided for his owne ſafetie; he by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, certified Baiazet of the confederation betwixt the French King and the Venetians, F and that their purpoſe was after they had oppreſſed him, and ſome other of the States of Italie, then with their vnited forces to inuade his dominions: and that therefore it were good for him in time to looke vnto it, and to giue ayd againſt thoſe which would in ſhort time become his moſt dangerous enemies. By this means the Duke was in good hope, ſo to buſie the Venetians by bringing the Turke vpon them, as that they ſhould ſtand the French in ſmall ſtead.
At which time alſo the Embaſſadors of Florence did what they could to pricke forward the Turke to make wars vpon the Venetians; for the malice they bare againſt them for protecting them of Piſa againſt the oppreſſion of the Florentines. G

Baiazet perſuaded by the Embaſſadours, and calling to remembrance the iniuries before done him by the Venetians; firſt by giuing ayd to Iohn Caſtriot the ſon of Scanderbeg, and Iohn Chernouich another Prince of Epirus, (whereby he loſt a great part of that countrey, and was alſo further enforced to yeeld to ſuch conditions as altogether ſtood not with his honor) and againe, by denying to giue his fleet leaue to put into their harbours of Cyprus, in the time of his wars againſt the Sultan of Ægypt: all which he was glad then to endure, for feare leſt that his brother Zemes (then liuing) ſhould by their means be ſet vp againſt him; promiſed now to doe what the Embaſſadors had requeſted: glad in his minde that the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes had preſented vnto him ſo fit an opportunitie of reuenge. Friuli part of the Venetian territory ſpoiled by the Turks.

Hereupon he made great preparation both by ſea and land againſt the Venetians, and vpon the ſudden cauſed Scander Baſſa his lieutenant in Illyria, with twelue thouſand horſe to breake into the countrey of Friuli, part of the Venetian territorie vpon the frontiers of Italie. The Baſſa as he had in charge, paſſing ouer diuers great riuers, at length entred the countrey, burning and deſtroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carrying away with him all the poore countrey people priſoners. But when he was come to the banks of Tiliauentum, and vnderſtood that he came too late to pleaſure the Duke of Millan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without reſiſtance driuen him quite out of Italie and Germanie) he there, with more than barbarous crueltie put foure thouſand poore priſoners to the ſwoord; and ſo hauing filled the countrey with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence he came, loaded with the ſpoyle of that rich countrey. I

At the ſame time alſo, Baiazet put to ſea ſuch a fleet as none of his predeceſſours had before ſet forth; and with a great armie in perſon himſelfe marched alongſt the ſea coaſt of Morea, in ſuch ſort, as that his armie by land, and his fleet at ſea, as neere as they could, kept euen pace the one within ſight of the other. Neither were the Venetians vnmindfull of themſelues, but ſet forth a ſtrong fleet vnder the charge of Anthonie Grimani their Admirall; in number far inferior to the Turks, but for equipage, ſtrength, ſkilfull mariners, and all other manner of warlike prouiſion, much ſuperior. For which cauſe the Turks, although defied and braued by the Venetians, yet durſt not at the firſt joyn with them in battell, but ſtil kept alongſt the coaſt of Morea, not daring to put further off into the ſea. In this their courſe the Venetians troubled them exceedingly, ſomtimes making ſhew as if they would haue conſtrained them to fight, & otherwhiles giuing them chaſe, neuer departing far from them, wiſely accounting it right good ſeruice, if they could but keepe that hugie fleet from landing in Italy, or other place of the Venetian territorie. Moſt men were in good hope, that if thoſe great fleets ſhould haue joyned in battel, the Venetians ſhould haue had a notable victorie; for that the enemie as afraid kept ſo dangerous a courſe, and ſo neere the maine. The longer they thus ſailed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrarie to all expectation, delayed to fight, and ſtil ſuffered the dangerous enemie to approch neerer and neerer their territories: and there were none which had not rather he ſhould haue ſet all vpon the hazard of one battell, than to protract by delay a long and doubtfull war. Whileſt all mens minds were thus in expectation of ſome great exployt to be done vpon the enemie, news came to the citie, that the Turks fleet had put into the hauen Sapientia in the Iſland Sphraga, to water, and was there embaied by the Venetians. This report was of moſt men joyfully receiued, as if the victorie had bin alreadie aſſured: and ſo much the more, for that it was vainly ſuppoſed, that it would be gained without any great loſſe. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwiſe, ſaying, That the place wherein the enemie lay was ſuch, as that he might ſafely at his pleaſure depart thence. Yet forſomuch as the Turks fleet was more ſubiect vnto danger in putting out of the harbor, than in the wide ſea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admirall would ſet vpon them as they ſhould come forth againe. Whileſt men were thus diuining too and fro, and the Venetians attending the comming forth of the enemis fleet, it fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus, and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a litle before come from Corcyra, of purpoſe to be preſent at the battell, were the firſt that began the fight; and with their two nimble Ships (after they had changed a few bullets) boorded a tall Ship of the Turks, being of ſuch beautie and burthen, that ſhe ſeemed rather a Caſtle

Fight at ſea betwixt the Turks and the Venetians.

A ſtle than a ſhip, whereof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable pirat) was captain: who after a long & cruell fight, perceiuing that he muſt either yeeld, or by force be taken, deſperatly ſet fire on his own ſhip, by the rage whereof both ſhe and the Venetian ſhips faſt grapled vnto her, were all three together burnt downe to the water. Many of the men (to ſhun the violence of the fire) leapt ouer boord into the ſea, where ſome of them were taken vp by other ſhips, and ſome periſhed. Some few other of the Venetian fleet couragiouſly aſſailed the Turks at their com-ming out, and doing great harme, put the Turks whole fleet in no ſmall feare. But the moſt part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a far off; vnto whom the other before in fight with the Turks, after they had done what they could, retyred alſo. But by that they had done, it appeared plainly, that the Venetian Admirall that day let ſlip out of his hands a moſt notable victorie, if he as a reſolute man had with his whole fleet charged the enemie.

B After this fight the Turks held on their courſe, ſtill keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians ſtill followed: at length the Turks fleet was come to the entrance of the gulfe of Patras, where the Venetians againe faintly ſetting vpon them, ſuffered them to recouer the gulfe; with no leſſe diſhonour than they had before let them eſcape at the port Sapi-entia: for the Venetians hauing the aduantage of the place, and better appointed for fight at ſea, might eaſily (as it was ſuppoſed) haue gained the victorie, if the commanders (but eſpecially the Admirall) had been ſo forward in the ſeruice as became men of their place. But many of them afraid to fight lay aloofe, ſo that Danthes the Turks Admirall (who perceiuing himſelfe too weake, had purpoſed to run his gallies on ſhoare, and ſo to haue fled to the armie at land, C if he had felt himſelfe ouercharged by the Venetian Fleet) had now contrarie to his expectation recouered the gulfe he deſired, though not without loſſe of ſome of his gallies. Within this gulfe ſtandeth the antient city of Naupactum (now called Lepanto) then ſubiect to the Venetians, whither Baiazet was then come by land with his armie; and now by the comming of his fleet into the gulfe, layd hard ſiege vnto the citie both by ſea and land. They of the citie ſeeing themſelues on euery ſide beſet with their enemies, without any great reſiſtance fell to compoſition with Baiazet, & ſo yeelded vnto him the citie, which the Turks hold at this day.

Lepanto yeelded to the Turks.

Grimanus the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for all his euil ſeruice (or rather for that he, according to his milde nature, had not vſed ſeueritie againſt ſuch captaines as refuſed to fight) caſt into priſon: and although he was a man mightily befriended, yet was hee by a publique Decree baniſhed into one of the Abſytides, Iſlands vpon the coaſt of Liburnia.
D From the firſt foundation of the city of Venice was neuer man impugned with more ſpight, or defended by greater friends: but common hatred preuailing, he was neuertheleſſe exiled.
Thus Baiazet hauing made a roade into the Venetian territory by Scander-Baſſa, and taken from them the citie of Naupactum, with the country therabout, returned with victorie to Conſtantinople.

The next yeare following, which was the yeare 1500, Baiazet put to ſea a greater and ſtron-ger fleet than he had the yeare before; and himſelfe in perſon with a puiſſant armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand men entred by the ſtrait of Corinth into Peloponeſus, and marching through the country, came and incamped before the ſtrong citie of Methone (now called Mo-E don) then vnder the gouernment of the Venetians: at which time his great fleet met him there alſo by ſea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus beſet the citie both by ſea & land, & with long and continuall batterie made three great and faire breaches in the walls, he gaue vnto the ſame two terrible aſſaults, and that with ſuch deſperat furie, that many of them which went firſt vnto the breach, ouerthrowne by the preſſe of them which followed, were trodden to death. Yet neuertheleſſe the citie was both times valiantly defended by the citiſens & gar-riſon ſoldiers: ſo that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retyre from the wals, hauing filled the towne ditches with the bodies of his ſlain Turks. The Venetian Admirall Triuiſanus lying at the Iſlle of Zacynthus (but far too weake to fight with the enemie) in the beginning of the ſiege ſent Valerius Marcellus and Baptiſta Polanus, with two gallies full of men F and munition in relief of the beſieged; and now doubting their further wants, ſent Io. Maripe-trus, Alex. Cothius of Corcyra, & Cachuris of Hydruntum, with three other great gallies, with men, munition, and ſuch other things as he thought needful for the defence of the citie. Theſe three reſolute captaines comming with a full winde, and packing on all their ſailes, brake tho-row the Turks fleet lying in their way, and ranne themſelues aground vnder the walls of the

towne: for they of the town had ſo barred the hauen for feare of the enemie, that they could G not that way poſſibly get in. The Citiſens and ſouldiers joyfull of the comming of this freſh ſupplie, and withall fearing leſt the Gallies ſhould be ſet off againe from them by the enemie, came running by heapes from all parts of the citie, towards the ſea, to receiue this new come ayd: which was done with ſuch a confuſed diſorder, that diuers places of the citie towards the land were left without defendants, as if there had beene no enemie neere. Which the Ianizaries quickly perceiuing, preſently entred by thoſe forſaken places with little or no reſiſtance. Then the Citiſens all too late began to make head: for the Ianizaries alreadie entred made way for the reſt of the armie; which ſwarming into the citie, ſlew without pittie all that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the ſouldiers but euen then newly landed out of the three gallies. In this ſlaughter, Anthonius Fabrius and Bardella (gouernors H of the towne) with Andreas Falco Biſhop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus and his Mytre on his head, were ſlaine: none eſcaped their furie, but ſuch as were for their ſtrength reſerued for ſeruile labour, or for their beautie, to the Victors luſt: and of theſe a thouſand bound faſt together in long ropes, were brought to Baiazets Pauilion, and there in his ſight by his commandement cruelly murthered. The Cities of Corone and Pylus (now called Nauarrinum) ſometime the dwelling place of old Neſtor, terrified with the taking of Methone, yeelded themſelues by compoſition to Baiazet. This citie of Chriſſeum, now knowne by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken alſo by Cherſeogles, Baiazet his ſonne in law. All theſe were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Nauplium was alſo beſieged by Haly Baſſa, but yet ſtill defended by the Venetiaus. Baiazet hauing new fortified the citie of Methone, and ſtored it I with new Inhabitants, left in it a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo with victorie returned to Conſtantinople.

At this time Triuiſanus the Venetian Admirall died, of griefe of mind as ſome ſuppoſed; in whoſe place the Senat ſent Benedictus Piſaurius, a noble and valiant gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemie, then departing from the ſiege of Nauplium, purſuing them euen vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, ſtill cutting off ſuch as ſtragled or tarried behinde the reſt of the fleet: by which meanes he tooke aboue twentie of their gallies, and in his returne tooke from the Turks the Iſland of Ægina, and landing in diuers places of the Turks dominions, left vnto them the wofull remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with Gonſaluus, ſyrnamed the Great (ſent by Ferdinand King of Spaine, to ayd him againſt K the Turks) at Zacynthus, he inuaded Cephalenia (which Triuiſanus his predeceſſour had in vaine attempted the yeare before) and layd hard ſiege to the citie; which was for a ſpace valiantly defended by the Turks, yet at length by the good conduct of Gonſaluus it was by force taken, when as Giſdare the gouernor thereof, with his garriſon of Turks had before fought it out euen to the laſt man. The citie being taken, all the whole Iſland yeelded forthwith to the Venetians.

Piſaurius hauing taken Cephalenia, repaired the citie, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon for defence of the Iſle, departed to Corcyra; where he was aduertiſed, that the Turks were rigging forth a great fleet againſt the next Spring, whereof ſome part lay in the Bay of Ambracia, not far from Corcyra; ſome at Eante, and the reſt within the ſtraits of Helleſpontus. Wherefore L purpoſing to do ſome exployt vpon thoſe gallies which lay in the bay of Ambracia, to auert the mind of the enemie from perceiuing of that he had ſecretly with himſelfe intended, he ſent the greateſt part of his fleet vnto the Iſland of Neritos, who ſuddenly landing ſhould put the Inhabitants in feare. The captaines ſent about the buſineſſe, cherefully put in execution what the Admirall had commanded, and by their ſudden landing raiſed ſuch a tumult, that all the countries thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which ſhould enſue thereof. The Bay of Ambracia is ſo ſtraitned on either ſide with the mountains of Epirus, that the entrance thereof is but halfe a mile ouer: but by and by opening it ſelfe into a great wideneſſe, and running vp into the land, maketh a moſt pleaſant and ſafe harbour for ſhips and gallies to ride in. Piſaurius with a faire wind comming thither with eight gallies wel appointed, when M the Turkes thought him to haue beene at Neritos, and entring the ſtrait, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turkes great Gallies, to the terrour of all them that dwelt round about the Bay, and carried away with him eleuen more, laded with munition and victuall, through the ſtrait; the Turks in vaine fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their great ordnance from ſhore to haue ſunke him in going out of the Bay. But hauing done what he came for, he returned with his prey againe to Corcyra. Not long after he alſo recouered the caſtle of Pylos in Morea: which as it was ſuddenly gotten, ſo was it as ſuddenly loſt; for Camalis, a notable Pirat of the Turks, who had bin abroad ſeeking after purchaſe, putting into that harbor by chance, took three gallies there left by the admiral for defence of the place, and ſo terrified the faint-hearted captaine, that he fel to compoſition with the Pyrat, to yeeld him the caſtle, ſo that he and his ſoldiers might in ſafetie depart: which the Pyrat granting, had the caſtle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with far greater ſtrength haue poſſibly woon. So was Pylos for feare twice in one yeare yeelded vp vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly captains which gaue it vp, being both beheaded by the commandement of the Admirall. About the ſame time, Piſaurius attempted to haue burnt other of the Turks gallies lying in the riuer Eante, vpon the coaſt of Macedonia: but not with ſo good ſucceſſe as before; for the Turks, made more carefull by the loſſe they had but a little before receiued at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly looke vnto their gallies: ſo that when Biſaurius had in certain ſmall veſſels, made of purpoſe for that ſeruice, embarked two hundred reſolute ſoldiers to haue gone vp the riuer to haue fired the gallies, they were by the way after they had entred a good way into the riuer, encountred by the Turks, and enforced to returne. But before they could get out of the riuer, the wind roſe ſo contrarie, with ſuch a ſtiffe gale ful in the mouth of the riuer, that the mariners ouermaſtered with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and ſpent all their ſtrength, were driuen aſhore, ſome on the one ſide of the riuer, and ſome on the other, and ſo fell into the hands of their enemies, of whom it booted not to craue mercie.

Dyrrachium taken by the Turke.

Mytilene beſieged.

About this time Baiazet tooke alſo the antient and famous city of Dyrrachium, now called Durazo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almoſt quite abandoned by the inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got all the country round about it. The Venetians ſore preſſed with theſe wars ſo long maintained againſt the Turke, had many times prayed ayd of other Chriſtian Princes, and were well holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of Cephalenia: and now Lewis the French King, vpon a good deuotion to that war, ſent the Lord Raueſtein with ſeuen tall ſhips and fifteene gallies well appointed out of Prouince and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his friends. This fleet departing from Naples, where they had by the way put in, and paſſing about Italie, and ſo through the Ionian ſea, came to Melos one of the Cyclades; at which Iſland Piſaurius with his fleet in ſhort time arriued alſo: from whence they by mutual conſent departed together to inuade the Iſland of Lesbos; and being there ſafely arriued, landed their Forces, and laid ſiege vnto the ſtrong Citie of Mytilene, where by the furie of their artillerie they in ſhort time had made a faire breach in the wall. In the time of this batterie, whileſt the breach was in making, Piſaurius with part of his fleet ſailed to Tenedos; for it was reported, that certain of the Turks gallies were then comming for that place out of Helleſpontus. Which report, as ſome write, was of purpoſe giuen out by the French, thereby to draw the Venetian Admirall from the ſiege, that ſo in the meane time they being in good hope to take the towne in his abſence, might themſelues carrie away the honour thereof, together with the rich ſpoyle. Others fauouring the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpoſe departed, enuying at the honor of the French. Which is hardly to be beleeued in ſo honorable a perſonage, and in an action ſo much concerning the good of his Commonweale. Howſoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his abſence was by the French preſently aſſaulted: although that Paulus Valateſius the Venetian Vice-Admiral, earneſtly requeſted the French Admirall to deferre the aſſault for a while, and to expect the returne of Piſaurius. Which his counſell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the aſſault. The French men after their manner furiouſly aſſailing the breach, were valiantly repulſed by the Turks; ſo that in the breach was made a deadly and moſt terrible fight, many falling on both ſides. Yet for all that, the Citie was manfully defended by the Turks, and the French men were enforced to retyre. The French Admirall hauing taken this repulſe, commanded all things to be carried aboord, purpoſing to haue forſaken the ſiege, and ſo to haue departed: when in the meane time the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much adoo perſuaded the French to ſtay. Whereupon the batterie was againe begun with greater furie than before, and now the Leaders were conſulting of a freſh aſſault to be giuen, when ſuddenly newes was brought, That the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the citie: and thereupon the aſſault was for a time deferred, and the batterie continued. But thoſe Turks which came, being in number but few, were for moſt part by them in the gallies taken and caſt ouer boord; ſome few that got to land, ſaued themſelues in the woods and deſart places of the Iſle. By this time the citie was againe made ſaultable, and the Venetians with great courage aſſailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the rampiers, from whence they were againe both times beaten down by the Turks, the French all the while looking on. Many valiant men were there ſlaine and hurt, and in the end the Venetians were glad with loſſe to retire, as had the French done before. Whileſt this was in doing, a pinnace came to the fleet with newes, That the Great Maſter of the Rhodes was comming with his gallies to the ſiege: whereupon the Admirals determined to maintaine the ſiege vntil his comming. But the next day after, the French Admirall changing his purpoſe, ſhipped his men, and hoyſing ſaile departed to Chios: and ſailing thence towards Italie, was ouertaken with a moſt terrible tempeſt, wherein the Admirall Gallie with two others were loſt, with eight hundred good ſouldiers; the Admirall himſelfe with aboue fortie others were by chance contrarie to all hope ſaued, and with much danger with his weather-beaten fleet recouered the hauen of Tarentum. The Venetian Admirall thus forſaken of the French, and ſeeing the time paſt wherein he expected the comming of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, brake vp the ſiege and departed from Leſbos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Maſter of the Rhodes with his Gallies; vnto whom he complained greatly of the inconſtancie of the French, imputing it vnto them, that the citie of Mytilene was not woon. Neither were they behinde with him, but in euery place where they came, layd the fault as much or more vpon him. From Paros the Venetian Admirall tooke his courſe to the Iſland of Melos, where he found one Rhithius an arch Pyrat of the Turks, who by force of tempeſt was driuen on ſhore, and by the ſudden comming downe of the Iſland people taken: him (for that he had exerciſed exceeding crueltie vpon certain Chriſtians that he had taken) Piſaurius cauſed to be faſt bound to a ſpit, and with a ſmall fire to be roſted to death. From Melos he returned to Corcyra, and there wintered.

The next Spring, Piſaurius with certaine gallies which Alexander Biſhop of Rome had ſent vnto him, vnder the command of Iacobus Piſaurius biſhop of Paphia, failed to Neritos, now called S. Maura, which is an Iſland parted from the firme land with a little fret of the ſea, long time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Piſaurius ſuddenly landing his men, ſurpriſed the Iſland, and with wonderfulll celeritie and induſtrie caſt vp two great trenches, in ſuch ſort, and to ſo good purpoſe, that three thouſand of the Turks horſemen comming at a low water ouer that narrow ſtrait which parteth the Iſland from the Maine, were with loſſe repulſed and forced to retyre. Whereupon S. Maura the chiefe citie was forthwith deliuered vnto Piſaurius, with the reſt of the Iſland.

The Venetians wearie of this long and chargeable war againſt ſo mightie an enemie, ſent Lodouicus Manetius their Embaſſador to Baiazet, to treat with him for peace: but Baiazet ſtood vpon ſuch hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Manetius ſo diſcreetly vſed the matter, that Baiazet ſent with him at his returne to Venice, his Embaſſador, to propound vnto the Senat ſuch conditions as it pleaſed him to grant them peace vpon. This Embaſſador had audience in the Senat twice, where he in the name of his Maſter propounded ſuch proud and vnreaſonable conditions, that they were by the Senat rejected, and ſo he himſelfe diſmiſſed and ſent backe againe.

1503. The yere following, the Venetians ſent an Embaſſador to Baiazet, who moued with the pitifull complaints of his owne ſubjects, for the daily harms they receiued from the Venetians alongſt the ſea coaſt, as alſo for want of trade; and fearing alſo ſome troubles like to ariſe in his kingdom in Aſia (as indeed there did, not long after) yeelded himſelfe more wllingly to heare of peace, than before. This Embaſſador called Zacharias Phriſcus, was well heard of Baiazet, and after long ſuit had brought the matter he came for into ſome good tearmes; and being honourably rewarded by the Turkiſh Emperour, returned home, carrying with him vnto the Senat farre more reaſonable conditions of peace than had at any time before beene by Baiazet propounded. Hereupon the Venetians ſhortly after ſent Andreas Gritti (an honourable Senatour) a man well knowne to Baiazet both for his famous traffique in former time at Con-

A ſtantinople, and alſo for that in theſe late warres he was taken priſoner at the winning of Methone, and his life ſpared at the interceſſion of Cherſeogles (Baiazet his ſon in law) and afterward ranſomed: he in the name of the ſtate from whence he came, concluded a peace with Baiazet. The capitulations wherof were, firſt, That the Venetians ſhould deliuer vp the Iſlands of Neritos and Leucadia, reſeruing vnto themſelues the Iſland of Cephalenia onely: Then, That Baiazet ſhould reſtore all ſuch goods as had been taken from the Venetian Merchants, in theſe late warres: And that it ſhould be lawfull for them (as they were wont) ſafely to trafique into the Euxine ſea, and to Conſtantinople; and there to haue their Conſull or Gouernour as they had had in former time; And laſt of all, That the Venetian territorie ſhould bee certainely knowne, and ſeparated from the Turkes by certaine bounds and limits. Theſe conditions were ſolemnly agreed vpon, and confirmed both by Baiazet and the ſtate of Venice; and ſo a firme B peace concluded in the yeare 1503, after the warres had continued betwixt them about the ſpace of fiue yeares.

A peace concluded betwixt Baiazet and the Venetians.

The ſame yeare Baiazet aſſembled a great and puiſſant army of his beſt and moſt approued ſoldiers, as well in Aſia as Europe, which met together at Sophia, purpoſing (as it was thought) to haue inuaded Hungarie: but worthily doubting the ſucceſſe of that war againſt ſo warlike a nation, he changed his purpoſe, and leauing Achmetes Baſſa with his Aſian ſoldiers at Sophia, turned himſelfe with the reſt of his armie into Albania (to reduce thoſe rebellious people againe to his obeyſance) and had before ſent a fleet of gallies to ſtop the paſſages of that countrey alongſt the ſea coaſt. But the country people vnderſtanding of his comming, fled into the high and rough rocks and mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harme: who neC uertheleſſe with incredible labour and aduenture, mounted thoſe difficult places, and killing an exceeding number of thoſe mountaine and ſauage people, carried all the women and children they could light vpon, away with them priſoners: and with fire and ſword made all the countrey deſolate. After which ſpoile done, Baiazet returned with his armie to Manaſtirum; and departing thence, vpon the way met with a Deruiſlar (which is a phantaſticall and beggarly kind of Turkiſh monks, vſing no other apparell but two ſheep-skins, the one hanging before and the other behind) a luſtie ſtrong fat fellow, attired after the manner of his order, with a great ring in each eare: who drawing neere vnto Baiazet, as if he would of him haue receiued an alms, deſperatly aſſailed him with a ſhort Scimitar which he had cloſely conueyed vnD der his hypocritall habit. But Baiazet by the ſtarting of the horſe whereon he rid (being afraid at the ſudden approch of the hobgoblin) partly auoided the deadly blow by the traitour entended, yet not altogether vnwounded: neither had he ſo eſcaped the danger, had not Iſbender Baſſa with his horſemans maſe preſently ſtruck downe the deſperat villain as he was about to haue doubled his ſtroke; but being now ſtrucke downe, he was foorthwith rent in peeces by the ſouldiers. This treacherous and deſperat fact ſo much moued Baiazet, that he proſcribed all them of that ſuperſtitious order, and baniſhed them out of his empire.

Baiazet in danger to haue bin ſlain by a Deruiſlar or Turkiſh monke.

After ſo many troubles, Baiazet gaue himſelfe vnto a quiet courſe of life, ſpending moſt part of his time in ſtudie of phyloſophie, and conference with learned men: vnto which peaceable kind of life, he was of his owne naturall diſpoſition more enclined than to wars; alE beit that the regard of his ſtate, and the earneſt deſire of his men of war, drew him oftentimes euen againſt his wil into the field. As for the ciuile gouernment of his kingdome, he referred it wholly vnto his three principal Baſſaes, Alis, Achmetes, and Iachia, who at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things. After he had in this quiet and pleaſing kinde of life to his great contentment paſſed ouer fiue yeares, of a little neglected ſparke ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a fire in Aſia, as was hardly after with much bloud of his people and danger of that part of his Empire quenched: the reliques wherof yet troubleth thoſe ſuperſtitious people at this day. Which thing was brought to paſſe by the craftie deuiſe of Chaſan Chelife, and Schach Culi his boy (whome ſome call Teckel Scachoculis, and others Techellis) two hypocriticall Perſians: who flying into thoſe countries, and with the counterfeit ſhew of feigned holineſſe hauing procured to themF ſelues a great name amongſt thoſe rude people, with a number of windie headed followes (filled with the noueltie of their new doctrine) raiſed firſt ſuch a diuerſitie of opinions about the true ſucceſſors of their vntrue Prophet, and afterwards ſuch a rebellion amongſt the people, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other was not in a good while after with great bloudſhed appeaſed.

Baiazet by nature peaceable.

But for the better vnderſtanding of the ground of theſe troubles, which hapned at this time in the raigne of Baiazet by occaſion of theſe two fugitiue Perſians; as alſo for the mortal wars which afterwards enſued betwixt Hyſmael (commonly called the great Sophi of Perſia) and Selymus, Baiazet his ſucceſſor, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefely to declare the great mutation which at this time hapned to the Perſian kingdome, as wel in the ſtate it ſelfe, as in matters of their ſuperſtition. At ſuch time as Aſſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes raigned in Perſia, there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Iouius calleth by the name of Harduelles) a man honorably diſcended amongſt the Perſians, who contemning worldy honour, riches, pleaſure, and whatſoeuer elſe belonged vnto delicacie of life (commonly accounted the greateſt part of humane felicitie) as meere vanities and trifles, led ſuch a ſtraight and auſtere kind of life, with ſuch continencie and contempt of the world, as that the vulgar people, for moſt part giuen to pleaſure, wondering at that in him which they could not or would not imitate, began to haue the man in ſingular admiration for the opinion they had conceiued of his vpright life and rare vertues. The fame of this new Prophet (for ſo he was accounted) was growne ſo great in the Perſian kingdome, that people without number reſorted out of all parts of Perſia and Armenia vnto the great citie of Tauris to ſee the man. And he the more to ſeduce the multitude (delighted with nouelties) began to inuay againſt the common receiued opinion of the Mahometans, concerning the true ſucceſſours of their great Prophet; and to reuiue the opinion of Giuni, ſurnamed Sofi; perſuading the people (as if he had bin inſpired with ſome diuine inſpiration) That none of the profeſſors of the Mahometan religion ſhould inherit the kingdome of heauen after they were dead, but ſuch as were the followers of Haly, the true ſucceſſour of the great prophet Mahomet, and his fellow in writing. Whom he taught them onely to honour as priuie to the mind of the great prophet, and ſo to receiue his writings as of all others moſt authenticall; reiecting Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, with their writings, as moſt wicked and accurſed men; whom the Turks had euer, and yet doe with the other Mahometanes, honour and worſhip as the true ſucceſſours of their great prophet Mahomet, and his ſincere interpretors, together with the aforeſaid Haly, whom the Perſians do onely acknowledge: and therefore in their praiers doe commonly ſay, Curſed be Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, and God be fauorable to Haly and wel pleaſed with him. Which their difference about the true ſucceſſor of their Prophet, in whom was no truth, hath bin, and yet is, one of the greateſt cauſes of the mortall wars betweene the Turkes and Perſians: and not the diuers interpretation of their law (as many haue written) which amongſt the Turks and Perſians is all one.

The Turks and Perſians differ not about the interpretation of their law, but about the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet.

Vſun-Caſſanes mooued with the fame and vertues of this new prophet, or rather (as ſome thought) deſirous to win the hearts of the multitude of them that had receiued this new phantaſie; gaue him in mariage his daughter Martha, begotten of the Chriſtian ladie Deſpina the daughter of Calo Ioannes Emperour of Trapezond. Which marriage the Chriſtian Emperour made with the Mahometan prince, and he alſo accepted thereof, thereby to ſtrengthen themſelues againſt the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet the Great; whoſe power was then become a terror vnto all his neighbor princes: but to how ſmall purpoſe this policie ſerued them both, is before declared in the life of the ſame Mahomet. At the concluſion of this marriage, the emperor had ſpecially couenanted with Vſun-Caſſanes, that his daughter Deſpina might haue the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion. Wherby it came to paſſe, that this Martha her daughter, inſtructed by her mother, became a Chriſtian alſo; who now married by her father vnto this preciſe hypocrit Haider Erdebil, in ſhort time bare him a ſonne called Hyſmael, whom ſhe ſo much as ſhe could trained vp in the principles of the Chriſtian Religion. Whereby it came to paſſe, that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the kingdome of Perſia, he alwayes during his life had the Chriſtians in good regard, and neuer found fault with their religion.

Haider thus graced with the marriage of the great kings daughter Martha, only for his rare vertues and puritie of life, as was commonly ſuppoſed, grew now into farre greater credit and eſtimation of the people than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began to be generally receiued, & the number of his followers ſo greatly augmented, that Iacup ſucceeding his father Vſun-Caſſanes but lately dead, began to haue the power and credit of Haider his brother in law in ſuſpect; & to diſtruſt leſt the Perſians (who ſecretly fauored the remainder of the poſteritie of their antient kings) ſhould aſſemble together vnder the colour of this new ſuperſtition,

A and raiſe ſome dangerous rebellion before he were well ſetled in his ſeat. For he was not ignorant, that Aſembeius Vſun-Caſſanes(his father)had but by force and policie vſurped the kingdome, hauing killed Moloonchres the lawfull king: whereof there aroſe two factions,ſome fauouring the vſurper,and otherſome the poore remainder of the diſcent of their antient kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which cauſes Iacup (as he was of a ſupitious and troubleſome nature, & aboue meaſure iealous of his ſtate)nothing regarding the neere alliance or reputed holineſſe of his godly brother in law cauſed him(ſuſpecting no ſuch matter)to be ſecretly murthered: and ſo hauing ſtrucke off his head,with fire and ſword perſecuted all the profeſſors of that new doctrine;ſo to deliuer himſelfe for euer of that his vain and needleſſe feare: Hyſmael the ſon of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophi of Perſia) beeing then but a B child,as it were by fatall deſtinie eſcaped the fury of his crueſl vncle Iacup,and fled into Hyrcania, vnto one Pyrchales his fathers friend,who then ruled in a ſmall territorie neere vnto the Caſpian ſea.

Haider Ardebil ſecretly murdred.

Amongſt many others of the diſciples and followers of Haider (which in that cruel perſecution were glad to flie for ſafegard of their liues) the two before named,Chaſan Shelife, and Schach Culi,afterwards ſyrnamed Cuſelbas,in outward ſhew both of vertue and learning not inferiour vnto their maſter,flying that dangerous tempeſt,and paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, came into Armenia the leſſer,and there tooke vp their dwelling at the great mountaine Antitaurus: at the foot wherof the broken rocks haue diuers darke and obſcure caues,made partly by art,and partly by nature,which place is of the inhabitants called Teke-Ili: whereof diuers hiſtoriographers,I know not whether deceiued by the name of the place,or els wittingly C transferring the name of the place vnto the man that liued therein,haue called this Scach Culi (who of the two proued of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name we will alſo from henceforth call him. A thing heretofore much vſed amongſt the religious, and alſo ſom of the children of great princes,who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were borne, or where they moſt liued. This place is both wholſome and exceeding pleaſant, for the varietie of fruits and liuely ſprings,wherewith the plaines adioyning are continually watered,and the mountaines at all times of the yeare garniſhed.

Here Shelife with his companion Techellis,hauing ſeparated themſelues far from the companie of men,and giuen themſelues wholly to a contemplatiue life, for diuers yeres liued moſt ſtraitly and auſterely,contenting themſelues with ſuch things as the earth of it ſelfe afforded D them,without ſeeking for better. Theſe hypocrits were firſt ſeene,and afterwards acquainted with the ſheepheards and heardſmen liuing vpon the mountains: and in proceſſe of time with the rude husbandmen and countrey people,who wondring at their ſtrait and deuout kinde of life,relieued them with all things neceſſarie. Yea Baiazet himſelfe hearing of their auſtere and deuout manner of liuing, ſent them yearely ſixe or ſeuen thouſand aſpers,as his almes giuen them vpon charitie and deuotion. But afterwards when they began to tell fortunes,and as it were by the way of diuination to prognoſticat of things to come,the rural people held them for more than men, and conceiued of them a firme opinion,that they were ſome diuine prophets.
And ſo were by the countrey people firſt drawne into the countrey villages,and afterwards, E as if it had bin againſt their wils,into the cities; where they had in ſhort time filled all the country far and neere,with the admiration of their fame: But after they began to publiſh their new phantaſied doctrine concerning the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new fangled followers (as had Haider their maſter before amongſt the Perſians) who had them in ſingular reuerence; perſuaded now by them, that they ſhould bee condemned for euer,if they did not (as they were by them taught)giue the honour of the true ſucceſſion of their great Prophet,only to Haly,and him onely to reuerence and call vpon next vnto the great Prophet himſelfe.

When they had thus with their often ſermons and blinded prophecies ſeduced the people, and in ſhort time woon great credit amongſt the vulgar ſort,of themſelues too much giuen to F noueltie and ſuperſtition; they commanded their diſciples and followers to weare vpon their Turkiſh hats a red band or riband,whereby to be knowne from others that were not of their profeſſion. Of which red bands or ribands, they which profeſſed this new ſuperſtition,were, and yet are ouer all the Eaſt part of the world called by the name of Cuſelbaſſas, which is to ſay, Red heads.

The beginning of the Cuſelbaſſas.

Hyſmael his behauiour in the time of his exile

Hyſmael alſo liuing in exile, moſt earneſtly embraced that new ſuperſtition which Haider G his father had before taught in Perſia, but with far better fortune and ſucceſſe. For as ſoone as he was grown to mans eſtate, he following his fathers maner of life, and being by nature wonderfull eloquent, comely of perſon, exceeding wiſe, and of an inuincible courage, was of the rude vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man: ſo that hee grew to be of great fame and power amongſt thoſe barbarous people with whom he liued. And not the baſe and vulgar ſort only, but diuers noblemen alſo, and others of good reputation, once allured with the noueltie of his doctrine, the more to maniſeſt their good will towards the author of their ſect; after they had forſaken their old ſuperſtition, ceaſed not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the higheſt degree of vertue and honor. And he himſelfe as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the ſetting forth of himſelfe, making ſemblant of more than was H indeed in him, obtained, as if it had bin againſt his will, riches, honor, fame, and authoritie; of al which things, he as a notable diſſembler ſeemed to make no account or reckning: neither were there ſome wanting which would ſweare, that Haider his father (as he was an excellent Aſtronomer) calculating his natiuitie, ſhould ſay, That he ſhould prooue a great prophet, and the author of true religion, who ſubduing the greateſt part of the Eaſt, ſhould become as glorious both in matters of religion and martiall affaires, as was Mahomet the Great Prophet himſelfe. Which report being bruted abroad amongſt the vulgar people, greatly increaſed his authoritie, and gaue them occaſion to talke of wonders. Not long after, Hyſmael was firſt by the admiration or rather aſſentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had bin by a generall conſent, ſyrnamed Sophos; which amongſt thoſe people ſignifieth a Wiſe man, or the Interpreter of the gods. Theſe proſperous beginnings, with the troubled ſtate of the Perſian I kingdome, encouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vncle Iacup the Perſian king was long before dead, beeing together with his ſon poyſoned by his adulterous wife: which thing he preſently perceiuing, enforced her to drinke of the ſame cup; and becauſe he would be ſure that ſhe ſhould not eſcape, with his owne hand ſtrucke off her head, and immediatly after died, with his ſonne. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe about the ſucceſſion: and diuers great men one after another aſpired to the kingdome, which they enioyed not long. And amongſt the reſt Eluan-Beg (whom Iouius calleth Aluantes) at that time ſtood in no ſure poſſeſſion of the kingdome, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus.

Hyſmael returneth into Armenia, and recouereth his inheritance.

Hyſmael taking hold of this opportunitie, armed diuers of the moſt able men of his followers, K and receiuing ſome ſmall aid from his poore old friend Pyrchales, entered into Armenia, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good will of the people, rather than by any force, recouered his fathers inheritance, whereunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew ſtronger and ſtronger, by the continuall repairing vnto him of ſuch as hauing once receiued the doctrine of Haider, were glad of long (for feare of perſecution) to diſſemble the ſame: but now hauing got an head and chiefetaine to cleaue vnto, began openly to ſhew themſelues againe, and in great number to reſort vnto him, in hope of the good ſucceſſe of their religion, not ſo happily begun by his father.

Sumachia taken by Hyſmael.

His power thus daily increaſing beyond his expectation, he laied ſiege vnto Sumachia, a citie L in the confines of Media, which he tooke by force and ſacked: and with the ſpoile therof both inriched and armed his ſouldiers, which before were for moſt part naked men. The taking of this citie wonderfully increaſed both his fame and courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That hautie minds, couragiouſly attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their firſt attempts make way vnto the full of their ſtately deſires. So after this, Hyſmaels thoughts were not ſo low, as to thinke of the taking of this or that little citie; but how he might now compaſſe the great citie of Tauris, the very ſeat of the Perſian kings, and afterwards the kingdome it ſelfe. Whereupon repoſing no leſſe confidence in his own good fortune, than the valour of his ſouldiers, he marched with his armie directly to the city of Tauris, & that with ſuch expedition, that he was come before it before any ſuch thing was feared, much leſſe prouided for. M Eluan the Perſian king was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great battell with his brother Moratchamus for the kingdome: and hauing vanquiſhed him, draue him out of Armenia and Perſia; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of ciuile warres, had cauſed diuers of the chiefe citizens of Tauris, which had taken part with his bro-

Hyſmael commeth to Tauris.

A brother againſt him,to be ſeuerely executed,filling the eies of their friends with the horrible ſpactacle of their diſmembred bodies,and the hearts of moſt men with ſorrow and heauines: whereby he had ſo alienated the minds of the citizens from him,that now vpon the approch of Hyſmael,they were all readie to forſake him: of which their diſpoſition Hyſmael was beforehand informed,and vpon the good hope thereof had haſted his comming. Eluan the Per-ſian king thus ouertaken on the ſudden,had not time to raiſe ſuch forces as might ſuffice either to encounter his enemie, or defend the citie; wherefore deſpairing of his owne ſtrength, and iuſtly fearing the reuolt and furie of the diſcontented citizens,as a man diſmaid,ſuddenly fled out of the citie. After whoſe departure the gates were preſently ſet open to Hyſmael. For the citizens which in thoſe troubleſome times (wherin the two brethren contended for the king-B dome)had ſuffered great calamitie,choſe rather in that preſent danger to receiue a conqueror of ſo great fame as was then Hyſmael, than to their vtter deſtruction to oppoſe themſelues againſt him in the quarrell of their cruell king: and the rather, for that they ſaw a general ſecurity and open way to preferment,propoſed vnto all ſuch as ſhould receiue the reformed religion of this new conquerour.

Hyſmael entering the citie, ſlew certaine of the kings guard which were not yet departed, and then vtterly raſed the ſtately tombe wherein his vncle Iacup was after the manner of the Perſian kings royally buried. And to mittigat the ſorrow he had ſo long conceiued of his fathers death, and with reuenge to appeaſe his angrie ghoſt, he cauſed the tyrants bones to bee digged vp and ſcattered abroad, and the memoriall of his name to bee quite raſed out of all C places of the citie.

Hyſmael taketh the city of Tauris,and defaceth the tombe of his vncle Iacup.

Although Hyſmael was thus poſſeſſed of the regall citie of Tauris,and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole kingdome, yet he knew that ſo long as Eluan liued, his conqueſt was not vnto him aſſured: and therefore to the vttermoſt of his power he augmented his armie with new ſupplies taken vp in that populous citie, whom he furniſhed with armour and weapons taken out of the kings armourie. In the mean time newes was brought vnto him, that the Perſian king before fled into the fartheſt part of his kingdome, was now comming from Scyras with a great armie againſt him; and that Moratchamus his brother,forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels,had raiſed a great armie about Babylon in Aſſyria,in ſhort time to ioyne with his brother.

D Hyſmael neuertheleſſe nothing terrified with the report of the gteat preparation of the two brethren againſt him, to the intent he might ſeeme to vndertake this war by the appointment of God,and vpon a greater aſſurance than vpon his own ſtrength,reſolued to go againſt them.
And ſo after he had muſtered his armie,& in beſt manner he could prouided all things neceſſarie,he ſet forward from Tauris; vſing no other perſuaſion to encourage his ſoldiers, but that they ſhould all as became reſolute men, make haſt & follow him whom God had giuen them for a chiefetain and leader,vnto a moſt aſſured victory. The Perſian king was at the ſame time ten daies iourney from Tauris,when Hyſmael with incredible celeritie preuenting the fame of his comming, was come to the mountaine Niphates, which parteth Armenia from Aſſyria: which mountaine,Eluan purpoſing ſhortly to paſſe ouer with his populous armie, had ſent be-E fore his ſcouts to diſcouer the ſtraight paſſages, and a multitude of pioners to make the wayes more commodious for his great armie to paſſe. Which thing Hyſmael vnderſtanding,and po-litickly conſidering that it ſhould be much for his aduantage, if he ſhould firſt himſelfe paſſe ouer thoſe great mountaines,and ſo vpon the ſudden ſet vpon his enemies then lying in ſecuritie,and fearing nothing leſſe than ſuch a deſperat attempt: vpon that reſolution aduanced his enſignes vpon the mountains; and hauing with ſmall reſiſtance diſcomfited them which kept the paſſages, came downe the ſame mountaines like a tempeſt, and furiouſly aſſailed the king, then lying in his campe on the other ſide at the foot of the mountaine: vpon the approch of whom,ſuch a hurly burly was raiſed in the kings camp, that what for the confuſed tumult of the ſoldiers,& fearfull outcries of the multitude of baſe people which followed the camp,the F king could ſcarcely giue order vnto his captains what he would haue don,or yet incourage his ſouldiers,or put them in order of battell. So that Hyſmael giuing a fierce onſet with his Armenian ſouldiers,there was ſuddenly begun a moſt terrible and bloodie battell. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyſmael faile him, whoſe courage and proweſſe neuer failed: for aſſailing the Kings battell of footmen, with three ſquadrons at once,hee had ouercome them and put them to flight before that the horſmen could arme themſelues and mount their horſes, which were for moſt part vnſadled and vnbridled at his comming. The king, who had nothing either feared or foreſeen this ſo ſudden a miſchiefe, but had vainly perſuaded himſelfe, That the very fame of his comming with ſo huge an army, would ſo terrifie his enemies, as that he ſhould find none either at Tauris, or in all Armenia, that durſt make reſiſtance; was glad now to run to and fro to encourage his ſouldiers, to ſtay his diſcomfited battels, yea and to come to handie blowes himſelfe. But when neither his captains nor ſouldiers could put in execution his ſudden directions which he was inforced to giue in that imminent danger, being at once ouercome with ſhame and deſperation, he reſolutely thruſt himſelfe into the head of his battell, and there valiantly fighting was ſlain. Whereupon the Perſian horſemen, the greateſt ſtrength of the Kings armie, hauing now no king for whom they ſhould fight, betooke themſelues to flight, after whom followed the archers, and all the reſt of the kings armie.

When as Hyſmael had with leſſe loſſe than a man would haue thought ſo great a victorie could haue bin atchieued, poſſeſſed the enemies tents, he made no great purſuit after them, for that he thought it more requiſit to refreſh his ſouldiers throughly wearied and almoſt ſpent with long trauell and late fight: wherefore for certaine dayes he repoſed himſelfe with his armie in thoſe his enemies forſaken tents. Afterwards, when he had receiued Embaſſadours from diuers places, yeelding their cities and towns, and that the fauor of the people generally inclined to him, together with the victorie; he marched with his armie to Scyras; where hee was of the citizens who had before heard of the victorie ioyfully receiued, & his army relieued with all things he could deſire. Hyſmael there entertained with the greateſt honours that the fearfull citizens could poſſibly attribute to him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth and excellencie of his fathers doctrine, and withall gaue out ſtrait proclamations, That he would account all them for his enemies, which did not within the ſpace of thirtie daies renounce their old ſuperſtition, and receiue this new found veritie (as he would haue it.) Wherfore, foraſmuch as on the one ſide were propoſed moſt certain rewards, by the happy courſe of his victories, & on the other, was threatned exile and torture to ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſiſt in their opinion; in ſhort time he drew all the vulgar people to embrace his new doctrine. And afterwards hauing paied his ſouldiers with the riches of that great citie, he gallantly furniſhed both his old and new ſouldiers that wanted armor, with moſt excellent armor and furniture: for in that citie, one of the greateſt and moſt famous of the Eaſt, were many ſhops full of all kind of armor, which the armourers with wonderfull cunning vſed to make of yron and ſteele & in the juice of certain hearbs, of much more notable temper & beautie than are theſe which are made with vs in Europe; not only head-peeces, curiaſſes, and complete armors, but whole capariſons for horſes, curiouſly made of thin plates of yron and ſteele. Departing from Scyras, he tooke alſo the great citie of Sapha ſuppoſed to haue beene the citie in antient time called Suſa, and Sultania, which for the wonderfull ruines of the huge buildings, is deemed to haue bin the antient and famous citie Tigranocerta. Theſe great matters quickely diſpatched, and hauing in euery citie placed Gouernours of his owne ſect, he paſſed ouer the riuer Tygris into Meſopotamia, of purpoſe to expulſe Moratchamus the late kings brother, out of Babylon, who was yet in armes, and had intended (as is before ſaid) to haue paſſed into Armenia, to haue ioyned his forces with the king his brother: but now terrified with his brothers calamitie (who together with a moſt puiſſant armie, and the ſtrength of the Perſian kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of ſo great a fortune) thought it not beſt to trie his fortune in the field againſt ſo fortunat an enemie, but forthwith to withdraw himſelfe into the remoteſt places of that large kingdome, and from thence to expect ſome better fortune. For he wel knew that he was not able to withſtand his victorious enemie, now leading after him a moſt puiſſant army, who not long before had with a ſmal power vanquiſhed & ſlain his brother in a great battel. Hyſmael now by the greatnes of his fame and forces, & as it were by the fauor of God himſelf, become a terror to all the princes of the Eaſt, entred into Meſopotamia after the flight of Moratchamus, & receiued all that great prouince into his ſubiection, euery man as it were ſtriuing who ſhould firſt by his ſpeedy ſubmiſſion purchaſe the fauour of the victorious conqueror. To be briefe, Moratchamus already terrified, & repoſing no great hope in himſelf, or his own power, neither deeming it for his ſafetie to ſhut vp himſelf within the wals of any ſtrong city, truſt vp his things of greateſt price, & with his wiues & children fled into Arabia.

This Moratchamus is he whom ſome Hiſtoriographers called Mara Beg, and is in the Turks Hiſtories called Imirſa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Baiazet, and recouering part of the Perſian kingdome, was ſuddenly murthered by ſome of his Nobilitie, whom he purpoſed ſecretly to haue put to death, if they had not preuented the ſame by murthering of him firſt. Hyſmael hauing victoriouſly ſubdued a great part of the Perſian kingdome, & filled all the Eaſt part of the world with the glorie of his name, returned out of Aſſyria into Media, & tooke in ſuch cities and ſtrong holds as were yet holden by the garriſons of the late Perſian king. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made wars vpon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell vpon the borders of the Caſpian: for that thoſe nations, in antient times tributaries vnto the Perſian Kings, taking the benefit of the long ciuile wars wherewith the kingdome of Perſia, and all the Eaſt countries, with the ruin of the kings houſe, had been of late turmoyled; had neither payed any tribute by the ſpace of foure yeres, nor ſent any honourable embaſſage, as they were woont, and as was expected, eſpecially in ſo great a victorie and alteration of the State.

Hyſmael hauing thus obtained the Perſian kingdome, in ſhort time became famous through the world, and was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be ſpoken of, than the innouation he had made in the Mahometane ſuperſtition: for by his deuice and commandement a new forme of prayer was brought into their Mahometane Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before vſed. By reaſon whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Oſman, the ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and onely ſucceſſor of their great Prophet. And becauſe he would haue his ſubjects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they ſhould all weare ſome red hatband, lace, or riband vpon their heads; which they religiouſly obſerue in Perſia vntil this day: whereof they are of the Turks called Cuſelba's, or Red heads. And in ſhort time he had ſo vſed the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his ſubjects; inſomuch that his ſayings were accounted for diuine Oracles, and his commandements for Laws: ſo that when they would confirme any thing by ſolemne oath, they would ſweare by the head of Hyſmael the King: and when they wiſhed well to any man, they vſually ſayd, Hyſmael grant thee thy deſire. Vpon his coyne which he made both of ſiluer and gold, on the one ſide was written theſe words, La illahe illalahu Muhame dun reſul allahe: which is to ſay, There are no gods but one, and Mahomet is his Meſſenger. And on the other ſide, Iſmaill halife lullahe; which is to ſay, Hyſmael the Vicar of God.

Whileſt Hyſmael was thus wreſtling for the Perſian Kingdome, Chaſan Chelife and Techellis (whom we haue a little before declared to haue bin brought out of the mountains and deſarts, into the countrey villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to haue filled the countries of Armenia and a great part of the leſſer Aſia with the noueltie of their new doctrine and opinions, firſt phantaſied by one Giunet Siech, and afterward reuiued by Haider Erdebil, Hyſmael his father) hauing gathred a great armie of ſuch as had receiued their doctrine, inuaded the Turks dominion. For after that Techellis (this cold Prophet) had with wonderful felicitie in the preſence of many prognoſticated of things to come; and Hyſmael the Sophi (of late a poore exiled and baniſhed man) was thought to haue grown vnto the higheſt type of worldly honors, not by mans helpe, but by vprightneſſe of life, and the fortunat paſſage of an vndoubted religion: ſuch a deſire of receiuing that new ſuperſtition poſſeſſed the minds of the people in generall, that the cities and townes thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profeſſion had taken vpon them the wearing of the red hat, the knowne Cogniſance of the Cuſelba's. Firſt they met together at the citie of Taſcia, at the foot of the mountaine Antitaurus, or as the Turkiſh hiſtorie reports, at the citie of Attalia, to the number of 10000, vpon a great Faire day; where they layd hands vpon the chiefe Magiſtrate of the citie, and executed him, ſetting his quarters vpon foure of the higheſt towers of the citie: and further perſuaded by theſe new maſters of this new ſuperſtition, to take vp armes in defence of themſelues and of their ſincere religion (as they termed it) in caſe that any violence ſhould be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all ſwore, neuer to forſake their Captaines for any diſtreſſe, or yet refuſe any labour or aduenture for the honor of their moſt holy religion (as they would haue it) in defence whereof they had alreadie vowed their ſoules and bodies. Theſe ringleaders of rebellion, ſeeing the minds of their frantick followers ſo wel prepared for their purpoſe, and repoſing a great confidence in their valour and reſolution; and withall conſidering that the mony which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the country people, partly for deuotion, partly for feare, was not ſufficient to maintain ſo great a multitude, gaue leaue by publike proclamation to their vnruly followers, to forrage the country round about them, & to liue vpon the ſpoile of them which would not receiue their new found doctrine. Wherupon they diuiding themſelues into diuers companies, and ranging vp and down the country, brought into the campe abundance of cattell, and other ſuch things as the countrey yeelded: and forthwith (their multitude ſtill increaſing) they entred into Lycaonia, a populous & fruitfull countrey, where they refreſhed themſelues many days, roaming vp and down to the great grieuance and terrour of the people; and brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in open dorps and villages, were glad to flie with their wiues, children, and goods, into the ſtrong citie of Iconium: for proclamations were in many places ſet vp in the names of Chaſan Chelife and Techellis, wherein many both ſpiritual and temporal bleſſings were in moſt ample manner propoſed to al ſuch as ſhould forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new doctrine alreadie eſtabliſhed in Perſia: but vnto ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſeuer in their old ſuperſtition, after they had once drawn their ſword, was threatned vtter deſtruction without hope of pardon of life. So that all the inhabitants therabouts, terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, ſome for feare of death, ſome vpon inconſtancie, ſome for ſafegard of their goods and poſſeſſions (dearer vnto them than any religion) ſome other indebted, infamous, in danger of law, beſide many fugitiue ſeruants, dayly reſorted to theſe new maſters. Not long after, whilſt the Turks were making preparation for the ſuppreſſing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horſemen ſent from Hyſmael, came in good time to theſe new prophets: for Hyſmael in fauour and furtherance of that new ſuperſtition, had a little before by fit meſſengers exhorted them to proceed couragiouſly in their ſo religious an enterpriſe, and to joine martiall force vnto the religion they profeſſed: promiſing further, not to be wanting vnto them at their need, but to ſend them skilfull Leaders, and from time to time to furniſh them with coyne for the maintenance of that war. All this Hyſmael did openly in deſpight of Baiazet, of ſmall beginnings to ſow the ſeed of greater war. For he bearing an old grudge againſt Baiazet for the former wars betwixt the Turks & the Perſians, as alſo for their diſagreement in matters concerning their ſuperſtition, and prickt forward with the heat of youth, deſired nothing more in the greatneſſe of his power, and proſperous ſucceſſe of his affaires, than to haue occaſion to make war with the Turkiſh king: for which purpoſe he ſent his Embaſſadors vnto the State of Venice, to joine with them in league and amitie, in ſuch forme and ſort as they had long time before, by Catarinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Embaſſadors, concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian king his grandfather. The chiefe things that he requeſted of the Venetians, was, That they would ſend him out of Italie by the way of Syria, men skilfull in the caſting of great ordnance, and with their fleet to trouble Baiazet by ſea: promiſing in the meane time himſelfe to fill Aſia the leſſe with his army by land, and ſo to giue a faire occaſion vnto them, to recouer by ſea all ſuch places as they had before in the late wars loſt vnto the Turks vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus and Grecia.

Hyſmael ſends embaſſadors vnto the Venetians, to ioyne in league with the against Baiazet

The Venetians hauing with all courteſie entertained the Embaſſadours, gaue them anſwer, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the antient league and amitie they had made with the Perſian king; the remembrance whereof was vnto their State a thing moſt pleaſant: and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new king was an enemie vnto the Turke, and had them in ſuch regard, as to participat to them the cauſes of that war: and further to promiſe vnto them thoſe things, which if his grandfather Vſun-Caſſanes, or his vncle Iacup would haue performed, he ſhould not now haue had need to make wars with the Turkiſh Emperor. But ſuch was the alteration of things & times, that as the Perſian kings then liuing at home in peace, thought it not good to ſtir whileſt Baiazet was buſie in Europe; ſo now their State ſtanding in far worſe condition and fortune, could not performe that which they heartily wiſhed, and moſt of all deſired; for that they thought it not good to break the league which they had not long before made with Baiazet the Turkiſh emperor: eſpecially then, when ſundrie warlike nations of Europe conſpiring together, and diuers mightie kings prouoked with no iniurie, but only enuying at their happie eſtate, made wars vpon them; yet neuertheleſſe were in good hope, that God would ſtand in their iuſt defence, and ſtill preſerue their ſtate, which no enemies power had for the ſpace of 700 yeares and more been able to ouercome. Wherefore they ſhould ſhew vnto their King, that they would as occaſion ſhould ſerue, and as it ſhould ſtand with the good of their State, do their vttermoſt deuoire to make him vnderſtand, that nothing was deerer vnto them than the friendſhip of ſo great a King: nor any thing more honorable, than by mutuall counſell and combined forces to aſſaile the Turke their common enemie.

Shortly after, the Embaſſadors (hauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their gallies to Cyprus, and ſo from thence to Syria, where they had ſecret conference with Petrus Zenus (the ſon of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his embaſſage vnto Vſun-Caſſanes into Perſia) gouernour of the Venetian Merchants at Damaſco. Which thing Baiazet hauing intelligence of, and of the paſſage of the Perſian Embaſſadors that way, complained grieuouſly both by his Embaſſadors and letters vnto Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, That he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him, in ſuffering theſe Embaſſadors ſo to paſſe throughout the middeſt of Syria, vnto the Chriſtians their common enemies, to ſtirre them vp to war. Whereupon all the Venetian Merchants which were at Tripolis, Aleppo, Damaſco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and eſpecially Zenus himſelfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan, and carried in bonds to Caire, where they were many times inforced in chaines to anſwer vnto ſuch things as were layd to their charge, and after they had by the ſpace of a yeare endured the manifold deſpights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to eſcape with life and libertie.

The two ſeditious Prophets, Chaſan and Techellis, well ſtrengthned with the ayd of the Perſians, were now come vnto Iconium the moſt famous citie of Lycaonia; and waſting all the countrey before them, drew a great multitude of people to receiue their new doctrine. For the repreſſing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahomethes, two of Baiazet his nephews (who in ſtead of their fathers Alem Schach and Tζian Schach, the ſons of Baiazet before dead, gouerned thoſe countries) gathered togither their forces, and diſdaining to ſuffer ſuch diſgrace by ſuch a rabble of raſcal people, in the ſight of ſo famous a city, came into the field to giue them battell. But they in their youthfull heat making too much haſt, and joyning battell in a place of diſaduantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would theſe ringleaders in that victorie haue forborne to haue aſſailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillerie and engines of war requiſit for the beſieging of cities.

Corcutus alſo, one of the ſonnes of Baiazet, hauing at the ſame time leuied a conuenient Armie about Thiatyra, Sypilus, Magneſia and Phocea, durſt not further ſtir or ſet forward againſt the rebels, although they lay diſperſed about the countrey faſt by him. Theſe new prophets with enſignes diſplaied, marching from countrey to countrey through the heart of the leſſer Aſia, entered at length into Bythinia, where neere vnto the riuer Sangarius they met with Caragoſes Baſſa the Viceroy of Aſia, comming againſt them with a great armie well appointed, which he had a little before raiſed vpon the bruit of the comming of theſe rebels; and had alſo commanded Achometes (whome the Turks call Achmetes) the eldeſt ſon of Baiazet then liuing, gouernor of the great countries of Capadocia and Pontus, to raiſe his power, and to follow at the backe of the rebels: who if they ſhould hap to be put to the worſe, would neither be able to retyre, neither to keepe the field, being ſo ſhut vp betwixt two ſo great armies. But Techellis by his ſpeedie comming fruſtrated theſe deſignes of the Viceroy; for marching with all ſpeed, he was vpon Caragoſes before he was well aware of his comming, neere vnto the mountaine Hormynus, as he was then taking vp of more ſoldiers, and daily expected the comming of others, as if he had been going againſt ſome puiſſant enemie. The Viceroy ſeeing the Rebels approch, although he had before not purpoſed to haue encountered them before he had raiſed far greater forces; thought it not now to ſtand with his honor, to refuſe to giue them battell, although his armie for moſt part conſiſted of the rude countrey peiſants, taken vp vpon the ſudden out of Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bythinia, raw ſouldiers, and for moſt part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in thoſe countries are preſſed againſt their wills out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turks called Aſapi, who of the Ianizaries are ſcarcely accounted for men. But his greateſt confidence he repoſed in the approoued valour of his antient horſemen,by whoſe means he doubted not,in ſafetie to retyre out of the battel, G and to ſaue himſelfe if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than wel; making no great account of the common ſouldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other ſide (their greateſt force conſiſting of footmen) had no hope to ſaue themſelues by flight,but only by plain valour and dint of ſword. Which Techellis wel conſidering, exhorted his ſoldiers to remember into what countrey they were come,and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie vnto, if they ſhould not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs couragiouſly (ſaid he) ſet forward againſt our enemies, and by victorie defend our liues, together with the truth of our religion, for which we haue vowed both our ſoules and bodies. He had ſcarcely ſayd thus much, but that his whole Armie,in token of cherefulnes,gaue a moſt terrible ſhout, and without further ſtay ſet vpon their H enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horſemen in the wings,thereby to haue compaſſed in his enemies: but Techellis had ſet all his footmen in one great ſquare battell, and his Perſian horſemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freſh-water ſouldiers could ſcarcely abide the ſight of Techellis his armie; for in the front of the battell ſtood ſouldiers throughly armed, and all the reſt of his armie with red hats vpon their heads,as if they had bin imbrued with bloud,which wonderfully terrified the Baſſa's cowardly and vnskilfull ſouldiers: ſo that hauing endured the fight ſcarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkiſh horſemen which had valiantly aſſailed the rebels armie on both ſides, although they had ſlaine many with their arrowes and lances, and ſomewhat diſordred the battell,for that the footmen were inforced to leaue their places, and I to preſſe ſtill on forward againſt them; yet when Techellis his ſoldiers (hauing ouercome the footmen, and diuiding themſelues into diuers ſquadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horſes, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewiſe betooke themſelues to flight alſo. Then the Perſian horſemen (which all this while had ſtood ſtill as lookers on) left their ſtandings,and following the chaſe ſlew many of the Turks in their diſordred flight: and following faſt on,incloſed the Viceroy as he was ſtaying of his horſmen,and could not for the thickneſſe of the duſt well diſcerne his enemies; ſo that he had bin there taken, if he had not been ſpeedily reſcued by his guard,and ſo deliuered from that danger. The reſt of the Turks horſmen ſaued themſelues by flight.In this battel ſeuen thouſand of the Turks footmen were ſlain, and all their enſignes taken,with great ſtore of prouiſion. K

After which victorie, Chaſan and Techellis reſting their armie one day, marched to the citie of Cutaie,neere vnto the mountain Horminius: this citie is ſcituated as it were in the midſt of Aſia the leſſe,and is the ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors Viceroy in Aſia; as Sophia in Mœſia is for his other Viceroy in Europe: for it was reported,that the country people had for feare of the preſent war conueyed thither the greateſt part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himſelfe with his chiefe horſemen were fled thither alſo: neither doubted they,but that all the army might be greatly inriched by the wealth of that citie,if they ſhould without delay imploy their whole forces for the gaining thereof, their enemies now altogether diſcouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis alſo deeming that enterpriſe of ſo much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces,comming before the city,placed ſuch field pieces L as he had before taken in the battel,& his archers in ſuch fit places as might moſt anoy the defendants: afterward he cauſed ſcaling ladders to be ſet vp, and proclamation made thorow all his camp,That the whole ſpoile of the citie ſhould be the ſoldiers if they could take it; with promiſe of greater rewards to them that ſhould firſt recouer the top of the wals. Filled with this hope,the rebellious multitude approched the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of ſhot,or danger of death;ſtriuing who ſhould firſt mount the ladders,& ſome climbing one in the necke of another,ſo to get vp by the ruins of the wal. The defendants in the meane time from aboue caſting down vpon them great ſtones, timber,fire,ſcalding water,lime,ſand, and ſuch like without meaſure: wherewith although many were ouerthrowne and cruſht to death or ſpoiled,yet others preſently ſtept vp in their place; neither was any of them ſeen,for M feare of the preſent danger to ſhrinke back or be diſcouraged: for the Viceroy on the one ſide, and Techellis on the other, were both eye-witneſſes of euery mans valour in that hot ſeruice: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope,for feare to be enforced to giue ouer the aſſault ſo begun; and the other with the due regard of his honor,life,and ſtate,all ſubiect to that danger, A ger, and therefore in perſon himſelfe performed all the parts of a worthie chiefetain and couragious ſouldier. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce aſſault of the enemie, and for moſt part wounded, Techellis continually ſending in freſh men, and withdrawing ſuch as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the citie in two places ouer the heapes of the dead bodies: and hauing repulſed the defendants, burſt open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole armie. Then began a miſerable ſlaughter of the ſoldiers and poore citiſens in euery houſe and corner of the citie. At which inſtant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retyred himſelfe with his familie) was alſo taken: the Viceroy himſelfe with his wiues and children were there alſo taken priſoners, and the ſtately Palace built with marble, in a trice conſumed with fire.

B The rich citie of Cutaie, the ſeat of the great commander of the Turkiſh Empire in Aſia, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole army both beautified and inriched with the ſpoile thereof; he perſuaded himſelfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the citie of Pruſa alſo, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in Bythinia, and ſo to endanger the whole ſtate of the Turks Empire in Aſia, if he ſhould now without delay carrie the terrour of himſelfe thither, before the Turks could in that countrey make head againſt him, or the citiſens be able in ſo ſudden a feare to make any ſufficient prouiſion for the defence of themſelues and their citie; and ſo in the courſe of his good fortune to vſe the courage and cherefulneſſe of his ſouldiers. Wherefore appointing a day when he would ſet forward, he commanded all things neceſſary to be made readie for the taking of that rich citie, being neither ſtrongly walled, neither fur- C niſhed with any good garriſon for the defence thereof.

But whileſt he was making this preparation, a new armie, lately ſhipt ouer the Helleſpont from Callipolis into Aſia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Baiazet awaked at the name of Techellis, & the fame of the new ſuperſtition now generally receiued in Perſia, had long before giuen commandement to his ſonnes, nephewes, and the Viceroy of Aſia, That they ſhould with all carefulnes prouide, that that part of his kingdome tooke no harme thereby. But after he ſaw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and backt alſo with the Perſian King, and al his dominions in Aſia in danger of ſome great alteration; he ſent Alis Baſſa with his Europeian armie. This Alis an Eunuch, borne in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greateſt captaines) had for his many and worthie deſerts, in the D time of the great Emperour Mahomet, Baiazet his father, got vnto himſelfe both the honour and name of a moſt famous Chiefetaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horſemen of Epirus, Macedonia, Seruia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joyning vnto them ſeuen thouſand Ianizaries (the moſt aſſured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) paſſed ouer from Callipolis into Phrygia, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Achomates and Corcutus, Baiazet his ſonnes, and to all the other Sanzacks and Gouernors of the Turks prouinces in Aſia, That they ſhould with as much ſpeed as they could, raiſe their forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis aduertiſed of his comming, thought it beſt for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to ſome place of more ſafetie, leſt by longer ſtaying he ſhould be incloſed by his enemies, re- E pairing thitherwards on euery ſide; or elſe vpon ſome great diſaduantage to joyne battell: for he ſaw, that if he ſtayed neuer ſo little, he ſhould finde no ſafe paſſage or place of refuge to retyre vnto, hauing left ſuch large and ſpacious Countries, ſo many enemies Cities, ſo many great riuers, ſo many diſcontented people behind him; all which the firſt fauor of the vulgar ſort, and ſpeedie courſe of his victorie, had a little before layd open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his Captaines and moſt expert men of war to conſult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madneſſe, or elſe of extreame neceſſitie, with ſo ſmall a power of vnskilfull ſouldiers, without any ſufficient ſtrength of horſemen, to joyne battell with ſuch an enemie as better knew the countrey than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertneſſe of his ſouldiers. Wherefore Techellis truſſing vp his rich prey he F had before gotten, began now with ſpeed to retyre backe againe with his followers through Galatia. But the Baſſa hauing intelligence almoſt euery houre by letters and eſpials, both of the retyring of Techellis, and the way he held, paſſed ouer the riuer Sangarius, and coaſting the countrey, came and incamped betwixt the cities of Cutaie and Ancyra, which way it was ſuppoſed the enemie would paſſe. Where when he had there a while reſted his wearied ſouldiers, and was certainly aduertiſed, that the rebels had taken another way, he ſet forward againe, and of his antient horſemen,by whoſe means he doubted not,in ſafetie to retyre out of the battel, and to ſaue himſelfe if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than wel; making no great account of the common ſouldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other ſide (their greateſt force conſiſting of footmen) had no hope to ſaue themſelues by flight,but only by plain valour and dint of ſword. Which Techellis wel conſidering, exhorted his ſoldiers to remember into what countrey they were come,and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie vnto, if they ſhould not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs couragiouſly (ſaid he) ſet forward againſt our enemies, and by victorie defend our liues, together with the truth of our religion, for which we haue vowed both our ſoules and bodies. He had ſcarcely ſayd thus much, but that his whole Armie,in token of cherefulnes,gaue a moſt terrible ſhout, and without further ſtay ſet vpon their enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horſemen in the wings,thereby to haue compaſſed in his enemies: but Techellis had ſet all his footmen in one great ſquare battell, and his Perſian horſemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freſh-water ſouldiers could ſcarcely abide the ſight of Techellis his armie; for in the front of the battell ſtood ſouldiers throughly armed, and all the reſt of his armie with red hats vpon their heads,as if they had bin imbrued with bloud,which wonderfully terrified the Baſſa's cowardly and vnskilfull ſouldiers: ſo that hauing endured the fight ſcarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkiſh horſemen which had valiantly aſſailed the rebels armie on both ſides, although they had ſlaine many with their arrowes and lances, and ſomewhat diſordred the battell,for that the footmen were inforced to leaue their places, and to preſſe ſtill on forward againſt them, yet when Techellis his ſoldiers (hauing ouercome the footmen, and diuiding themſelues into diuers ſquadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horſes, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewiſe betooke themſelues to flight alſo. Then the Perſian horſemen (which all this while had ſtood ſtill as lookers on) left their ſtandings,and following the chaſe ſlew many of the Turks in their diſordred flight: and following faſt on,incloſed the Viceroy as he was ſtaying of his horſmen,and could not for the thickneſſe of the duſt well diſcerne his enemies; ſo that he had bin there taken, if he had not been ſpeedily reſcued by his guard,and ſo deliuered from that danger. The reſt of the Turks horſmen ſaued themſelues by flight.In this battel ſeuen thouſand of the Turks footmen were ſlain, and all their enſignes taken,with great ſtore of prouiſion.

After which victorie, Chaſan and Techellis reſting their armie one day, marched to the citie of Cutaie,neere vnto the mountain Horminius: this citie is ſcituated as it were in the midſt of Aſia the leſſe,and is the ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors Viceroy in Aſia; as Sophia in Mœſia is for his other Viceroy in Europe: for it was reported,that the country people had for feare of the preſent war conueyed thither the greateſt part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himſelfe with his chiefe horſemen were fled thither alſo: neither doubted they,but that all the army might be greatly inriched by the wealth of that citie,if they ſhould without delay imploy their whole forces for the gaining thereof, their enemies now altogether diſcouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis alſo deeming that enterpriſe of ſo much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces,comming before the city,placed ſuch field pieces as he had before taken in the battel,& his archers in ſuch fit places as might moſt anoy the defendants: afterward he cauſed ſcaling ladders to be ſet vp, and proclamation made thorow all his camp,That the whole ſpoile of the citie ſhould be the ſoldiers if they could take it; with promiſe of greater rewards to them that ſhould firſt recouer the top of the wals. Filled with this hope,the rebellious multitude approched the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of ſhot,or danger of death;ſtriuing who ſhould firſt mount the ladders,& ſome climbing one in the necke of another,ſo to get vp by the ruins of the wal. The defendants in the meane time from aboue caſting down vpon them great ſtones, timber,fire,ſcalding water,lime,ſand, and ſuch like without meaſure: wherewith although many were ouerthrowne and cruſht to death or ſpoiled,yet others preſently ſtept vp in their place; neither was any of them ſeen,for feare of the preſent danger to ſhrinke back or be diſcouraged: for the Viceroy on the one ſide, and Techellis on the other, were both eye-witneſſes of euery mans valour in that hot ſeruice: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope,for feare to be enforced to giue ouer the aſſault ſo begun; and the other with the due regard of his honor,life,and ſtate,all ſubiect to that danger, A ger, and therefore in perſon himſelfe performed all the parts of a worthie chiefetain and couragious ſouldier. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce aſſault of the enemie, and for moſt part wounded, Techellis continually ſending in freſh men, and withdrawing ſuch as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the citie in two places ouer the heapes of the dead bodies: and hauing repulſed the defendants, burſt open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole armie. Then began a miſerable ſlaughter of the ſoldiers and poore citiſens in euery houſe and corner of the citie. At which inſtant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retyred himſelfe with his familie) was alſo taken: the Viceroy himſelfe with his wiues and children were there alſo taken priſoners, and the ſtately Palace built with marble, in a trice conſumed with fire.

B The rich citie of Cutaie, the ſeat of the great commander of the Turkiſh Empire in Aſia, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole army both beautified and inriched with the ſpoile thereof; he perſuaded himſelfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the citie of Pruſa alſo, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in Bythinia, and ſo to endanger the whole ſtate of the Turks Empire in Aſia, if he ſhould now without delay carrie the terrour of himſelfe thither, before the Turks could in that countrey make head againſt him, or the citiſens be able in ſo ſudden a feare to make any ſufficient prouiſion for the defence of themſelues and their citie; and ſo in the courſe of his good fortune to vſe the courage and cherefulneſſe of his ſouldiers. Where fore appointing a day when he would ſet forward, he commanded all things neceſſary to be made readie for the taking of that rich citie, being neither ſtrongly walled, neither C furniſhed with any good garriſon for the defence thereof.

But whileſt he was making this preparation, a new armie, lately ſhipt ouer the Helleſpont from Callipolis into Aſia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Baiazet awaked at the name of Techellis, & the fame af the new ſuperſtition now generally receiued in Perſia, had long before giuen commandement to his ſonnes, nephewes, and the Viceroy of Aſia, That they ſhould with all carefulnes prouide, that that part of his kingdome tooke no harme thereby. But after he ſaw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and backt alſo with the Perſian King, and al his dominions in Aſia in danger of ſome great alteration, he ſent Alis Baſſa with his Europeian armie. This Alis an Eunuch, borne in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greateſt captaines) had for his many and worthie deſerts, in the D time of the great Emperour Mahomet, Baiazet his father, got vnto himſelfe both the honour and name of a moſt famous Chiefetaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horſemen of Epirus, Macedonia, Seruia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joyning vnto them ſeuen thouſand Ianizaries (the moſt aſſured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) paſſed ouer from Callipolis into Phrygia, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Achomates and Corcutus, Baiazet his ſonnes, and to all the other Sanzacks and Gouernors of the Turks prouinces in Aſia, That they ſhould with as much ſpeed as they could, raiſe their forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis aduertiſed of his comming, thought it beſt for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to ſome place of more ſafetie, leſt by longer ſtaying he ſhould be incloſed by his enemies, E repairing thitherwards on euery ſide; or elſe vpon ſome great diſaduantage to joyne battell: for he ſaw, that if he ſtayed neuer ſo little, he ſhould finde no ſafe paſſage or place of refuge to retyre vnto, hauing left ſuch large and ſpacious Countries, ſo many enemies Cities, ſo many great riuers, ſo many diſcontented people behind him; all which the firſt fauor of the vulgar ſort, and ſpeedie courſe of his victorie, had a little before layd open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his Captaines and moſt expert men of war to conſult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madneſſe, or elſe of extreame neceſſitie, with ſo ſmall a power of vnskilfull ſouldiers, without any ſufficient ſtrength of horſemen, to joyne battell with ſuch an enemie as better knew the countrey than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertneſſe of his ſouldiers. Wherefore Techellis truſſing vp his rich prey he F had before gotten, began now with ſpeed to retyre backe againe with his followers through Galatia. But the Baſſa hauing intelligence almoſt euery houre by letters and eſpials, both of the retyring of Techellis, and the way he held, paſſed ouer the riuer Sangarius, and coaſting the countrey, came and incamped betwixt the cities of Cutaie and Ancyra, which way it was ſuppoſed the enemie would paſſe. Where when he had there a while reſted his wearied ſouldiers, and was certainly aduertiſed, that the rebels had taken another way, he ſet forward againe, and

and after fiue dayes march in the plaines of Galatia, ouertooke the ſtraglers of the enemies, who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the armie: all whome the Baſſa commanded to be cruelly put to the ſword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Baſſa, or at leaſtwiſe with a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſtay his purſuit, cauſed Carageſes the viceroy, whom he had carried along with him in chains, to be cruelly impaled by the highway ſide, vpon a ſharp ſtake ſet faſt in the ground, and ſo left him ſticking for the Turks to wonder at. But Alis Baſſa nothing diſmaied with the horrible death of ſo great a perſonage, held on his way with more haſt than good ſpeed, exhorting his ſoldiers patiently to endure the painfulneſſe of the long march, and to ſtraine themſelues to take reuenge of thoſe rebellious theeues and robbers, who deſtroying the countrey before them, ſpared not ſo much as the Turks children, and the temples of their religion; and ſo the day following came into the plaines of Ancyra. The ſame day alſo Achomates came vnto the Baſſa with ten thouſand ſouldiers. Alis Baſſa perceiuing that he could not poſſibly with his whole armie ouertake his enemies, marching with greater ſpeed before him, and grieued at the heart to ſee them eſcape out of his hand, reſolued to prooue if he could with his horſemen ouertake them: whereupon leauing his footmen with Achomates, he himſelfe with eight thouſand horſe following the enemie vpon the ſpur, ouertooke the rereward of their armie at the mountain Olyga, a little from the citie of Ancyra, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmiſh.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, vpon the riſing of the hil, although he ſaw his men faint with long trauell and the ſcortching heat of the Sun, yet quickly perceiuing that he ſhould haue to do only with horſemen, and that in a place of aduantage; turning his army, and orderly placing his ſoldiers, as the ground and the ſhortneſſe of the time would giue leaue, valiantly receiued the impreſſion of the Turks, and with their long pikes and arrowes at the firſt repulſed them: ſo that it ſeemed they would neither haue giuen ground vnto the bragging horſemen, neither haue done any thing not beſeeming their former victories, had not Alis Baſſa ſent 1000 Carbines, who in troupes orderly following one another, deliuered their ſhot as thicke as haile vpon the enemy: with which ſtorme many of them being ſlain, and moe wounded, their ranks began to be ſomewhat diſordred: whereupon the other horſemen breaking in, with great ſlaughter ouerthrew the vauntgard of Techellis battell; in which conflict Chaſan Chelife himſelfe was ſlain. Techellis always at hand where moſt need was, euen in the midſt of the ſlaughter of his men ſet in order a new battell of his moſt readie and beſt armed ſoldiers, the only remedie in ſo great a diſtreſſe; and bringing them on into the front of the battell, oppoſed them againſt the horſemen, now (as they thought) in poſſeſſion of the victorie; commanding them by little and little to retyre vnto the mountaine, to the intent that they might ſeeme to do that by commandment of the Generall, which they were like enough to haue done of themſelues for feare: hoping that it would ſo come to paſſe, That the Turkes finding the diſaduantage of the place, would leaue ſo hardly to aſſaile them. But the Baſſa encouraged with the firſt ſucceſſe of the battell, exhorted his ſoldiers to vrge the victorie, now almoſt as good as gotten, & not to giue the enemie ſpace to recouer the ſtrength of the mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little ſhort pains that day to end all that warre, to the honor of Baiazet their ſoueraigne, and worthie commendation of themſelues in generall. In this ſort encouraging them, he with a troupe of his beſt horſmen (to animate the reſt, and to ſhew his own valour) brake through the enemies battel: which thing he in the ſame heat, with more courage than diſcretion, attempting to perform the ſecond time, was incloſed by his enemies and ſlaine: vpon whoſe fall the fortune of the battell was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which erſt fought couragiouſly, hauing beaten backe and almoſt ouerthrown their enemies, now diſmaied with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, & by little and little to giue ground, and at laſt turning their horſes about, fled. On the other ſide Techellis his ſoldiers, who but a little before had repoſed greater hope in the ſtrength of the place and the mountain, than in their weapons and valour, now incouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thruſt forward, and with a moſt terrible noyſe crying victorie, put to flight the Turks horſemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the Generals raſhneſſe loſt a notable victorie almoſt alreadie gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemie could neither refreſh his horſes, nor yet with any aſſurance keepe the field, if he ſhould haue purſued him; yet hauing loſt many of his beſt ſoldiers, & the Chaſan Chelife ſlaine.

Alis Baſſa ſlain.

A reſt of his armie ſore weakened with trauell, faſting, and fighting, determined to refreſh his wearied followers vpon the mountain Olyga. From whence after a few daies he marched ouer the riuer Halys vnto the citie of Taſcia, his old dwelling place, and ſo to the citie of Celenis, which the riuer Marſya (much ſpoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of Maras, but as then the regall ſeat of the mountaine king Aladeules. The Turkes horſemen hauing thus in ſome ſmall ſort rather reuenged the iniuries done by the rebels, than obtained any victorie, returned to Achomates, who was then comming on with the footmen. Not long after, Baiazet vnderſtanding of the death of Alis Baſſa his Generall, ſent Ionuſes Baſſa, a warlike captaine, and of great experience (borne in Epirus) in his ſtead. Who as ſoone as he had receiued the charge of the armie from Achomates, marching forthwith into Cappadocia, and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine Antitaurus, came in few B daies vnto the citie of Taſcia, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and deſtroying the countrey all about, he came and encamped with his armie at the foot of the mountaine: The Baſſa had in his armie about fortie thouſand horſe and foot, well appointed, with many field pieces, and plentie of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare country. Techellis terrified with his comming, hauing of late receiued no aid from Hyſmael the Perſian king, and wanting alſo great artillerie, and beſides that ſeeing his ſoldiers greatly both diminiſhed and diſcouraged with the late battell at Olyga, determined not vpon ſo great diſaduantage to meet his enemie in the plain field, but to keepe the rough mountains and thicke woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe thoſe ſtrong places, he ſhould either C receiue ſome aid from Hyſmael, or by the heat of the Turks leaders take them at ſome notable aduantage. In the meane time many notable skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the ſouldiers on both ſides: for the Turks fetching a compaſſe oftentimes about the mountains, and ſeeking for the beſt paſſages, by the eaſie riſing of the hils, came to skirmiſh with their enemies: and Techellis his ſouldiers on the other ſide, ſallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountains, valiantly aſſailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this ſort, as if it had bin in diſport, rather proued their forces one vpon another, than done any great matter; the Turkes prying into euery corner, at length perceiued two waies whereby their whole armie with enſignes diſplayed might without any great difficultie bee brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and ſo into their enemies ſtrength. The Baſſa hauing well viewed and conſidered the places, cauſed the Ianizaries at one inſtant to march vp to the mountaine by one of the D aforeſaid waies, and the reſt of his armie by the other: who with ſoft pace climing vp the ſteepe mountaines, with their targuets defended themſelues as well as they could againſt their enemies darts and ſhot. For Techellis his ſouldiers hauing before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, caſt downe vpon the Turks great ſtones and ſhot without number, as if it had beene out of ſome ſtrong forts. But the Turks bending certaine ſmall field peeces againſt the places which moſt anoied them, eaſily draue them from their ſtandings; the harquebuſiers ſtill following their enſignes, ſhrouded cloſe vnder the targuetiers, and deliuered their deadly ſhot as ſhowers of raine vpon their enemies. Whoſe deſperat approch Techellis perceiuing, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and with all his armie retired farther off into the higher mountaines and rougher woods. E The night following, perceiuing that by the euill ſucceſſe of the former skirmiſh he had loſt a great part of his credit and ſtrength, he with great ſilence forſooke the woods, and paſſing quite ouer the mountains fled into Armenia, then part of the Perſian kingdome. Neither did the Turks perceiue their departure vntill it was light day, and that their ſcouts entring the thick woods, and finding the enemies baggage, with ſome wounded ſouldiers not able to flie, brought newes vnto the Baſſa of the enemies departure and of his ſpeedie flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, vnderſtood to be certainely true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not preſently vpon the enemies retreat beſet the wood round, he ſent his horſemen forthwith to purſue them: but all in vaine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne waies gone into Armenia. Some few ſtraglers F not able to make ſo much haſt as the reſt, were ouertaken by the Turkes horſemen, and brought backe to the Baſſa.

Techellis thus put to flight, Ionuſes cauſed ſtrait inquiſition to be made through all the cities of the leſſer Aſia, for all ſuch as had profeſſed the Perſian religion: and them whom he found to haue borne armes in the late rebellion, he cauſed to be put to death with moſt exquiſit torments, and the reſt to be burnt in their foreheads with an hoat yron, thereby for euer to bee G knowne; whom together with the kinsfolkes and friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he cauſed to be tranſported into Europe, and to be diſperſed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponeſus: for feare leſt if Techellis now fled into the Perſian Kingdome, ſhould from thence returne with new forces, they ſhould allſo againe repaire vnto him, and raiſe a new rebellion. This was the beginning, courſe, and ending, of one of the moſt dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkiſh empire: wherin all, or at leaſtwiſe the greateſt part of their dominions in Aſia, might haue beene eaſily ſurpriſed by the Perſian King, if hee would thorowly haue proſecuted the occaſion and oportunitie then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his followers, flying into Perſia, by the way lighting vpon a Carauan of merchants laden with ſilkes and other rich merchandiſe, tooke the ſpoile thereof: H for which outrage comming to Tauris, the captaines were all by the commandement of Hyſmael executed, and Techellis himſelfe to the terrour of others burnt aliue.

A great earthquake at Conſtantinople.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the fourteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible earthquake in the citie of Conſtantinople and the countries thereabouts: by the violence wherof, a great part of the wals of that imperiall citie, with many ſtately buildings both publike and priuat, were quite ouerthrowne, and thirteene thouſand people ouerwhelmed and ſlaine. The terrour whereof was ſo great, that the people generally forſooke their houſes and lay abroad in the fields: yea Baiazet himſelfe, then very aged and ſore troubled with the gout, for feare thereof remoued from Conſtantinople to Hadrianople; but finding himſelfe in no more ſafetie than before, he left the citie and lay abroad in the fields in his I tent. This earthquake indured by the ſpace of eighteene daies, or (as the Turkes Hiſtories report) of a moneth, with very little intermiſſion; which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miſerable calamities which ſhortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this earthquake enſued a great plague, wherewith the citie was grieuouſly viſited, and for the moſt part vnpeopled. But after that the earthquake was ceaſed, and the mortalitie aſſuaged, Baiazet cauſed the imperial citie to be with all ſpeed repaired, and to that purpoſe gaue out commiſſions into all parts of his dominions for the taking vp of workemen: ſo that there were at once in work eightie thouſand workmen, who in moſt beautifull manner in the ſpace of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great citie.

Baiazet had by his many wiues, eight ſonnes and ſix daughters, which liued to be men and K women growne; and the ſons all Gouernors in diuers prouinces of his large empire: whom the Turkiſh Hiſtories reckon vp in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, TZiban Scach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who long time liued in Baiazet his court, and (as he of himſelfe writeth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning vp the ſonnes of Baiazet, maketh mention but of theſe ſix, Sciemſcia, Alemſcia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names ſomething differing from the other. Sciemſcia the eldeſt, Gouernor of Caramania, for his towardlineſſe moſt deerely beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his ſubiects greatly lamented. Alemſcia died in like manner, of whoſe death as ſoone as he was aduertiſed, by mourning letters written in blake paper with white charactes (as their manner of wri- L ting is, in certifying of heauie news) he caſt from him his Scepter with all other tokens of honor, and cauſed general mourning to be made for him in the court, & through all the citie of Conſtantinople, by the ſpace of three daies; during which time all ſhops were ſhut vp, all trading forbidden, and no ſigne of mirth to be ſeene: and for a certaine ſpace, after the manner of their ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne ſacrifices to be made for the health of his ſoule, and 7000 aſpers to bee giuen weekely vnto the poore. His dead bodie was afterward with all princely pompe conueyed to Pruſa, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. TZihan Gouernour of Caria, and Mahomet Gouernor of Capha, vpon their fathers heauie diſpleaſure, were by his commandement both ſtrangled,

M Of his other foure ſons, Achmet, otherwiſe called Achomates, Machmut, or Mahometes, Corcut, or Corcutus, and Selymus: the ſecond (namely Mahometes) was of greateſt hope and expectation, not giuen to ſenſualitie or voluptuous pleaſure, as Achomates his eldeſt brother, neither altogether bookiſh as was Corcuthus, nor yet of ſo fierce and cruell a diſpoſition as Selymus: but of ſuch a liuely ſpirit, ſharp wit, bountifull diſpoſition, and princely carriage of himſelfe, A ſelfe, that in the iudgement of moſt men, he ſeemed already worthie of a kingdome. Which immoderat fauor of the people, cauſed his elder brother Achomates, yea and Baiazet alſo himſelfe, to haue him in no ſmall iealouſie, as if he had affected the empire; and was in ſhort time the cauſe of his vntimely death: which thing he nothing doubting, haſtned (as fatal things are) by ſuch meanes as he leaſt feared might haue procured any ſuch mortall diſtruſt or danger.

Moſt of Baiazet his children were by diuers women, yet Achomates and this Mahometes were by one and the ſame mother: for which cauſe, Mahometes tooke greater pleaſure in him than in any his other brethren, although it were anſwered with like loue againe. Achomates was Lord and Gouernor of Amaſia; and this Mahometes, of Magneſia; who deſirous to ſee the manner of his brothers life and gouernment, diſguiſed himſelfe with two of his familiar and faithfull friends, as if they had bin religious men, of that Order which the Turks call Imaliers.
B [Theſe men are for moſt part comely perſonages, born of good houſes, who in cleanly attire made after an homely faſhion, do at their pleaſure wander vp and down from towne to town, and countrey to country, noting the diſpoſition and manners of the people; wherof as fitteth beſt their purpoſe, they make large diſcourſes afterwards to others: they commonly carrie about with them ſiluer cymbals, wheron they play moſt cunningly, and therunto ſing pleaſant and wanton ditties: for which idle delight, they receiue mony of the people, as an alms giuen them of deuotion. Theſe are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether giuen to eaſe and pleaſure, and are of the Turks called, The religious brethren of Loue: but might of right, better be tearmed, Epicurus his hogs, than profeſſors of any religion at all.] Mahometes and his two conſorts, as men of this profeſſion, trauelled vp C and downe the countries of Pontus and Capadocia (where Achomates commanded) and ſo to the citie of Amaſia; receiuing for their merrie glee by the way as they went, the almes and deuotion of the fooliſh countrey people. And being at the length come to Amaſia vpon a ſolemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church: who paſſing by, ſtaid a while liſtening attentiuely vnto their pleaſant and alluring harmonie; which was for that purpoſe moſt curiouſly and skilfully before deuiſed, and by them both with their inſtruments and voices performed. When they had ended their muſicke, and according to the manner of their idle profeſſion expected his deuotion; Achomates being a man of a ſpare hand, commanded fiue aſpers to be giuen them in reward [which is about ſix pence of our mony.] Mahometes diſdaining his brothers baſe reward, as a ſigne of his miſerable diſpoſition, would in no D wiſe diſcouer himſelfe, as he had before determined; but taking horſe, returned with ſpeed to Magneſia: from whence he wrot taunting letters vnto his brother Achomates, ſcoffing at his good husbandrie (no praiſe to a prince) and in contempt ſent him backe againe his fiue aſpers; which thing Achomates tooke in ſo euil part, as that he was neuer afrerwards freinds with him. The report of this fact was in ſhort time diſperſed throughout all parts of the Turkiſh empire, diuers men diuerſly deeming of his purpoſe therein.

Not long after Mahometes had in this ſort plaid with his brother Achomates, he attired himſelfe with certaine of his truſtie followers as if they had been ſeafaring men, and with a ſmall barke came to Conſtantinople, and there landing as aduenturers from ſea, tooke diligent view E both of the imperiall citie, and of the citie of Pera ſtanding opoſit againſt it, curiouſly noting how all things were by his fathers appointment ordered and gouerned. It hapned whileſt he was thus ſtaying at Conſtantinople, that Baiazet had appointed a ſolemne aſſembly of all his chiefe Baſſaes at the court; which Mahometes was deſirous to haue the ſight of, as alſo of the faſhion of his fathers court: but as he with his companions preſſed to haue entred in at the court gate, they were by their baſe apparel taken of the porters to haue bin rude mariners, and ſo by them kept out. Wherefore conſulting what to do in that caſe, he went and preſently bought a moſt beautiful Chriſtian captiue boy, and the next day comming again to the court with two of his companions (as if they had been aduenturers at ſea) requeſted to be let in, for that they had brought a preſent for the Emperour. So finding meanes to be admitted to the preſence of F Baiazet, one of his conſorts (as if he had bin a ſea captain) boldly ſtept forth, & with due reuerence offered the preſent vnto the Emperor; which he thankfully tooke, and in token thereof gaue him his hand to kiſſe, and commanded a rich garment wrought with gold to be giuen vnto him, with two others of leſſe value vnto Mahometes and his fellow, ſuppoſed to be the ſaid captaines followers: who all this while ſtood a farre off, as if it had been for reuerence of the Emperour, but indeed for feare to be diſcouered. As theſe counterfeit gueſts were returning from the court in their garments of fauour, they hapned to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who diſmounting from their horſes, had done him honour and due reuerence, as to the ſonne of the great Emperor, had he not by ſecret ſignes forbidden them, as one vnwilling to be knowne. When he had thus ſeene his father, the court, and the imperial city, he went againe aboord, and ſo with ſpeed returned to Magneſia.

The report of this his doing, had in ſhort time filled both the citie and the court, and was at laſt brought to Baiazets eares: which raiſed in his ſuſpitious head many a troubleſom thought, greatly fearing, that in theſe ſlie practiſes lay hidden ſome ſecret and deſperate conſperacie, dangerous to himſelfe and his other children. Wherefore after long diſcourſe had with the three great Baſſaes then of his ſecret counſell, concerning the matter, to rid himſelfe of all feare, hee reſolued in any caſe to take him away. And therefore cauſed them in his name to write vnto Aſmehemedi, a gallant courtier, and alwaies neere vnto Mahometes, to poyſon him with a ſecret poiſon, for that purpoſe incloſed in thoſe letters ſent vnto him: with promiſe of great rewards and preferments for that his ſeruice, to be afterwards receiued from the Emperor: charging him withall, that if he could not effect the matter, he ſhould ſo conceale it, as that Mahometes ſhould haue no diſtruſt thereof; the leaſt ſuſpition whereof, would tend to his vtter deſtruction. This Aſmebemedi for ſomvnkindnes bare a ſecret grudge againſt Mahometes, which Baiazet knowing of, made choiſe of him the rather: and he on the other ſide, partly to perform the old tyrants command, and partly to reuenge his owne priuat wrong, vigilantly awaited all opportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Mahometes hauing diſported himſelfe in his gardens of pleaſure, and being thirſtie after his exerciſe, called for drinke: Aſmehemedi alwaies at hand, in a gilt boule fetcht him ſuch drinke as he deſired, whereinto he had ſecretly conueied the deadly poiſon ſent from Baiazet. Mahometes hauing drunke thereof, in ſhort time began to feele himſelfe euill at eaſe, and preſently ſent for his phyſitians: who thinking that he had but ſomething diſtempered himſelfe with drinking too much cold drink in his heat, perceiued not that he was poiſoned, vntil that within ſix daies after, he died. Of whoſe death Baiazet aduertiſed, could not abſtain from mourning, although he himſelfe had bin the onely author thereof: and the more to manifeſt his heauineſſe, commanded all the court to mourne with him, and praiers to be made in their temples after their ſuperſtitious maner, and almes to be giuen to the poore for the health of his ſoule. His dead bodie was afterwards carried to Pruſa, and there honourably buried with his anceſtors. Aſmehemedi the traitour in reward of his vnfaithfulneſſe towards his maſter, was by the commandement of Baiazet caſt into priſon, and neuer afterwards ſeene, being there (as it was thought) ſecretly made away.

Mahometes poiſoned by Aſmebemedi.

Aſmehemedi iuſtly rewarded for his treacherie.

Now had Baiazet but three ſonnes left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates Gouernour of Amaſia, was a man both politick and valiant: but much giuen to pleaſure and delight: him Baiazet and moſt part of the great men of the court fauoured aboue the reſt of his brethren, except ſuch as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his milde and quiet nature, was of moſt men beloued, but not thought ſo fit for the gouernment of ſo great an empire; eſpecially by the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court, for that he was (as they thought) altogether drowned iu the ſtudie of Phyloſophie, a thing nothing agreeing with their humor. Yet might Baiazet ſeeme to do him wrong, if he ſhould not according to his promiſe again reſtore him vnto the poſſeſſion of the empire, which he had almoſt thirtie yeares before receiued at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more hautie diſpoſition than to brook the life of a ſubiect vnder the command of either of his brethren, and altogether giuen to martiall affaires, ſought by infinit bountie, feigned courteſie, ſubtil policie, and by all other means good and bad, to aſpire vnto the empire. Him therefore the Ianizaries with all the great ſouldiers of the court, yea and ſome of the chiefe Baſſaes alſo (corrupted with gifts) wiſhed aboue the reſt, for their lord and ſoueraigne: deſiring rather to liue vnder him which was like to ſet all the world on a hurly burly (whereby they might increaſe their honor and wealth, the certain rewards of their adnentures than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they tearmed it) vnder a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whileſt men ſtood thus diuerſly affected towards theſe princes of ſo great hope, Baiazet now far worne with yeares, and ſo grieuouſly tormented with the gout that hee was not able to

A to helpe himſelfe: for the quietneſſe of his ſubiects and preuenting of ſuch troubles as might ariſe by the aſpiring of his children after his death, determined whileſt he yet liued (for the auoiding of theſe and other ſuch like miſchiefes) to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion in ſome one of his ſonnes; who wholly poſſeſſed of the kingdome, might eaſily repreſſe the pride of the other. And although he had ſet downe with himſelfe, that Achomates ſhould be the man, as wel in reſpect of his birth-right, as of the eſpeciall affection he bare vnto him; yet to diſcouer the diſpoſition of his ſubiects, and how they ſtood affected, it was giuen out in generall termes, That he meant before his death to make it knowne to the World, who ſhould ſucceed in the empire, without naming any one of his ſonnes; leauing that for euery man to diuine of, accor-ding as they were affected: which was not the leaſt cauſe, that euery one of his ſonnes with B like ambition began now to make ſmall account of their former preferments, as thinking onely vpon the Empire it ſelfe.

First of all Selymus, whom Baiazet had made Gouernor of the kingdom of Trapezond, rigging vp all the ſhips he could in Pontus, ſayled from Trapezond ouer the Euxine (now called the blacke ſea) to the citie of Capha, called in antient time Theodoſia, and from thence by land came to Mahometes king of the Tartars called Præcoponſes, a mightie prince, whoſe daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married: and diſcouering vnto him his intended purpoſe, beſought him by the ſacred bonds of the affinitie betwixt them, not to ſhrinke from him his louing ſon in law in ſo fit an opportunitie for his aduancement: And withall ſhewed vnto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empire was propoſed vnto him C by his moſt faithfull friends and the ſouldiers of the court, if he would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transfer the empire to ſome one of his ſons) & either by faire means to procure his fauor, or by entering with his armie into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for the ſucceſſor. The Tartar king commending his high deuiſe, as a kind father in law with wonderfull celerity cauſed great ſtore of ſhipping to be made readie in the Ponticke ſea, and Mœotis, but eſpecially at the Ports of Copa and Tana, vpon the great riuer of Tanais, which boundeth Europe from Aſia; and arming fifteene thouſand Tartarian horſemen, deliuered them all to Selymus, promiſing forthwith to ſend him greater aid if he ſhould haue occaſion to vſe the ſame. Theſe things being quickly diſpatched, Selymus paſſing ouer the riuer Borryſthenes, and ſo through Valachia, came at length to Danubius, and D with his horſemen paſſed that famous riuer at the citie of Chelia: his fleet he commanded to meet him at the port of the citie of Varna, called in antient time Dionyſiopolis, in the confines of Bulgaria and Thracia: he himſelfe ſtill leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in ſhew quite another thing than he had indeed intended: which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purpoſed to haue inuaded Hungarie.

Selymus aided by Mahometes his father in law, riſeth againſt his father

But Baiazet a good while before aduertiſed, that Selimus was departed from Trapezond, and come ouer into Europe, maruelling that he had left his charge in Aſia (the rebellion of Techellis and the Perſian war yet ſcarce quieted) and that vpon his own head he had entertained forreine aid to make war againſt the moſt warlike nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his armie by land, he had ſeized vpon the places neereſt vnto Thracia, and with a E ſtrong nauie kept the Euxine ſea; he began to ſuſpect, as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and entended againſt himſelfe: for the craftie old ſire had good proofe of the vnquiet and troubleſome nature of his ſon, eſpecially in that without his knowledge he durſt preſume to take a wife from amongſt the Tartars, and afterwards with no leſſe preſumption of himſelfe raiſe an armie both by ſea and land: whereby he eaſily perceiued, that he would neuer hold himſelfe contented with a ſmall kingdome, ſo long as he was in hope by deſperat aduenture to gain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like diſſimulation to appeaſe his violent & fierce nature, than by ſharpe reproofe to moue him to farther choller, he ſent vnto him embaſſadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkiſh kings had in former times taken vpon them thoſe Hungarian wars: for example wherof he needed not to goe no further than F to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loſſe had made proofe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he ſhould do wel to expect ſome fit opportunitie, when as he might with better aduiſe, greater power, & more ſure hope of victorie, take thoſe wars in hand. Wherunto Selymus anſwered, That he had left Aſia, inforced therunto by the iniuries of his brother Achomates, and was therefore come ouer into Europe, by dint of ſword and the helpe of his friends,to win from the enemies of the Mahometan religion a larger and G better prouince for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had giuen him, bordering vpon Hiberia and Cholchos, bare and needie people, liuing as connies amongſt the rocks and mountaines. As for the Hungarians,whom they thought to be a people inuincible, and therfore not to be dealt withall,he was not of that baſe mind to he daunted with any danger, were it neuer ſo great : and yet that in his opinion the war was neither ſo difficult or dangerous, as was by them pretended ; foraſmuch as the antient proweſſe of that warlike nation was now much changed, together with the change of their kings ; and their diſcipline of war not onely much decayed,but almoſt quite loſt,after that Vladiſlaus,farre vnlike in policie and proweſſe,had ſucceeded the renowned Mathias in that kingdome. Neither had he (as he ſaid) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of war, as knowing H that neither God nor man would be wanting to him, who with an honourable reſolution did aduenture vpon vertuous and worthie attempts : and that therefore hee was fully reſolued for his owne honor(which his father had in ſome ſort blemiſhed by the immoderat aduancement of his brethren) either to die honourably in the field in battell againſt the enemies of the Mahometan religion,or elſe gloriouſly to extend the bounds of the Turkiſh empire : and that he would not (though one of the yongeſt in the Othoman familie) be accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and proweſſe. Thus was the Hungarian war neuer by Selymus entended, notably by him pretended;and with no leſſe diſſimulation by Baiazet diſſuaded. The Embaſſadours, although Selymus in all his ſpeeches ſhewed no token of peace : yet in his fathers name preſented vnto him diuers gifts, thereby if it might be to appeaſe his fierce and cruell I mind. Vnto his old gouernment they adioyned Samandria,which the Hungarians call Schenderouia, a ſtrong citie of Seruia vpon the borders of Hungarie,with many other ſtrong towns in the ſame countrey : they gaue him alſo threeſcore thouſand duckats, beſide a thouſand garments of cloth and ſilke : with good ſtore of prouiſion wherewith to relieue and content the ſouldiers by him entertained ; leaſt that they drawne farre from home in hope of ſpoile, ſhould take it in euil part if they ſhould be ſent away emptie handed. Selymus in a happie time hauing receiued theſe gifts, returned the embaſſadours vnto his father , with more doubtfull anſwer and vncertaine hope than before : yet changing nothing in himſelfe of his former reſolution, ſecret meſſengers and letters from his friends in the court ſtil whetting him forward K (too much alreadie inflamed with deſire of ſoueraigntie) perſuading him to make haſt and to repoſe his greateſt hope in his quicke ſpeed ; for that they vnderſtood,that about the time of his ſetting forward, his brother Achomates was comming with a great power,being ſent for out of Capadocia by his father.

Preſents giuen to Selymus by his fathers embaſſadours.

Baiazet would appoint his ſucceſſour whileſt be yet liued.

In the mean time Baiazet, moued the rather with the feare of Selymus,reſolued vpon that, whereof hee had long before in his mind deeply conſidered, and now ſaid openly, That hee would appoint his ſucceſſor,who in ſtead of himſelfe,ſpent with yeares and ſickneſſe, ſhould bring with him the flower of youth and ſtrength of bodie, fit to gouerne ſo great an empire.
But when thoſe things were propounded vnto the ſouldiers of the court by the foure great Baſſaes(who in all things both of peace and wars had next place vnto the Emperor himſelfe) L it was forthwith gaineſaied by thoſe martiall men, crying aloud with one voyce, That they would know no other Emperor but Baiazet, vnder whoſe conduct and good fortune they had now ſerued aboue 30 yeres : and therfore would not ſuffer him to liue a priuat life in obſcuritie, who with ſo many victories and ſtrong cities taken, had brought the Othoman empire vnto that height of renowne and glory. They ſaid moreouer,that there was in him yet ſtrength enough,if he would but with the reuerend honor of his age retain the maieſtie of his place,& the glorie he had gotten with his long and happie raigne, and moſt famous victories : and that of his children, ſuch a one ſhould vndoubtedly in his due time ſucceede in the empire, as of right ought:only they wiſht,that the old Emperor might in the mean time liue in health with a long and happie raign:neither needed he(as they ſaid)to feare that after his death any controuerſie ſhould ariſe among his ſons about the ſucceſſion;for that the Othoman progenie vſed M to attain the imperiall ſeat,according to the old cuſtome of their anceſtors the Othoman kings, by right and order only,and not by corruption or faction. But if he would needs vpon his own priuat good liking,or as it were by new adoption,proceed to make choice of ſuch a one as the people & the men of war(his moſt loiall & faithfull ſubiects)could not ſo wel like of,it would

A be an occaſion of much more trouble, and happely the means to bring in that confuſion of the State, which he thought thereby to eſchew. For then, beſide the diſlike of the people, the other brethren would neuer endure ſo notable an iniurie, or euer be at quiet, vntil they had (as men wrongfully caſt off and diſinherited) by ſtrong hand and endangering of all, recouered their honour loſt by the headſtrong will of their aged father.

The ſouldiers thus before inſtructed by the friends and fauourites of Selymus, (who with mony and large promiſes had corrupted their captains and chiefe officers) ſpake theſe things frankly, to haue deterred the old Emperor from his purpoſe. But he thinking that they had (as he himſelfe did) eſpecially affected Achomates his eldeſt ſon, (for that they had generally protested, That they would againſt all iniuries defend his honour, vnto whom the empire ſhould B of right appertaine) ſaid he would make choice of Achomates, if it ſhould ſtand with their good liking. But the chiefe of the ſoldiers (who corrupted by Selymus, had together ſould both their faith and themſelues) cunningly commended Achomates, and ſeemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Soueraigne, Baiazet yet liuing, they ſaid was not agreeing with the antient cuſtome of the Othoman kings, neither for the behoofe of the men of war, neither yet good for the ſtate of the Empire; foraſmuch as neither his brethren Corputus and Selymus, neither the ſoldiers of the Court, could patiently endure the leaſt touch of the ſuſpicion of infidelitie; which they muſt needs do, if he as a ſuſpicious father ſhould doubt either of the loue or loyaltie of his moſt dutifull ſonnes, or of the faith or conſtancie of his moſt faithfull ſeruants, whereof he had made ſo many trials. Beſides that, it ſeemed vnto them all C vnreaſonable, that by the odious preiudice of that fact, the ſouldiers ſhould be left defrauded of the rewards vſually granted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the Empire, ariſing of the ſpoile taken from them which are of religion different from the Turks. For it is a cuſtome, that immediatly vpon the death of the Turkiſh Emperor, all the Iewes and Chriſtians which dwell at Conſtantinople, Pera, Hadrianople, Theſſalonica, and Pruſa, eſpecially merchants, expoſed vnto the iniuries of the Turks, are by the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court, ſpoiled of all their wares and goods, and become vnto them a prey: neither will they giue their oath of allegeance vnto the new Emperor, vntill he haue granted vnto them all that prey, as a bountie, and haue ſolemnly ſworne by his own head (the greateſt aſſurance that can by oath be giuen amongſt the Turks) freely to pardon all the offenders, and for euer to forget D all the outrages before committed. When Baiazet ſaw his men of war thus generally to oppoſe themſelues againſt the tranſlation of the Empire to Achomates, he of purpoſe to corrupt the minds of them which were before alreadie corrupted, promiſed to giue them fiue hundred thouſand duckats if they would ſtand fauourable to Achomates, and accept him for their Soueraigne: which maſſe of money his cuſtomers and receiuers vndertooke to leuie of the ſame merchants ſtrangers and Iews, and to pay it as Baiazet had promiſed. Yet the ouerthwart frowardneſſe of theſe men of war ouercame the good fortune of Achomates, although the reward promiſed were great: for why, they had in their martial minds conceiued far greater rewards and preferments, if in ſtead of a peaceable and quiet Prince, a monſtrous tyrant of reſtleſſe nature (as was Selymus) might by their help and means aſpire to the Empire. Thus Baiazet E driuen from his hope, thought it beſt for the preſent to diſſemble the matter; and concealing his griefe, with patience to put vp that diſhonour, vntil a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that he ſo much deſired.

Selymus aduertiſed from his friends, with what affection and faſtneſſe the ſouldiers of the court had in the ſecret fauour of him openly withſtood the earneſt deſire of Baiazet, for the preferment of Achomates; becauſe he would no longer fruſtrat the expectation of his fauourits by lingring and delay, or ſeem to diſtruſt the readie good wils of the men of war towards him, left the borders of Hungarie, & with his armie marching through Thracia, incamped at length vpon the riſing of a hill not farre from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his horſes might eaſily be heard, and his tents from the high places of the city diſcouered. From thence F he ſent a meſſenger to his father then lying in the citie, to certifie him, That for as much as he had not of many yeares before ſeene him, he was now therefore deſirous to come vnto his preſence to viſit him, before he croſſed the ſeas backe againe by his appointment to Trapezond: and the rather, becauſe it might chance that he ſhould neuer ſee him againe, being now become both aged and diſeaſed: beſides that, it much concerned (as he would haue had him to beleeue)the quietnes of his kingdom in Aſia,and the vnitie of his children, if the controuerſies G betwixt him & his brother Achomates , which could not ſafely be committed to meſſengers, might by themſelues be diſcouered him to their father, as an indifferent hearer and decider thereof. Wherefore he humbly beſought him to appoint him a time and place to giue him audience in,and not to denie him leaue to come and kiſſe his hands ; which thing his anceſtours neuer refuſed to grant to their poore friends, much leſſe to their children. Baiazet who a few days before vnderſtanding of the comming of Selymus,& throughly ſeeing into his deuices,had called vnto him certain of his Sanzacks or chiefe captains,with their ſelect companies out of the neereſt parts of Grecia,and had alſo ſet ſtrong watch and ward through the city: fearing leſt vnder the colour of parle,his ſouldiers attending about his perſon, corrupted by Selymus and his friends (who euen then loded with gifts and promiſes, were ſecretly vpon H the point of reuolt) ſhould be quite drawn away from him,and ſo he himſelfe at length be either by open force oppreſſed,or ſecret treacherie circumuented,thought it beſt to cut him off at once from al hope of conference or acceſſe vnto his preſence. Wherefore ſeriouſly blaming him,that he had vpon his own head brought his armie into another mans prouince, that he in armes required audience, and laſt of all, ſo inſolently abuſed his fathers lenitie and patience; he by the ſame meſſenger ſent him farther word,That he ſhould not preſume to approch any neerer vnto him,or expect any thing appertaining to peace: who guarded with forrein power had without his fathers leaue entred into armes,and ſpoiled the countries of his friends: and that therefore he ſhould do wel,with all ſpeed to retyre out of Thracia,yea and out of Europe alſo, and disbanding his forces,againe to retyre himſelfe vnto his owne charge in Pontus ; in I which doing he ſhould find greater fauor & kindneſſe with him his father,than euer he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the courſe by him begun,that then he would no more take him for his ſonne,but for his enemie,and before it were long, ſharply chaſtiſe him for his malapert inſolencie,little differing from vnnatural treacherie. The meſſenger with his anſwer diſmiſſed,it was not long after, but that Baiazet was by his eſpials aduertiſed, that Selymus the night following was riſen with his armie,and marched directly towards Conſtantinople;whither he was ſent for by his friends,in hope that vpon his approch with his army,ſome ſudden tumult and vprore would to his auaile ariſe in that ſo great and populous a citie. Whereupon Baiazet fearing leſt in ſtaying at Hadrianople,he might loſe the Imperial citie of Conſtantinople, early in the morning by breake of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Conſtantinople. K Vpon his departure Selymus peaceably entered the citie of Hadrianople,the Citiſens fearing,that if they ſhould haue made any reſiſtance,their vnſeaſonable faithfulneſſe towards Baiazet might haue turned to their vtter deſtruction. Selymus after he had a while refreſhed his armie with the plentie of that citie, according to his former determination ſet forward again,of purpoſe by long & ſpeedie marches to haue preuented his fathers comming to Conſtantinople.

Baiazet was yet ſcarcely come to Chiurlus, or rather Tzurulum,an antient ruinous citie almoſt vpon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Conſtantinople,when warning was giuen him of them that followed his armie, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the ſtraglers of his armie,and with hot ſkirmiſhing ſtayed and troubled his reereward. L The aged Emperor more mooued than terrified with the ſtrangenes of the matter,because his marching ſhould not ſeeme as if it were a flight or chaſe, commanded his ſtandard to be ſet vp,and al his armie to make a ſtand,of purpoſe that if Selymus ſhould come on to giue him battell,he might finde him in readineſſe. The great captaines and noblemen then preſent with Baiazet,whether it were for old acquaintance,or vpon ſome new inclination of their affection, or elſe vpon hope of new allyance and preferment, wiſhing well vnto Selymus,and therefore indirectly and cunningly fauouring him, ſeemed not to like of Baiazet his reſolution, to bee ſo farre mooued (as they ſaid) with the youthfull heate and lightneſſe of his ſonne, as to ſeeke reuenge by battell, whereas the victorie it ſelfe could yeeld him nothing but ſorrow; but the ouerthrow threatened deſtruction both to himſelfe and all them that were M with him: the imminent euent thereof ſeemed to be ſo much the more dangerous and fearefull, by how much he was at that time inferiour vnto his ſonne both in warrelike prouiſion and number of men. Wherefore it were good for him (they ſaid) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding vp of his life to make too much haſte by a miſerable death in a woful battell to ſtaine the whole glorie of his former life. There was (as they would haue perſuaded

Selymus ouertaketh his father.

The chiefe men about Baiazet, ſecretly fauour Selymus,& diſſuade him from giuing him battell.

A ſuaded him)but one only courſe to be taken, full of wholſome policie and ſafetie; & that was, That he ſhould with ſuch ſpeed as he had begun, march on forward to Conſtantinople, that ſo Selymus excluded out of the citie, (his chiefeſt hope) and then not knowing which way to turne himſelfe, ſhould either of his own accord, or for feare of his fathers greater forces, think of return; and ſo with his raſcal followers more honeſtly periſh by the hands of them whoſe countries he had ſpoyled, and vpon whom he muſt of neceſſitie liue in his returne, than by the ſword of his father. The author of this counſel was Muſtapha, the moſt antient Baſſa of thoſe which being in greateſt authoritie about the Emperor, are only of his priuie Councel, & ſway all matters of importance concerning either peace or warre: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malicious mind loathing Baiazet, as one that had too long raigned, hated him alſo for certaine priuat diſpleaſures conceiued of the emulation of the other yonger Baſſa's by him promoted; B and ſecretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and fauor reſembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought vp himſelfe, and him of all the ſonnes of Baiazet he thought moſt worthy of the Empire. This Muſtapha was borne in the town of Seres (neere vnto Amphipolis) the ſon of a Greeke Prieſt, a man of a ſlie, craftie, and ſubtill wit, alwayes ſubiect to corruption: which diſeaſes of mind were in him wel to haue bin diſcouered by his froward looke and ſquint eyes, the certaine notes of a nature to be ſuſpected. Next vnto this Muſtapha was Boſtanges Baſſa, born of the honorable houſe of the Ducagina in Ætholia, and thereof called Ducaginoli; a man for his couetouſneſſe, ambition, and treacherie, infamous; as the foule and miſerable end of his life afterwards declared. Vnto this man, Selymus had by ſecret promiſe betrothed one of his daughters, now marriageable, as a reward of his corrupt C faith. By which ſleight he had alſo allured Aiax (Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, and great Maſter of the houſhold) to promiſe his aid for the obtaining of the Empire; whereunto hee ſaid he was by deſtinie called: and by his means drew other inferior captains ſecretly to fauor his quarrell; vnto whom he ſpared not to promiſe whatſoeuer might pleaſe their humours. Yea the captaines almoſt generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commanders, of themſelues leaned that way. Of all the reſt, onely Cherſeogles Baſſa (whom the Turks hiſtories call alſo Achmet Hertezec-Ogli) a faithful, conſtant, and vpright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a faſt and aſſured friend vnto Baiazet his father in law, was of opinion, That the immoderat pride and inſolency of Selymus, was euen there by force of armes and ſtrong had forthwith to be oppreſſed, before he ſhould approch D any neerer vnto the Imperiall Citie, for feare of raiſing ſome further trouble or tumult there, than were well to be appeaſed; which was the thing that Selymus his friends moſt of all deſired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherſeogles ſaid) that the naked Tartarian horſemen, although they were in number moe, would euer be able to abide the firſt charge of Baiazet his well armed Penſioners. As for the Ianizaries, of whoſe approoued faith and valour tried in many dangers, he had before had good experience; there was no doubt but that they would now to the vttermoſt of their power defend the perſon and honour of their aged and victorious Emperor, who had of long time ſo well of them deſerued; and alſo to reuenge his quarrel vpon diſobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God the iuſt reuenger of ſuch vngracious dea- E ling, neither the infamie of men, had moſt vnnaturally lift vp his ſword againſt his father, wickedly to depriue him of life, of whom he had receiued life. Wherefore he perſuaded him, in his owne iuſt quarrell to goe forth vnto his ſouldiers with cheerefull countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the benefits they had from time to time moſt bountifully receiued at his hands, as alſo of their allegeance and dutie; to make them to vnderſtand, that repoſing his truſt in their fidelitie and valour, he had reſolutely ſet downe with himſelfe, in that place before he went any further, by their faithfull hands to chaſtiſe the preſumptuous inſolencie of his vnnaturall ſonne, together with his rebellious Followers.

Cherſeogles Baſſa the only great man faithful to Baiazet, perſuadeth him to giue battell to Selymus.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherſeogles, it ſhall not be amiſſe, both for the honor of the man, and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Chriſtians, to ſtep F a little out of the way, to ſee the cauſe why he being a Chriſtian borne, turned Turke. For he was not (as almoſt all the reſt of the great men about Baiazet were) of a child taken from his Chriſtian parents, and ſo brought vp in the Mahometan religion; but being now a man grown, turned Turke: yet ſo, as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Crhiſtian religion or loue toward the Chriſtians; a thing not common among ſuch renegates. He being the ſonne of one

Cherſcogles, a ſmall Prince of Illyria neere vnto the blacke mountain, and going to be married vnto a ladie whom he moſt entirely loued, and vnto whom he was alreadie betrothed, honorably diſcended of the houſe of the Deſpot of Seruia; his intemperat father with luſtfull eye beholding the young ladie of rare feature and incomparable beautie, deſired to haue her for himſelfe: and regarding more the ſatisfying of his own inordinat deſire, than his own honor, or the fatherly loue of his ſonne, tooke her in marriage himſelfe; all his friends labouring in vaine to diſſuade him, and with open mouth crying ſhame of ſo foule a fact. Wherefore the young man, mooued with the indignitie of ſo great an iniurie, and driuen headlong with diſpaire, fled firſt to the Turks garriſons which lay not far off, and from thence to Conſtantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondred at: For being brought before Baiazet, who with cheerefull countenance entertained him, for that he was honorably diſcended, and well liked both of the man, and of the cauſe of his reuolt; ſmiling vpon him, ſaid, Be of good cheere Noble Youth, for thy great courage is worthie of farre greater fortune than thy fathers Houſe can affoord thee; now in ſtead of thy Loue wrongfully taken from thee by thy father, (the Kinſewoman of a póore exiled Prince) thou ſhalt haue giuen thee in marriage the daughter of a great Emperour, of rare and ſingular perfection. And not long after abiuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen, to Achomates and Cherſcogles, he married one of Baiazet his daughters, a Princeſſe of great beautie, and deſerued to haue a place amongſt the Baſſa's of greateſt honour in the Court. Yet ſtill retaining the remembrance of his former profeſſion, with a deſire to returne thereto againe: inſomuch that he kept in his ſecret cloſet the image of the Crucifix, which he ſhewed to Io. Laſcaris, as to his truſtie friend, as he himſelfe reported. This man at ſuch time as the citie of Modon was taken by the Turkes, and a multitude of poore Chriſtian captiues cruelly put to death in the ſight of Baiazet, by earneſt entreatie ſaued the Venetian Senatours there taken: and afterward by earneſt ſute deliuered Andreas Gritti, being priſoner at Conſtantinople, and condemned to die; who not many yeares after was choſen Duke of Venice. He was the chiefe means wherby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Baiazet. He alſo by his great authoritie, and of his own charge redeemed innumerable Chriſtians from the ſeruitude of the Turks, and ſet them at libertie. Neither is his kindneſſe towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at ſuch time as the foreſaid Io. Laſcaris the notable & learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the tenth, ſought antient works of famous writers, he procured the Turkiſh Emperors letters patents, that he might freely at his pleaſure ſearch all the Libraries in Grecia, to the great benefit of good letters. Now Baiazet encouraged by this mans perſuaſion (as is aforeſaid) and hearing as he lay in his pauilion, the alarme of the enemie, with the tumult and clamour of his owne ſouldiers as if they had been men affraid; and ſundrie meſſengers alſo at the ſame time comming vnto him with newes, That Selymus with his Tartarian horſemen had almoſt incloſed the rereward of his armie, and already taken ſome of his baggage: grinding his teeth for verie madneſſe and griefe of minde, with teares trickling downe his hoarie cheekes, got him out of his pauilion in his horſelitter, (for he was at the ſame time ſo troubled with the gout, that he was not able to ſit on horſebacke) and turning himſelfe vnto the Penſioners and Ianizaries ſtanding about him, as their manner is, ſaid vnto them, Baiazets ſpeech to the ſouldiers and Ianizaries of the court.

Will you, Foſter children, valiant Souldiours, and faithfull keepers of my perſon, who with great fortune haue ſerued me in field aboue the ſpace of thirtie yeares; and for your faithfull and good ſeruice haue both in time of peace and warre, of me receiued ſuch rewards, as by your owne confeſſion and thankeſgiuing farre exceeded your owne expectation, and the meaſure of our Treaſures: Will you, I ſay, ſuffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his graceleſſe Sonne? And your old Emperour, tormented with age and diſeaſes, to be cruelly murthered by a companie of wilde Tartars, little better than arrant Rogues and Theeues? Shall I be now forſaken in this my heauie old age and laſt act of life? And ſhall I be deliuered vnto myne enemies, by them, by them, I ſay, who many yeares agoe with great faithfulneſſe and inuincible courage defended myne honour and right againſt my brother Zemes? and haue many times ſince, not onely valiantly defended this Empire againſt moſt warrelike Nations, but alſo moſt victoriouſly augmented the ſame? But I will not ſo lightly beleeue that which to my no ſmall griefe is brought vnto myne eares, concerning the reuolting of myne Armie: neither if I did beleeue it, am I ſo fearefull as to be therewith diſcouraged, or to ſeeke to make ſhift for my ſelf.

For to what purpoſe ſhould I thinke of flight? as though I could in any other place find more faithfulneſſe or ſurer defence than with you? And concerning your ſelues, what ſhould be your hope by this ſo infamous treacherie? If any of you (for I cannot beleeue that you are all ſo mad) without regard of faith, of worldly ſhame, or the feare of God, haue polluted your minds with the pernitious conceit of ſo foule a treaſon, doe you thinke to gaine greater rewards and preferments by your treacherie and villanie, than by your fidelitie and conſtancie? There be many which carefull of my perſon, perſuade me to reſerue this my ſicke and feeble bodie vnto my better fortune, and to commit my ſelfe to flight, ſo rather to ſaue my life with ſhame and infamie, than to end my dayes with honour and glorie: Which is ſo far from my thought for the apprehenſion of any feare to doe, that I will to the contrarie forthwith giue the fierce enemie battell, and in this my laſt danger make proofe of all your fidelitie and valour, and of euery one of your good wils in particular: and ſo by conduct of the Higheſt, either defeat the power and breake the ſtrength of this graceleſſe man, or elſe hauing raigned aboue thirtie yeares an Emperour, end my dayes together with them which ſhall vnto the end continue with me in their faithfulneſſe and loyaltie, although I ſhould be moſt ſhamefully and diſhonourably betrayed and forſaken of ſome of myne owne Guard: which thing though lying fame would make me beleeue, yet will I not feare it vntill I ſee the proofe thereof.

The common ſort of the Ianizaries, vnto whom the great Commanders and captaines corrupted by Selymus, had not for their leuitie and multitude communicated their purpoſe of transferring the Empire to Selymus, began to crie out as if it had beene with generall conſent, That he ſhould not doubt to ioyne battell with his enemies, and ſo to make proofe of their conſtant fidelitie and woonted valour. Which was done with ſuch a cheerefulneſſe and deſire expreſſed by great ſhouts, clapping of hands, & clattering of armor, that it ſeemed they would play the parts of reſolute ſouldiers, and that as guiltleſſe men they tooke it grieuouſly to be once ſuſpected of treaſon or infidelitie. Others alſo who ſecretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for faſhion ſake followed them with like crie: but eſpecially the great commanders both of the armie and of the Emperours Court, now changed their affection, whether it were for ſhame of the fact, or for feare of diſcouering themſelues out of ſeaſon, is vncertaine. Wherefore according to the manner of ſuch men, which through their mutabilitie and miſchieuous diſpoſition, fearing to be conuinced and diſcouered, adde vnto the preſent a ſecond and new treaſon or treacherie, to couer the former: ſo Muſtapha and Boſtanges (not daring now to ſhew themſelues for Selymus) to make a great ſhew of their feigned loyaltie towards Baiazet, departed themſelues out of his pauilion, to encourage the ſouldiers, and to martiall the battell.

Baiazet ſicke in his chariot, by the aduice of Cherſeogles the faithfull Baſſa, placed his battel in this order: The Sanzacks (which are the gouernours of prouinces) with their horſemen, in number about 6000 he ſet in the front of the battell: the Spachi-oglans & Siliphtars, which are the chiefe horſemen of the court, and as it were the Emperors Penſioners, were placed as two wings on each ſide of the great ſquadron of the Ianizaries; in the midſt whereof was old Baiazet himſelfe. Other 4000 horſemen (ſeruants to the great men of the court) were left in the rereward, and to guard the baggage. Theſe ſlaues (for ſo indeed they are) for their apparell and furniture, yea and valor alſo, are little inferior to their maſters, by whom they are ſo ſumptuouſly maintained both for ſtrength and oſtentation. The battell thus ordered, Baiazet commanded the trumpets to ſound, and a red enſigne in token of battell to be diſplaied. On the other ſide, Selymus placing his Tartarian horſemen in both wings, and his Turks in the midſt, in manner of a halfe moone, for that he in number of horſemen far exceeded his father, did almoſt on euery ſide incloſe him, and ſo charge him. The Tartars when they were come within 100 paces of their enemies, caſting themſelues (after the manner of their fight) into great rings, emptie within in manner of a crowne, and ſo running round, that they might both backward and forward deliuer their arrowes, caſt vpon their enemies whole ſhowers of ſhot, as if it had bin haile, to the great annoyance of the Turks: when as in the meane time the other Tartarian archers further off, ſhooting their arrows not right forth, but more vpright towards heauen, which falling directly downe, ſore gauled the Turks horſes alſo. But the old ſoldiers (taught by the example of their captaines) ſerred cloſe together, and caſting their targets ouer their heads, as if it had been one whole roofe or penthouſe, receiued their arrowes with leſſe harm, and haſted with as much ſpeed as they could to come to handie blows. The penſioners alſo at the ſame inſtant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battell, where his Turkiſh horſemen ſtood: and Aiax captaine of the Ianizaries, drawing out 700 readie harquebuſiers out of the ſquadron of the Ianizaries, with them aſſailed the hindmoſt of one of the wings of the Tartars: and the foure thouſand ſeruants left in the rereward, as deſirous as the reſt to ſhew their forwardneſſe, with great ſlaughter repulſed the other wing of the Tartars, which came to haue ſpoyled the Turks carriages. This fierce battell betwixt the father and the ſon, with doubtfull euent endured from noone vntill the going down of the Sun: Selymus in many places ſtill reſtoring his declining battel, and fighting himſelfe, as for an empire. But after that the Tartars, hardly charged by the harquebuſiers, were not able to abide the ſhot, eſpecially their horſes, being with the vnwoonted noiſe thereof wonderfully terrified, and ſo carrying backe their riders whether they would or no, began to flie; the reſt of the horſemen could neither by commandement, threatning, or wounds, be inforced to ſtay, but turned their backs and fled. The footmen alſo whom Selymus had attyred and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forſaken of their owne horſemen, were now by Baiazet his horſemen compaſſed about and almoſt all ſlaine.

The battell betwixt Baiazet and Selymus.

Selimus his army diſcomfited.

Selymus his armie thus ouerthrown, and himſelfe hardly beſet, was by certain troups of his Turkiſh horſemen which yet ſtayed with him, deliuered from the preſent danger; and being wounded, was mounted vpon a freſh horſe, & ſo with all the ſpeed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be purſued and ouertaken by his fathers ſpeedie horſemen, he changed his horſe, and tooke another of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe: and ſo reſeruing himſelfe to his future fortune, with a few of his followers fled to Varna, and from thence by ſea to Capha.

The horſe whereon Selymus fled was all cole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to ſay, a blacke cloud) whom Selymus as a good ſeruitour euer after exempted from all ſeruice, and had him in ſuch eſtimation, that couered with cloth of gold, he was as a ſpare horſe without a rider led after him in all his great expeditions, firſt into Perſia, and afterwards into Ægypt, where he died at Caire, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horſe, had a monument erected for him: wherein Selymus ſhewed himſelfe more kind than to his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murthered, and hardly affoorded to ſome of them ſo honourable a Sepulture.

In this battell, of fortie thouſand which Selymus brought into the field, eſcaped not aboue 8000, but they were either ſlain or taken priſoners. Of Baiazet his armie were loſt about 700, and 3000 hurt with Tartarian arrowes: which loſſe he preſſently reuenged, with extream crueltie, cauſing all ſuch as were taken priſoners to be without mercie put to the ſword in his ſight; whoſe heads were layd together by heapes, and their dead bodies, as if they had beene towers. Of this notable battell betwixt the father and the ſon in the yeare 1511, Chiurlus, called in antient time Tzurulum, before an obſcure old ruinous citie, (or as Iouius calleth it, a village) became famous: but much more afterwards by the fatal deſtinie of Selymus; who not many yeares after, ſtrucken with a moſt loathſome and incurable diſeaſe, ended his dayes in the ſame place with an vntimely and tormenting death; God (as it is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the ſame place taking iuſt puniſhment for his former diſloyaltie towards his father, as ſhall hereafter in due time and place be declared.

Three dayes Baiazet lay ſtill in the ſame place where he had obtained the victorie, till ſuch time as all his ſoldiers were againe returned from the chaſe of the enemie: after that, he held on his way to Conſtantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his ſoldiers. In the mean time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his father and his brother Selymus, with the euent thereof, came with an armie of twentie thouſand from Amaſia, thorow the Countreis of Galiatia and Bythinia, vnto the citie of Scutari, called in antient time Chriſopolis (though ſome ſuppoſe it to haue beene the famous citie of Chalcedon) which citie is ſcituated vpon the ſtrait of Boſphorus, directly againſt the Citie of Conſtantinople. In this place Achomates encamped his armie, neere vnto the ſea ſide, expecting what courſe his father would take after ſo great a victorie. For beſide the prerogatiue of his age, and the eſpeciall loue of his father towards him, the generall affection of the vulgar people, with the good opinion he had of himſelfe, had alreadie filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherefore he ceaſed not night and day to ſend Meſſengers ouer that narrow ſtrait, to Conſtantinople; and moſt earneſtly to ſolicite Baiazet his father, in ſo fit an occaſion to make

A haſt to diſpatch what he had ſo long before determined, concerning the reſignation of the empire. He alſo importuned his friends and familiars in beſt maner he could to commend him to his father, and in moſt ample ſort to extoll his graue purpoſe for tranſlation of the empire; and to doe the vttermoſt of their deuoire, that ſeeing God and good fortune had iuſtly ouerthrowne the raſh attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good means might the ſooner obtaine the empire, whereof he was the vndoubted heire.

Baiazet, who of himſelfe and according to his old good liking was altogether deſirous of the preferment of Achomates, was by their perſuaſions eaſily intreated to haſten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the empire. And making no great ſecret of the matter, commanded certaine gallies to be made ready for the tranſporting of Achomates from Scutario to Conſtantinople. But the great Baſſaes with the ſoldiers of the B court (the ſecret fauorits of Selymus) vnderſtanding the matter, began againe openly to reſiſt and impugne his purpoſed determination, and to alledge the ſame reaſons they had before at Hadrianople alleaged; in fine they ſaid plainely, That they would by no meanes ſuffer him ſo far to diſable himſelfe as an inſufficient man to reſigne the empire, who of late had with ſo valiant and couragious an heart fought for the honour of his crowne and dignitie; and that therefore ſo long as he liued, they would acknowledge no other ſoueraigne but Baiazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achomates his hope, ſo neither ought he to diſtruſt the good will of the men of war; but that he being a man of moſt approued and known valour, might in due time with their generall good liking enioy his right, which ſhould then C without all queſtion be due vnto him as the eldeſt ſonne of their Emperor. They ſaid moreouer, that they had in the late battel againſt Selymus ſufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperour and Achomates, and what confidence they were to repoſe in the fidelitie of their ſouldiers, who to manifeſt their faithfulneſſe and loyaltie, had not refuſed to offer themſelues vnto the hazard of a moſt vnequall battell, yea their liues vnto death it ſelfe. O foule diſſimulation, the couert maske of all miſchiefe, vnder which, meere treacherie is here pretended for great loyaltie, the aged Emperour too too much flattered, Achomates ſhamefully deluded, and (the man that might not as then without ſome addition of diſgrace be named) Selymus, euen bloudie Selymus, ſecretly ſought for aboue all men to be preferred!

Baiazet willing to prefer Achomates to the empire.

Baiazet by this offwardneſſe and inſolencie of the ſouldiers againe diſappointed of his purpoſe, D or elſe (as ſome thought) delighted with the ſweetneſſe of ſoueraigntie: for that after the late victorie he ſeemed (as one growne young againe) neither to feele himſelfe old or vnable ſtill to gouerne ſo great an empire; ſent word to Achomates, how the matter ſtood, and that he ſhould forthwith depart from Scutari to his old charge at Amaſia, from whence he would againe call him at ſuch time as he had with new bountie won the minds of the ſouldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in court, whereby ſo great a matter and not vſuall, might the better and with more ſecuritie be effected.

Achomates thus deceiued of his hope and expectation, grieuouſly complaining that he was ſo mocked of his father, and contemned of the ſoldiers of the court, began to mix his new requeſt E with words of heat and diſcontentment, and to inueigh againſt his father, for making him a by-word (as he termed it) and a laughing ſtocke vnto the world, after he had taken the paines to come ſo far, and that by his ſpeciall appointment. But if he proceeded ſo to doat, and to make ſo great reckoning of the ſouldiers of the court, that in reſpect thereof he neither reregarded his promiſe, nor that was right and iuſt; he would himſelfe by force of arms take vpon him the defence of his own honor and right, ſo lightly eſteemed by his father, and reuenge the diſgrace offered vnto him by others.

Whereunto Baiazet anſwered by the Cadeleſcher (which is a man of greateſt place and authoritie amongſt the Turks in matters concerning their ſuperſtition, and therfore of them honored aboue others, as the ſacred interpreter of their law) that he did neither well nor wiſely F without iuſt cauſe to fal into ſo great rage and choller, as by his ſpeech and force to thinke to extort that good which was only by loue and loialtie to be gained: whereas all things ſhould be ſurely kept for him, and the empire vndoubtedly deſcend vnto him, if by vntimely haſt he did not marre that hope which he ought by ſufferance and patient expectation to cheriſh: he might (as the Cadeleſcher told him) learn by that late example & fortune of his brother Selymus, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, deſperatly to thruſt himſelfe headlong into ſuch an action as he could not poſſibly ſee the end G of, than moderating by reaſon his hot paſſions, to expect with patience the opportunitie of time, and fitneſſe of occaſion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achomates inciteth his two ſons Amurathes and Aladin to take part with him againſt their grandfather Baiazet.

Achomates inflamed with anger and griefe of the repulſe, all the while the Cadeleſcher was deliuering his fathers meſſage, gaue him many ſharpe taunts, and had much adoe to ſtaie himſelfe from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatning him, that in ſhort time both his father ſhould deerely buy the changing of his purpoſe, and the ſouldiers of the court their treacherous dealing: and ſo ſending him away with this ſhort anſwer, he preſently roſe with his army, and paſſing through Bythinia, cruelly ſpoiled the country in his return to Amaſia. There daily more and more enflamed with the griefe and the indignitie of the repulſe before receiued, he determined to inuade the leſſer Aſia: that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that he muſt needs by H force of armes trie his right againſt either of his brethren, he might therein vſe the wealth of that rich prouince. Whereby if it ſhould chance that he ſhould by the practiſe of any, faile of the whole empire, yet he ſhould at the leaſt wiſe be poſſeſſed of the one halfe thereof, and bee the readier for all euents, hauing all theſe great and rich prouinces in his power. Wherfore calling vnto him his two ſonnes, Amurathes and Aladin, yong princes of great hope, after he had grieuouſly complained of the vnkindneſſe of his father Baiazet, and of the iniuries done againſt him by his enemies in the court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtaine the empire, except they would forthwith enter into armes with him, and ſo together with him defend both his and their owne right and honor, againſt the malice and iniuries of their enemies: which he ſaid, would be an eaſie matter to do by ſurpriſing the I leſſer Aſia, if they would couragiouſly aduenture vpon it; foraſmuch as all Piſidia, Lycaonia, Pamphilia, with the ſea coaſt of Ionia, were not as then kept with any armie or nauie. And as for his brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet diſpoſition would be content either to ſit ſtil, or elſe in regard of his iuſt quarrell take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet eſtate with the troubled, and ſo enter into armes, might eaſily be thruſt out of whatſoeuer he poſſeſſed: as for the Gouernors of the reſt of the prouinces, he doubted not, but that they would alſo yeeld either to his command, or fortune. Wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts as men of courage, and to go into the countries thereabouts to take vp men, and whatſoeuer els were needfull for the wars.
Theſe gallants, of their owne youthfull diſpoſition readie enough for ſuch a matter, and now K encouraged with their fathers perſuaſion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in ſhort time raiſed a notable armie of voluntarie ſouldiers, of whom the greateſt part were of ſeruile condition. But Achomates himſelfe, beſides his old armie which he had in former time lead againſt the Perſian rebels, leuied new forces alſo, and called foorth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the cities round about: and ſo running through the prouinces proclaimed himſelfe king of Aſia, and ſuch as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, thoſe he and his two ſonnes in diuers places proſecuted with all hoſtilitie: by which means many cities, eſpecially ſuch as were but weakely fortified, partly for feare, partly by conſtraint, were deliuered ouer vnto him. L

After that, he entered with his armie into Lycaonia, and the borders of Cilicia, where by embaſſadors and often letters hee requeſted Mahometes his brothers ſon (who then gouerned thoſe countries) to aid him in his iuſt quarrell againſt them, who by craftie and ſiniſter perſuaſions had to his diſhonour and diſgrace withdrawne his fathers good will from him, and ſo far ſeduced him, as that he was determined to appoint another ſucceſſour in the empire, than him his eldeſt and firſt begotten ſonne: which their malice he would (as he ſaid) preuent, and by force of armes recouer his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to haue put him in poſſeſſion of whilſt he yet liued, had he not by the ſiniſter practiſe of others beene hindered: for the recouery whereof, if Mahometes would out of his prouince aid him with men and victuall, and ſo further his iuſt cauſe, he promiſed that he ſhould find a far better vncle than he had found a father; and that his preſent friendſhip ſhould in time be moſt M amply and bountifully requited.

Wherunto Mahometes anſwered, that he could not do what his vncle had required, except he were ſo commanded by his grandfather Baiazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread ſoueraigne: and that it was not for him to iudge, whether he did right or otherwiſe, That he

A would not in his life time reſigne the empire to his ſon. But this (he ſaid) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yeeld his obedience to any other, ſo long as he liued poſſeſſed of the empire: to whom both his father Tziban Stach whileſt hee liued, and himſelfe alſo had giuen their oath of obedience and loyaltie. Wherfore it were good for him to pacifie himſelfe, leſt in ſeeking vntimely reuenge of his enemies, he ſhould to the offence of all men wrong his father: and by too much heat and haſt ouerthrow both his hope and honour; which of right ſhould be moſt great, if he could but in the meane time haue patience, and ſtay himſelfe a while. Achomates, who expected nothing leſſe than ſuch an anſwer, but thought that Mahometes would either for loue or feare haue preſently come vnto him, and now finding his requeſts to be with greater grauitie and conſideration denied by his nephew, than they were by reaſon B of him demanded, entered with his armie into the borders of his prouince, and with fire and ſword began to deſtroy the country before him. Which Mahometes with ſuch power as he had thinking to remedie, was by the way encountered by his vnckle not farre from Larenda, and there ouerthrowne: and taking that city for refuge, was there certain daies beſieged by Achomates; and at laſt together with his brother (then but a child) deliuer into his hands, at ſuch time as the citie was by the fearefull citizens by compoſition yeelded vnto him. Achomates hauing taken the citie with his two nephewes, cauſed Mahometes his counſellors, with his foſter brother, by whoſe perſuaſion it was ſuppoſed that he had ſo anſwered his vnckle and endangered himſelfe, to be put to death.

These proceedings of Achomates filled Baiazet with griefe and indignation, that he ſhould C in ſo great yeres be ſet vpon by two of his owne ſons, one after the other. Yet to proue if thoſe troubles might without more bloudſhed be pacified, he ſent his embaſſadors vnto him to reproue him for his diſloyaltie, and to command him foorthwith to ſet at libertie his two nephewes, Mahometes and his brother, and ſo without more ſtirre to get him againe to Amaſia: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulſe ambitiouſly affected the empire, had reſolued with himſelfe to deale ſo much the more cruelly in his proceedings: hauing receiued this meſſage from his father, cauſed the chiefe embaſſadour (for that he had in franke ſpeech deliuered his meſſage and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his own preſence put to death, and threatned the reſt with the like, if before the going downe of the Sun they auoyded not his campe.

Baiazet ſendeth embaſſadors to Achomates.

Achomates killeth his fathers embaſſadour.

D This outrage highly offended Baiazet, and alienated the minds of many before wel affected to Achomates; for that without any reuerence of his father and contrary to the law of nations, he had violated the embaſſadors ſent to him for peace. Vpon the firſt bruit hereof, the ſouldiers which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Baiazet exclaimed, that the inſolencie of Achomates was not longer to be ſuffered, but forthwith by force to be repreſſed; that by ſufferance and delay he would grow from euill to worſe; and that if Baiazet ſhould prolong the time, and in fatherly ſort ſeeke by faire meanes to reclaime him, he ſhould afterwards in vain craue the aid of his beſt ſouldiers againſt his rebellous ſon ſtrengthned by his owne long ſufferance. Muſtapha alſo the chiefe Baſſa, with Boſtanges and others of great place (who ſecretly fauored Selymus, and had cunningly cauſed theſe things by fit men to be diſperſed amongſt E the ſouldiers) began at the firſt to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the ſtrangeneſſe and hainouſnes of the fact, in ſuch ſlie ſort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer.
But afterward, when they ſaw that Baiazet was throughly heated, both by his own angry diſpoſition and the ſpeech of the ſoldiers, and vpon the confidence of his former victory againſt Selymus, now ready to ſeeke reuenge; they began then to heape freſh coles vpon the fire, and bitterly to inuey againſt Achomates, as a traitour to his aged father and the ſtate; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and ſoldiers of the court, who for the ſafetie and honour of their aged Emperor, were moſt preſt and readie to expoſe themſelues, their liues, and what ſoeuer elſe they had, vnto new dangers.

So was Achomates by the craft and ſubtiltie of theſe great men, by the anger of his father, F and the iudgement of the ſouldiers, proclaimed traitor; and order taken, that the ſouldiers of the court with the Europeian horſmen, ſhould with all poſſible ſpeed be ſent againſt him into Aſia. But when choice was to be made of ſome valiant and worthie Generall that might take vpon him ſo great a charge, which ſeemed eſpecially to appertain vnto ſome one of the great Baſſaes: it was ſtrange to ſee, how they all began to ſtraine courteſie at the preferment, & eue-rie one to refuſe the place and diſable himſelfe, ſaying, That it were a great indignitie, that the G Emperours armie ſhould be led againſt his ſon by any of his ſeruants: and the ſouldiers (hauing their leſſon before hand) ſaid plainly, That they durſt not, nor would not draw their ſwords or lift vp their hands againſt the ſon of the Emperor, and heire apparant of the empire, except they were conducted and commanded by ſome of the Othoman bloud in perſon preſent with them: for ſo had his brother, long before when he rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late, Selymus his rebellious ſon, bin both ouerthrown and vanquiſhed, euen by the conduct of Baiazet himſelfe, and not by any of his ſeruants. Theſe things all tended to this purpoſe, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his father (whom they ſecretly fauored, although for feare of diſpleaſure they durſt not ſo much as name him but by way of diſgrace) and by this very meanes to make way for his returne to Conſtantinople, and ſo conſequently H giue him power to ſeiſe vpon the empire. For it was probably ſuppoſed, that neither Baiazet himſelfe, being very aged & diſeaſed, neither Corcutus, altogether buried in his ſtudy, would vndertake the managing of thoſe wars: ſo that of the Othoman familie only Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed, all the nephews of Baiazet by reaſon of their tender yeares, as yet vnfit for the ſame. At theſe ſpeeches of the Baſſaes and the ſoldiers, Baiazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his pallace, excuſing himſelfe by his great yeares and diſeaſed bodie: but complaining deeply, that Corcutus in following the vain title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the mean time neglected other ſtudies and honorable qualities, better beſeeming his princely birth and calling. As he was thus reaſoning with himſelfe, and deuiſing what courſe to take, Muſtapha the old Baſſa, who all the I time of his raigne had vſed to diſburden him of his cares, hauing by way of talke drawn him into a full diſcourſe concerning the proceeding to the intended war, ſet vpon him with this craftie and premeditated ſpeech, framed of purpoſe for his deſtruction.

Your Maieſtie may not (moſt dread Soueraigne) although by yeares and ſtrength of bodie you were neuer ſo well able, you may not I ſay, either tranſport your armie, or your ſelfe paſſe ouer in perſon in Aſia; leſt whileſt you are there, from place to place chaſing Achomates, you leaue a farre more dangerous enemie behind you in Europe, who may in your abſence ſeiſe vpon Thracia, Græcia, yea and the imperiall Citie it ſelfe, deſtitute of ſufficient defendants. Doe we not heare, that Selymus is raiſing of new forces aboue Varna? to expect a new ſupplie of horſemen from the Tartar King K his father in law? And alreadie as it were houering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater ſpirit and courage, than to bee daunted or diſmayed with the misfortune of one battell? or if you ſhall ſend ouer your old beaten ſouldiers into Aſia, and call Corcutus into Europe with the forces he leauied the laſt yeare, who in time of your ſickneſſe may withſtand the attempts of Selymus: will he feare theſe freſh water ſouldiers of Aſia, or their phyloſophycall Generall, which feared not the ſouldiers of your court, the pickt and choſen men of the world, and your ſelfe a moſt worthie and victorious Emperour? You are deceiued, and (if I may be ſo bold ſo to ſay) you throughly ſee not into the doubtfull euent of things, if you thinke not, that you muſt at one time wage warre againſt two dangerous enemies, euen in the remoteſt parts of your Empire, in Aſia and Europe: For whileſt you ſhal goe about to expulſe Achomates out of Capadocia, Selymus neerer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities; will by and by L at your backe, raiſe a moſt dangerous warre in the very heart and chiefe ſtrength of your Empire. But if you, mooued with the greatneſſe and due conſideration of the danger, ſhall goe about to defend Thracia, and for that purpoſe retaine with you the moſt approoued and faithfull ſouldiers of the court, you ſhall ſee all Aſia on a fire before your face: neither will Achomates make an end of waſt and warre, vntill ſuch time as he hath drawne the Empire of Aſia vnto himſelfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your ſelfe, ſhould by your ſelfe and the conſent of all men be iudged traitours vnto your crowne and dignitie; whereof the one through raſhneſſe, the other vpon pride and vaine diſcontentment, hath riſen vp in armes againſt you: Why doe you not in ſo doubtfull and perplexed a matter, preferre ſafe and ſound adviſe before that which masketh vnder the ſhew of maieſtie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one M time correct and be reuenged vpon, to ſet vpon them as occaſion ſhall ſerue when they are together by the eares betwixt themſelues? This is the onely hope of your ſafetie, this is the onely way, if you ſhall reſolue (as the common prouerbe ſaith) to driue out one naile with another, and ſo to ouercome your enemies. Moderate a while your hot deſire of reuenge, and for the preſent diſſemble your

A grieſe; grant vnto one of them pardon, and in ſhew take him into your grace and fauour, imploy him againſt the other: ſo ſhall you without danger, howſoeuer it ſhall fall out; perſecute the one whom you loue not, with the hazard of the other whom you truſt not: and at your pleaſure oppreſſe him to whome you ſhall commit your enſignes and armie; the hands of your faithfull and truſtie ſouldiers being euer at your appointment ready to take reuenge. So ſhall you with ſecuritie make an end of this warre, expoſing vnto the danger him whom you had rather to ouercome (as your enemie) by him whom you wiſh alſo to periſh.

Muſtapha had ſcarce made an end of ſpeaking, but the other Baſſaes (as they had before agreed amongſt themſelues) began where he left, & with all their cunning labored to perſuade B Baiazet to call home his ſon Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie againſt his brother: ſaying, That he had already indured ſufficient puniſhment for his former diſloyalty, and that therefore it was like that he as a well corrected child would from thenceforth containe himſelfe within the compaſſe of his moſt dutifull obedience: whereas Achomates proud of his birth-right, hauing of late violated his fathers embaſſadors, and filled all Aſia with rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reaſonable conformitie, vntill he were by force of armes pluckt downe, and ſo made to know himſelfe, in like maner as was his brother Selymus of late. Baiazet ſeeing that in reſoluing of a matter of ſo great conſequence, Cherſcogles Baſſa (his ſon in law, and the onely faithfull counſellor then about him) ſat all ſilent, hanging the head, as a man not of the ſame opinion with the reſt, ſtood a great while in doubt what to reſolue vpon: C he could not ſo eaſily forget the late iniuries don againſt him by Selymus, it was yet freſh in memorie, how that he had out of Aſia inuaded Europe, ſurpriſed Hadrianople, giuen him battell, indangered his perſon with his Tartarian horſemen, and that onely by the goodneſſe of God he had obtained the victorie: on the other ſide, his Maieſtie contemned, his nephews impriſoned, his embaſſadors violated, the cities of Aſia ranſacked, and all thoſe goodly countries preſently ſmoking with the fire of rebellion, ſo filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he deſired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whileſt hee was thus ſtrugling with his owne thoughts, and doubtfull what to do, the vnfaithfull Baſſaes by deepe deceit and trecherie (Cherſcogles moſt inſtantly perſuading the contrary) ouercame him ſo far, as with his own hand to write letters to Selymus, promiſing him, that forgetting al iniuries paſt, he would D vpon the hope of his loyaltie, receiue him into his former grace and fauor, and make him Generall of his armie, if he would without delay repaire to Conſtantinople, and ſo paſſe ouer into Aſia againſt his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whileſt theſe things are in doing at Conſtantinople, Corcutus aduertiſed by letters from his friends of the weake eſtate of his aged father, and by what perſuaſions he had bin induced (after Achomates was proclaimed traitour) to call vnto him Selymus, and to make him Generall of his army, came downe out of Magneſia to Phocis, and there imbarking himſelfe in his gallies, ſailed to Conſtantinople: where being arriued, he went preſently to the court, attended vpon with a great number of his friends and fauourits; and entring into the priuie chamber, E humbled himſelfe before his father, and kiſſed his hand: and after much talke had betwixt them of diuers weightie matters, is reported to haue ſpoken vnto him as followeth.

Corcutus commeth to Conſtantinople.

It is now aboue thirtie yeares paſt (moſt reuerend father, and dread Soueraigne) ſince that I (being choſen and proclaimed Emperour by the prerogatiue of the ſouldiers of the court, by generall conſent of the citizens of this imperiall citie, and by the graue Iudgement of the wiſe and graue Baſſaes of the Court) haue cheerefully and willingly, and as I may truely ſay, with mine owne hand deliuered from my ſelfe vnto your Maieſtie the poſſeſſion of this moſt glorious Kingdome and Empire: Which thing what worldy wight would haue done? but either a mad man, or elſe a moſt kind and louing ſonne? Vnto which ſo rare an example of a religious and louing heart, I was not by any feare F or conſtraint enforced, but onely by regard and contemplation of your owne ſacred perſon, and the due conſideration of my dutie. Neither did it in the courſe of ſo many yeares, euer repent me of that my ſingular kindneſſe and dutie done, when as I contenting my ſelfe with ſuch things as you had vnto me aſſigned, and with the generall commendation of my well doing, as well as with a kingdome, thought this your great eſtate and higheſt type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet contentment of my pleaſing ſtudies; when as I accounted it a vaine thing, and not beſeeming the re-

ſolution of a ſetled and quiet mind, to long after theſe worldly things, which being had and enioyed to the full, worke no full contentment in the inſatiable deſire of man: and that ſurmounting vertue, and the ſweet, ô moſt ſweet meditation of heauenly things promiſed vnto my contemplatiue and rauiſhed mind, things of far more worth and maieſtie than all the kingdomes and monarchies of the world. But whileſt I was tracing this path, little regarding wordly honour, or the glorie of an empire, and was for pure deuotion and deſire of knowledge trauelling into the furtheſt part of Arabia, vnto the Altar of our moſt ſacred Prophet Mahomet, and ſo to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and ſincere profeſsion; you in the middeſt of my trauell drew me out of Ægypt by the long hands of the Ægyptian Sultan, backe againe into Phrygia; commanding me, that eſchewing the manifold dangers (which in my long trauell I muſt needs haue fallen into) I ſhould from thenceforth haue more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my loyalty towards you, and of your fatherly loue towards me: as if you had been then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the euill diſpoſition of ſome, an innocent man, deuoted vnto the ſtudie of wiſedome and learning, might be a ſtay both vnto your ſelfe and the whole Othoman familie. Since which time I haue euer both dutifully obeyed your commaund, and with as much care and integritie as I poſsibly could, diſcharged my charge: and in the late Perſian warre, raiſed and brought into the field mine armie, wherewith I defended the frontiers of my prouince from the incurſions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquiſhed, and by your forces driuen out of the leſſer Aſia, and that my vnnaturall and graceleſſe brethren, the one of them in Europe, as a moſt deſperate recreant, had in plaine battell aſſailed the perſon of your moſt ſacred Maieſtie (his reuerend father, farre ſpent with age, and then grieuouſly tormented with the gout) of purpoſe to haue at once depriued you both of your life and empire: And the other in Aſia ſeeking by like diſloyaltie and moſt horrible treaſon there to poſſeſſe himſelfe of a Kingdome, had beſieged and taken priſoners his brothers ſonnes your nephewes, young Princes of great expectation, your faithfull and louing ſubiects, and proceeding further, had ſet al that part of your empire on a broile: I thought my ſelf in duty bound to repaire hither vnto your imperiall Maieſtie, for that I ſaw it came to paſſe, not without the prouidence of the moſt Mightie, that I might at ſuch time eſpecially requeſt the iuſt reward of my due deſert of you my moſt reuerend and louing father, the moſt religious obſeruer of Equitie and Iuſtice: when as you hauing had too great proofe of the infidelitie of my vnnaturall brethren, might moſt fitly and moſt commodiouſly performe that which you vpon great reaſon might now grant vnto me your dutifull and obedient ſonne, although my former deſerts had merited no ſuch thing. Wherefore moſt gracious, I humbly pray and beſeech you by all your fatherly loue and affection towards me, and my knowne loyaltie towards you, to vouchſafe before the comming of Selymus, to haue regard of mine honour, with the ſtate of your Empire: for when he ſhall once in armes breake in, he will at a trice cut off all hope of pacification; and ſupported by the men of warre, confound all things at his pleaſure: for I heare, that the very guarders of your perſon, and chiefe commanders of your armies, altered in diſpoſition towards you, doe but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly ſalute for their Emperour and Soueraigne, him, whome your good fortune of late full ſore againſt their wills, ouerthrew in open field. Wherefore that Empire whereof I was ſometime poſſeſſed, and for the rare deſert of mine antient loyaltie towards you, is of good right due vnto mee, reſtore to mee againe whileſt you may, and whileſt it is yet in your power, in this ſudden and momentarie occaſion now preſented. For your Maieſtie ſhall in vaine fauour my moſt iuſt and vpright claime, after that you (hauing at once receiued into the imperiall Citie a moſt deſperat aud ambitious man) haue for euer loſt your libertie, together with your ſelfe.

Baiazet comforteth Corcutus, and promiſeth to reſign to him the empire, after that Selymus was paſſed ouer into Aſia.*

Corcutus with tears ſtanding in his eies hauing ended his ſpeech, the aged Emperor moued with a fatherly affection, and the reaſonable perſuaſion of him, his onely loyall and moſt kind ſon, comforted him vp with good words, and willed him to be of good cheere; and withall diſcouered to him the very ground of his reſolution, in calling home of Selymus: telling him farther, That he could be well content to reſigne to him againe the empire, but that it was not in his power ſo preſently to do, for feare of the ſouldiers of the court; who had (as he ſaid) of late withſtood him in the like motion, and would againe with tooth and naile gaineſay it, if he ſhould but giue the leſt occaſion for them to ſuſpect any ſuch matter: but that by the plot now laied, Selymus ſhould vnder the title of honour bee drawne out of Europe, together with the ſouldiers of the court, into Aſia againſt Achomates, both barres vnto his preſent deſire for transferring of the empire; in whoſe abſence it ſhould be in his power freely to diſpoſe therof

A at his pleaſure: which he promiſed preſently to reſigne vnto him, ſo ſoone as they were once paſſed ouer into Aſia. Which thing once done, although it were not altogether to their liking, yet feared he not, that either the captains or ſoldiers, who had of late ſo honorably and faithfully defended him againſt Selymus, ſhould now for his ſake diſlike of Corcutus, or attempt any thing not beſeeming the glorie of their late deſert: but rather hoped, that if his two vnnatural and rebellious ſons, Achomates and Selymus, ſhould once ioyne battel (as it was moſt like they ſhould) that either the one or both ſhould by the iuſt iudgement of God periſh for their ſo great diſobedience, murdred by the hands one of another. Corcutus not much diſliking of his fathers purpoſe, and reſting himſelfe wholly vpon his fauor, thought it not good further to argue the matter his father had ſo well conſidered of; but taking his leaue, returned to his B lodging, not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and ſo remained many days after at Conſtantinople: during which time he ſought neither by gifts nor golden promiſes to procure the loue and good liking of the great Baſſa's or ſoldiers of the court; for that he as a plain vpright man, thought it not good by ſuit and corruption (the great promoters of the vnworthie) to ſeeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauor & promiſe.

In the mean time Selymus his faſt friends aduertiſing him of the comming of Corcutus to the court, aduiſed him to make haſte, and with all ſpeed poſſible to come to Conſtantinople; for that it was to be feared, leſt Baiazet being verie aged, and withal eaſie to be drawn away, might by the perſuaſion of Corcutus be induced to alter, yea and perhaps quite breake off the courſe before well ſet for his moſt readie preferment. Vpon which news, Selymus attentiuely waiting C vpon nothing more than to haue acceſſe vnto his friends in court, and before reſolued, at his firſt comming thither not to ſpare for any coſt in corrupting the men of warre, and ſo to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the Empire; made now no ſtay, but with certaine troupes of horſemen, commanding the reſt to follow after, came with wonderfull celeritie to Conſtantinople. Corcutus with the great Baſſa's and Courtiers, and moſt part of the ſoldiers of the court, going to meet him at the gates of the citie, at his entrance receiued him with a kiſſe (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the midſt of the citie, all the people running out by heapes to haue a ſight of the man, of late in euery mans mouth for his deſperat rebellion, but now welcommed with much thundering ſhot in token of triumph, and the ioyfull acclamation of men, women, and children, and people of all ſorts. So that it eaſily appeared, that all the D hatred before conceiued againſt him, for his late outrage againſt his father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in ſhort time before his other brethren aſpire vnto the Empire.

The next day after, Selymus came to the court, and hauing acceſſe to his father, fell proſtrate before him and kiſſed his feet, and with the greateſt ſhew of humilitie poſſible, craued of him pardon for his diſloyaltie. O deepe diſſembler, and traitor of all other moſt treacherous! of late in field with ſword drawn to haue ſlaine his aged father, but now proſtrate at his feet; and within an houre mounted perforce into his imperiall ſeat!

The old Emperour ſmiling vpon this Crocodile, in moſt kinde manner tooke him vp, and courteouſly ſaid vnto him:

Baiazets craftie ſpeech vnto his ſonne Selymus.

Thy faults, ſonne Selymus, are ſo much the leſſe, for that they haue found ſpeedie repentance, E wherefore I doe the more willingly grant thee pardon: but from henceforth endeauour thy ſelfe, that God who hath giuen thee a notable ſpirit and courage, may alſo be thought to haue indued thee with a good and well diſpoſed minde. There is a martiall matter readie, worthie thy hardneſſe, wherein thou mayſt ſufficiently manifeſt vnto the world thy forwardneſſe and courage: there when time ſerueth let it appeare.

The craftie diſſimulatiō of Selymus.

Shortly after was called a Councell for the wars, but eſpecially for the chuſing of a Generall to goe againſt Achomates: the honour of which place when many would haue giuen to Selymus, he began with great diſſimulation to refuſe, making as though he would not in any caſe be preferred before his brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he ſaid) willingly giue place, both in reſpect of his yeares and learned diſcretion, who could no doubt with greater authoritie and wiſedome mannage that war: as for himſelfe, now he had obtained his fathers F gracious pardon and fauour, he could well content himſelfe with any corner of the Empire, were it neuer ſo little.

But Corcutus and his friends, who had repoſed all their hope and all their deuiſes in the departure of Selymus with the ſoldiers of the court; as if they had with great modeſtie contended on both ſides, again perſuaded him, yea and inſtantly requeſted him not to refuſe that honour, by generall conſent without any diſgrace to his brother, giuen to him as to a worthie G Chiefetaine of great experience in martiall affaires. So Selymus with wonderfull cunning deluding Corcutus and his fauorits, whileſt he ſeemeth craftily to refuſe the thing he moſt deſireth, is by the general conſent of all parts choſen Generall of the armie to go againſt his brother Achomates. Which was no ſooner made knowne vnto the ſouldiers, eſpecially the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court; but they before inſtructed, with loud acclamations ſaluted him not for their Generall onely, but for their ſoueraigne Lord and Emperor alſo: and ſo without further delay put themſelues in armes to defend and make good that they had done, if any better diſpoſed ſhould ſeeme to withſtand them or diſſent from them.

Selymus by the ſouldiours thus ſaluted Emperour, at firſt made ſhew as if hee had beene halfe vnwilling to take vpon him the Empire; and ſo began faintly to refuſe it, as mooued ſo H to doe by the due reuerence and regard of his father, yet liuing. But after a while he ſuffered himſelfe to be entreated: and then commending himſelfe and his cauſe wholly to the men of warre, to binde them vnto him the faſter, promiſed beſide the particular fauours he owght them, to beſtow a right great and generall largeſſe amongſt them: which he afterwards accordingly performed.

After that, he requeſted the chiefe Baſſa's and commanders of the armie there preſent, to go forthwith vnto his father, and to take ſuch order (ſeeing it was the mind of the whole army it ſhould be ſo) that the Empire might by his good will, without further trouble or tumult, be forthwith transferred vnto him.

I Muſtapha the great Baſſa, in whoſe wylie head all this matter was (to his owne worthie deſtruction) firſt hammered; whether it were vpon a new fineneſſe of his owne, or that Selymus (as it was giuen out) had threatned to kil him, except he would go and ſhew all the whole proceſſe of the matter to his father: comming as a man diſmaied to Baiazet, (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the ſouldiers, was come out of his chamber, into the open roomes of his Palace) in few words deliuered vnto him this moſt vnwelcome meſſage, as followeth:

The blunt ſpeech of Muſtapha to Baiazet, perſuading him to reſigne the empire to Selymus.

Emperor (ſaid he) the men of war haue in their Councell ſaluted Selymus both their Generall and Emperour, which their choice they require thee to ratifie, being readie preſently to breake into the Court to kill vs both, if thou ſhalt refuſe forthwith to reſigne the Empire. They all with one conſent requeſt that of thee, which they haue alreadie put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of farre more K danger, to ſeeke to recouer that thou haſt alreadie loſt, than willingly to yeeld that which is alreadie taken from thee, ſeeing it is not by any force or policie to be regained. They in armes, in furie, and now entred into rebellion, thinke vpon ſome greater miſchiefe.

Baiazet troubled with feare and choler, and then too late perceiuing the treacherie of the Baſſa's, and how he had bin by them betrayed, pauſing a while at the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter afterwards in furie brake out into theſe words:

The reſolute anſwer of old Baiazet to Muſtapha and the other Baſſa's.

Falſe and Forſworne, do you thus betray me? and with ſuch monſtrous villanie requite mine infinit bountie? Why do you not alſo as murtherers take away my life, which could not endure for a while to expect the diſſolution of this my weake and aged bodie; but depoſing your iuſt and lawfull Soueraigne, muſt needs in poſt haſte ſet vp a moſt wicked and graceleſſe man to raigne ouer you? But much good do it you with your deſired Emperour, the contemner of God, and murtherer of his father: to whom ere it be long, L you ſhall full deerely pay the price of this your perfideous dealing and treacherie againſt me. And he himſelfe beginning his Empire by moſt vnnaturall treaſon, murther, and bloudſhed, ſhall not (I hope) eſcape the heauie hand of God, the vndoubted and ſeuere reuenger of ſo great impietie and treaſon.

Muſtapha, with Boſtanges and Aiax as falſe as himſelfe, returning backe again to the ſoldiers, ſpeaking not a word of the ſorrow and indignation of Baiazet, told them how that he was wel content to reſigne the Empire, and ſo had appointed Selymus (to whom both God and the general conſent of the men of war had already deliuered the Empire) to ſucceed him in the empire. When this their ſpeech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold vp their heads and looke big on the matter: and others who before ſtood doubtfull what to do, ſeeing now no other remedie, in haſt joyned themſelues vnto the M ſame faction. Whileſt all things were thus diſorderly carried by the vnruly ſouldiers, Selymus was by them mounted vpon a couragious horſe, and ſo with all pomp conducted vp & down moſt of the faire ſtreets of the imperiall city; and with the generall voice and clamour of the people (howſoeuer their minds were for moſt part otherwiſe affected) ſaluted Emperor. And the

A the ſame day both the great Baſſa's and the ſouldiers in generall, were all ſolemnly ſworne vnto Selymus, as their onely Lord and Emperour.

Corcutus, whether it were for griefe of his hope now loſt, or for feare of his life, although Selymus had promiſed to giue him the citie of Mytilene, with the Iſland of Lesbos, ſecretly embarked himſelfe, and ſo returned to Magneſia.

Baiazet of late one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world, but now thus thruſt out his empire by his ſon, deteſting both him and the treacherie of his ſubiects, and ouercome with ſorrow and melancholie, determined of himſelfe, before he were thereto enforced by Selymus, to forſake Conſtantinople, and to retyre himſelfe to Dymotica (a ſmall citie wholeſomely ſcituated in Thracia, not far from Hadrianople; where in former time he had for his pleaſure B beſtowed great coſt, and now as he thought beſt fitted his preſent eſtate.) Wherefore cauſing great ſtore of treaſure, plate, jewels, and rich furniture to be truſſed vp, he with fiue hundred of his houſhold ſeruants, full of heauineſſe and ſorrow, with teares trickling downe his aged cheekes, departed out of the imperiall citie, towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe from thence to haue gone to Dymotica. Selymus brought him about two miles vpon his way, and ſo returning againe to Conſtantinople, tooke poſſeſſion of the Palace.

Baiazet being then about ſeuentie ſix yeares old, or as ſome report full foureſcore; and beſide his old diſeaſe of the gout, ſore weakened with heauineſſe and griefe of minde, was not able to trauell aboue fiue or ſix miles a day, but was conſtrained by the extreamitie of his pain and weakeneſſe, to ſtay ſometimes two or three dayes in a place. Whileſt he was thus C traueling, Selymus no leſſe carefull of the keeping of his eſtate, than he had before been for the obtaining of the ſame, began now to doubt, That if he ſhould depart from Conſtantinople, and with all his Forces paſſe ouer into Aſia againſt his brother Achomates, Baiazet in the meane time might in his abſence returne to Conſtantinople, and ſo againe poſſeſſe himſelfe both of citie and the empire. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he reſolued moſt viper like before his going to kill his father, and ſo moſt vnnaturally to depriue him of life, of whom hee had receiued life: ſuch is the cruell and accurſed nature of ambition, that it knoweth neither father, mother, brother, wife, kindred, or friend, no ſometimes not her owne children; the furie whereof was neuer in any one more pregnant, than in this moſt monſtrous and cruel tyrant Selymus.

D The readieſt and moſt ſecret way he could deuiſe for the effecting of this his damnable deuice, (which without great impietie could not be ſo much as once by him thought vpon) was, to worke it by poyſon: vpon which reſolution he ſecretly compacted with Haman a Iew, his fathers chiefe phyſitian, to poyſon him; promiſing him for his reward a penſion of ten duckats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terrour and feare, as well as with reward, enforced to be the miniſters of miſchiefe; he to be the more ſure of this Iew, (prone enough for gaine to doe euill) threatned him with moſt cruel death, if he did not both ſecretly and ſpeedily worke this feat, commanding him ſo ſoone as he had done it, to returne vnto him to Conſtantinople.

The deceitfull Iew moued both with the feare of death and hope of reward (two great E motiues) comming ſhortly after to Baiazet, and finding him very weake, ſeeming to be very carefull of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a potion, which ſhould both reſtore to him his health, and alſo ſtrengthen his weake bodie, if it would pleaſe him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Baiazet nothing diſtruſting his old phyſition whom he had ſo often and ſo long truſted, ſaid he would gladly take it. Early the next morning commeth the Iew with the deadly poyſon in a cup of gold, Baiazet yet ſleeping, which he ſet downe in the chaire of Eſtate, and ſo ſtood waiting vntill the aged Prince ſhould of himſelfe awake. But Baiazet ſleeping ſoundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men ſleepe their laſt) and withall ſomwhat longer than ſtood with the Iewes purpoſe, he preſuming of his woonted practiſe, awaked him and told him, That the time to take the potion was almoſt paſt, and asked him if F it were his pleaſure then to take it. Baiazet doubting no treaſon, willed him to bring it: whereof when the Iew had taken the ſey, (hauing before himſelfe taken a preſeruatiue againſt that poyſon) he gaue it to Baiazet to drinke, who cheerefully dranke it vp: the phyſition commanding them that waited in his bed-chamber, and attended on his perſon, to keepe him well couered with warme clothes, and not to giue him any thing to drinke vntill he had wel ſweat.

Baiazet poyſoned by the Iew.

The death of Baiazet.

Selymus causeth two of his Fathers Pages to be put to death for mourning for their Maſter.

This curſed Iew hauing thus poyſoned the aged Prince, to auoid the danger of the fact, and to carrie the firſt newes thereof to Selymus, ſecretly conueyed himſelfe away, and fled in haſte G to Conſtantinople. But Baiazet attainted with the force of the poyſon, began firſt to feele moſt grieuous gripings in his ſtomacke, the ſtrong paine whereof appeared by his miſerable complaining and heauie groaning; in the middeſt of which torments he gaue vp the ghoſt, in the yeare 1512, when he had raigned thirtie yeares. The Turks report that he died a natural death: but Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who at that time ſerued in Baiazet his chamber, & was preſent at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead bodie the euident tokens of poyſon were to be ſeene. His dead bodie with all his treaſures were preſently brought backe again to Conſtantinople, and deliuered to Selymus, who cauſed the bodie of his father to be with the greateſt ſolemnitie that might be, buried in a moſt ſumptuous tombe, in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple, which he had before built for himſelfe at Conſtantinople: which H Monument there remaineth at this day to be ſeene. His ſeruants were all by Selymus reſtored to their places which they before held in the Court in the time of their old Maſter, excepting fiue of the Pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their Maſter aboue the reſt, had attyred themſelues all in mourning apparell: for which cauſe they were by the commandement of Selymus caſt in priſon, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the ſuit of Solyman, Selymus his ſonne, and of other two Baſſa's, were ſaued: but being ſtript of their rich apparell, and whatſoeuer elſe they had gotten vnder Baiazet, they were inrolled for common ſouldiers vnder Sulluſtares Baſſa. Of theſe three, Antonius Vtrius (the Genoway before ſpoken of) was one, who after ten yeares miſerable captiuitie amongſt the Turks, at laſt eſcaped I at ſuch time as Selymus was by the Perſian diſcomfited: and with much adoo returning againe into Italie, wrot the hiſtorie of all ſuch things as he himſelfe had there ſeene, with the calamities of Baiazet his houſe, and a great part of the tyrannous raigne of Selymus.

Hamon the Iew iuſtly rewarded for his treacherie.

Hamon the falſe Iew (as the ſame author reporteth) comming to Conſtantinople, and expecting ſome great reward for his foule treaſon, by the commandement of Selymus had his head preſently ſtrucke off: with this exprobation of his treachery, That opportunity ſeruing, he would not ſticke for reward to do the like againſt Selymus himſelfe. Of this Baiazet, Ianus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

SELYMVS PRIMVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR TERTIVS: FLORVIT ANo 1512 1603

Phil. Lonicer. Turc. Hiſt. li. 1.

En Selymus, ſcelere ante alios immanior omnes :
In patris, & fratrum, dirigit arma necem.
In Perſas mouet inde ferox : Memphitica regna Deſtruit : & Syros Æthiopaſque domat.
Hinc in Chriſticolas irarum effundere fluctus, Ipſorumque imo vertere regna parat.
Cum diro victus proſternitur vlcere : Chriſtus Scilicet eſt populi, portus & aura ſui.

Lo Selymus, in crueltie exceeding others farre, His father, and his brethren both, deſtroyes with mortall warre.
The Perſian fiercely he aſſailes : and conquers Ægypts Land :
The Syrian, and the Moore likewiſe, he tam'd with mightie hand.
But purpoſing in his mad mood, the Chriſtians to confound, And the memoriall of their name to root from off the ground, A loathſome Canker eat him vp, and brought him to his end : Chriſt is to his the ſafeſt Port, when he will them defend.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE THIRD AND MOST WARLIKE EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

THis Selymus, by fauor of the great Baſſaes and men of warre whom he had before corrupted, hauing depriued his father Baiazet firſt of the empire, and ſhortly after of his life alſo, and now fully poſſeſſed of the empire himſelfe, firſt tooke view of the treaſures which the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors his anceſtors had before of long time heaped vp in great aboundance: out of which hee gaue vnto the ſouldiers of the court two millions of duckats; and for a perpetuall remembrance of his thankfulneſſe towards them augmented their daily wages, allowing vnto euery horſeman foure aſpers a day, and to euery footman two, aboue their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bountie, he greatly aſſured vnto himſelfe the minds of the men of warre.

Shortly after he paſſed ouer with a great armie into Aſia, leauing the gouernment of the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople vnto his only ſonne Solyman: and marching into Galatia came to the citie of Ancyra, in hope there to haue oppreſſed his elder brother Achomates. But he vnderſtanding before of his comming, withal wiſely conſidering how vnable he was to withſtand his forces, fled before into the mountaines of Capadocia vpon the confines of Armenia, taking vp men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all ſorts of people, yea euen of ſuch as were but of ſmall abilitie themſelues, and vnto him meere ſtrangers; that ſo he might in beſt manner he could, prouide ſuch ſtrength as might ſerue him to make head againſt his brother, and for the recouerie of Aſia.

Selymus going into Aſia againſt his brother Achomates.

Selymus hauing ſpent that ſommer without doing any thing worth the ſpeaking of, and conſidering that he could not well winter in that cold countrey neere vnto the great mountaine Taurus, by reaſon of the deepe ſnowes and extreame cold there vſually falling; and that to go farther was to no purpoſe, foraſmuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and mountain to mountaine was not to be ſurpriſed, he retired backe againe into Bythinia, and ſending his Europeian horſemen downe to the ſea coaſt, and the Ianizaries to Conſtantinople; reſolued to winter with the reſt of his armie at Pruſa. At which time being wholly bent againſt Achomates his competitor of the empire, he for certaine yeares continued the league which his father Baiazet had before concluded with Vladiſlaus king of Hungarie, Sigiſmundus king of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) ſuperflous which might concerne the eſtabliſhing of his empire, he called vnto him fiue of his brothers ſons, Orchanes the ſonne of Alem Scach; Mahometes the ſonne of Tziban Scach; Orchanes, Emirſa, and Muſa the ſonnes of his brother Mahometes; all young Princes of great hope, of yeares betwixt ſixteene and twentie, excepting Muſa who was not paſt ſeuen yeares old: Of all theſe, Mahometes (whom his vncle Achomates had a little before taken priſoner at Larenda, as is before declared, and vpon the death of Baiazet had againe ſet him at libertie) beeing about twentie yeares old, was for rare feature and princely courage accounted the paragon and beautie of the Othoman family: which great perfection, as it woon vnto him the loue and fauour of the men of war, and alſo of all the people in generall: ſo did it haſten his ſpeedie death; onely Selymus his cruell vncle enuying at his life. After he had got theſe poore innocents into his hands, he ſent for diuers of his great doctors and lawyers, demaunding of them, Whether it were not better that ſome fiue, eight, or ten perſons ſhould be taken away, than that the ſtate of the whole empire ſhould with great effuſion of bloud be rent in ſunder, & ſo by ciuile wars be brought in danger of vtter ruine & deſtruction? Who although they wel perceiued whereunto that bloudy queſtion tended, yet for feare of diſpleaſure they al anſwered, That it were better ſuch a ſmall number ſhould periſh, than that the whole ſtate of the empire ſhould by ciuile war & diſcord be brought to confuſion, in which general calamitie, thoſe few muſt alſo of neceſſitie periſh with the reſt. Vpon colour of this anſwer, and the neceſſitie pretended, he commanded theſe his nephewes before named, to be led by fiue of his great captaines into the caſtle of Pruſa, where they were all the night following moſt cruelly ſtrangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a penknife ſlew one of the bloudie executioners ſent into his chamber to kill him; and ſo wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead: and that Selymus being in a chamber faſt by, and almoſt an eye-witneſſe of that was done, preſently ſent in others, who firſt bound the poore Prince, and afterward ſtrangled him with the reſt: whoſe dead bodies were buried at Pruſa amongſt their anceſtors. The crueltie of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of moſt men, inſomuch that many euen of his martial men filled with ſecret indignation, for certain daies abſented themſelues from his preſence, ſhunning his ſight as if he had beene ſome fierce or raging lyon.

Selymus ſeeketh after the liues of Amurat and Aladin, the ſons of Achomates. his brother.

Of all the nephewes of old Baiazet, only Amurat and Aladin (the ſons of Achomates) yet remained, whom he purpoſed to ſurpriſe vpon the ſudden, and ſo to rid himſelfe of all feare of his brothers children; hauing then left none of the Othoman family, but them and his two brethren vpon whom to exerciſe his further crueltie. Theſe two yong Princes had a little before recouered the citie of Amaſia, from whence they were the Sommer before expulſed by their vncle Selymus, at ſuch time as Achomates their father was glad to flie into the mountaines of Capadocia. Selymus fully reſolued vpon their deſtruction, ſent Vſegi one of his Baſſaes with fiue thouſand horſemen, who by great iournies trauelling to Amaſia, might vpon the ſudden come vpon theſe two yong Princes, and take them altogether vnprouided, and as then fearing no ſuch danger: which was thought no great matter for the Baſſa to do, foraſmuch as he might with his light horſemen eaſily preuent the fame of his comming; and the citie of Amaſia where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furniſhed with any ſufficient garriſon for defence therof: beſide that, Achomates himſelfe was at that time abſent, buſied in taking vp of ſoldiers vpon the frontiers of Caramania. But Muſtapha the old Baſſa, by whoſe ſpecial means Selymus had obtained the empire (as is afore declared in the life of Baiazet) being priuie vnto his wicked purpoſe, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, deteſting his moſt execrable tyranny, both for the vnworthy death of Baiazet, his father, & the guiltleſſe bloud of ſo many yong princes his nephews by him ſhed without all pittie; and hauing compaſſion of the imminent danger whereinto theſe two brethren were now like alſo to fall, by ſecret and ſpeedie meſſengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Baſſa, and of all that was entended againſt them. Who vpon ſuch knowledge giuen, preſently aduertiſed Achomates their father thereof, and laid ſecret ambuſh themſelues for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies afrer, the Baſſa comming with his horſemen towards Amaſia, fell before hee was aware into the middeſt of his enemies: at which time alſo, Achomates following him at the heeles, ſo ſhut him in with his armie on euery ſide, that moſt of his men being ſlaine, he himſelfe with diuers other captaines were taken priſoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commandement committed to ſafe cuſtodie.

Now it fortuned, that ſome of Achomates ſoldiers ſcoffing at the priſoners whom they had taken, told them how they had bin deceiued, and how all the matter had bin carried (ſo hard a thing it is to haue euen the greateſt counſels in court kept ſecret) boaſting, that they wanted not their friends, euen of ſuch as were moſt inward with Selymus, who ſecretly fauoured the better cauſe, & would not long ſuffer the cruel beaſt to rage further: all which things Selymus his ſoldiers reported again after they were ranſomed and returned home. But Vſegi the Baſſa lying ſtil in priſon, and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by ſecret letters gaue

A Selymus to vnderſtand, that Muſtapha the great Baſſa whom he moſt of all truſted, had ſecret intelligence with Achomates, and had been the only cauſe of the loſſe of his armie.

Selymus of late enuying at the great honour and authoritie of Muſtapha, and wiſhing him dead, (whoſe deſert he was not able, or at leaſtwiſe vnwilling to requite) cauſed him vpon this accuſation without further triall to be ſecretly ſtrangled in his ſight, and his dead bodie (as it were in ſcorne of his former felicitie) to be caſt out into the ſtreet for euery man to gaze vpon. This was the ſhamefull end of this traiterous Baſſa, who had of long time at his pleaſure commanded all things in the Turkiſh Empire, and was for riches, power, and authoritie, next vnto the Emperours themſelues: but now lieth as a dead dog in the ſtreet, no man daring for feare to caſt earth vpon him. A rare ſpectacle of the vncertaintie of worldly felicitie, and a worthie example of diſloyaltie. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Muſtapha, B in reuenge thereof in like manner executed Vſegi Baſſa his priſoner; and according to his courteous nature ſet all the reſt of the priſoners at libertie.

Muſtapha Baſſa ſhamefully murthered.

Vſegi Baſſa put to death.

Selymus thirſting after nothing more than the guiltleſſe bloud of his brethren and nephews, vpon whom he had againſt all right vſurped the kingdom, wherof he neuer thought himſelfe ſufficiently aſſured ſo long as any of them breathed; began with the firſt of the Spring to deuiſe with himſelfe, how he might firſt take away his brother Corcutus, who then liued at Magneſia, and hauing caſt off all hope of the Empire, gaue himſelfe wholly to the ſtudie of Phyloſophie, which he (ſeduced with ambition) had in euil time a little before forſaken; but now retyring himſelfe thereto againe, as to his greateſt contentment, ſpent his time in quiet con- C templation, not attempting any thing againſt his cruell brother vſurping the Empire. Selymus reſolued vpon the deſtruction of this harmleſſe Prince, ſuddenly commanded his captaines to make choice of 10000 horſemen to be in readineſſe within three dayes, giuing it out that he would make an inroad vpon the ſudden into Cappadocia. In the number of theſe horſemen, Antonius Mœnaninus a Genoway, author of this hiſtorie (as he of himſelfe reporteth) was one.

All things being in readines againſt the appointed time, Selymus in perſon himſelfe ſet forward with his armie from Pruſa, ſtill keeping the way on the right hand; ſo that the ſoldiers, who thought they ſhould haue marched directly into Cappadocia, and ſo to Amaſia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceiue by the contrarie courſe they held, that they were to go for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant ſouldier among the reſt, who had ſome- D time ſerued one of the Baſſa's in Corcutus his court, by diuers circumſtances gathering the intention of Selymus, ſecretly conueyed himſelfe out of the armie, and being excellently well mounted, taking the neereſt way, came to Magneſia, & gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Corcutus conſidering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the meſſenger, and leauing his houſe in ſuch order as it was woont to be, fled with two of his ſeruants to the ſea ſide, in hope to haue found paſſage either into Creet or elſe Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the caſtle of Magneſia before the riſing of the Sun, in hope to haue found Corcutus yet in his bed: but being deceiued of his expectation, he fel into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all E his brothers ſeruants and Eunuchs, What was become of him, and where he had hid himſelf? and with much ado got it out of them, That he had warning of his commiug by a fugitiue ſoldier, and was thereupon fled, but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus ſtayed there fifteen dayes, during which time he cauſed diligent ſearch to be made all ouer the countrey, and along the ſea coaſt, for to haue apprehended him. But when after much ſearch he could heare no tydings of him, he cauſed all his brothers treaſure & rich furniture to be truſſed vp, and to be ſent by ſea to Conſtantinople. So leauing one of his captains with a thouſand horſemen in garriſon at Magneſia, he returned againe to Pruſa with as much ſpeed as he came from thence: verily ſuppoſing, that his brother was for ſafegard of his life, by ſea fled into Italie. All this while Boſtanges, Selymus his ſonne in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coaſt of Ionia, F had taken from Corcutus all hope of eſcaping by ſea: ſo that he was faine to hide himſelfe in a caue neere vnto the ſea ſide, not far from Smyrna; liuing in hope, that after a few days the fleet would depart, and ſo he ſhould finde ſome opportunitie to eſcape.

After he had thus a great while in feare moſt miſerably liued with countrie crabs and other like wild fruit (a poore diet for a man of ſtate) and was with extream neceſſitie inforced to ſend his man for reliefe to a poore ſhepheards cottage thereby, he was by a country peſant diſcoue-

Corcutus taken red to Caſſumes, who with too much diligence ſought after his life: and being by him apprehended, was carried towards the tyrant his brother at Pruſa. G

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking: who as ſoone as he vnderſtood that he was within a daies journey of Pruſa, ſent one Kirengen-Ogli (who of his ſquint looke was called Chior Zeinal) to ſtrangle him vpon the way, and to bring his dead bodie to Pruſa.

This captaine comming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his ſleepe, told him his heauie meſſage; how that he was ſent from his brother Selymus to ſee him executed, which muſt as he ſaid preſently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with theſe heauie news, and fetching a deepe ſigh, deſired the captaine ſo long to ſpare his life, vntill hee might write a few ſhort lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore requeſt being granted, he called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkiſh verſe (for he had ſpent all his time H in ſtudie) reproued his brother of moſt horrible cruelty; vpbraiding him, that he had not only moſt diſloially thruſt his father out of his empire, but alſo moſt vnnaturally depriued him of life, of whom he had before receiued the ſame: and not ſo content, had moſt tyrannouſly ſlaine his brothers children; and now like an vnmerciful wretch thirſted after the guiltleſſe bloud of himſelfe, and Achomates his brethren. At laſt concluding his letters with many a bitter curſe, he beſought God to take of him iuſt reuenge for ſo much innocent bloud by him moſt vnnaturally ſpilt. And when he had thus much written, he requeſted the captaine, that it might together with his dead body be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any further delay hee was according to the tyrants command preſently ſtrangled. The next day after, when the dead body was preſented vnto Selymus, he vncouered the face therof, to be ſure that it was he, and ſee- I ing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruel nature and ſtony heart) he burſt out into tears; proteſting, that he was neuer ſo much grieued or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cauſe, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the court, & with princely ſolemnitie buried his bodie. Three daies after, he cauſed fifteen of thoſe diligent ſearchers who firſt found Corcutus, to haue their heads ſtruck off, and their bodies to be flung into the ſea, ſaying, That if he were by any extremitie driuen to flie & hide his head, they would not ſtick to ſerue him in like maner as they had don his brother.

The lamentable death of Corcutus.

Now of al the poſterity of Baiazet remained none aliue to trouble the cruel tirants thoughts but only Achomates and his two ſons: who vpon the approch of the Spring, ſet forward with his army from Amaſia, excited by the often letters of his friends, who aſſured him, that Selymus K might vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed, if he would with al expedition come to Pruſa; forasmuch as the Ianizaries & Europeian horſmen, the vndoubted ſtrength of his army, were at that time abſent, and he himſelfe as one hated both of God & man, could not in ſo ſudden and vnexpected danger tel what he were beſt to do, or which way to turn himſelfe: wherfore they willed him without delay to haſten his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, leſt in the mean time Selymus ſhould call together his diſperſed forces: God (they ſaid) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunitie and meanes to do great matters if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he ſhould do well now by celeritie and courage to ſeeke to better his euil fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers L kingdom; for if Summer were once come on, he muſt either gain the victorie by plain battell, which would be a hard matter, or els get him packing out of Capadocia and all Aſia the leſſe.

Achomates, who before had promiſed vnto himſelfe better ſucceſſe, as well for the great ſtrength he had of his own, as for the new ſupplie of horſemen he had procured from Hyſmael the Perſian king, but eſpecially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late crueltie, ſhould in the time of the battell be forſaken of his owne ſouldiers; yeelded to the perſuaſion of his friends, who with many pleaſing words ſet before his eies glorious things, eaſie to be ſpoken, but hard to bee effected. Wherefore, when hee was come into Galatia with ſomewhat more than 15000 horſmen, hauing for haſt left his footmen by eaſie marches to come after him: Selymus aduertiſed of his comming, by ſpeedie meſſengers ſent for his horſemen to Pruſa. In the mean time whiles he is leuying other common ſouldiers, & expe- M cting the reſt of his forces; fortune which alwaies fauored his attempts, did then alſo auert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulnes of his followers, & ſhewed to him the open way to victorie. For Achomates ſecret friends which were in Selymus his campe, continuing firm in their good wil toward him, did earneſtly by letters perſuade him (being already ſet for-

A ward,and now come as far as Paphlagonia)to make haſt,and to come before Selymus his forces were come together : for that he had ſent for the Ianizaries and Europeian horſemen,and did with all ſpeed and diligence make all the preparation he could poſſibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he ſhould vpon the ſudden come vpon him before he were prouided. Which letters being by chance intercepted,gaue Selymus certain knowledge both of his brothers purpoſe and comming, together with the treaſon intended againſt him by his owne ſeruants : wherefore executing them who had writ thoſe letters,he in their names cauſed others to the ſame effect to be written to Achomates, perſuading him with all ſpeed poſſible to come ſtill on,and not to ſtay for his footmen, for that Selymus might eaſily be oppreſſed with a few troups of horſmen,if Achomates would with ſpeed but come and ſhew himſelfe vnto his friends and fauorites: who vpon the firſt ſignall of battell would raiſe a tumult in the B armie,and vpon the ſudden kil Selymus, vnaduiſedly going too and fro in the battell. Which letters ſo written, Selymus cauſed to be ſigned with the ſeales of them whom hee had before executed,and found means to haue them cunningly deliuered to Achomates, as if they had bin ſent from his friends: who giuing credit to the ſame, and preſuming much vpon his owne ſtrength,doubted not to leaue his footmen,who followed eaſily after him, vnder the conduct of Amurath his ſon; and came and encamped with his horſemen neere vnto the mountaine Horminius,vpon the banke of the riuer Parthemius. Selymus alſo departed from Pruſa,and hauing receiued into his army ten thouſand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the ſtrait) ſent before Sinan Baſſa, Generall of his Aſian horſmen,to know & make proofe of the ſtrength of his enemies. The Baſſa not knowing as yet where Achomates lay,neither of what force he C was,being deceiued by the darkneſſe of the morning,fell into a place of diſaduantage, where he was ſet vpon by Achomates,and hauing loſt ſeuen thouſand of his men,was glad with other eight thouſand which were left,to flie backe vnto Selymus.

Treaſon againſt Selymus diſcouered.

Sinan Baſſa diſcomfited by Achomates.

For all this loſſe,was not Selymus diſcomforted,or doubtfull of the victorie, but forthwith marched on forward to the riuer Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine Horminius into Pontus,watering moſt large fields vpon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land.So did Achomates alſo,who although he knew his brother to bee euery way too ſtrong for him,yet being incouraged with the late victorie,and in hope that his friends in Selymus his army (whom he vainly ſuppoſed to haue bin yet liuing)would in the very D battell doe ſome notable matter for him, and that victorie would follow his iuſt quarrell; reſolued neither to retire backe,neither to expect the comming of the reſt of his army. The riuer was betwixt the two campes,and the number of both armies certainly diſcouered ; yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a ſafe retreat vnto the reſt of his army) poſſeſſed with a fatal madneſſe,be perſuaded (conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger)in time to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his army, carried headlong(as it ſeemed)by ineuitable deſtinie to his fatall deſtruction, which preſently after enſued.

Selymus a little before the going downe of the Sun,with his army paſſed ouer the riuer Elata,and gaue generall commandement through all his campe, that euery man againſt the next day ſhould be ready for battell : and in a wood not far off placed a thouſand horſemen in ambuſh, E vnder the leading of Caraglis,his wiues brother,a valiant yong gentleman, whom his father had a little before ſent from Taurica vnto his ſon in law with a choſen companie of Tartarian horſmen : vnto him Selymus gaue in charge,that when the battell was ioyned,he ſhould ſhew himſelfe with his horſemen vpon the backe of his enemies,and there to charge them.

As ſoone as it was day,Selymus in a great open field put his armie in order of battell,placing his horſemen in two wings,ſo that all his ſpearmen were in the right wing, & the archers and carbines in the left : in the maine battell ſtood the Ianizaries with the reſt of the footmen. On the other ſide Achomates hauing no footmen,diuided his horſemen into two wings alſo.

Whileſt both armies ſtood thus raunged, expecting but the ſignall of battell, a meſſenger came from Achomates to Selymus,offering in his maſters name, to trie the equitie of their F quarrel in plain combat hand to hand : which if he ſhould refuſe, he then tooke both God and the world to witnes,that Selymus was the only cauſe of al the guiltles bloud to be ſhed in the battel,& not he : whereunto Selymus anſwered,that he was not to trie his quarerl at the appointment of Achomates:& though he could be content ſo to doe,yet would not his ſoldiers ſuffer him ſo to aduenture his perſon & their own ſafety:& ſo with that anſwer returned the meſſenger backe againe to his maſter, giuing him for his reward a thouſand aſpers.

Achomates hauing receiued this anſwer, without further delay charged the right wing of his G brothers armie, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge: but when they were come to the ſword, and that the matter was to be tried by handie blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Perſian horſemen; who being well armed both horſe and man, had before requeſted to be placed in the formoſt ranks, by whoſe valor the right wing of Selymus his armie was diſordered, and not without great loſſe enforced to retire back vpon their fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them againe; and preſently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and piſtols, in ſtead of them that were fled: and at the ſame time came on with the Ianizaries alſo, who with their ſhot enforced Achomates his horſemen to retire. Achomates himſelfe carefully attending euery danger, with H greater courage than fortune came in with freſh troups of horſemen, by whoſe valor the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victorie made doubtfull: but in the fury of this battell whileſt he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victorie, Canoglis with his Tartarian horſemen riſing out of ambuſh, came behind him, & with great outcries cauſed their enemies (then in the greateſt heat of their fight) to turne vpon them: at which time alſo the footmen ſtanding cloſe together aſſailed them afront, and the horſemen whom the Perſians had at firſt put to flight, now moued with ſhame, were againe returned into the battell: ſo that Achomates his ſmall army was beſet, & hardly aſſailed on euery ſide. In fine his enſignes being ouerthrown, and many of his men ſlain, the reſt were faine to betake themſelues to flight. Where Achomates hauing loſt the field, & now to late ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe I by flight, fell with his horſe into a ditch, which the rain falling the day before, had filled with water and myre: and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtain ſo much fauour at their hands as to be preſently ſlaine, but was reſerued to the farther pleaſure of his cruell brother. Selymus vnderſtanding of his taking, ſent Kirengen (the ſame ſquint-eyed captaine which had before ſtrangled Corcutus) who with a bow ſtring ſtrangled him alſo. His dead bodie was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commandement in royall manner buried with his anceſtors in Pruſa.

Achomates ſtrangled.

Amurat and Aladin the ſons of Achomates, fly, the one into Perſia, and the other to Egypt.

Now Amurat, Achomates his ſonne, vnderſtanding vpon the way by the Perſian horſemen (who ſerred together, had againe made themſelues way through the Turks armie) of the loſſe of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to Amaſia: and there after K good deliberation, reſolued with his brother to betake themſelues both to flight; he with the Perſian horſmen paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, fled vnto Hyſmael the Perſian king: but Aladin the yonger brother paſſing ouer the mountain Amanus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and ſo to Campſon Gaurus the great Sultan of Ægypt.

After this victorie, Selymus hauing in ſhort time and with little trouble brought all the leſſer Aſia vnder his obeiſance, and there at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, determined to haue returned to Conſtantinople; but vnderſtanding that the plague was hot there, hee changed his purpoſe, and paſſing ouer at Callipolis and ſo trauelling through Grecia, came to Hadriaonple, where he ſpent al the reſt of the Summer, and all the Winter following: and afterward when the mortality was ceaſed, returned to Conſtantinople; where it was found, that an L hundred and threeſcore thouſand had there died of the late plague.

Hyſmael the Perſian king, whoſe fame had then filled the world, hearing of the arriuall of Amurat, ſent for him, and demanded of him the cauſe of his comming. The diſtreſſed young prince, who but of late had loſt his father, together with the hope of ſo great an empire, and now glad for ſafegard of his life to flie into ſtrange countries, oppreſſed with ſorrow, by his heauie countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expreſſed the cauſe of his comming: yet in ſhort ſtrained ſpeech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vncle, with the reſt of his couſins, all princes of great honour, had of late been cruelly murdred by the vnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like fury ſought alſo after the life of himſelfe & his brother, the poore remainders of the Othoman familie, who to ſaue their liues, were both glad to M flie, his brother into Ægypt, and himſelfe to the feet of his imperiall Maieſtie.

Hyſmael moued with compaſſion, and deeming it a thing well beſeeming the greatneſſe of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to giue him reliefe, willed him to be of good comfort, & promiſed him aid. And the more to aſſure him thereof, ſhortly after

A gaue him one of his owne daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus (for his tyrannie become odious to the world) ſhould by any meanes miſcarrie (as with tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman Familie, forſhaken with his vnnaturall crueltie, none was to be preferred before this poore Prince Amurat: beſides that, it was ſuppoſed, that if he ſhould inuade him with an armie out of Perſia, that vpon the firſt ſtir, all the leſſer Aſia mourning for the vnworthie death of Achomates, would at once reuolt from him, who for his crueltie and ſhamefull murthers had worthily deſerued to be hated together both of God and man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyſmael furniſhed Amurat his new ſonne in Law with ten thouſand horſemen, willing him to paſſe ouer the riuer of Euphrates at Arſenga, and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proofe how the people of that Countrey B were affected towards him, as of the ſtrength of the enemie: after whom he ſent Vſta-Ogli, the moſt famous Chiefetaine amongſt the Perſians, with twentie thouſand horſemen moe, with charge, That he ſhould ſtill follow Amurat within one dayes journey: and he himſelfe with a farre greater power ſtayed behinde in Armenia, doubting to want victuall, if he ſhould haue led ſo great an army through thoſe vaſt, barren, and deſolate places, whereby he muſt of neceſſitie paſſe.

Amurat marching through the leſſer Armenia, and entering into the borders of Cappadocia, had diuers townes yeelded vnto him by his friends, ſome others he tooke by force, which he either ſacked or elſe quite raſed; and brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the inhabi-C tants of that prouince, that the people ſubmitting themſelues vnto him all the way as he went, it was thought he would haue gon directly to Amaſia, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captaine whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant in Aſia) with a great armie come to meet him at Sebaſtia, which at this day is called Siuas. This Chendemus had alſo long before aduertiſed Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Perſians, as ſoone as he had learned by his eſpials, That they were paſſed the riuer Euphrates. Vpon which news Selymus came preſently ouer into Aſia, and commanding all his forces to meet together at Pruſa, had with wonderfull celeritie leuied thereabout fortie thouſand common ſoldiers. Which ſo ſoon as Amurat vnderſtood, as wel by ſuch priſoners as he had taken, as by aduertiſement from his friends, although he was verie deſirous to haue fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus D ſhould with his wonted celeritie come againſt him, he ſhould be intangled in the ſtraits of the mountaine Antitaurus, he retyred backe againe to Vſta-Ogli. But Selymus, who all that yeare had in his haughtie thoughts beene plotting ſome ſuch notable exployt as were worthie his greatneſſe, ſtanding in doubt whether he ſhould by ſea and land inuade Hungarie, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time ſore ſhaken with ciuile wars; hauing now ſo fit an occaſion giuen him by the Perſian, to the great joy of all Chriſtendome, conuerted himſelf wholly vnto the Eaſt, and in thirtie dayes march came to Arſenga. Where joyning his armie with Chendemus, when he vnderſtood that his enemies hauing harried the countrey, were againe retyred; prickt forward with the griefe of the iniurie, and deſire of reuenge, with hope of victorie he reſolued E to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into Armenia the greater, the principall prouince of the Perſian Kingdome.

Amurat ſpoileth Capadocia.

Selymus reſolueth to inuade the Perſian.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Councell propounded by them which had beſt knowledge of thoſe countries, were great and many; all which by his owne good hap and inuincible courage, he himſelfe afterwards ouercame: for the ſouldiers which had in ſhort time alreadie marched by land out of Illiria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, muſt of neceſſitie in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the ſharpe and pinching cold of the huge mountaine Taurus, and by and by after the moſt vehement and ſcortching heat in the plaines of Armenia the leſſer, with extreame thirſt, hunger, and moſt deſperat want of all things: and well the more, for that the Perſians in F their retreat ſpoyling the country as they went, had vtterly deſtroyed all that might ſerue for the vſe of man, of purpoſe to leaue nothing to their enemies but want of all things, if they ſhould purſue them: beſides that, his moſt expert Captaines ſtood in no ſmall doubt of the pettie Princes of Armenia the leſſe, and the mountaine King Aladeules, whom they were to leaue behinde them at their backes, without any great aſſurance of their friendſhip, who they well knew would leaue them, if any thing ſhould happen otherwiſe than well to Selymus, either in the battell, or for want of victuals, or in the ſtrait paſſages. For they were to be re- G lieued with victuals from the Armenians: and Aladeules forces then in readineſſe, were neither for number nor power to be contemned; who alſo with caſtles commodiouſly placed, and ſtrong garriſons, at his pleaſure commanded all the ſtraits, paſſages, and entrances which led out of Capadocia into Armenia and the Perſian kingdome: for all the mountaine countreys were vnder his command, and his kingdome ſtretched from the mountaines called Scodriſci neere vnto Pontus, all alongſt the great mountaine Taurus vnto Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria.

Amongſt the reſt, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natolia, a man of great experience, and of all others in greateſt credit, fauour, and authoritie with Selymus, perſuaded him to ſtay a while in Capadocia, and there to refreſh his Europeian ſouldiers alreadie wearie of their long trauell, H and ſo to expect the comming of his enemies. And to perſuade him from the dangerous expedition into Perſia, ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Chendemus Baſſa diſſuades Selymus from going any further againſt the Perſians.

It is not to be thought (moſt mightie and inuincible Emperour, that the Perſians are fled for feare, becauſe they retyred before they ſet eye vpon vs their enemies: it is a fineneſſe, and they plainly go about to entrap vs, whiles they by flight make a falſe ſemblant of feare. Know we not what cunning heads, what able bodies Perſia breedeth? Will they feare the naked Turkiſh light horſeman or archer, which with their couragious barbed horſes and themſelues ſtrongly armed, feared not the Scythian ſhot? or (if that be too little) which by their valour haue vanquiſhed ſo many nations, and gained vnto their King ſo great and large an Empire? Thinke you, that you haue either greater or better forces than had long I agoe Caſſumes your vncle, or Great Mahomet your Grandfather; who diuers times prouing their Forces againſt this enemie, where more than once put to the worſt, I my ſelfe then ſeruing in their camps neere vnto Trapezond and the mountaines of Nicopolis. I will not denie, but that the great ordnance which you carrie with you may ſtand you in great ſtead, ſo that fit place may be found to beſtow ſo many field pieces in: but thus ſcortched ground, the frozen and abrupt mountains, with the vaſt and ſolitarie plaines beyond them, terrifie me, whom all the armed Forces of our enemies in places of great aduan-tage could not diſmay. You muſt fight not onely with your valiant enemies, but with the difficulties of nature alſo. Neither may your Maieſtie giue any credit to the Armenians or Aladeules, Princes of moſt doubtfull faith: although at your firſt ſetting forward they ſhew a faire face, and ſeeme neuer ſo friendly: for they will but expect and await ſome fit occaſion to take you at an aduantage, and ſo to ſet K vpon you when you leaſt feare them. But admit you were aſſured of victorie, O with how much warme bloud of your beſt ſouldiers ſhall you buy the ſame? with what other ſouldiers, with what other Forces will you defend Grecia, if the Chriſtian Kings hearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or deſire of fame being gone into the furtheſt part of Armenia, ſhall in the meane time inuade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wiſedome, with ſafetie to defend your owne, than with danger to ſeeke for that is other mens; if Princes of greateſt policie haue repoſed the glorie of their victorie, not in the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter of their enemies, but in the ſafetie and preſeruation of their owne ſouldiours: ſpare to obiect your ſelfe and your armie to moſt manifeſt danger, and vnaduiſedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good fortune: which being a moſt tickle and vnconſtant miſtreſſe, if ſhe ſhall but once dallie L with your dangerous attempts, you ſhall through your raſhneſſe in farre ſhorter ſpace tumble down head long from the type of ſo great maieſtie, than you haue thereunto a while agoe by your rare vertues worthily aſpired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce nature, ſo would he haue all things done according to his own deuice and direction; and though he were not a little moued with this ſpeech of ſo graue a counſellor and moſt expert commander, and ſaw many of his captains troubled with the imagination of the future danger; yet in a fume refuting ſome little of that which Chen- demus had ſayd, he diſmiſſed the Councell, proteſting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpoſe, hap what hap ſhould, from friend or foe: although that old fellow were (as M he ſaid) ſo careful of his life, that he feared to die an noble death. Which Selymus had no ſooner ſaid, but preſently others about him, accuſtomed to ſerue his humor, which enuied at the glorie and wealth of old Chendemus, tooke hold vpon theſe words, and beginning with the great-neſſe of his forces, the valour of his ſoldiers, the ſtore of his artillerie, with his own inuincible fortune, made eaſie matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words labored to ex-

A tenuat all that the graue Baſſa had before ſaid concerning the prowеſſe and power of the enemie. After that, they began to diſcredit Chendemus, ſaying, That he (being a martiall man, and of knowne reſolution in all his moſt warlike actions) had not ſaid as before, for want of courage, of any diſtruſt he had of the victory, but of purpoſe to hinder that moſt honorable expedition, and to cut off all hope of victorie, which was (as they ſaid) as good as alreadie gotten; being before loded with Amurat his great promiſes, and the gold of Perſia. Wherefore they wiſhed him to beware of the ſlie old Fox his wyles and treaſon, and to proceed on in his expedition ſo much the more boldly: and not to thinke that his ſoldiers would refuſe any danger or labour, ſo long as they ſaw courage in himſelfe, but would be readie (as they ſaid) to vndertake the moſt deſperat difficulties of war, and deſired nothing more, than to be conducted B into thoſe far Countries, where by their martiall prowеſſe and valiant acts they might make their Emperor Selymus equall with the great Alexander, and themſelues comparable to his Macedonians. And to worke the vtter deſtruction of this moſt faithful counſellor without all recure, theſe falſe flatterers ſuborned bold faced accuſers, who falſly and ſhamefully affirmed, that he had receiued great ſums of mony from Amurat, and did not therfore in time go againſt the Perſian robbers, whereby all the former calamities hapned (as they ſaid) to that prouince. For which pretended cauſes, Selymus commanded Chendemus without further hearing to be ſlaine: but indeed to terrifie others from like libertie of ſpeech, and withall to teach them, to deeme thoſe deuices and counſels as moſt excellent, which their Soueraigne ſhould as it were by diuine inſpiration finde out himſelfe, and ſo to accept of them without contradiction. The C ſudden death of this moſt faithfull counſellor Chendemus, ſtrucke an exceeding feare into the minds of all men, for that ſo honorable a perſonage, of late in ſo great credit and fauour with his Soueraigne, was without hearing executed; whom they had known as a man of great account, both for his prowеſſe and policie, to haue ſtood faſt on Selymus ſide, firſt in his warres againſt his father, and of late againſt his brother: not doubting but that Selymus, by nature cruell and ſuſpicious euen of trifles, would with like tyrannie not ſpare men of meaner calling, which ſpared not his deareſt and moſt antient friends.

Selymus marching from Arſenga, came to the confines of the leſſer Armenian kings, and of Aladeules; where by his Embaſſadors he requeſted the kings of thoſe nations (who were then in armes) that they would ioyne their Forces with his againſt the Perſian, and to go with him D into Armenia the great: promiſing that when the wars were happily ended, he would giue vnto them all ſuch territorie as ſhould chance in thoſe wars to be taken from the enemie, as a reward of their aid. But theſe poore Kings, which hated both Hyſmael and Selymus for their manifold iniuries they dayly receiued in the frontiers of their dominions, lying in the midſt betweene them, (as commonly it falleth out, that the weakeſt goe to the walls) craftily expecting the euent of this war, would not openly ſhew themſelues, but anſwered, that they had taken vp armes for no other purpoſe, but for the defence of themſelues and their kingdomes. Not meaning in that doubtfull war to beare themſelues as enemies vnto either of thoſe great Princes their friends and neighbours, of whoſe iuſt grieuances they were not able or worthie to determine: yet if he would without hoſtilitie in peaceable manner paſſe through their Do- E minions, they promiſed to giue free paſſage vnto him and his armie; and after he was entered into Armenia the greater, to releeue him with ſuch prouiſion of victuall as their bare Countries could affoord.

Selymus thus deceiued of this his firſt hope, (for why, he thought thoſe poore kings would at the firſt either for loue or feare haue bin readie to haue done him all the ſeruice they could) diſſembled his griefe for the preſent, as wholly bent againſt Hyſmael: fearing that if he ſhould by word or deed offend thoſe neuter Princes, he ſhould haue them at his backe his moſt aſſured & vndoubted enemies. Wherfore paſſing the mountains called Scodriſci, he came in eight days vnto the great mountaine called Moſchij, which the famous riuer Euphrates, with his mighty ſtreame and hugie broken bankes, ſeparateth from the great mountain Antitaurus, and F with perpetuall ſteepe ridges runneth into Iberia & Colchis, and on the Eaſt diſcouereth Armenia the greater. Here Selymus with enſignes diſplaied marching alongſt the banke of the riuer, departed not from the ſame, for feare to lacke water in that hot and drie country; and ſo held on his way directly Eaſtward, leauing the countrey of Armenia the leſſe vpon his left hand, and the frontiers of the kingdome of Aladeules on the right, vntill he came vnto the mountaine Periardo. This great mountaine, famous by the riſing of two great and notable Riuers out of it, is for the wonderfull fertilitie of all things, of the barbarous people called Lepeus, which is to ſay, fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two diuers and contrarie marſhes, with many armes, water and enrich that champain and dry country. Selymus hauing made ſo great a journy, and yet not able ſo much as by report, to vnderſtand what was become of Hyſmael his ſo great and populous army, which he knew was but a little before departed out of Capadocia; as a man in doubt and halfe afraid, ſtayed and incamped his armie at the head of the riuer Euphrates, and from thence ſent out his ſcouts euery way, if happily they could intercept ſome which might giue him knowledge of his enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for feare of the comming of the Turks, or that Hyſmael their king had ſo commanded, were all before fled out of that part of the countrey whereby Selymus was to paſſe with his army; and hauing forſaken their houſes, had carried away with them, or elſe by fire deſtroyed whatſoeuer might ſerue for the vſe of man. G H

The Turkiſh ſcouts after they had by the ſpace of two dayes ſcoured vp and downe the countrie, returned back again to Selymus, not hauing taken ſo much any as one man; ſhewing vnto him, That all things were deſtroyed before him, and nothing left but wilde fields and a moſt deſolate country, without any appearance of man or beaſt: and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian guides were deceiued in the way, or elſe had of purpoſe brought them into ſuch deſart places, whereas wanting paſture for their horſes, and food for men, they muſt needs together periſh with hunger. Which their preſent feare was greatly increaſed by the weake kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but eſpecially Aladeules, who either for ſhame or feare had a few dayes at the firſt holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were farther entred into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before moſt faithfully promiſed: ſeeking therein the fauor of Hyſmael, who he thought would with the ſame good fortune vanquiſh the Turks, that he had not long before the greateſt part of the Eaſt. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to ſuſpect treaſon, to feare famin, to dread the deſarts and forſaken places, and with griefe of minde to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull counſellour had before moſt truly told him: for all that, he ſhewed himſelfe vnto his ſoldiers with cheerefull countenance, as a man nothing diſmaied: which his firme conſtancie ſeemed to promiſe vnto their diſcouraged minds good ſucceſſe, with ſpeedie victorie. Wherfore calling vnto him his guides, and ſuch as beſt knew the countrey; and vnderſtanding by them, that on the right hand beyond the mountaine Periardo lay the moſt fruitfull countrey of all Armenia, he roſe with his army, and compaſſing the hil toward the North, turned down toward the riuer Araxes, and aboue the citie of Coy paſſed his armie ouer the riuer, his footmen by little bridges, and his horſemen by foords: for Araxes, vntill it haue receiued ſuch riuers as fall into it out of the marſhes of Periardo, runneth but with a ſmall ſtreame, and is in ſome place eaſie to be paſſed ouer. I K

Selymus had ſcarcely well got ouer the riuer, and incamped his great armie, when Vſta-Ogli (who hauing joined his forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off, and fearing leſt the citie of Coy and the vnprouided citiſens ſhould by the ſudden comming of the enemie be oppreſſed) quickely roſe with his armie, and ſet forwards to meet the Turkes: for that citie of all others in that country, for freſh fountains and riuers, moſt pleaſant (wherein the Perſian Kings for the great plentie of all manner of fruit, and wholſomeneſſe of the aire, leauing Tauris, were woont to ſpend moſt part of the Summer) had then in it many rich citiſens & ſumptuous buildings, which Vaſta-Ogli thought good betimes to reſcue, and not with diſhonour to loſe that rich citie, looking as it were vpon it, and leauing it vnto the enemie, to ſuffer him there to refreſh his hunger-ſtarued ſoldiers with plentie of all things. Caſsimus an Armenian borne, and preſent in thoſe wars, did by many probabilities (as Iouius writeth) ſhew vnto him, That this citie of Coy was in antient time that moſt famous citie which was called Artaxata, which Domitius Corbulo deſtroyed. Neither did Hyſmael himſelfe (although he had but a little before ſent the greateſt part of his forces againſt the Coraxeni, who were then riſen vp againſt him in rebellion; as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durſt haue come ſo far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as ſoone as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came alſo in perſon himſelfe vnto his armie. L M

By chance Vſta-Ogli (who contrary to all mens expectation had vntill then ſhunned to fight, or come in ſight of his enemies, of purpoſe with leſſe danger and loſſe of men to ouerthrow them afterwards, being ſore weakned and almoſt ſpent with long trauell and want of victuals) lay then incamped neere the citie, when as the Turkes ſcouts, vpon the comming of Hyſmael, perceiued by the great riſing of the duſt, and by the neighing of the Perſian horſes, that ſome greater power was at hand. Which ſo ſoone as it was noyſed in the Turkiſh campe, they began to reioyce exceedingly, and to conceiue the firſt hope both of their ſafetie and victorie; glad, that now meeting with their enemies, they ſhould either by victorie turne their labour, toyle, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time ſtriuen, into eaſe and plentie of all things, or elſe by honorable death end all their miſeries at once: for many of the horſemen, eſpecially of them that came out of Europe, whoſe horſes were ſtarued for want of forrage, and the common footmen ſpent with long trauell, and grieuouſly troubled with the flix, (who trauelling in the extreame heat of the Sun, had for moſt part liued vpon crabs and other wild fruits, with a bad ſupping made of meale and vinegre, and almoſt deſpairing to get the ſight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hyſmael as ſoone as he was come within ſight of his enemies, repoſing great confidence as well in the valor of his ſoldiers, as in his own rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battell: whereupon he ſent an herauld vnto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilfull ſoldiers, which ſhould in beſt ſort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillerie, and in what ſort they lay incamped: and to tell him, That foraſmuch as he had no title vnto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed any intereſt therein, he could not but maruell, why he had againſt all right entred with his armie into his dominion: but if he happely vpon a vaine preſumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, ſhould thinke ſo much of the world his own, as he could by the ſword and his own good fortune win, he ſhould then make himſelfe readie againſt the next day to make proofe of his fortune, and the forces of others not inferiot to his owne.

Hyſmael ſends an herauld to Selymus.

Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That the freſh remembrance of the manifold iniuries done to the Turks by the Perſians, was ſuch, as might giue him juſt cauſe to take vp armes: for as much as long ago both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his vncle Caſſumes, and euen of late his father Baiazet, and he himſelfe alſo in his wars againſt his brother Achomates, had receiued great wrong and diſhonor from the Perſians. All which things, although they were of themſelues important, yet he eſteemed not of them as ſufficient cauſes of warre, but onely ſought after his enemy Amurat, his brothers ſon, who had of late ſpoyled Capadocia: whom if he would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutuall lawes of amitie and friendſhip amongſt Princes for the maintenance and preſeruation of their eſtates and kingdomes required, then he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably returne into his kingdome: otherwiſe, he threatned with fire and ſword to deſtroy, not the frontiers of Armenia, but euen the heart of Perſia. And ſo diſmiſſing the herauld, both the armies for that day lay ſtill in their trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battell.

Selymus his anſwer vnto Hyſmael.

The next day Selymus by perſuaſion of his captaines brought his armie into the open field, and in order of battel ſet forward againſt his enemies, which lay about two miles off, thinking that Hyſmael, a prince of ſo great name, would without delay accept of battel: yet what ſtrength the Perſian king was of, what number of men he had, what manner of horſemen, how armed, and with what weapons, he could not certainly learne: for beſide that the Perſians are by nature ingenious and ſubtill, the ſoldiers generally ſo reuerenced and loued Hyſmael their king, that no one was found to haue gone from him to the Turke: whereas many reuolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Perſian captaines.

Selymus, who had at that time 80000 horſemen vnder his enſignes, placed Chaſan Baſſa his lieutenant general of Europe, with his Europeian horſemen in the right wing; and Sinan Baſſa with his Aſian horſemen in the left: and before them both the Acanzij, which are voluntary horſemen the forerunners of the Turks armie, who in hope of ſpoile follow the Turks wars out of all countries: in the middle battel he placed the Aſapi or common ſoldiers, which baſe and halfe naked people, as men of little worth or eſtimation, are commonly thruſt into the front of the Turks battels, to receiue the firſt furie of the enemie, and to blunt their ſwords, more than for any other good ſeruice: directly behind them he beſtowed his great artillerie, guarded with 4000 horſemen: laſt of all followed himſelfe with his choſen pentioners and Ianizaries compaſſed about with ſmal field-pieces, and his carriages, as with a double trench: G for he had (as their manner is) ſo inuironed himſelfe round with his ſadled camels made faſt one to another with long chains, that they ſtood him in ſtead of a ſtrong trench, from whence he might ſpeedily relieue any part of his diſtreſſed armie; and in caſe of extremitie being in the midſt of his ſtrength, might as out of a ſure fort repreſſe the furious aſſault of his enemies. He alſo commanded his footmen in the vauward of his battell, that vpon the approch of the enemies horſe, they ſhould ſpeedily withdraw themſelues aſide into two parts, leauing ſpace for the great ordnance which was placed behind them to play in the middle between them. On the contrarie part Hyſmael, who by the Turks fugitiues vnderſtood all the deuices of his enemies, calling vnto him the chiefe commanders of his armie, ſhewed vnto them, That there was no doubt of the victorie, ſo that they could ſhun the furie of the great artillerie: which H he aſſured them would eaſily be done, if when they ſaw the Turkiſh footmen diuide themſelues, they would alſo in like manner withdraw themſelues into two parts, and giue place to the furie of the great ordnance: for which purpoſe he cauſed two great enſignes to be diſplaied, whereunto they ſhould at the time appointed retyre, the one for himſelfe and thoſe whom he conducted, the other for Vſta Ogli and the reſt of his armie.

Hyſmael (as Iouius reporteth) had in his army about thirtie thouſand horſmen, without any footmen, amongſt whom were ten thouſand men at armes, reſolute gentlemen of great experience, all gallantly mounted vpon couragious barbed horſes, and themſelues brauely armed, both for the ſhew and the terrour of the enemy; their weapons were a good lance, a ſure ſcimitar, I and a horſemans mace; the reſt were armed with ſtrong cuiraſſes and head-pieces, and were either archers on horſebacke, or elſe vſed light horſemens ſtaues, made of aſh after the Spaniſh faſhion, wherewith they ſerued at the halfe ſtaffe. As for guns they had none, in which thing only and number of men, they were inferior to the Turks. But ſuch was the inuincible courage and noble mindes of the Perſians, that contemning the huge multitude of their enemies (who were in number about three hundred thouſand) and making no great reckoning of their great artillerie, they doubted not with ſo few to giue them battell.

Hyſmael hauing giuen the ſignall of battell, came on with his armie, exhorting his ſoldiers then to remember the honour they had long before gotten in many battels, and couragiouſly to follow him their Soueraigne, whom they by their worthie ſeruice and many victories had K made the greateſt Monarch of the Eaſt; telling them, that they ſhould haue now to doe but with naked men, whoſe weapons were but weake ſtaues and light targuets, and their horſes little poore jades almoſt dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the firſt charge of his valiant men at armes.

On the other ſide, Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies by the riſing of the duſt, cauſed knowledge to be giuen through his armie by his captaines and officers, that the time of battel which they had ſo long wiſhed for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily acquite themſelues againſt thoſe their proud enemies, they ſhould to their immortall fame extend the Turkiſh Empire from the Perſian ſea to the mountain Caucaſus: but if they cowardly forgetting their antient proweſſe, ſhould faint in time of battell, they were not then to L thinke by any meanes to eſcape by flight backe againe through thoſe great plaines and deſolate countries; where they ſhould by the way either ſhamefully periſh, or elſe to their perpetuall infamie be taken priſoners, and as baſe ſlaues, during their liues be enforced to ſerue the Perſian women: foraſmuch as beſide the great diſtance of the place, both the great riuer Euphrates, and the huge mountaine Taurus, and the faithleſſe king Aladeules, who had ſhut vp all the paſſages, did cut off all hope from them, if they ſhould be ouercome, by any meanes poſſible to eſcape backe againe into Capadocia.

When Hyſmael was come neere with his armie, and the Aſapi vpon ſigne giuen diuiding themſelues, made place for the great artillerie to play, as was before appointed; he alſo preſently diuiding his horſmen, charged the right wing of the Turks armie, with ſuch force, that after a moſt terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks, and the valiant Perſian men at armes, M Chaſan Baſſa the great commander of the Europian horſmen, with the formoſt of that wing being ſlain, and many more after them, he inforced all that wing to retyre vnto that place where Selymus himſelf with the Ianizaries ſtood. On the other ſide, Vſta-Ogli hauing receiued no little harm by the Turks great ordnance, becauſe he had not ſo ſpeedily cleered himſelfe & his fol-

A followers of that danger, as had Hyſmael, charged the Aſian horſemen in the left wing, and there in bloudie battell made great ſlaughter of the enemie, but not with like good hap as did Hyſmael: for whiles he moſt couragiouſly in the formoſt rankes aſſailed his enemies, he was ſtruck with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. With whoſe fall the Turks were greatly encouraged, inſomuch as that they which but now were glad to giue ground, and had loſt the third part of that wing, began afreſh to renew the battell, and valiantly to withſtand the Perſians; and with their harquebuſiers (wherwith the Perſian horſmen were wonderfully terrified) draue them headlong vpon the Turks common footmen. The Perſians whether it were forced by neceſſitie for that they had loſt ſo great a commander, and not wel able to gouerne their horſes terrified with the thundring ſhot, or elſe for that the open ſide of the footmen preſented vnto them B greater place of aduantage, ſerring themſelues together brake through the middle of the battell of thoſe Turkiſh footmen, and bearing them down before them with a mightie ſlaughter, came to the great ordnance and there ſlew the canoniers, who diſcharging their field pieces at all aduentures, in that great medly made a foule ſlaughter, as well of their owne men as of their enemies. And ſo without ſtop (as victorious conquerors) made way through the midſt of their enemies, vntill they came to the right wing: where Hyſmael was ſtill hardly charging the Europeian horſemen, who hauing before loſt Chaſan their Generall, and beeing many of them ſlaine or wounded, were already enforced to retire; but now charged afreſh vpon the ſide, had much adoe to endure the fury of their enemies, but as men in extreame danger, were glad to crie to Selymus for helpe.

Vſta-ogli ſlain.

C In this hard diſtreſſe, Selymus in two places opened his carriages, wherewith he ſtood as it were entrenched, and preſently ſent out part of his horſmen. And by and by turning himſelfe vnto his Ianizaries, ſaid, This daies victorie is reſerued (moſt worthie ſouldiers) vnto your valor and labor, wherefore now valiantly ſet forward, and as freſh and couragious men, aſſaile your wearied enemies; their horſes are all on a water with ſweat, and the men themſelues faint vnder the waight of their armor. But yet for all that Selymus could ſay, the Ianizaries were not very forward, but ſtood ſtill, as men willing in ſo great a danger to keepe themſelues within the ſafegard of their munition. Wherefore whileſt they at their leiſure ſet forward, the Perſians in the midſt of the heat of this victorie, compaſſing in the Europeian horſemen, ſlew them downeright, Selymus looking on and wiſhing in vain to help them. Fabritius Carrettus great Maſter of the Rhodes, D who of all theſe things had certaine intelligence, writ to Leo the tenth then Biſhop of Rome, that the Ianizaries refuſed to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by any perſuaſion or in-treatie to be induced to relieue the diſtreſſed Europeian horſemen; but as men diſtruſting the euent of the battell, choſe rather in their ſtrength to expect the ſucceſſe therof, than with moſt manifeſt danger to expoſe themſelues vnto the violence of the Perſian horſemen, which had as a tempeſt ouerborne the vantgard of the Turkiſh footmen.

The Perſians were now ready on euery ſide to haue aſſailed Selymus in his greateſt ſtrength: when Sinan Baſſa, although the wing he led was ſore rent and weakned, yet following the Per-ſians through the midſt of the heaps of the ſlaine footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus, and with certain freſh troups which had eſcaped the fury of Vſta-Ogli, reſtored the battell be-E fore almoſt loſt: but eſpecially by the inuincible courage of Alis-Beg and Mahomet his brother, diſcended of the honorable familie of the Molcozzij, which for nobilitie amongſt the Turks is accounted next vnto the Othomans; both of them for courage reſembling their warlike father Malcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition he made into Friuli againſt the Venetians in the raigne of BaiaZet. Selymus alſo not yet diſcouraged but ſtil in hope, commanded all the great ordnance wherewith he was enuironed, which he had reſerued as his laſt refuge, to be diſcharged: by the violence whereof, ſuch ſlaughter was made, as well of his owne men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for duſt, what for ſmoake, and thundring of the artillerie, hauing on both ſides almoſt loſt the vſe of ſight and hearing, and their horſes being ſo terrified with the thundring report of the great ordnance, that they were not now to be ru-F led, the battell was broken off, the victory yet doubtfull. The Turkiſh hiſtories to expreſſe the terror of this day, number it amongſt their diſmall daies, terming it The onely day of doome.

The terrour of the battell betweene Selymus and Hyſmael.

Hyſmael in this furious battell, hauing receiued a wound vnder his left ſhoulder with a ſmall ſhot, by perſuaſion of his friends withdrew himſelfe to haue his wound ſearched: which thing vndoubtedly was the ſafegard both of Selymus and his army: for the Perſians by & by folowing their king, left the victory, now in all mens opinion almoſt gotten. But after that Hyſmael perceiued the wound was not deepe, for that the ſtrengh of his armor had ſo broken the force of the ſhot, that it pierced not farre into his bodie, hee was about to haue charged the Turks afreſh: but vnderſtanding of the death of Vſta-Ogli, in whom for his ſingular experience in martial affaires, he had repoſed his greateſt confidence; and his captains alſo perſuading him not to make ſo light reckoning of his wound, the griefe whereof he yet felt not, being warme, but to haue regard to his owne health: he in ſeemly order ſoftly marched away in ſuch ſort, that his departure had no reſemblance of flight. And paſſing by the citie of Tauris, willed the chiefe of the citizens to open the gates of the citie to Selymus (if he ſhould come thither) and to receiue his garriſons, rather than by vaine conſtancie to fall into vtter deſtruction: and ſo marched himſelfe into the confines of Media.

But the Turks intangled with many difficulties, hauing no hearts for feare, nor ſtrength for wearineſſe to purſue their enemies, yet comming to the Perſian tents, tooke them without reſiſtance: where beſide the rich pauillions wrought with needle worke of ſilke and gold, and much other pretious furniture, many noble ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Perſians had followed their husbands in thoſe wars, whom Selymus cauſed to be all freely ſet at libertie vntouched, excepting one of the wiues of Hyſmael whom he detained and gaue her in marriage to one of his Baſſaes. Some which were preſent at this battell, reported that amongſt the heapes of them that were ſlaine, were found the dead bodies of diuers Perſian women, which being armed, & following their husbands, died with them in the battell; whom Selymus cauſed to be honeſtly buried.

Thus was that notable battel fought in the Galderan fields neere vnto the citie of Coy, betwixt theſe two great princes, the ſeuenth day of Auguſt in the yeare of our Lord, 1514. In which battell Selymus loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men, amongſt whom was Cheſan Baſſa his great lieutenant in Europe, ſeuen Sanzackes, in which were the two Malcoczian brethren, who labouring the one to reſcue the other, were both together ſlaine. Beſide his common footmen of whom he made leaſt reckoning, he loſt moſt part of his Illirian, Macedonian, Seruian, Epirot, Theſſalian, and Thracian horſmen, the vndoubted flower and ſtrength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almoſt all ſlaine, or grieuouſly wounded.

Selymus for all this great loſſe, by the confeſſion of his enemies hauing gotten the victorie, and receiuing Embaſſadors from Coy and the cities thereabout, and the great citie of Tauris, promiſing to relieue him with whatſoeuer he needed, and to do what els he ſhould command: marched directly to Tauris, deſiring both to ſee and poſſeſſe himſelfe of that citie, as one of the chiefe pallaces of the Perſian kings. This citie is two dayes iourney diſtant from Coy where the battell was fought, & is verily thought to be the famous city called in antient time Ecbathana, about an hundred and fiftie miles diſtant from the Caſpian ſea. The citizens were readie at the comming of the Turks, and brought them great ſtore of victuals out of the gates of the citie, where Selymus had lodged his armie in the ſuburbs, thinking it no ſafetie to lodge within that great and populous citie, contenting himſelfe to haue the gates thereof deliuered vnto him, which he kept with ſtrong guard. Some report that Selymus durſt not truſt the Perſians, and therefore neuer went into the citie but diſguiſed in the habit of a common ſouldier. Yet ſome others ſay, that he did with great magnificence banquet in the ſtately pallace of the Perſian king, and there had great diſcourſe with them of Tauris concerning his late victorie. But whileſt he thus ſtaied at Tauris, and with himſelfe purpoſed to ſpend that winter in Armenia, he called together his great captains and commanders of his armie, to know how they liked therof: who fearing his diſpleaſure, wholly referred themſelues to his own reſolution. Only Muſtapha his chiefe Baſſa chanced to ſay, That it were good that the minds of the Ianizaries and the other ſoldiers of the court ſhould therin be known. Which his ſpeech, Selymus tooke in ſuch euill part, that he preſently commanded him out of his ſight, and depriued him of his greateſt honor: and the more to diſgrace him, ſent one of his ieſters after him, who in great ſcorne and deriſion comming behind him, cut of part of his tulipant that hung down as the faſhion was. But the Ianizaries vnderſtanding the matter, and much offended with the indignitie offered vnto the great Baſſa whom they deerely loued, roſe vp all together in armes, & told Selymus flatly, That they would not in any caſe winter ſo far from home in the enemies country: and therfore that it were beſt for him betime to conſider of the matter, for that they

A were reſolutely ſet downe to forſake him if he would needs ſtay, and not with ſpeed returne. Selymus much troubled with this inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing dayly, that Hyſmael with new ſupplies out of Iberia, Albania, and Parthia, was comming vpon him with greater power than before, and conſidering withall, with what difficulty and danger he had eſcaped in the late battell, preſerued rather by his good fortune and force of his great artillerie, than the valour and proweſſe of his ſouldiers, and withall ſuſpecting the multitude and ſtrength of the Tauriſians, of whoſe fidelitie he could make no reckoning, he changed his former determination, and reſolued againe to returne into Capadocia: whereupon hauing contrarie to his promiſe exacted a great maſſe of money from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carrying away with him three thouſand families, the beſt artificers in that citie, eſpecially ſuch as were skilfull in making of armour and weapons, and ſo with ſpeed retired towards the riuer Euphrates, B a longer way than that whereby he came: fearing to returne againe by the head of Araxis and the mountains Periardes, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horſmen, who were reported to be then comming againſt him.

Hyſmael vnderſtanding of his departure, followed after with as much ſpeed as he could, leauing behind him for haſt his carriages and ſuch of his ſouldiers as were not able to indure ſo long and ſpeedie a march: yet for all his haſt (forſomuch as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not ouertake any part of his army, vntil he was come to the great riuer Euphrates, where Selymus ſtaying two daies, and hauing made diuers little boats, was paſſing ouer his footmen: which becauſe they were not ſufficient for the ſpeedie tranſportation of ſo C great a multitude, many for haſt ſwam ouer the riuer with bladders, & ſome aduentured to get ouer vpon the broken peeces of their carriages, which they had for that purpoſe burſt in ſunder. Selymus himſelf got ouer to the farther bank in a little boat, hauing before cauſed his horſmen with their horſes at once to take the riuer, of purpoſe to break the violence of the ſtream, whereby his footmen & cammels with their burdens got ouer with leſſe danger, and ſome of his field pieces were alſo with leſſe difficulty tranſported: yet for all the ſpeed he could make, the Georgian horſemen, the forerunners of Hyſmael his army, being come within ſight before the Turks were all got ouer, raiſed ſuch a feare and a ſtir all alongſt that ſide of the riuer, that two thouſand of the Turks were in their haſty paſſage there drowned, diuers field pieces left ſtic king in the mud, & much of their baggage carried away with the force of the riuer. The D Georgians contenting themſelues with ſuch things as were left, purſued them no further: for the wheeles of the Turkes carriages entangled together with the violence of the ſtreame, had ſtaied a great part of the Turkiſh traſh, floating in the riuer: and much more was in diuers places driuen vpon the ſhore, all which the Georgian horſemen eaſily drew out. Hyſmael in the mean time reioicing at nothing more, than that hauing chaſed away his enemies, he had alſo recouered much of the great ordnance, wherby he had before receiued ſo great hurt.

Selymus in paſſing the riuer Euphrates, receiueth great loſſe.

Selymus by ſpeedie flight thus got out of the hands of the Perſians, found his paſſing much more dangerous at the mountain Antitaurus, than he had before thought of: for Aladeules, the mountain king hauing now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had E with his ſauage people before taken all the ſtrait paſſages of the mountain country, who euery night in theeuiſh manner aſſailed the Turks, as they with their weake and wearie companies paſſed through thoſe rough and broken waies: and robbing their carriages, preſently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thicke woods and rockie mountaines. Aladeules himſelfe in the mean time (by whoſe fraud all this was done) euery day excuſing himſelfe, as if it had bin done againſt his will, by the rude mountaine people, enured to ſuch deſperat robberies, whom neuertheleſſe he ſaid hee would in ſhort time ſeuerely chaſtiſe ſo ſoone as hee could find the authors thereof. In the meane while, for faſhion ſake ſending a little ſpare prouiſion for certaine dayes, did euery night rob and ſpoile the Turkes by his ſouldiers, as they could take them in places of aduantage. Againſt which miſchiefes Selymus could neither by F policie, neither his ſouldiers by induſtrie prouide any ſufficient remedie. Wherefore diſſembling the iniuries he daily receiued, purpoſing to be thereof in time reuenged, together with the foule & trecherous dealing of the faithleſſe king, holding on his way, he with much adoo came at length to Trapezond, and from thence, to Amaſia, where he ſpent that winter in repairing his ſore weakned army, purpoſing with the firſt of the Spring to make war vpon Aladeules & the mountaine people, who in his returne had done him ſo great harm and iniurie.

Selymus commeth to Amaſia.

In this ſort Iouius, one of the great hiſtoriographers of that time, reporteth the aforeſaid wars betwixt Hyſmael and Selymus, whoſe credit in that matter other writers haue ſince for moſt part followed. Howbeit, Io. Ant. Mananinus, a Genoway, who ſerued in thoſe wars, doth in his book concerning Turkiſh affaires, dedicated to the French king, much otherwiſe report the ſame: which to ſatisfie the deſirous reader, I haue thought good here in few words to ſet downe, as it is by himſelfe reported.

The former hiſtory as it is reported by Io. Ant. Manauinus a Genoway preſent at doing thereof.

Selymus (ſaith he) with his armie, in number about three hundred thouſand men, being come to the riuer Euphrates, found the bridge broken downe by his nephew Amurat, and his enemies encamped in conuenient place on the farther ſide of the riuer, with their forces greatly increaſed by new ſupplies lately ſent from the Perſian king: ſo that there was then in the Perſian armie about ninetie thouſand men horſe and foot, the horſemen for moſt part furniſhed with two horſes a piece for ſeruice: and though Selymus did what he might, to know whether the Perſian king were in perſon himſelfe in the campe, or elſe (which he moſt feared) was raiſing of greater forces in Perſia, yet could he by no meanes learne the truth of that he deſired. Wherfore repairing againe the broken bridge, he firſt ſent ouer his two great lieutenants of Grecia and Natolia, who paſſing ouer the riuer, encamped themſelues as they thought conuenient. The next morning, about two hours before the riſing of the Sun, Amurat ſuddenly aſſailed the great commander of Grecia, Chaſan Baſſa, in his trenches, and by plaine force diſcomfited the Turks, and by good fortune tooke from them their tents: whereupon ſuch a terror & feare came vpon the other great commander of Natolia, that his ſoldiers thruſting themſelues for feare into the riuer, ſwam ouer with great danger, and againe ioyned themſelues with the reſt of the army. Selymus troubled with the great loſſe thus receiued, cauſed all his great artillerie to be placed all alongſt the hithermoſt banke of the riuer Euphrates, and becauſe the enemie ſhould not perceiue the ſame, ranged certain companies of his ſoldiers before the ordinance, as if they ſhould preſently haue paſſed the riuer: who vpon ſignall giuen, ſhould forthwith withdraw themſelues and giue place to the great ordnance bent vpon the enemie. But when fire was giuen to theſe great pieces, many of them being ouercharged, burſt in ſunder, and ſlew diuers of the Turks: many alſo of their rich horſes and mules being neere vnto the riuers ſide, and terrified with the thundring ſhot, leapt into the riuer, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Perſians alſo receiuing great loſſe, retired farther off for feare of the great artillerie. So Selymus without reſiſtance paſſing ouer the riuer, marched forthwith toward the enemie, whom the Perſians as men nothing diſmaied, notably incountered. The battel was of long time doubtfull, and much bloud ſhed on both ſides: and if the approch of the night had not broke off that mortall fight, the Perſian armie rather ouercharged with the multitude of the enemie, than vanquiſhed by valour, had vndoubtedly receiued a great ouerthrow; but through the benefit of the night, they without further loſſe eſcaped the purſute of the Turks. Vpon this victorie, Selymus left his cariages and baggage with his footmen, and taking with him only his horſemen, ſet forward with intention to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the regall citie of Tauris, before the fame of the late fought battell could bee carried thither: the Perſians in the meane time being no leſſe carefull of their affaires. The day before, ten thouſand freſh horſemen well appointed, which had not yet bin in the battell, were comming to Hyſmael: theſe he craftily laid in the Turks way, commanding them vpon the approch of the enemie to flie as if it had bin for feare. Selymus in the morning hauing deſcried theſe horſemen at hand, ſuppoſing them to be ſuch of his enemies as being ouertaken with the night were not able to follow the reſt of his armie, exhorted his ſouldiers couragiouſly to purſue their diſcouraged enemies.

The Perſians ſeeing the Turkes, of purpoſe betooke themſelues to flight, & they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed faſt after them, vntill that about mid-day being wearie of the purſuit, and comming to a little riuer which was in their way, they there ſtaied to refreſh themſelues: and after they had taken a ſhort repaſt, againe purſued the Perſians, ſtill leauing behind them ſuch as were not able ſo faſt to follow, prickt forward with hope, that before night they ſhould ſurpriſe & ranſack the rich citie of Tauris. The Turkiſh horſemen thus drawn far from the footmen, the Perſian horſemen left in ambuſh, in the meane time ſet vpon the Turkes footmen, lying (as they ſuppoſed) in great ſecuritie, and with a great ſlaughter ouerthrew them: at which time they alſo tooke all Selymus his treaſure and great artillerie. Which ouerthrow was by

A ſpeedie poſts, about two a clocke in the night made knowne to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceiued the ſacking of Tauris) and withall that the fierce enemie was following him at the heeles. Selymus wonderfully abaſhed with this vnexpected newes, and the loſſe of his footmen, forthwith began to retire: which the ten thouſand Perſians which had before of purpoſe fled, perceiuing, now turning themſelues vpon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly: ſo Selymus encloſed both before and behind by his enemies, receiued a great ouerthrow: and the Turks thus hardly beſet, and almoſt deſpairing of their liues, & hauing loſt their enſignes, brake out ſidewaies betwixt their enemies and fled. Selymus ſeeing all deſperat and forlorne, betooke himſelfe to flight alſo with the reſt: and paſſing the riuer Euphrates, brake down the bridge which he had but a little before repaired, for feare the Perſians ſhould further purſue him; and with much trouble and no leſſe danger comming at length to Amaſia, aſſembled B thither the reliques of his diſcomfited armie. Such of the Turkes as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keepe way with the reſt, were all ſlaine by the Perſians.

The Genoway author thus concludeth his hiſtorie, That the Perſian king did not more reioice at this victorie, than did he himſelfe for the ouerthrow of the Turks, hoping in that their ſo great a confuſion, to free himſelfe of his long and miſerable thraldome, & to find a way vnto his natiue countrey parents: as afterwards he did, for flying firſt to Trapezond and there taking paſſage into Europe, hee came to Hadrianople, from whence he trauelled by land on foot to Salonica, and there chancing vpon certaine ſhips of Chriſtian merchants which had brought corne thither, he was by them tranſported into the Iſland of Chios; from whence he C joyfully returned to Genoa his natiue country, after he had amongſt the Turkes endured ten yeares captiuitie: moſt part wherof he liued as a page in old BaiaZets priuie chamber, and the reſt as a ſouldier of the court in the raigne of Selymus; and therefore well acquainted with the faſhion of the Turkes court, and manners of that barbarous nation.

Now ſhall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpoſe, here with Iouius a little to digreſſe in comparing theſe two great Princes Hyſmael and Selymus together, who in that time had filled the world with the glorie of their fame: that wearied with bloudie broiles, and the wonderfull chances of war, we may a little repoſe our ſelues with matter of a milder vaine, neither vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable.

Selymus and Hyſmael compared together.

These two mightie princes, as they were for royall diſcent, ſtrength of bodie, courage of D mind, riches, and power, equall, and had therby obtained like fame and renown: ſo in conditions and qualities of mind, and martiall diſcipline, they much differed. Firſt of all (beſide the mutual hatred of the one nation againſt the other, deliuered as it were by ſucceſſion frō their grandfathers and fathers) theſe two princes, and ſo likewiſe their ſubiects alſo, were at great ods about an idle queſtion of their vain ſuperſtition, the one preferring & honoring Ebubekir, Homaris, and Ottoman, as the moſt true and rightful ſucceſſors of their great prophet Mahomet: the other with no leſſe deuotion honouring Haly, and deteſting the three former; differing otherwiſe in few or no points of their moſt fond ſuperſtition: yet did they vnder the color and zeale of their religion (as they would haue haue it) both pretend iuſt cauſes of warre, although their euil diſſembled ambitious deſires plainly declared vnto the world, that they both ſhot E at one and the ſame marke, viz. By confirming their power & ſtrength, to extend the bounds of their great empires. Which their aſpiring thoughts, masking vnder the vaile of zeale towards their religion, ſeemed not altogether vain, fortune with like indifference immoderatly fauoring their bold ambitious & endleſſe deſires. But in Hyſmael appeared ſuch a wonderful deuotion & grauity, that his hautie thoughts were with the reuerend maieſtie therof couered: whereas in Selymus, his inhuman cruelty did blot & obſcure all his other princely vertues: for he with reward & F puniſhment retained the maieſtie of his empire, but with greater fame of ſeuerity than bountie. Becauſe it was expedient in the exact diſcipline of that ſeruile gouernment, wherof the greateſt ſtrength of the Othoman empire conſiſteth, to vſe all rigor & ſeueritie: otherwiſe then it ſtood with the ſtate of Hyſmael, who leauied alwaies his armies of his nobilitie and men free born, with whom temperat iuſtice, ciuile courteſie, & popular clemencie, are of greateſt force, to win their fidelitie, faith, & loyaltie: for that there is no man wel born, which feareth not more the blemiſh of infamie than the heauines of puniſhment: ſo that it was not to be maruelled, if Hyſmael G by ſuch honorable vertues did mightily defend the glorie of his maieſty and renowne.

Vnto theſe his rare vertues, was alſo ioined a comlineſſe of face (the faireſt gift of nature) wel beſeeming ſo great a monarch: for he was well colored, quicke eyed, yellow bearded, & that which amongſt the Perſians is accounted the ſigne of antient nobilitie, hooke noſed, and was eies and hearts of ſuch as beheld him. But in Selymus, his ſtern countenance, his fierce and piercing eies, his Tartar-like pale color, his long muſtacho's on his vpper lip, like briſtles, trild back to his neck, with his beard cut cloſe to his chin, did ſo expreſſe his martial diſpoſition & inexorable nature, that he ſeemed to the beholders, to haue nothing in him but miſchiefe & crueltie.

Which diuerſitie of countenances was alſo accompanied with no leſſe diuerſity of affections, H and ſo conſequently with farre vnlike manner of gouernment. For Hyſmael was of nature courteous and affable, eaſie to be ſeen and ſpoken withall, doing nothing that beſeemed his regall function, but in the ſight of all men: his maner was to dine openly in the companie of his nobility, delighting much in hauking and hunting, accompanied with his noble men and the Embaſſadors of forraine princes: He would oftentimes run, leape, and proue maſteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himſelfe a moſt excellent horſman & cunning archer: in his exerciſes he was ſo popular, that he would not ſtick openly to bathe himſelf & ſwim in his princely bathes: his wiues, the beautifull daughters of his nobility or neighbor princes, ladies of great chaſtitie, he neither loathed nor diuorced, after the antient manner of the Perſian kings, who alwaies vſed moſt tenderly to loue and cheriſh their wiues, doing them all the honor poſſible I in court, as partakers of all their fortune; and carried them, their children, nurſes, & richeſt furniture into their fartheſt warres, to their great trouble and charge, by the preſence of ſo deere pledges the more to encourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selymus contrariwiſe did al things in ſecret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended vpon with his pages and eunuches only, and ſatisfying natures want with ſome one ſimple diſh of meat: he ſeldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turks chiefe Saboth; and then ſo beſet with his penſioners and other ſouldiers of the court, that although he vſed to ride alone mounted vpon ſome couragious horſe, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him among ſo many armed men, who with great pride and inſolencie kept backe the beholders: hee was ſeldome ſeen abroad in the city, chuſing rather for his recreation to paſſe ouer in his gally into K Aſia, and there alongſt the ſea coaſt to take the aire: his wiues he would not ſuffer to come to court, neither vſed their companie but for procreation ſake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiarity; for that he being not greatly giuen to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleaſure, thought a mans bodie and mind to be not a little weakned with the allurements of women: wherefore he ſeldome reſorted to the cloiſter of choice paragons in the middeſt of Conſtantinople, ſhut in on euery ſide with high and blind wals. Thoſe dainty pieces, either taken from their Chriſtian parents, or by chance ſurpriſed by pirats, are there moſt curiouſly kept by antient matrons and old eunuches, by whom they are with all diligence inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan law, and to read the Arabian L tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to ſing, play, daunce, and ſow: but Selymus of all others vſed ſeldome to ſee their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or deſirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunate) children, hauing but one ſon (Solyman) by the daughter of Muhamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the ſufferance of God, proued a great plague to the Chriſtian commonweale. Such ſpare time as he had from his ſerious & weighty affaires, he vſed to ſpend in walking in his gardens with ſome of his Baſſaes or other great courtiers, & in beholding & noting the noblemens children there ſporting themſelues, would diſcourſe & conſult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would ſpend in the bathes, and in reading the hiſtories of his anceſtors & other forraine princes: imitating therein his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who cauſed almoſt all the hiſtories of the famous princes M of the world to be tranſlated into the Turkiſh language, & their liuely counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more inflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times ſcoffe at the great buſines of his father Baiazet, who (as he ſaid) was ſo drowned in the ſtudie of Auerroes (determining nothing certainely of the nature of the ſoule) and the motions of the heauens, that he deſired rather the name of a ſharpe diſputer,

A diſputer amongſt the idle profeſſors of Philoſophie, than of a renowned chiefetaine amongſt his valiant ſouldiers and men of war.

One of the Perſian embaſſadors finding him pleaſantly diſpoſed, demanded of him, why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Baiazet, and other great princes of that age had don, therby to ſeeme vnto their ſubiects of greater maieſtie: to whom he anſwered, That he liked not to carrie about with him ſuch an vnneceſſarie handful, whereby his Baſſaes might at their pleaſure lead him vp and down the court, as they had done his father: noting therby, that Baiazet whileſt he yet liued, had bin too much ouerruled by the Baſſaes; which he could by no means indure, following no mans aduiſe but his owne in whatſoeuer he tooke in hand.

But to come vnto the Perſians themſelues, they in their warres had great diſaduantage of B the Turks: for as they were ſtrong in horſmen, ſo were they deſtitute of expert trained footmen, by whoſe only meanes the Turks haue atchieued their greateſt victories, and performed their greateſt wars. Beſide this, it was a great want in the Perſians, that they had not the vſe of guns, againſt whoſe fury no ſufficient reſiſtance can be made, or force of man oppoſed: as appeared by the lamentable example of Vſun-Caſſanes at Artenga, & now of Hyſmael in the Calderan fields, whoſe victorious armies of horſmen were in both places put to the worſe by the terror and violence of the Turks artillerie. For the naked Turkiſh horſeman is not to be compared with the Perſian man at armes; who comes into the field armed with a ſtrong cuiras, a ſure head-piece, and a good targuet: whereas the Turkiſh Europeian horſemen, altogether naked, vſe only a ſquare or crooked buckler, wherewith they do ſcarcely couer themſelues: C and the Aſian horſemen, bucklers made of ſoft reeds, wound round, and couered with ſome kind of ſilke. The Perſian horſemen alſo, wearing their pouldrons and gauntlets, and bearing ſtaues of good aſh, armed at both ends, fight with them as occaſion ſerueth at the halfe ſtaffe, after the maner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thruſts from on high, doe eaſily wound or kill the vnarmed Turks, with their horſes: whereas the Turkiſh horſemen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their ſtaues in their reſts, do at the firſt courſe moſt commonly breake the ſame, being made of light and brittle firre, and ſo preſently come to their ſcimitars, or horſemans maces, being in all other things far inferior to the Perſian man at armes. As for the Turkiſh archers on horſeback, they are in no reſpect to be compared with the Perſians, who well mounted and ſurely armed, and vſing both greater & ſtronger D bowes, ſhoot more deadly arrows, & ſo make ſmall account of the Turks. So that al things well conſidered, the Perſian armie, deuoted to their king, as well for the great and firme opinion conceiued of his high courage and diuine ſpirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged, although it was in number far inferior, yet had it bin of the Turkes inuincible, if it had not bin ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murthering artillerie, and wonderfull multitude of men. The cauſe why Hyſmael out of ſo many great & large prouinces then vnder his obeiſance (able in antient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, & to drink the riuers drie) brought now ſo ſmall an army againſt the Turkiſh Emperor, breaking into the heart of Armenia, was, for that Hyſmael to win the hearts of the people by bounty, had remitted a great part of his cuſtoms and tributes, ſo as then ſtood beſt with his policie, hauing but E lately aſpired to the kingdome, and thruſt downe his neere kinſmen, the poſterity of Vſun-Caſſan and Iacup, the rightfull inheritors thereof: ſo that his coffers being emptie, & wanting money, the ſinews of war, he was not able to raiſe ſo great an army as otherwiſe he might out of thoſe populous kingdoms & countries, yeelding plentifully all things neceſſarie for mans vſe.
Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwiſe: whoſe horſemen, footmen, captaines, canoniers, both at ſea and land, officers of peace and wars, receiued their daily wages and monthly paies in readie money, of his treaſurers and paymaſters: for defraying of which charge he neuer wanted coyne, hauing an ineſtimable maſſe of money alwaies in ſtore in the ſeuen towers at Conſtantinople: and his yerely tributes and reuenewes ſtill exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The ſtrength of the Perſian king conſiſted in three kind of ſoldiers: the firſt were they F which were accounted ſouldiers of the court: the ſecond, ſuch as were by cuſtome and dutie bound to ſerue him in his wars: and the third, ſuch as were ſent to him from the princes his neighbors and confederats. Thoſe which were accounted ſouldiers of his court, had their certain ſtipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom, according to the old cuſtome of the Perſian kings, they at certaine times receiue armor, horſes, apparell, tents, and wages, euery one as he is in place and degree. And being attended vpon with a gallant and ſtrong garriſon of theſe, he maintaineth the maieſty of his court, eſpecially when he rideth in prograce. The nobilitie and antient gentlemen of his country, who hold lands and poſſeſſions diſcended vnto them from their anceſtours, or holden by the gift of the king, are ſent for in time of wars, and are of dutie bound to performe ſuch like ſeruice as the nobilitie and gentlemen of Italie, France, and Spaine do vnto their soueraignes: theſe hardly amount to the number of twentie thouſand, whereof it is well if the third part come well armed; the reſt content themſelues with head-pieces and iacks, and vſe for their weapons either horſemens ſtaues or bowes, which they can moſt cunningly handle, diſcharding their arrows very neere vnto that they aime at, either forward or backward. They which come vnto him from forrein princes, confederat or tributary, are commonly ſent from the kings and princes of Iberia, Albania, and the countries bordering vpon Media, and Armenia; who being halfe Christians, beare a mortall hatred againſt the Turkes. Hyſmael the Perſian king had then vnder his dominion theſe great and famous countries, Armenia the greater, Sulthania, Perſia, Aſſyria, Meſopotamia, Media and Partia: whereof Armenia is the chiefeſt, famous for the great citie Tauris, called in antient time Ecbathana: this countrey yeeldeth vnto the Perſian king his beſt footmen; but his choice horſemen come from out of Perſia, and eſpecially from Scyras, called of old Cyripolis: next vnto them are from Aſſyria; the chiefe citie whereof is Bagadat, called in antient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the beſt archers next vnto the Scythians.

The countries ſubiect to Hyſmael.

Selymus with a new armie entreth into Armenia.

But now to returne againe from whence we haue a little too farre ſtrayed. Selymus after his great expedition againſt Hyſmael, wintering at Amaſia, by his lieutenants and captaines in Europe and Aſia, raiſed ſuch a power, that with the firſt of the Spring he entered again into the confines of the Perſian kingdome, with a greater army than before, and that ſomewhat ſooner than the extreame cold of that part of Armenia (ſubiect to the ſnowie mountaine Taurus) would either well ſuffer, or that the enemie thought it had beene poſſible for him to haue ſo done. There was vpon the further ſide of the riuer Euphrates a ſtrong towne called Clamaſſum, ſcituate a little aboue that place where the riuer Melas (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the riuer Euphrates; which towne for the commodious ſcituation thereof, ſtanding vpon the firſt entrance of the paſſage into Armenia the great, the Perſians had furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon: this towne Selymus thought good in any caſe to be maſter of, by taking whereof, and of ſome other holds thereabout, he ſhould open a faire way for himſelfe into his enemies countrey. Hyſmael at the ſame time was gone with all his power againſt the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other ſauage people dwelling neere vnto the Caſpian ſea, then vp in arms againſt him: which wiſhed opportunitie Selymus taking, and making a bridge ouer the riuer Euphrates, paſſed ouer with his armie, came before the towne, and laid hard ſiege to the ſame before his enemies were well aware of his comming. The Turkes at their firſt approch compaſſing the citie round with their huge multitude of harquebuſiers and archers, draue the defendants from the wals; and ſtill without reſt or intermiſſion bringing on freſh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the ſame time breaking open the gates, and in diuers places ſcaling the wals, enforced the defendants to forſake their ſtandings, and to retire themſelues into the market place; where although they were before ſore ſpent with labor & wounds, yet did they there with wonderfull courage a great while notably withſtand the multitude of their enemies ſtill ſwarming in, and in defence of their countrie, like reſolute men, fought it out vnto the laſt man.

Selymus hauing taken and ranſacked Clamaſſum, with two other ſmall caſtles which the defendants had for feare before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred & ambitious deſire prickt forward againſt Hyſmael, and thirſted after nothing more than the ſubuerſion of the Perſian kingdome: yet he thought it not good further to enter into Armenia, before hee had out of thoſe forreſts and mountains chaſed the mountain king Aladeules, who but the yere before had moſt trecherouſly done him and his armie ſo many iniuries in his return from the Perſian expedition. For Aladeules not without cauſe fearing his owne eſtate, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that Selymus had againe taken the field, and that he was come to the riuer Euphrates, and ſo to Clamaſſum, ſpeedily aſſembling his forces, had in ſhort time raiſed a great armie for the defence of himſelfe and his Kingdome: purpoſing that if Selymus ſhould goe farther

A into Armenia,then after his wonted maner to looke on as a beholder, and by the euent of the war,to take occaſion of prey,and by ſhutting vp the paſſages of his country, at his pleaſure to rob and ſpoile the Turkes in their returne. Wherefore Selymus leauing a garriſon at Ciamaſſum, retired backe againe ouer the riuer Euphrates vnto the mountaine Antitaurus, where it was reported that his enemies lay.

Aladeules his kingdome.

This Aladeules (as is aforeſaid) ruled ouer the rude and ſauage mountaine people, inhabiting the great mountaines Taurus and Antitaurus: which mountaines as it were linked together one to another,run from the mountains called Scodriſci, and the borders of Capadocia, with a perpetuall riſing,through many large prouinces and countries vnto the great mountain Amanus,and vttermoſt bounds of Cilicia. The people of this countrey were by nature fierce B and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the want of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare countrey, could little or nothing profit by husbandrie: yet in ſuch places as would beare any paſture, they had their breed of horſes and cammels, and did with all diligence vſe graſing;but the greateſt part of their liuing conſiſted in hunting & ſtealing. Theſe are ſuppoſed to haue had their beginning from the Galatians, Capadocians, Armenians, and the old inhabitants of Aſia the leſſe,which by long and continuall wars in former ages,and eſpecially by the lamentable irruption of the Scithians,were inforced to forſake their cities and dwellings,and for ſafegard of their liues to flie into thoſe rough and deſolat mountains. Theſe diſtreſſed people ſearching euery hill and euery dale, and following the opportunitie of the riuers and fountaines, but eſpecially the mildeſt temperature of the aire, and fauorable aſpect C of the Sun,built in many places poore countrey villages,and afterwards diuers faire townes: where in proceſſe of time they growing to better eſtate, there riſe vp ſome amongſt them, which ouerruling the reſt,ambitiouſly tooke vpon them the name of kings,deſiring to be had in regard, and to bee feared of their neighbours, although they commanded but ouer rough woods and ragged rockes. Neere vnto the confines of Aladeules kingdome is the citie Orpha, which many ſuppoſe to haue bin the famous citie Edeſſa, becauſe that as yet there remaineth certaine monuments of Baldwin in latine letters, who after his brother Godfrey was poſſeſſed of Ieruſalem,is reported to haue taken Edeſſa,and there raigned. Not far from thence is alſo the antient citie Amyda, which at this day is called Caramida, ioyning vpon Meſopotamia: which countrey lying betweene the two great riuers Euphrates and Tygris, is now called D Diarbecha. The chiefe citie of Aladeules kingdome was Maras,ſo called as may be thought of the faire riuer Marſias running through it out of the mountaine Cælene, taking the name of Marſias,ouercome by Apollo,and made famous by the verſes of many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he ſaw that Selymus with his armie was entered into the frontiers of his kingdom, and drawing neere vnto him,brought downe all his horſemen,in number about fifteene thouſand, from the mountains into a faire large valley;commanding his footmen, whereof he had great ſtore, to keepe the mountaines on the right hand and the left: where hauing the high rockie mountaines and ſtrait paſſages much for his aduantage, hee determined in that place which he had long before choſen and fortified,to expect the comming of his enemies. Selymus conſidering the diſaduantage of the place, although he perceiued the victorie could not E without great loſſe of his men be obtained, and before perſuaded that his enemies would neuer haue willingly bin drawne to battell: yet made no doubt to aduenture his fortune,preſuming vpon the multitude and ſtrength of his armie. Wherefore he commanded Sinan Baſſa the Eunuch (whom he had made generall of the Europeian horſemen in ſtead of Chaſan Baſſa before ſlaine) with a ſquare battell to charge the enemie afront, foraſmuch as the place would not ſuffer him to range his battell in length, nor to vſe any wings: and hee himſelfe with his Ianizaries and Aſian horſemen followed after in the rereward. Neither were the ſouldiers of Aladeules vnmindfull of themſelues or of their king, who valiantly fought in the head of the battell,but hauing ſpent their arrowes, did couragiouſly receiue the furious aſſault of the Turkes: and ſtanding cloſe to them,ſtill keeping the aduantage of the ground,did with ſuch F force repulſe them,that the old beaten ſouldiers of the Turks,ſeemed little or nothing to preuaile either with their multitude or valor: for the Turks by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the place,could not incloſe them on either ſide, and were beſide grieuouſly wounded by Aladeules footmen,who ſtanding vpon the ſides of the hils with their darts and arrowes from aboue, ouerwhelmed the Turks in the vally. When Selymus ſaw that Aladeules,contrary to his expectation made ſtrong reſiſtance, and valiantly withſtood his forces, he drew certaine com- G panies of harquebuſiers out of his own ſquadrons, and ſent them to relieue their fellowes: and at the ſame inſtant commanded the Ianizaries for all the danger to mount the hill. Then the mountain people terrified with the ſtrangenes of the ſhot, and not able to abide the force therof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their ſure haunts, in the mountians & woods faſt by: yet the greateſt ſlaughter fell amongſt theſe footmen, who when they ſaw the horſmen put to flight, & the Ianizaries comming vp the hils againſt them, did with much difficultie, by ſteepe and broken waies clamber vp the high mountains: as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the ſtrength of mens legs and other their wonted forces faile them moſt, when ſurpriſed and ouercome with ſudden feare, they deſire to run & flie faſteſt.

The Turks hauing them in chaſe, had the killing of them vntill the going down of the Sun. H
The horſmen with the king, vpon their ſwift horſes, wel acquainted with thoſe rocks & rough ways, with little loſſe retired themſelues into the further & ſtronger palces of the mountains.

Aladeules flies into the mountaines.

Aladeules after this diſcomfiture, finding himſelfe in all things far inferiour to his enemie, thought it beſt by protracting the war, to wearie him out: wherfore as the Turks purſued him, and burnt the poore country cottages ſtanding in their way, hee ſtill fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battell or ſhewing himſelfe, but in places of great aduantage: and therefore Selymus fearing leſt in that barren rough and vnknowne countrey, he ſhould either want victual, or by ſome other means be intrapped, if he ſhould ſtil with his whole armie follow after his ſtrong enemies, vpon the ſeuenth day left off to purſue them any further. And en- I camping himſelfe in the moſt conuenient place of that countrie, ſent Sinan Baſſa with his light horſemen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, ſhould ſtill at the heeles follow the enemie, and with all ſpeed and policie poſſible hunt after the king himſelfe. Selymus in the meane time curiouſly inquiring of the countrey captiues after the ſtrength of Aladeu- les, & what means he had to maintain the war, found, that he had taken with him his beſt men both horſe and foot, and had commanded the countrie people to forſake the villages, of purpoſe to leaue all deſolat to the enemie: and hauing ſurely intrenched himſelfe vpon a certain ſtrong rock (whither he had before conuaied great ſtore of prouiſion) was reſolued not to giue battell vnto his enemies, vntill he had drawn them into the impregnable ſtraits of the mountains, where their hugie multitude ſhould little auaile them, but to increaſe their owne loſſe. K Another cauſe there was alſo (as they ſaid) for that he feared to be betraied by Alis Beg his kinſman, Generall of his horſemen, who firſt fled in the late battell, whoſe vnfaithfulnes and hatred might ſeeme to proceed of a iuſt ground, for that Aladeules had in former time trecherouſly murthered his father, vpon a iealous ſuſpition of his aſpiring vnto the kingdome.

Selymus vnderſtanding all this, cauſed the captiues to haue their yrons ſtruck off, and in ſtead of their gyues lading them with gifts and promiſes, ſent them to Alis Beg with ſecret letters and rewards, to perſuade him in ſo fit a time to reuenge his fathers death, which thing if hee would perform by ſome notable exploit vpon Aladeules, he ſhould both purchaſe vnto him-ſelfe great credit with Selymus, and alſo the kingdom. Theſe homely meſſengers according as was giuen them in charge, hauing imparted the matter to Sinan Baſſa, within few daies had ſo wrought, that Alis Beg (whom the deſire of a kingdome together with Selymus his rewards L prickt forward to ſeeke reuenge) was eaſily drawne to ioine hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who miſtruſting all things, warily looked vnto himſelf, he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Baſſa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his beſt horſemen: by whoſe means the reſt alſo which remained being with rewards corrupted, one companie after another came at laſt all ouer vnto the Baſſa. Aladeules circumuented with this vnexpected trecherie, which neuer before thought it poſſible that his men ſhould all ſo ſuddenly haue forſaken him & reuolted to the Turks, was now glad to repoſe all his hope in ſecret flight. But Sinan Baſſa & Alis Beg, hardly purſuing him as he fled through the mountains & hiding himſelf in rocks & the thick woods, at laſt drew him out of a caue, being betraied by M the country peaſants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to death, & his head in great deriſion afterwards caried about through all Aſia the leſſe: & afterward by way of barbarous oſtentation, ſent by Selymus to the Senat of Venice, as a loathſome teſtimony of his victory. Aladeules thus dead, Selymus reduced al his kingdom to the form of a prouince, which he diuided into three parts, & after the maner of the Turkiſh gouernment, ap-Aladeules taken & brought to Selymus, is put to death.

A pointed to euery part a Sanzacke: yet ſo, that Aliu Beg ſhould be chiefe ouer the reſt, with ſuch ſoueraigntie, as that hee wanted nothing of a king but the name onely. And for the better go-uernment of all things in that new gained kingdome, hee left Sinan Baſſa there all the reſt of that Summer; with commandement, that after he had ſet all things in good order, he ſhould winter at Iconium; and he himſelfe with a ſmall traine returned to Conſtantinople, for he had heard, that whileſt he was buſied in his wars againſt Hyſmael and Aladeules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made diuers incurſions into Seruia, and ſpoiled that countrey. Wherefore for feare of loſing Samandria (which ſtanding neere to Danubius, for the conuenient ſcituation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of Seruia and Thracia) hee ſent Ionuſes Baſſa then Gouernor of Boſna with eight thouſand horſemen, who paſſing the riuer Savus entered into Croatia as B far as Catinum: and at the ſame time tranſported another army ouer Danubius into Hungarie, to the intent that the Hungarians at one inſtant beſet with double danger, ſhould be inforced to feare their owne State; and withall to ſhew vnto the World, of what ſtrength and power the Othoman Emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the preſent, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Chriſtians; if hee ſhould by his happie attempts make it knowne, that hee could at once eaſily and readily maintaine ſo many and ſo puiſſant armies, and wage ſo great warres in diuers parts of the world, and ſo far diſtant one from another.

Selymus inuadeth Hungarie.

In the end of the yere, when he had thus with double inuaſion repreſſed the Hungarians, he ſpent the Winter following at Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, in making of greater prepa-C ration for war than euer hee had before from the beginning of his raigne. For he was aduerti-ſed, that the great monarchs of the North his neighbors, namely Maximilian the Emperour, Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie, and Sigiſmundus king of Polonia, with the princes of Germanie, had combined themſelues together to make warre vpon him. But after he had learned by his ſure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge ſent into all parts of Europe, diligently to obſerue what was done in the courts of thoſe great princes) that all the great meetings of the Chriſtian Princes proued nothing but glorious words and ſumptuous banquets; he being rid of that vaine feare (God ſo appointing) turned himſelfe and all thoſe his wonderfull preparations againe toward the Eaſt, to the great quiet of Chriſtendome in generall.

Yet leſt happily in the abſence of himſelfe and of his armies, the Chriſtian Princes might D take occaſion to inuade his dominions, he ſtrengthened the frontiers of his empire with moſt ſtrong garriſons, and left his ſonne Solyman (who afterward proued the ſcourge of Chriſten-dome) at Hadrianople with a ſtrong power, and Pyrrhus Baſſa his tutor (a man of great wiſe-dome and gouernement) at Conſtantinople. This great Baſſa was of Cilicia, a natiue Turke borne, which was a thing accounted ſtrange, foraſmuch as the great Baſſaes were alwaies choſen of the Chriſtian bloud. After that, he ſent Cherſeogles (whom of all others he moſt truſted) with his armie into Bythinia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch Admiral of his nauie, which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labour and charge rigged forth. Then ſtaying a few daies at Conſtantinople to ſee the young ſouldiers, but then choſing Ianizaries, hee departed thence and went to his old armie, lying with Sinan Baſſa at Iconium, purpoſing to haue E againe inuaded the Perſian.

Selymus goeth to Iconium.

When he was come thither, he vnderſtood that Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt (with a great armie leuied in Ægypt and Iudea) was come into Syria; giuing it out that he would aid the Perſian king his confederat, & with al hoſtilitie enter into Cilicia, if Selymus ſhould farther proceed to inuade Hyſmael the Sophi his friend & allie. Selymus perplexed with theſe news, & fearing that if he ſhould once paſſe ouer the riuer Euphrates, Campſon lying ſo neere in readineſſe, ſhould forthwith breake in at his back into Aſia by the mountain Amanus, and ſo indanger that part of his dominion, ſtaied at Iconium, & ſent his embaſſadors with great preſents to Campſon to pacifie him, if it might be. The chiefe men in this embaſſage were the Cadeleſ-F cher, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, and of them exceedingly reuerenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan ſuperſtition, who afterward wrot the Commentaries of this war; & Iachis a great captain. The ſcope of whoſe embaſſage was, to intreat Campſon, that he would not hinder or diſturbe Selymus from making war vpon the Perſian king; who had ſo often and ſo forcibly inuaded his dominions in Aſia, and by bringing in a new forme of ſuperſtition, had corrupted and altered the moſt certain grounds of the Mahometan religion. And if they found him reſolutely ſet downe and not to be by any conditions G remoued,then with all poſſible diligence to learne his ſtrength and farther deſignes, ſo far as by any means they could, and with all ſpeed to make their returne.

The cauſes mouing Campſon to fal out with Selymus.

But Campſon now far ſpent with age,and liuing in the height of worldly bliſſe,although he knew it fitter for him at thoſe yeres to giue himſelfe to eaſe & quietneſſe,than to thruſt himſelfe into wars and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many cauſes both good and neceſſarie. Firſt,he deadly hated the man for his inhumane crueltie,and therfore could neuer be perſuaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Baiazet: beſides that,he deſired to abate and repreſſe his audacious inſolencie, grown already by his proſperous ſucceſſe beyond the bounds of reaſon: for Selymus hauing taken Tauris,ouerthrowne the Perſians,and ſlaine Aladeules,began now to ſeeme terrible H to all the princes that bordered vpon him, and there were many which ſaid hee was another Alexander,who whileſt other princes ſate ſtill as men a ſleepe, did in the mean time plot in his victorious mind,the monarchie of the whole world. But aboue all things, the feare of the loſing of Syria,and conſequently the loſſe of all his kingdome (the quickeſt motiue for ſtirring vp of the ſuſpitious mindes of the greateſt princes) moſt inforced Campſon to take in hand this war: for as much as the goodly kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea,and Syria, oppreſſed with the intollerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore leſſe faithfull to the Ægyptian kings, were in danger to reuolt to the Turks, if the Perſians ſhould by any miſchance or fortune of war be of the Turks vanquiſhed. For which cauſe Campſon in the beginning I of this war,ſolicited by the Perſian embaſſadors,had made a firme league and confederation with Hyſmael;and alſo moued with the miſerie of the wofull yong prince Aladin the ſon of Achomates,was in mind perſuaded, that the cruel Turkiſh tyrant might by his and the Perſian kings forces,eaſily be thruſt out of his empire in Aſia and Europe. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father,fled to Campſon the Sultan of Ægypt (as is before declared) had liued three yeares as a forlorne and diſtreſſed prince in the Ægyptian court, and by all means he could deuiſe incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the iniuries and cruelty of his vncle Selymus. The eldeſt ſonne alſo of the late king Aladeules,a goodly yong prince,hauing at once loſt his father,his kingdome,and whatſoeuer he had elſe,was in good time fled to the Ægyptian king,and had ſo filled the minds of all men with the indignation and deteſtation of Selymus K his exceeding crueltie, that the princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to Campſon,humbly beſeeching him to take vpon him ſo iuſt a war: and if by reaſon of his great yeares he ſhould think himſelfe vnable to indure the trauell thereof,it would then pleaſe him yet to giue them leaue of themſelues to take the matter in hand,for the repreſſing of the inſolencie of that great and wicked tyrant.

The order of the Mamalukes.

Theſe Mamalukes far excelled the Turkes,not onely in ſtrength of bodie, ſkilfull riding, and goodly armor,but alſo in courage and wealth. Beſide that, they had not forgotten with what ſmall power they had vnder the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan,ouerthrown the Turks great armies in Cilicia,firſt at Adena,and afterward at Tarſus,where they tooke priſoners, Meſites Palæologus the great Baſſa,and Cherſeogles, Baiazet his ſon in law: by which victorie they grew into ſuch a proud and vaine conceit of themſelues,as if they had bin the onely L ſouldiers of the world, able of themſelues to vanquiſh and ouercome whomſoeuer they ſhould ſet vpon. Theſe ſo valiant ſouldiers, were for the moſt part of the poore people called in antient time Getæ, Zinchi,and Baſtarnæ,born neere vnto the Euxin ſea and the fens of Mæotis, eſpecially on that ſide where the riuer Corax falleth into the Euxine ſea: which countrey is of latter time called Circaſſia,of the people called Gercitæ neere vnto Cholchis. Theſe miſerable and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their mothers breaſts, or by other violent meanes ſurpriſed) were ſold to merchants,who culling out the beſt for ſtrength of body,or aptneſſe of wit, conuaied them by ſea to Alexandria,from whence they were continually ſent to the great M Sultan of Ægypt: and by his appointment were at Caire (after the old manner of that people) deliuered to maſters of fence and ſuch other teachers, who carefully inſtructed them, beeing ſhut vp in their ſchools,in all manner of feats of actiuitie: where after they were become able to bend a ſtrong bow, and taught cunningly to ſhoot, leap,run,vault,ride,and ſkilfully to vſe all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and receiued into the number of the kings

A kings horſemen or Mamalukes: and ſuch of them as prooued cowardly or vnapt,were made ſlaues vnto the reſt. So that they ſeeing all honor, credit,and preferment, laied vp in martiall prowesſe,did with all diligence and courage imploy themſelues to militarie affaires,and therin ſo well profited,that oftentimes they which at the firſt were but bare and baſe ſlaues, of the meaneſt of the Mamalukes,by many degrees of ſeruice riſe at length to the higheſt degrees of honour. All theſe Mamalukes were the children of Chriſtian parents, from the time of their captiuitie inſtructed in the Mahometan ſuperſtition: for no man borne of a Mahometan father,or of a Iew,could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horſemen: which was ſo ſtraitly obſerued,that the honor of a Mamaluke horſeman neuer deſcended vnto the ſons of the Mamalukes,yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands,poſſeſſions,and goods:by B which reaſon the ſonnes of the Sultans themſelues neuer ſucceeded their fathers in the kingdom. Hereby alſo it came to paſſe,that many Chriſtians of looſe life,or condemned for their notorious offences,flying thither,and abiuring the Chriſtian religion,and ſuffering themſelues to be circumciſed,being men meet for the wars,grew by degrees to great honor: as did Tangaribardinus the ſonne of a Spaniſh mariner,who by his forwardneſſe and induſtrie grew into ſuch credit and authority with Campſon the great Sultan,that almoſt all things were done by his aduice and counſell;& was diuers times by him employed in moſt honorable ſeruice,being ſent embaſſador both to Baiazet the Turkiſh Emperour,and to the State of Venice, about matters of great importance. Yet his impietie eſcaped not the hand of God, for at length by the enuie of the court he was brought into diſgrace,thruſt out of his place, & caſt into priſon, C where he,loaded with cold yron, moſt miſerably died. Neither was it to be maruelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that exceſſe of wealth, foraſmuch as the Ægyptians and Syrians being miſerably by them oppreſſed, were not ſuffered to haue the vſe either of horſe or armour,neither admitted to any matters of counſell; but being impoueriſhed and brought low with heauie impoſitions and daily iniuries of the Mamalukes,gaue themſelues wholly to the trade of marchandiſe,husbandrie,and other mechanicall occupations:ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and command,as imperious maſters ouer their ſeruants, & would with greater inſolencie than is to be beleeued abuſe the poore countrey people, beating and ſpoiling them at their pleaſure;and not ſo contented,rauiſhing their wiues and daughters without redreſſe. The Ægyptians (a people in antient time much renowned for their valor and prowesſe) D were by theſe maſterful ſlaues kept in this miſerable thraldome and ſlauerie about the ſpace of three hundred yeares. For after the declination of the Romane empire, that rich countrey falling into the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitan Emperors,the Ægyptians ſoone wea-rie of the proud and auaritious ſoueraigntie of the Greekes, called in the Saraſins, by whoſe help they expulſed the Greekes,and after choſe the General of the Saraſins for their king,after whoſe name the Ægyptian kings were of long time called Caliphes,as they had of antient time been called by the names of Pharo and Ptolomey.

The imperious gouernment of the Mamalukes in Egypt,Iudea, and Syria.

The laſt of theſe Caliphes raigned at ſuch time as the Chriſtians vnder the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund,paſſing as conquerors through Aſia and Syria,erected the kingdome of Hieruſalem. He being inuaded by Almericus ſixt king of Hieruſalem,and finding himſelfe too E weake,praied aid of the Sultan of Syria,who ſent him Sarraco, a valiant captain,with a ſtrong power to aid him: but Sarraco no leſſe vnfaithfull than couragious, trecherouſly ſlew the Caliph,in whoſe aid he came, and tooke vpon himſelfe the kingdome. After Sarraco ſuccee-ded Saladine his brothers ſonne, who vtterly extinguiſhed the name and authoritie of the Caliphes in Ægypt, whom Sarraco had yet left as high Prieſts. This Saladine oftentimes van-quiſhed the Chriſtian armies in Syria and Iudea, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of Hieruſalem,as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie to be ſeene. Saladin dying,left the kingdome of Ægypt to his brother, whoſe poſteritie ſucceſſiuely raigned of long time there,vntill the time of Melechſala. This Melechſala (laſt of the free borne kings,and of the poſteritie of Saladine)had great and mortall warres with the Chriſtians,wherein hauing loſt moſt of his F beſt ſoldiers,and repoſing no great confidence in the Ægyptians,thought good to ſtrengthen himſelfe with a new kind of ſouldiers, meere ſlaues bought for money. For at that time the Tartars breaking into Armenia and Capadocia, and ouerrunning the people called Comani ioyning vpon Capadocia, made generall ſpoile of that people, as of priſoners taken by law of armes. Of this baſe people, Melechſala for a little money bought a great multitude, which he tranſported into Ægypt, and furniſhed them with armes: by whoſe proweſſe he not only defended the frontiers of his kingdome, but alſo beſieged Lewis the French king in his trenches not far from Damiata, called in antient time Heliopolis, or Peluſium, and ſhortly after in plaine battel tooke him priſoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victorie, Melechſala was by the conſpiracy of theſe his new ſouldiers ſlaine: in whoſe place they ſet vp one Turqueminius, a deſperat fellow of their owne companie, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of Ægypt. Turqueminius of a baſe ſlaue now become a great monarch (after the maner of men) forgetting his old companions which had ſo highly promoted him, and hauing them in great diſdaine, was by one of them (called Clotho) ſuddenly ſlaine; for which fact he was by thoſe baſe ſouldiers, his companions, choſen Sultan in his place: who for the ſhort time of his raigne did much for the confirming of that ſeruile monarchie: yet was he at length ſlaine alſo by Bandocader, ſometimes one of his fellow ſeruants, who alſo ſucceeded him in the kingdom. After him in long order ſucceeded many valiant men of the ſame ſeruile ſtate and condition, whom for breuitie I wittingly paſſe ouer. Amongſt the reſt, Caitbeius (of whom wee haue before ſpoken in the life of Baiazet) was for wealth and martiall prowes moſt famous; who according to the maner of his predeceſſors, did with greater bountie and care maintain that ſeruile gouernment, than any of them who had before him raigned in Ægypt: and was for his notable gouernment and noble acts iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt princes of that age. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe in that ſeruile monarchie about the ſucceſſion. Whereby the Mamalukes drawne into diuers factions, ſome ſeeking to prefer one, and ſome another, had in foure yeares ſpace with ciuile wars ſore weakned their eſtate, and ſlaine diuers of their greateſt princes which had aſpired vnto that kingdome. For appeaſing of which miſchiefes, tending to the vtter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and chiefe men amongſt the Mamalukes with one conſent offered the kingdome to Campſon Gaurus (or as the Turks call him) Canſanes Gauris, of whom wee now ſpeake, a man of great integritie and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of ſo many kings whom he had ſeene in ſhort time miſerably ſlaine by the ambitious aſpiring of other proud competitors; when hee was ſore againſt his will hoiſt vp vpon the ſhoulders of the nobilitie and chiefe ſouldiers, and ſo carried into the court, as their manner was, began earneſtly to refuſe the kingdome, and to withſtand their choice, excuſing himſelfe as vnfit for ſo hie a place; and with teares ſtanding in his eyes, beſought the other great lords his friends, that they would forbeare to thruſt him, well contented with his priuat life, into that glorious place ſubiect to ſo many dangers; and the rather, for that he neither had mony to giue bountifully vnto the ſouldiers of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accuſtomed, neither held that ſufficiencie and authoritie as was requiſit for repreſſing of ſuch violent & ſeditious tumults as were too riſe in that troubleſome time and confuſion of all things.

The moderat and happie gouernment of Campſon.

The nobilitie on the other ſide perſuaded him, That he would not vpon a fooliſh obſtinacie or vaine modeſtie refuſe the offer of his preſent good fortune, but couragiouſly to take vpon him the gouernment of the ſtate, now ſore ſhaken with ciuile diſcord, together with the regal dignitie, which was with the generall good liking of all men ſo frankely offered vnto him. At laſt they all by ſolemne oath promiſed vnto him, That they would with all their power, policie, and wealth, maintaine and defend the maieſtie of his ſtate; and that the men of war ſhould not demand their wonted largeſſe, before the ſame might by his receiuers and treaſurers be raiſed of his cuſtomes and other reuenewes of the crowne. By which perſuaſions Campſon incouraged, ſuffered himſelfe to be ſaluted Sultan, and ſo tooke vpon him the gouernment. Afterwards, when he had giuen vnto the men of war ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largeſſe, and by his moderat gouernment had cauſed men generally to haue his proweſſe and wiſedome in admiration, he did with ſuch policie and dexteritie reforme the ſhaken ſtate of that kingdome, before rent in ſunder with ciuile wars, taking away by poiſon and other ſecret deuices, ſome few, the chiefe authors of ſedition, that for the ſpace of ſixteen yeares neither tumult nor noiſe of war was at any time heard of in all Syria or Ægypt: worthie vndoubtedly the name of a moſt excellent and fortunat Prince, if when he had by ſingular wiſedome and policie eſtabliſhed the generall peace and proſperitie of his kingdome, hee could haue there contented himſelfe to haue liued in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life not raſhly haue thruſt himſelfe into the dangerous quarrels of other princes.

The

A The Cadeleſcher and Iachis (Selymus his embaſſadours) departing from Iconium, came in few daies to Campſon the great Sultan, who then lay incamped neere vnto the riuer Orantes, at this day called Farfar. Theſe embaſſadors entertained by Campſon with greater bountie than courteſie, and ſhortly after their comming hauing audience in his pauilion, did with moſt temperat and calme ſpeech deliuer their embaſſage. To whom Campſon anſwered, That it was the antient cuſtome of the Ægyptian Sultans (foraſmuch as they held the chiefe place in their religion) with all care and induſtrie to keepe the other Mahometan Kings and people in peace and concord amongſt themſelues; whereof he for his part had been alwaies moſt deſirous: and was for no other purpoſe come with his army into his prouince of Syria, than to perſuade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended wars againſt Hyſmael B the Perſian king, his friend and confederat, he would then do what ſhould ſtand with his honour and place, and not longer ſuffer all to goe to wracke, for the vaine pleaſure and furie of one inſolent and ambitious man. He ſaid alſo, That he had of long time before ſeene into Selymus his inſatiable, fierce and troubleſome diſpoſition, who hauing moſt vnnaturally procured the death of his good father the old Emperor Baiazet, and ſlaine his brethren, Princes of great valour; ſeuen of his nephewes, princes of no ſmall hope; with many other of his beſt friends and faithfull counſellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyrannie. Wherefore they ſhould tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace ſhould be, if he would from thenceforth deſiſt from inuading of Hyſmael, and reſtore to Aladeules his ſon, his fathers kingdome, which had of long been vnder the defence and protection of the Ægyptian Sultans, as C of right and reaſon hee ought to doe: hee ſhould in ſo doing, beſide his fauor and friendſhip which might greatly ſtand him in ſtead, reape greater fame and glory by an aſſured and honorable peace, than by doubtfull and dangerous warre.

Campſon his anſwer to the embaſſadors of Selymus.

The Embaſſadors, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats giue ouer his enterpriſe or lay downe armes, yet to the intent they might the ſooner be diſpatched, and ſo in time aduertiſe Selymus of the Sultans ſudden comming, ſeemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to giue good hope by their reaſonable perſuaſions to induce Selymus to like thereof: foraſmuch as they were of his ſecret counſell, and men able to doe much with him; whereby they truſted (as they would haue had the Sultan to beleeue) it would eaſily be brought to paſſe, that thoſe ſparks might be quenched, which all things ſtanding D vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of war. So they being by Campſon rewarded, and hauing leaue to depart, trauelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to Cæſarea.

Campſon alſo remouing from Orantes, came into Comagena vnto the famous city of Aleppo, which citie is probably ſuppoſed to haue bin built of the ruines of the antient citie Hierapolis, by Alepius the Emperor Iulianus his lieutenant, who in that prouince did many notable matters, and called that new built citie after his owne name. It is ſcituate neere vnto the riuer Singa, which riſing out of the mountaine Pierius, with many turnings and windings runneth thorough Comagena, and being but a ſmall riuer, falleth at length into the riuer Euphrates. This citie Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at ſuch time as the Chriſtian princes of E the Weſt made warre with the Ægyptian kings, for the kingdomes of Syria and Ieruſalem. Which calamitie notwithſtanding, it was againe repeopled; and is at this day a famous city, for the commodious ſcituation thereof much frequented with merchants from the furtheſt parts of the world. It is ſcarce fiue daies iourney from Tripolis and Berytus, the great ports of Syria, and is alſo neere vnto the Turks and Perſians: ſo that the riches of the Eaſt are hither commodiouſly conuaied out of Turkie, ouer the mountaine Amanus which parteth Cilicia from Syria: and ſo likewiſe out of Perſia and Meſopotamia ouer the riuer Euphrates, where the citie Bytha of late time bounded the kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Perſian.

F Selymus vnderſtanding by his embaſſadors (who had diligently noted all things in the Sultans camp) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies, and alſo enformed of the Sultans proud anſwer, who had ſo peremptorily preſcribed to him ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as pleaſed himſelfe: thought good to alter his purpoſe, and now to conuert his forces another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into Armenia, leauing ſo puiſſant an enemy as Campſon at his back, ſeemed a thing too ful of danger: and to giue ouer

the enterpriſe he had with ſo great care and charge vndertaken, at the appointment and pleaſure G of another man, ſtood neither with his honor or ſtate. Wherfore in a matter ſo doubtful, he reſolued vpon a notable and neceſſarie point, well fitting the greatneſſe of his mind. Hee made ſhew as if he would haue gon directly againſt the Perſian, as he had before determined; and that the more certaine report of this his purpoſe might be carried to Campſon, he ſent before part of his armie with his carriages to the citie Suaſſia, in old time called Sebaſta, it ſtandeth in the frontiers of the Perſian kingdome, where the great riuer Euphrates pent vp with the rocks of the mountaine Taurus, breaketh againe violently forth into Meſopotamia: but turning himſelf vpon the right hand, purpoſed to paſſe the mountain Taurus, & breaking ſuddenly into Comagena to come vpon the Sultan before hee were well aware of his comming. Wherefore calling vnto him his truſtie Ianizaries, with the other ſouldiers of the court, hee H openly with cheerfull countenance declared vnto them what he had reſolued to doe with the reaſons of the alteration of his former determination: perſuading them, that the victorie would eaſily be atchieued, if they as couragious ſoldiers would with all celeritie (before the Mamalukes could perceiue they were returned) get vp to the top of the mountaines, and recouer thoſe difficult paſſages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamalukes. For why (ſaid he) the ſtrength of thoſe horſemen is long ſince decayed and gone: the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of ſome fame and reputation, are all dead. You ſhall in battell meet but with a ſort of gallant horſebreakers rather than ſouldiers, which can cunningly manage their horſes in ſport, to the pleaſure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enemy, or to indure to be wounded: I who as carpet Knights effeminat with long peace, and corrupted with exceſſe and delicacie of their great Cities, neuer ſaw their foes intrenched, or armed enemies, neither haue heard the ſound of a trumpet, but at plaies or ſhewes. Wherefore you are to make but ſmall account of them, being furniſhed with no ſtore of ordance or ſtrength of footmen. But as the reuerend interpretours of our ſacred Lawes and Religion, hauing orderly performed all their obſeruances, do diuine vnto vs all happineſſe: ſo you as men full of hope, ſet forward cheerefully vnto moſt aſſured victorie ouer your proud enemies. For God no doubt fauoureth the quarrell of men iuſtly prouoked, and offereth meanes of victorie to ſuch as take vp iuſt and neceſſarie armes. Yet to ouercome the enemie, and to enioy victorie indeed, wholly conſiſteth in the courage and valour of them which deeme nothing better or more honourable than to ſpend their liues for the honour of their Prince and Countrey. Heere the Ianizaries ſhaking their weapons, K forthwith cried out with cheerefull voice, That he ſhould lead and conduct them whitherſoeuer hee would: ſaying, That they were readie as couragious men, to ouercome all the difficulties of thoſe hard paſſages, and patiently to endure all the labors and dangers incident to that warre.

Selymus encourageth his ſouldiers to goe againſt the Mamalukes.

Selymus, by the mountaine people hauing found out the eaſieſt paſſages, reſolued to paſſe ouer the mountaine with his armie in three places: and ſo appointing three great companies of the common ſouldiers and country people, for the opening of the ſtrait paſſages; hee commanded the rough and vneuen waies to bee made plaine and ſmooth, for the tranſporting of his ordnance, and the broken paſſages to be caſt euen, that ſo his baggage and carriages might the better paſſe: and the more to encourage his ſouldiers to take paines, he promiſed preſent reward to all ſuch as in tranſporting of his ordnance, ſhould take any extraordinarie paines. L Whereby it came to paſſe, that the ſame being of the ſmaller ſort bearing bullet of no great height, was in ſhort time by the cheerfull labour of his ſouldiers, drawne ouer thoſe great hils and dales: ſo that in fiue daies all his armie with his baggage and carriages were got ouer the mountain Taurus, and come into the plaines of Comagena. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of Amanus, which is almoſt in the middle where the riuer Euphrates parteth the mountaine Taurus, and the Bay Iſſicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impaſſable: for as it commeth neerer the ſea, it is not ſo rough as elſewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accuſtomed to labor and toile, M who are now called Caramanians, which is to ſay, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine ſeeme a far off to be blake.

Alis-Beg which bettraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before ſent for, as ſoone as the armie was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a ſtrong power of his light horſmen, ſpeedily ouerran all that country which is at the foot of Amanus and Taurus: therby to vnderſtand of the country people & ſuch as they could take priſoners, where Cam-

A ſon lay with his armie; and alſo by keeping the paſſages to doe what might poſſibly be done, that Selymus his comming might not be knowne to the enemie.

But Campſon, who with no leſſe vanitie than pride had fondly flattered himſelfe, onely by the authoritie and greatneſſe of his name to haue terrified Selymus, and ouerruled him at his pleaſure; could not be perſuaded that he was come ouer the mountaine Amanus, vntill certain newes was brought him, that he was encamped with a moſt puiſſant armie within two daies march of him. With which vnexpected newes being ſore troubled, and in the midſt of that danger to ſeeke counſell, as one which began rightly to conſider of his owne ſtrength, and the ſtrength of his enemie; began then to doubt what were beſt for him to doe, and in great perplexitie ſometime hoped well, and by and by was as a man halfe diſcouraged and diſmaied. B And now become exceeding carefull both of his honour and himſelfe, hee began to doubt, whether it were better for him to giue place to ſo great a danger, and ſhunning battell to retire with his armie into places of more ſafetie; or elſe couragiouſly to abide the comming of his enemies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great diſaduantage; foraſmuch as he reputed it farre more honorable, after the example of his predeceſſors from whom he had receiued that great kingdom (both gotten and kept by martiall prowеſſe) to die with honor in the field, than by ſhamefull and vnwonted flight, either to blemiſh their militarie glorie continued aboue the ſpace of 300 yeares, or for loue of a ſmall remainder of life, being now 77 yeares old, to ſeeme willing to reſerue vnto obloquie and ſhame his laſt dayes, depriued of all honour and reputation.

The wholeſome counſell of Gazelle for protracting the warre.

C There were amongſt his chiefetaines many, which preferred wholeſome counſell before that which was in ſhew more glorious: but aboue all others, one Iambard ſyrnamed Gazelles (ſometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant man of great honor, for his long experience in martiall affaires, and at that time gouernour of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks armie, conſiſting for moſt part of expert ſouldiers, with ſo ſmall a power, were a thing of deſperate danger; ſo was he alſo, that it were good ſpeedily to retire, and to chuſe the citie of Damaſco, as the fitteſt place for thoſe wars: foraſmuch as the Turks army could make no haſt after them, by reaſon of their footmen and carriages, ſo that they might at eaſe and with ſafety retire; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in gariſon in Iudea and Ægypt, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbors, to protract the D war vntill Winter, when as they might eaſily diſtreſſe the enemie for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that Aleppo, if it were furniſhed but with a reaſonable garriſon, could by & by be taken of the enemy, who had but ſmal field peeces not fit for batterie. Beſide that, in ſhort time aid would come from the Perſians out of Meſopotamia, yea & Hiſmael himſelfe hearing of the Turkes expedition into Syria, was like ynough to breake into Aſia the leſſe: neither would the Christians refuſe to furniſh them with great artillerie from the Iſlands of the Rhodes and Cyprus againſt that common enemie, if they were thereto in time requeſted. All which things being laid together, he ſaid, the Sultan might afterward vpon euen hand goe into the field, if he ſhould thinke it ſo much to concerne his honor, to giue his enemies battell. But for as much as the greateſt wars, which at the firſt had moſt violent and moſt E furious motions, by the politicke enemies delay, did moſt commonly in time grow calme, he ſhould not therefore make too much haſt to aduenture the fortune of battell: for that the errours of war, which many times chanced through the ouerſight or raſhneſſe of the chiefetains, might wel of good men be lamented & deteſted, but hardly or neuer recouered or amended.

Gazelles his graue and conſiderat ſpeech had much moued both the Sultan and others: yet the cheerfulneſſe of the ſouldiers, and fooliſh hardines of the Mamalukes did ſo fill Campſons eares, that he could not hearken to ſo good and wholeſome counſel: for as ſoone as they heard certainly of the comming of the Turks, they began to leape and dance, and to reioice among themſelues, that the time was come wherin they might make proofe of their valor, and win to themſelues honor. For now (as they ſaid) was come that time they had long wiſht for, where- F in they would by notable ſlaughter of their enemies, aduance the honor and maieſty of Campſon their Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeius: and ſome euen of the chiefe men about Campſon, vpon flatterie and vaine oſtentation, alledging how honorably and with what ſmall labor they had before ouerthrown the Turks great armie at Taurus; perſuading him, that the victorie would eaſily and without any great danger be gotten. But eſpecially Cajerbeius Gouernor of Aleppo and of the prouince of Comagena (who after his war ended, was in reward of his G foule treaſon, by Selymus vnworthily preferred to the greateſt honours of Ægypt) extolling with glorious words the faithfulneſſe, courage, and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the power and ſtrength of the enemie, forced his wits to the vttermoſt to ouerthrow the wholſome counſell of Gazelles.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart againſt Campſon, becauſe hee had ſome few yeres before poiſoned his brother, whom he had in jealouſie, being a man next to himſelfe of greateſt power, wealth, and authority amongſt the Mamalukes, and withall of an aſpiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to looke to himſelfe, and doubting the like practiſe to be intended againſt himſelf, being, as the maner of that kingdom was, ſummoned to a parliament at Caire, faigned himſelfe ſicke, and would not come: wherwith H Campſon was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it beſt to diſſemble the matter, & to wait ſome fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, ſo forgetful of his duty, and bearing himſelfe againſt his ſoueraigne, as if he had bin an abſolute king in his own prouince: this he thought might moſt couertly be brought to paſſe, if he ſhould vpon the occaſion of the preſent war (as it then fel out) or els vnder the color of going in perſon himſelfe to the riuer Euphrates, come to Aleppo: for it was the manner of the antient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themſelues worthie of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had, as Caytbeius had of late done, encamped their army vpon the ſide of the riuer Euphrates at the citie Byrtha (which ſtanding vpon the banke of the riuer, retaineth at this day both the antient I name and fame) and there with ſolemne pompe had in the ſight of the armie forced their horſes into the riuer to drinke: giuing to vnderſtand by that ceremonie, the greatnes of their empire, & that they were readie by force of arms to proue, that all thoſe countries were theirs which lay alongſt the riuer Euphrates, from the mountain Taurus vnto the deſerts of Arabia. But the conſideration of this war letted that he did not at his firſt comming oppreſſe him, becauſe he deemed it to ſtand beſt with his preſent affaires: and not yet knowing the purpoſe of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Perſians, and to defer the execution of his wrath againſt Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the war; for feare leſt the other Mamalukes, diſmaied with the hainouſneſſe of the ſudden fact, ſhould either reuolt from him, or els raiſe ſome mutinie or rebellion in that populous citie. Fot Cayerbeius had by his courteſie and bountie K many ſtrong companies in the army faſt bound vnto him: and beſide that, was of greateſt credit and authority with them of Aleppo, hauing in his keeping a ſtrong citadell, built vpon the riſing of an hill in the midſt of the citie, which he kept with a ſtrong and ſure garriſon.

But whiles Campſon doth thus ſlowly and conſideratly purpoſe his deſtruction, many of the Sultans ſecret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, ſecretly aduiſed Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by ſome good means in time to prouide for his owne ſafetie. He vnderſtanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, ſent ſecret meſſengers vnto Selymus, diſcouering vnto him the cauſe of his griefe, and promiſing as occaſion ſhould ſerue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the caſtle with the heart of the citizens, and all the ſtrength of his owne horſemen; thereby to prouide for his owne ſafetie, to reuenge his L brothers death, and to further his victorie againſt Campſon: and for performance of promiſes on both ſides, required ſecret hoſtages to be giuen. By the ſame meſſengers he alſo aduertiſed him, what ſtrength the Sultan was of, perſuading him in any caſe to make haſt to giue him battel before he had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condiſcend to all that the traitor had requeſted, promiſing of himſelfe farre greater things than euer he had required: aſſuring himſelfe of the victorie, if his enemie ſhould loſe ſo much of his ſtrength by the reuolt of ſo great a commander.

Campſon enforced by the generall conſent of his ſouldiers, and the violence of his ineuitable deſtinie, then at hand, reiecting the good and faithfull counſell of Gazelles, at ſuch time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; reſolued according to the counſell of the traitor Cayerbeius, to dare him battell. He lay conueniently incamped vpon the riuer Singa, almoſt ten miles M from the citie, in ſuch ſort as that his ſoldiers might vſe the benefit of the riuer, and remoued from the houſes and pleaſures of the citie, might yet neuertheleſſe be eaſily relieued with the ſtore and plentie thereof.

The Mamalukes notable ſouldiers.

The Mamalukes were ſcare in number twelue thouſand, but euery one of them, according

A as he was of greater place or calling,ſo had he attending vpon him mo ſeruants, wel furniſhed with horſe and armor. A goodly and inuincible armie, it the battel might haue been tryed by true valour. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and ſterne countenance, hauing ſtrong and able bodies, vſed ſuch cunning in all their fights and battels, that after they had giuen the firſt charge with their launces,they would by and by with wonderfull actiuitie vſe their bows and arrows,caſting their targuets behind them;and forthwith the horſmans mace,or crooked ſcimitar,as the manner of the battell or place required. Their horſes were ſtrong and couragious,in making and ſwiftneſſe much like vnto the Spaniſh Iennets; and that which is of many hardly beleeued, ſo docible, that at certaine ſignes or ſpeeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him vp from the ground a launce, an arrow, B or ſuch like thing; and as if they had known the enemie,run vpon him with open mouth, and laſh at him with their heeles,and had by nature and cuſtom learned,not to be afraid of any thing. Theſe couragious horſes were commonly furniſhed with ſiluer bridles, guilt trappings, rich ſaddles,their necks and breſts armed with plates of yron: the horſeman himſelfe was commonly content with a coat of maile or a breſt-plate of yron. The chiefe and wealthieſt of them vſed headpieces; the reſt a linnen couering of the head,curiouſly folded into manie wreathes, wherewith they thought themſelues ſafe ynough againſt any handie ſtrokes: the common ſouldiers vſed thrumb'd caps, but ſo thicke that no ſword could pierce them.

The order of Campſon his battell.

Campſon of all his armie made foure battells: The firſt was committed to Cayerbeius, becauſe it was in his owne prouince where the battell was to be fought. The ſecond was led by C Sybeius, who for his wonderfull actiuitie was of them called Baluano, which in their language ſignifieth a tumbler, or one that ſheweth feats of actiuitie: he was gouernour of Damaſco, a man of ſingular faith and valour. Theſe two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turks armie. After them followed Gazelles with the third battell, to ſecond either the one or the other of the two formoſt, as need ſhould require. Campſon himſelfe led the fourth,all gliſtering in guilt armour, behind the reſt almoſt a mile and a halfe. The laſt was left for defence of the campe.

The order of Selymus his battell.

But Selymus according to his woonted manner ſo ordered his battell, that his Aſian horſemen were in the right wing, his Europeian horſemen in the left, his Ianizaries and artillerie in the maine battell; before whom in the middle betweene the two wings he placed his moſt D valiant and gallant penſioners,amongſt whom,contrarie to his woonted cuſtome, he choſe to ſerue that day.

Cayerbeius as ſoone as he was come neere the enemie, in token of his braue courage, gaue a hot charge vpon the Europeian horſemen; and by and by, as if he would haue compaſſed in that wing,wheeled a great way about behind them: where chancing vpon a great company of ſcullions,drudges,and other baſe people that followed the campe, with an infinite number of camels and carriages,he made there a great ſtir with little ſlaughter,that as a valiant and cunning traitor he might in the ſelfe ſame time ſatisfie the expectation of his valour and of his treaſon togither. In the other wing, the gouernor of Damaſco,to enter vpon the open ſide of the enemie,forbearing to charge him afront,and turning about his troups on the left hand,entred E ouerthwart their ranks; where the Mamalukes fought with ſuch furie,that hauing made great ſlaughter of the Aſian horſemen,they brake in amongſt them, as if it had been a raging floud,bearing all down before them,vntil they came to the enſignes in the midſt of that wing: neither could Muſtapha the Beglerbeg(who was by birth a Hungarian, & Selymus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor-Baſſa(or maſter of the houſe)though they did what they might to withſtand him, after the firſt were ouerthrowne, ſtay the reſt, but that they would needs turne their backs and flie. So Sybeius as a valiant conqueror hauing cut in two peeces the right wing of the enemies battell, and thruſting in betwixt the battell of the footmen and the backs of the penſioners,brought a great terror and feare vpon the whole maine battell. The matter was now brought to extreame danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almoſt F cut off from his footmen,in whom he had repoſed his greateſt confidence. And now the Ianizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles,who following the fortune of Sybeius, had ſet vpon the head of the enemies battell. The Aſian horſemen alſo being put to the worſe, and cut in pieces,found no meanes how to reſtore againe their diſordered battell.

In this extremitie Sinan Baſſa in good time came in with his horſemen: by his comming, for that he had bin but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the traitor, and had brought with him many G freſh troups of horſemen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repreſſed, the Turks againe encouraged, and the victorie ſhortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillery being by the commandement of Selymus at the ſame time diſcharged amongſt them, by the terrible thundring whereof, the Mamalukes horſes ſomewhat troubled, could ſo well as before be ruled: neither could the men themſelues, although they were of wonderful courage, much preuaile, being on euery ſide oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that diſtreſſe beeing nothing diſmaied, although they were by Cayerbeius and their good fortune forſaken, they were not to ſeeke either of courage or direction: but ſetting themſelues cloſe togither, they brake through the midſt of their enemies, with great ſlaughter of the Europian horſemen, and hurt of the penſioners; and ſo with ſpeed fled towards the campe and citie. H After whom followed Sinan Baſſa with the readieſt and freſheſt troupes of his horſemen: for Selymus (who that day in the extreame heat, for his wonderfull paines, courage, and direction, ſeemed vndoubtedly greater than himſelfe) riding vp and downe, called earneſtly vpon his ſouldiers to vrge the victorie, and with all ſpeed to purſue their flying enemies.

The death of Campſon.

Campſon had now (his deſtinie ſo leading him) ſet forward, of purpoſe to come to the relief of his men ſent before; or if the Turks ſhould be ouercome, to be partaker of the victorie: when vpon the way he vnderſtood by them that fled, That Cayerbeius was reuolted, his armie ouerthrown, and the terror ſo great, as that the flight of his ſoldiers was not now poſſibly to be ſtaied: beſide that, to augment the feare, it was reported, That the multitude of his enemies, I and force of their artillerie was ſo great, that they were not then to be encountred. With which heauie news, the proud old man, who in the perpetuall courſe of his good fortune had neuer taſted of euill hap, was readie for ſorrow and griefe of minde to haue ſunk down to the ground. And forthwith his own men, and the enemy purſuing them, comming vpon him, who in their headlong courſe without regard ouerthrew whomſoeuer they met, euery man making ſhift for himſelfe, without reſpect of others harmes: he being a corpulent man of great yeres, and beſide the heauineſſe of his armor, troubled alſo with a rupture, ouercome with heat and griefe of mind, fainted in that great preiſe, and ſo falling down, was without regard troden to death, after he had with great maieſtie gouerned the kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria, many yeres. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damaſco and Tripolis, whileſt others fled for life, either K to the campe or to the citie of Aleppo, labouring in the hindermoſt of their flying troupes to repreſſe the force of their purſuing enemies, where both fighting honorably ſlain. Selymus erecting a few tents in the ſame field wherein the battell was fought, and keeping moſt part of his armie in armes, ſlept not all that night, but ſtood faſt as a man not yet aſſured of his victory or good fortune; fearing leſt men of ſo great valour as were the Mamalukes, ſhould in the couert of the night returne and ſet vpon him in his campe: for he knew right wel, that they were ouercome and put to flight, rather by the treacherie of Cayerbeius, and furie of his great ordnance, than by the valor of his ſoldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly vnderſtood of the death of Campſon, hauing giuen their horſes a ſhort bait, departed in haſt from Aleppo to Damaſco. L The next day Selymus remouing with his armie, took the rich tents of his enemies full of all princely ſtore, which he gaue vnto his ſoldiers for a prey: and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the citie peaceably deliuered vnto him by Cayerbeius, where he fauorably tooke the citiſens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priuiledges than they had in former time enioyed.

Aleppo deliuered to Selymus by Cayerbeius the Traitor.

In this battell were ſlaine not aboue a thouſand Mamalukes, but of their ſeruants and followers a great number; moe being ſlaine in the flight than in the fight, when as their horſes fainting for heat, and dying vnder them for thirſt, many of them were inforced to betake themſelues to their feet, and ſo were eaſily ſlaine of euery baſe horſeman. For a great number of goodly horſes died there, which being foggie fat, and delicately brought vp in cold ſtables, could not endure the vehemencie of the heat, and that vnacquainted trauell: for that day all things were burnt with the ſcortching heat of the Sunne. M

This famous battell was fought the 17 of Auguſt, in the yere of our Lord 1516, the verie ſame day (which is ſtrange to tell) whereon but two yeares before, he had obtained the victorie againſt Hyſmael the great Sophie in the Chalderan fields. Selymus loſt in this battell three thouſand horſemen: whereby it may eaſily be gathered, That he had there receiued a notable

A dle ouerthrow of his horſemen, if Sinan Baſſa in the left wing (which by the treaſon of Cayerbeius eſcaped with ſmall loſſe) had alſo happened vpon his Syberius, as the other Generall did.

The dead bodie of Campſon found two dayes after without any wound appearing thereupon, was by the commandment of Selymus laid forth in open place for all men to behold; that ſuch as beleeued him yet to liue, and to be gone to repaire his armie at Caire, might be out of all hope of his returne; and others that were alreadie reuolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all feare of him. Not long after, when the dead bodie began to putrifie and grow noyſome, and to conuince the fame of his eſcape, had lien open to the view of all men by the ſpace of three dayes, it was without any funerall pompe or ſolemnitie, ſimply buried in the moſt antient Temple of Aleppo. Of the riſing and fall of this great man, Ianus B Vitalis hath written this Elogium or Epitaph.

The dead bodi. of Campſon laid out for all men to view.

Selymus comming to Damaſco.

Selymus hauing receiued the citie of Aleppo into his obeiſance, ſent Ionuſes Baſſa before M him with a great part of his light horſemen, to purſue his flying enemies to Damaſco, whither he himſelfe in few daies after came alſo with the reſt of his armie, when hee vnderſtood that his enemies were departed thence and fled to Caire. They of Damaſco, thinking it not to ſtand with their good to ſtay the courſe of his victorie, and with their liues to hazard the

A the great wealth of that rich citie: without delay preſently opened vnto him the gates at his comming. By whoſe example other cities alongſt the ſea coaſt mooued, eſpecially Tripolis, Berytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, ſending their Embaſſadours, and receiuing in the Turks garriſons, yeelded themſelues in like manner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great Councel in his camp, which then lay vnder the wals of Damaſco: for he would not bring his ſoldiers into the citie for troubling the quiet and populous ſtate thereof, togethet with the great trade of merchandiſe, which at that time was with wonderful ſecurity kept there by merchants of diuers countries, comming from far, euen from the remoteſt parts of the world. And in the camp ſuch was the military diſcipline of that moſt ſeuere Commander, that the ſouldiers (knowing the victorie to giue them no whit the more B libertie) ſuffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citizens, in the moſt plentifull time of Autumne, to reſt in ſafetie vntouched, without any keeper. By which ſeuere and ſtrait gouernment he ſo politickly prouided againſt all wants, that his camp was in all parts furniſhed with plentie of all things neceſſarie, and that at prices reaſonable. There taking vnto him men skillfull in the laws and cuſtomes of the countrey, and calling before him the embaſſadors of all the cities of the countrey, he heard and decided the greateſt controuerſies of the Syrians, appointed Gouernors ouer the prouinces and cities, took view of the tributes and cuſtoms, and abrogated many cuſtomes & tributes due vnto the old Sultans, which ſeemed either vnreaſonable or grieuous to the people; therby to gain the fame of a iuſt & bountiful conqueror.

Notable diſcipline in Selymus his armie.

When he had thus ſet all things in order in Syria, and ſufficiently reſted and refreſhed his C army; and eſpecially his horſes which with long and continuall trauel were grown maigre and leane: he of nothing more deſirous than of the conqueſt of Ægypt, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Sultans ſtate and Mamalukes gouernment; ſent before Sinan Baſſa into Iudea with fifteene thouſand horſemen, and a ſtrong regiment of harquebuſiers ſelected out of the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers, to trie the paſſage of that countrey, and to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be vnto him very troubleſome, by reaſon of the wild Arabians roaming vp and downe that countrey. The citie of Gaza ſtandeth neere the ſea towards Ægypt, not far from the ſandie deſarts, whereby men with much difficultie and dangerous trauell paſſe out of Syria and ſo to Caire.

In the meane time, the Mamalukes who vnder the conduct of Gazelles were come to Caire, D with all the reſt of their order which were thither aſſembled from all parts of the kingdome, entring into counſel together (as it often falles out in time of danger & diſtres) without al contention or enuie, choſe Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman-bai) a Circaſſian borne, to bee their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honor and power vnto the Sultan; whoſe proweſſe & policie was ſuch, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able and ſufficient to ſtay and vphold the afflicted & declining ſtate of their kingdome.
He by their general conſent and good liking promoted to the ſtate of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his owne maieſtie, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be wholly repoſed in arms, and the fortune of battell: began with great carefulneſſe and ſingular induſtrie to prouide armor, weapons, and horſes from all places; he alſo cauſed great ſtore of E ordnance to be caſt, and muſtered great companies of ſuch of his ſlaues as ſeemed meet for the wars: beſide that, he entertained for pay, many of the Moores and Arabians his neighbors.
He alſo for great reward, hired men skilfull of the countries, to go through the deſarts of the Palmyrens into Meſopotamia, and ſo to Hyſmael the Perſian king with letters earneſtly requeſting him to inuade the Turkes dominions in Aſia the leſſe, or with all ſpeed to breake into Comagena, being by the departure of the enemy left bare and deſtitute of ſufficient gariſons: and farther to aduertiſe him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of Iudea, might eaſily be incloſed with their two armies, and ſo be vanquiſhed, or for want of victuals diſtreſſed: and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turkes vpon that coaſt, able from ſea to relieue their armie by land, or yet to tranſport them thence in caſe they ſhould by chance of war be F diſtreſſed, & ſo thinke to return. In which doing, he ſhould both relieue the Ægyptian Sultan his friend and confederat, for his ſake brought into ſo great danger, and alſo without any great trouble or perill notably reuenge himſelfe of ſo many ſhamefull iniuries as he had before receiued from that his moſt capital enemy. Whilſt Tomombius doth theſe things, Sinan Baſſa the forerunner of Selymus, hauing eaſily repulſed diuers companies of the wild Arabians, who in Tomombeius by the generall conſent of the Mamalukes choſen Sultan of Ægypt.

Gaza yeelded to Sinan.

manner of theeues and robbers lay vpon the paſſages, had now opened the way, and was come to Gaza: where the citiſens, although they were in heart faithfull vnto the Mamalukes, yet for that to ſhut their gates againſt the Baſſa, and to ſtand vpon their guard without a ſufficient garriſon, ſeemed a matter both perrilous and vnreaſonable, forthwith yeelded their city vpon reaſonable compoſition; and with the plentie thereof relieued the Turks Baſſa, giuing him great (but diſſembled) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were deliuered from the cruell bondage of the Mamalukes: promiſing for the remembrance of ſo great a benefit, for euer to remaine his faithfull ſeruants. Sinan commending their readie good will, required of them all ſuch things as he wanted, or had occaſion to vſe; which they ſeemed willingly to deliuer: and ſo lodged his armie neere vnto the walls of the citie, within the defence of the gardens, purpoſing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus.

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and moſt skilfull in martial affaires) he ſought by all means to get knowledge of that deſart and vnpeopled countrie, not inhabited for lacke of water; and eſpecially of the nature of the great ſands whereby Selymus was with his armie to paſſe: he alſo woon by rewards the inhabitants of the countrey thereabout, by large offers, to procure vnto him the fauour of the Chieftaines and leaders of the Arabians, neere vnto thoſe places; and alſo to eſpie what the Mamalukes did at Caire, and wherein they repoſed their chiefe confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge thereof.

On the other ſide, the citiſens of Gaza, in heart enemies vnto the Turks, as dayly feeling the grieuances of the preſent armie, aduertiſed Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Baſſa: and that that power of the Turks armie might eaſily be oppreſſed before the comming of Selymus, if a ſtrong power of Mamalukes were ſent thither vnder the conduct of skilfull leaders: promiſing, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time vpon the ſudden in the night ſet vpon the ſleepie Turks, they would at the ſame inſtant ſallie out of the citie vpon the campe, and there with fire and ſword doe what harme they could for the ouerthrow of the enemie.

Of this deuice, Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked well, and ſo without delay ſent Gazelles ſix thouſand choſen horſmen, and a great number of the Arabians, to performe the exploit vpon Sinan: for Gazelles, in that his wholeſome counſell had been by Campſon and others reiected, (who being ſtraitway deſirous of battell, had raſhly caſt themſelues and the whole State into ſo great calamitie) and afterwards in the greateſt danger of the battell hauing performed all the parts of a politique and valiant Chiefetaine, was growne into ſuch credit, that all men held a great opinion both of his valour and direction.

But he was ſcarcely well ſet forth, when aduertiſement was giuen vnto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were comming thorow the ſandie Deſarts, vpon the ſudden to oppreſſe him; and that they would be with him before two dayes were expired, foraſmuch as they had ſet forward vpon the ſpur, without any carriages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the ſafegard of Sinans armie, ſo was it of greateſt importance and moment, for the obtaining of the full conqueſt of Ægypt afterward. But Sinan Baſſa, although he knew nothing of the treacherie of them of Gaza; yet as a man of a prouident and ſubtill wit, ſuſpecting that ſuch a thing might happen, becauſe he would not at once haue to doe with a double enemy, reſolued to go and meet the Mamalukes vpon the way, and to giue them battell. Wherefore with great ſilence diſlodging his armie betwixt tenne and twelue of the clocke in the night, he ſet forward and marched out of ſight of the citie about fifteene miles toward Ægypt. There was neere vnto that place a little low village, wherein trauellers vſed commonly to lodge, for the commodiouſneſſe of a liuely and plentious ſpring which there riſeth: there by chance both Sinan Baſſa had purpoſed to ſtay, and Gazelles in like manner had alſo determined to reſt a few houres to refreſh his armie, that he might by night, after he had wel refreſhed his horſes, come vnlooked for vpon his enemies at Gaza: when newes was brought to both the Generals almoſt at one inſtant, by the forerunners of both the armies, That the enemie was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected news, for that he perceiued himſelf diſappointed of his purpoſe; and vnable to fight with his enemies in plaine battel, eſpecially his horſes being ſore wearied with trauell, was inforced vpon the ſudden for the ſafegard of himſelfe and his followers, to reſolue vpon a new reſolution: yet nothing diſcouraged, with cheerfull countenance and liuely ſpeech exhorted his ſoldiers to make themſelues readie for battaile,

A battell, & that which they could not by policie bring to paſſe, they ſhould now by plain force performe. Sinan on the other ſide hauing ſomewhat ſooner ſet his men in order of battel than had Gazelles, foraſmuch as hee had before at good leiſure taken order what hee would haue done, if it ſhould come to the point of batell: with conſtant looke and long perſuaſions full of hope, encouraged his ſouldiers to fight. But the concluſion of all his ſpeech was, That they ſhould play the men, and not once thinke of flight, foraſmuch as all places about them would be ſhut vp, and become impaſſable, if they obtained not the victorie: and that aboue all things they ſhould perſuade themſelues, that no one of them could that day periſh, but ſuch as the immortall God had by the ineuitable law of fatall Deſtinie appointed to die: and that with like hazard valiant men found life in the middeſt of their enemies weapons, that cowards by B immutable Deſtinie found death in their ſafeſt flight.

The battell betweene Sinan Baſſa and Gazelles.

The Baſſa had placed his harquebuſiers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of a great length in thin ranks, thereby to vſe their peeces at more libertie, and with more eaſe to incloſe the enemie: in the middle were placed the horſemen to receiue the firſt charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approching the enemie, ſent before the troups of the Arabian light horſmen to trouble the wings of his enemies battell, and with a ſquare battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battell of the Turks. The battell was a great while moſt terrible, and the victorie doubtfull: for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to indure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were gald to giue ground; and quite diſor-dered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men diſcouraged, began to looke about them C which way they might flie: when by the commandement of Sinan, the harquebuſiers, who with the firſt volley of their ſhot had repulſed the Arabians, wheeling about, encloſed all the enemies battell. By which means both men and horſe were a far off ſlaine, with the multitude of the deadly ſhot: where true valor helped not them, ſo on euery ſide incloſed. For where any troupe of the Mamalukes preſſed forward vpon the Turks, they quickly retired, and in all places of the battell as much as they could ſhunned to encounter their enemies with their horſemen, labouring onely to gaule them with ſhot. Gazelles ſeeing his horſes ſpent with extreame wearineſſe, and that he was not to expect any further help, his Arabians beginning now to fall from him; and alſo conſidering, that many of his moſt valiant ſouldiers were either ſlaine or wounded, and hauing alſo himſelfe receiued a great wound in his necke, he with the reſt of his D armie made way through the midſt of his enemies; and hauing loſt diuers of his enſignes, fled backe againe to Caire through the ſame ſandie deſerts whereby he came. In this battell was loſt the Gouernor of Alexandria, and Orchamus Gouernor of Caire (both men of great account among the Mamalukes) and beſide them a great number of Arabians, with a thouſand or more of the Mamaluke horſemen. Neither got Sinan a ioyfull or vnbloudie victorie hauing loſt aboue two thouſand of his beſt horſemen, and amongſt them certaine commanders, men of great marke.

The Turkes wearie of this battell, which had endured from noone till night, and many of their horſes fainting vnder them, were not able to purſue their enemies, and therefore encamped themſelues in the ſame place where the battell was fought, neere vnto the fountaine. The E day following they at leiſure gathered the ſpoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies, which were eaſily knowne by their long and rough beards, faſtened them vp vpon the Date trees growing thereby, as well in witneſſe of their worthie labour, as by that ſtrange and horrible ſpectacle to feed the eyes of their fierce Emperour, who was ſhortly after to paſſe that way, and ſo to manifeſt vnto him the victorie of that day.

In the meane time they of Gaza vpon the riſing of the Sun, perceiuing the Turks camp left emptie, as men not able longer to diſſemble their couert trecherie, and vainly ſuppoſing that Sinan Baſſa vpon ſome knowledge of the comming of the Mamalukes, had for feare retired back into places of more ſafetie, ſuddenly ſet vpon ſuch as were left in the camp, which were for moſt part ſick and weake men (yet in number many) whom they moſt cruelly ſlew: & pre-F ſently after ſet vpon 2000 of the Turks horſmen, ſent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the ſame day, enquiring with great carefulneſſe what was become of the Baſſa and his armie; and ſpoiling them of their carriages, put them to flight: who after that diſcomfiture, ſuppoſing the Baſſa (whom they had thought to haue found at Gaza, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by ſome miſhap or policie of the enemy to haue been loſt, with all his armie,and therefore fearefully retiring,were vpon the way miſerably ſlain by the Arabians: neither had any one of them eſcaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the Gouernor of Achaia at the citie of Rama: for hee was alſo ſent from Selymus to Sinan Baſſa with a ſtrong companie of Græcian horſemen, by whoſe comming the fury of the Arabians was well repreſſed. Yet theſe pilfering people ſtill calling forth to the prey more and more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountaines adioyning,and being growne to a great armie,ouertooke the Turks at a village called Carasbara, where they inforced them to fight in a place of great diſaduantage. For the Arabians hauing before taken certain ſtraits,which cloſed in the paſſage at the further end of a large vally,ſhewed themſelues at once,before,behind,and on both ſides of the Turkes: their weapons were bow and arrowes, and long ſpeares armed at both ends, which they nimbly handled,after the manner of the Moores. Theſe weapons they moſt skilfully vſed vpon their ſwift horſes,and both in their charge & retreat wounded their enemies deadly.So that the Turks in number few,and for their horſemens ſtaues inferior to their enemies,durſt not offer to charge them;but keeping cloſe together, hardly defended themſelues ſtill making way as they might: and had vndoubtedly bin brought into extreame danger to haue bin vtterly loſt,had not Iuleb with foure peeces of arttillerie which he brought with him for his defence,driuen them which kept the ſtraits from their high places,and ſo opening the way, with all ſpeed brought thorow his men: which ſtraits once paſſed, and comming into the open fields, he with more ſafetie marched forward,skirmiſhing a far off with the enemie with his archers and harquebuſiers,and diſcharging his field pieces where he ſaw the greateſt and thickeſt troups of thoſe wild people.

On the other part,the Arabians diſperſedly houering about them in troups,were ſtil in the taile of the army,and ſuch as were wounded or weak and could not follow the reſt,they ſlew; and ſought by all means to hinder their iourny,not ſuffering them(circumuented with ſo many dangers)either to refreſh themſelues, or to take any reſt. This was vnto the Turks a moſt diſmall day,for many of them tormented with thirſt,and weakned with wounds and extream labour,gaue vp the ghoſt; and now no helpe remained in this deſperat eſtate, being ſtill beſet and hardly laid too with the multitude of thoſe fierce and deſperat enemies:when ſuddenly a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid way vnlooked for, being now in deſpaire and euen at the laſt caſt: for Selymus hauing left the Imbrahor-Baſſa with a ſtrong armie vpon the borders of Perſia,for the defence of Syria and Aſia,and hauing ſent for new ſupplies of ſouldiers to Conſtantinople,which ſhould with a great fleet be tranſported into Syria,had now remoued from Damaſco: and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow ſcant in that waſted countrey;euery day ſent before great troupes and companies of his armie,as it were at certaine appointed times.

So Iuleb deliuered of the preſent danger by the comming in of theſe freſh ſoldiers,met with Selymus the next day,and in order told him all that had hapned vnto him and his firſt troupes at Gaza and Rama,and all the way after: and alſo what they ſuppoſed by coniectures to haue chanced to Sinan Baſſa with his armie,for the manifold wiles of ſo dangerous enemies. With which newes Selymus became exceeding melancholie, and thereupon thought it not good to goe any further,before he perfectly knew how all ſtood with Sinan: in whoſe fortune he had repoſed all the hope of his good ſucceſſe in that ſo great an enterpriſe. But whileſt he was in this dumpe,ſuddenly came the Syrian ſpies, who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Baſſa had done,conuerted that melancholie paſſion into no leſſe ioy and gladneſſe: for hee ſaw that by that victorie,Ægypt was laid open vnto him,and his deſires as good as halfe accompliſhed in leſſe time than euer he expected.

News of Sinans victory comforteth Selymus.

The next day after,he remoued with his armie to Rama,and by the way as he went(to the terror of others)burnt the dwellings together with the wiues and children of thoſe Arabians, who but a little before had done ſo much harm to his men in their paſſage. And from thence ſending before his footmen to Sinan Baſſa at Gaza,he himſelfe with his horſemen turned out of the way vpon the left hand to Ieruſalem,to viſit that moſt antient and famous citie,ſo much renowned both for the antiquitie thereof,and the fame of the religion of the Iewes. That vnpeopled and deſolate citie lay then defaced with the hugie ruins of the old ſacred and ſtately buildings;not inhabited by the Iews,the antient inhabitants therof(who for their inexpiable guilt,as men exiled out of the world,haue no countrey or reſting place) but for moſt part by a few

A a few poore Chriſtians, who to the great ſcorne and ſhame of the Chriſtian name, payd yerely a great tribute vnto the Sultan of Ægypt, for the poſſeſſion of the ſacred Sepulchre: when as the Chriſtian Princes, flouriſhing at that time with glorie, power, and wealth, could not by any motiue of immortal glory or fame, be incited to reuenge ſo great an iniurie; but deeming it (as ſhould ſeeme) better agreeing with their ſtate, to ſpend their time in idle vanities, or mortall war one againſt another, than in the quarrell of the moſt true and Chriſtian religion.

Selymus hauing reuerently worſhipped the antient monuments of the old Prophets, and done eſpeciall ſacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet; gaue vnto the Chriſtian prieſts keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) mony to maintain them for ſix months: and ſtaying at Ieruſalem but one night, marched in foure dayes to the reſt of his armie at Gaza: B where by the way he had continuall skirmiſhes both day and night with the Arabians: for they according to their wonted manner were deſperatly at hand in euery place, and where the ſtraitneſſe of the ways inforced the Turks to extenuat their ranks, there would they be readie to skirmiſh with them, and ſuddenly vnlooked for come to handie-blowes; and when they came into the vallies, they tumbled down from the mountains great ſtones vpon them, which they had for that purpoſe before prouided. At which time the Turks harquebuſiers, in whom they had greateſt confidence, ſerued them to little purpoſe: for the weather was ſo tempeſtuous and extreame moiſt with continuall raine, that the pouder in their flaskes became wet and vnſeruiceable, and hardly could they keepe fire in their matches. Yet by the valiantnes of the Ianizaries the matter was ſo vſed, that neere vnto the perſon of the Emperour no great harme C was done by thoſe naked robbers: for climebing vp the hils with pikes in their hands they droue them from their ſtandings, and enforced them to abandon the ſtraits and high places.

But Sinan Baſſa (who after his victorie returning to Gaza, had put to death the authours of the late reuolt, confiſcated their goods, and exacted of the people in generall a great ſum of money, as the iuſt puniſhment of their falſe treacherie) hearing now of the comming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious ſouldiers, furniſhed with the ſpoyles of their enemies. Whome Selymus moſt honourably receiued, and gaue generally to the Captaines, and particularly to the moſt valiant of the common ſouldiers, garments of ſilke, with a great ſum of money in reward of their good ſeruice.

After that, he ſtaied but foure days at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to giue any long D time of breathing vnto his diſcouraged enemies, now twice ouerthrowne; or to ſuffer the new Sultan (not yet well ſetled in his kingdom) to grow ſtronger by new preparations and ſupplies raiſed in the moſt populous and plentifull country of Ægypt. Which to let, although it required great haſte in ſetting forward, and ſerued as ſpurs vnto him, naturally haſting to glorie and renowne; yet was his armie to be refreſhed after ſo long and painfull trauell, & great prouiſion to be made for the carriage of water vpon camels all the way through the drie, ſolitarie, and ſandie deſarts. For betweene Gaza and Caire lie vaſt vnpeopled and barren ſands, which moued by the wind, riſe vp in billows in manner of a wrought ſea, ſo troubleſome, that oftentimes it is not poſſible to ſee for duſt: and the light ſands in many places gauled deepe with the winde, wonderfully troubleth the wearie paſſengers. But ſuch a ſudden calme enſued E the great rain which fell but three dayes before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted nothing that he could wiſh, for the happie conduct of his armie: for the aire was become ſo calme, that there was no blaſt of wind to raiſe the ſand to trouble their ſight; and withall, ſuch plentie of water was found almoſt in euery place, by reaſon of the abundant rain, which being not yet ſunke far into the ſand, afforded them water in ſuch plentie, if they digged but two foot deep, that the ſoldiers commonly thought it needleſſe to carrie any bottle of water for feare of thirſt. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that paſſage, on euery ſide to houer about the Turks armie (as hawks ouer their prey) and ſuffered none of them to ſtraggle out of order, or ſtay behind the armie, but they were ſtraitway ſnatcht vp & ſlain. Againſt whom Selymus prouided an eaſie remedie, by placing his field pieces in diuers parts of his ar- F mie, which by the direction of the leaders (as euery man hapned to be neereſt vnto the danger) were forthwith diſcharged vpon the roaming enemie. And in the rereward of his army were placed ſtrong companies of harquebuſiers, for defence of the weake and feeble ſoldiers, who could but ſoftly follow the armie, and were therefore moſt ſubiect to danger.

By this meanes Selymus with ſome ſmall loſſe receiued from the Arabians, in eight dayes march drew neere to Caire, Sinan Baſſa going before him, who with his Europeian ſouldiers ſtill kept one daies iourney before. There is a village about ſix miles diſtant from the citie of Caire called Matharea, famous for the plentie of moſt excellent balme: with liquour of all others moſt fragrant and ſoueraigne, diſtilled out of low trees there planted, whoſe vttermoſt rind the people cut with yuorie kniues to giue the liquor paſſage: which baulme for the notable vertues thereof, being not elſewhere to be had, mens diſeaſes and wanton deſires haue made of a wonderfull price. Into that place neere vnto a village called Rhodania, had Tomombeius conuaied all his new and old prouiſion of artillerie; and had drawne deepe ditches ouerthwart al the field, & croſſe the high way, which he had cloſely couered ouer the weak hurlds and earth, as if it had bin firme ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue thouſand) and a great multitude of Arabian horſemen lay in places conuenient, of purpoſe that when the Turks battels ſhould approch, they ſhould firſt feele the force of his great ordnance, before they came within the ſhot of their arrowes, and forthwith vpon great diſaduantage, with all his forces ſuddenly to ſet vpon them diſordred and intrapped. All which things were ſo cunningly and ſo politiquely contriued and done, that there was none in the Sultans army which doubted of the good ſucceſſe of that day: and a great miſchiefe had vndoubtedly befallen the Turks, had not fortune which fauored Selymus, and frowned vpon Tomombeius (or more truly to ſay, the fatall period of that kingdome ſo requiring) by the falſe treacherie of a few fruſtrated the great endeauors of the Mamalukes.

Tomombeius ſeekes to inſtrap the Turks.

There was in the Sultans armie among the ſoldiers of the court, foure Epirot Mamalukes, who grieued to ſee Tomombeius (contrary to their deſires) preferred to the kingdom by others of a contrary faction; whether it were vpon a malicious diſpoſition, or vpon hope of reward and better entertainment, or for that in ſo great a declination of their kingdome, they thought it good to ſeeke for new friends of more aſſurance, fled ſecretly to Sinan Baſſa, as to a moſt famous captaine, and one of their owne nation. For this great commander Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was borne in a poore country village of Epirus, in the mountain countrey of Ambracia; whom a wonderfull miſchance preferred to that height of credit and wealth: for it is reported, that a ſow kept in the houſe wherein he was borne, bit off his genitories, being then but a child, as he lay by chance ſleeping in the ſhadow; and being made of greater eſteem by that miſhap, was by them which tooke vp delicate minions for the Turkiſh Emperor, brought to Conſtantinople, and preſented to the great Emperour Mahomet, Selymus his grandfather: where fortune by the fatall direction of his good hap, aduanced him to his appointed honors, whome ſhee had long before diſmembred. By theſe fugitiue Mamalukes, Selymus and Sinan were inſtructed of all the deuices of the enemie, and eſpecially what ſtratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policie deuiſed: whereinto they muſt needs fall, if they ſhould go directly on and not forſake the highway. Wherefore guided by the ſame fugitiues, they fetcht a great compaſſe on the left hand, and by an vnuſed way, before it was day, hauing eſcaped the front of their enemies campe, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and ſhewed themſelues at their backs in order of battell, with their great artillerie readie bent, becauſe they were deſirous without delay to ioyne battell.

The comming of Selymus by an vnexpected way makes great cõfuſion in Tomombeius campe.

Tomombeius now too late perceiuing that his plot was diſcouered by the treaſon of ſome of his owne people; although he was therewith aboue meaſure grieued, for that all that he had with ſo great induſtrie and the labour of ſo many men brought to paſſe, was through ſpitefull fortune made fruſtrat, and in a moment brought to nought; yet for all that, as he was a man of an inuincible courage) preſently entred into his wonted and deepe deuices, and calling to him his chiefe commanders, quickly told them what he would haue done. Now in this ſhort moment of time he was to do many things at once; the ſignall was to be giuen for the ſoldiers to mount their horſes, and to make themſelues readie, the order of his campe was to be changed, his battel to be ordred, his ſoldiers to be encouraged, and all his great ordnance, as the caſe required, quite the contrarie way to be turned: all which things, as they could but hardly and troubleſomely by one commander be directed, ſo were they haſtily and diſorderly at once done by many. But aboue all other things, the great concourſe of people for turning & remouing the great artillerie, moſt troubled the wel ordring of the reſt: for many of them were hugie yron pieces of great weight, made faſt in ſtocks of wood, with rings & yron claſpes, after the old and rude manner of ſhip ordnance, which for their exceeding aud ponderous weight, could

A could not be out of their places remoued, but by the ſtrength of many horſes, and the great labour of men, with leauers and roules put vnder them: and ſuch as were mounted vpon carriages when they were drawne through all parts of the campe, with the great clamour of the diſordered and haſty people, ſome drawing, ſome thruſting forward the ſame, with their tumultuous ſtir and doings, wonderfully troubled the other ſouldiers as they were mounting to horſe and repairing toward their enſignes. But two things maruellouſly helped theſe difficulties, the ſoldiers cheerfulneſſe, & conſtancie, which was ſuch as paſſeth credit: for they did not vpon any apprehenſion of feare faile either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it hapneth in ſudden accidents, wherin euen the old approued ſoldiers do many times faile of their wonted valor. And although they were twice ouercome in battell, yet ſtill they were of greater ſpirit B and confidence, as men deſtitute neither of courage or skill, but onely of fortune.

Wherefore Tomombeius hauing with much adoo ordered this battell, and his ſoldiers with great cheerfulneſſe deſiring the ſignall to be giuen, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compaſſe in the wings of the enemies battell behind, and ſo to skirmiſh with them: that ſo (if it were poſſible) the Turks horſemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with ſuch an vncertain enemie, be diſordered before he ſet forward to charge them with his troups: and withall commanded his great ordnance (which was now turned vpon the enemy) to be preſently diſcharged. So did the Turks likewiſe, diſcharging at once from a conuenient diſtance both their greater & ſmaller ordnance, and ſpeedily recharging them, brought them within an arrow ſhot; ſo that for a good ſpace they lay beating the one the other on both ſides C with their great artillerie onely: in which manner of fight the Ægyptian canoniers were almoſt all ſlaine, and many of their field pieces broken by force of the enemies ſhot. For Selymus had in his camp many excellent and skilfull canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italie and Germanie: and eſpecially of thoſe refuſe Iewes, which by the zeale of king Ferdinand being driuen out of Spaine, afterwards to the ſhame of the Chriſtians, diſperſed thoſe rare and deadly deuices through the Eaſt. The chiefe of theſe canoniers was one Iacobus è Regio Lepidi, a cunning enginer, who but a litle before ouercome by the Turkes rewards, abiuring the Chriſtian Religion, reuolted vnto the Mahometan Superſtition.

Chriſtian canoniers ſerue the Turks againſt the Egyptians.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battel on both ſides, they gaue out a moſt hideous and dreadfull crie, and with exceeding fury aſſailed the Turks in three places: D for Selymus ſtill keeping his wonted order, approched his enemies with his battel in forme of an halfe Moone. Muſtapha Baſſa had the leading of the Aſian horſemen in the right wing: and Ionuſes Baſſa, of the Europeians in the left: he himſelfe ſtood in the maine battel with the ſquadron of his truſtie Ianizaries, and great ſtore of artillerie: but Sinan the Eunuch Baſſa, General of the field, led after him a great number of moſt valiant horſemen, drawne out of euery troup to be ready againſt all the vncertaine euents that might happen in the battell, vnto whom hee ioyned fiue hundred harquebuſiers, Ianizaries, men of wonderfull courage and actiuitie, ſelected out of Selymus his owne ſquadron, to relieue ſuch part of the army as ſhould chance to be moſt preſſed by the enemie.

The order of Selymus his army.

Sinan Baſſa Generall of the field.

So almoſt at one time, whileſt Tomombeius ſtood in the maine battell againſt Selymus, and E the wings of the Mamalukes with equall battell encountered the wings of the Turks, and the Arabians alſo valiantly charging them in the rereward as they had in charge, foure ſharp battels were at once made in diuers places. It is reported by ſome that were preſent in that battel, that what for the clamor & crie of ſoldiers, what for the noiſe of drums and trumpets & ſuch like inſtruments of war, what for the thundering of ordnance, clattering of armor, and riſing of the duſt, all mens minds were ſo confounded and abaſhed, that running on headlong as men furious & deſperat, when neither their ſpeeches could be heard their tokens known, their enſigns ſeen, or captains vnderſtood, miſtaking one another in that hurly burly, they ſlew many of their friends in ſtead of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, neither did euer two great kings with leſſe care of their perſons & ſafety more reſolutely or F deſperatly make ſhew of their ſtrength & courage: for both of them with like danger both of themſelues and of their armies, ſeeing plainly that they had put both their liues & kingdoms to the hazard of a battell, promiſed vnto themſelues no other hope of ſafetie, but what they ſhould obtaine by victory. Gazelles deſirous both of honor and of reuenge, to requite the Europeian horſmen with like ſlaughter as he had before receiued from them not far from Gaza, with

with wonderfull fury aſſailed Ionuſes Baſſa, and at the firſt encounter brake his firſt rankes, and G ouerthrew certain of his guidons: at which time the Arabians preſſing couragiouſly in at their backes, enforced thoſe victorious troupes, which in all battels had hitherto carried away the priſe (the very flower of Tracia, Theſſalia, Epirus, Macedonia, and Grecia) to flie and ſhew their backs, which neuer enemie had before that time ſeene. At which time Sinan Baſſa carefully attending euery accident, came ſpeedily in with his moſt valiant troupes of freſh men, vpon the ſide of the enemie, and reſtored againe the battell, now declining and fouly diſordered. But whileſt Sinan, who in this his laſt worthie labor had interrupted the manifeſt victory of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, he was by the comming in of the couragious captaine Bidon with his Mamalukes, ouercharged and ſlaine. His moſt valiant followers alſo laboring to reſcue and carry away his dead bodie, were H by Gazelles vnfolding his troupes (that ſtanding thin, they might at more libertie vſe their ſwords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight: and that choſen companie of fiue hundred of the moſt valiant Ianizaries, now deſtitute of their horſemen, when they had moſt couragiouſly done what was poſſible for men to doe, being compaſſed round with the Mamalukes horſemen, were all in a trice cut in pieces and trodden vnder foot. Thus reſteth this Eunuch Baſſa in the bed of fame, who liuing, had the leading of this moſt warlike Emperour Selymus his greateſt armies in his moſt dangerous warres.

Muſtapha in the other wing of the Turks battell comming on couragiouſly with his Aſian horſemen, did ſore preſſe the left wing of the Ægyptians (whereof Helymus the Diadare, and I Giapal, two valiant captaines, had the leading) who but a little before had receiued great harme by the great ordnance which was diſcharged out of the middeſt of Selymus his battell ouerthwart the field: which Muſtapha perceiuing, and deſiring to blot out the old infamie he had before receiued, did fiercely preſſe vpon them, ſo diſordered, and with his whole troups ouerthrew their broken rankes, and gliſtering in his bright armour, with a loud voice encouraged his Aſian ſouldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant proweſſe or honorable death, to recouer their antient honor of late loſt in the fields of Aleppo.

At the ſame time alſo Tomombeius breaking through the middle battell of the Turks horſemen, was entered into the ſquadron of the footmen, with his crooked ſcimitar giuing many a deadly wound, himſelf being a valiant big made man, and of great ſtrength. The Arabians had K alſo in a ring incloſed the vttermoſt parts of the Turks armie, & in many places inforced them to turne their battell vpon them, being ſore charged with a doubtfull fight both before & behind: when Selymus ſet forward with his battel of footmen, and his ſquadron of Ianizaries, his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge in that his hard diſtreſſe, whoſe inuincible force, neither the couragious barbed horſes nor their victorious riders were able to abide: for part of them with their harquebuſiers, and the reſt with their pikes, had ſo ſtrongly ſet the front of their battell, that nothing was able to ſtand whereſoeuer that firme battell, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire body, ſwayed. Yet was this cruell battell continued with diuers fortune on both ſides, from foure a clocke vntill the going downe of the Sunne; neither was there any part of their armies, which had not with diuers ſucceſſe and change of fortune, endured the fury L of that battell: for both the victors and the vanquiſhed being enraged with an implacable hatred one againſt another, fought deſperatly as men prodigal of their liues: the Mamalukes diſdaining to haue the victory wrong out of their hands by them whom they had in ſo many places diſcomfited, and the Turks taking it in no leſſe ſcorne, that they, whom but of late they had ouercome & vanquiſht in two great battels, ſhould now the third time make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance. So that on both ſides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakned with wounds, ſupported only with anger & obſtinacie of mind, ſeemed yet ſufficient to haue maintained that bloudie battell vntill the next day, if the darkneſſe of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that dayes ſlaughter.

Tomombeius vndoubtedly vanquiſhed, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrown, firſt cauſed a retreat M to be ſounded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed not able to withſtand the Ianizaries, might not ſeeme to be put to flight, but rather as men commanded, to retire. Which he thought to concern much both for the encouraging of his ſouldiers, and for the keeping of his own credit & eſtimation with his ſubiects: for now the ſelfe ſame fortune which had deceiued

A his firſt hopes, ſeemed vnto him (as it fareth with them in diſtreſſe, ſtill hoping for better) to promiſe him more proſperous ſucceſſe, if he were not diſcouraged: but reſeruing ſuch remainders of his forces as were left, he ſhould againe couragiouſly renew the war.

The battell thus broken off by the approch of the night, the Turks as victors enioying the tents and great artillerie of their enemies, purſued the Mamalukes vntill midnight, who held on their way to Caire, in manner as if they had fled. This great battell was fought vpon a Thurſeday, the 24 day of Ianuary, in the yere 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the valiant captaine Bidon, hauing in the battell one of his legges broken in the knee with a faulchion ſhot, wherewith his horſe was alſo ſlaine vnder him. Selymus commanded them both the next day to be ſlaine, either for that their wounds were ſup-B poſed to be incurable, or els for that it was his pleaſure, with the death of thoſe two honorable perſonages to appeaſe the angrie ghoſt of Sinan Baſſa, whoſe death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus cauſeth the Diadare & the valiant captaine Bidon to be ſlaine.

The Turks although they ſtill preuailed, yet was their armie greatly impaired euen in their proſperous ſucceſſe and fortunat battels: the fourth part of their armie was conſumed with ſickneſſe and the ſword, and that dayes labour had tyred a great number of their horſes, be-ſide the long journey they had before endured. For which cauſes Selymus was enforced to ſlacke ſomewhat of his accuſtomed haſte: for as yet he had no experience of the diſpoſition of the Ægyptians which dwelt at Caire; neither could he vnderſtand by any certaine report, where Tomombeius ſtayed, or vpon what reſolution he reſted. Which things not throughly knowne, he thought it not good to commit himſelfe and his armie into that moſt populous C and ſpacious citie: but ſtaying foure dayes at the village of Matharea and Rhodania, carefully prouided for his wounded ſouldiers, and cauſed the bodies of ſuch as were ſlain to be buried; but the dead carkaſſes of his enemies he left to the birds of the aire and beaſts of the field.
And afterward remoouing his campe thence, that he might more commodiouſly water, he came to the plaines betweene old Caire and Bulach.

In the meane while Tomombeius, nothing diſcouraged with ſo many miſhaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his armie commodiouſly between the new citie of Caire and the riuer Nilus; he alſo armed eight thouſand Æthyopian ſlaues (which kind of men he had not before vſed, for the remembrance of their old rebellion:) beſide that, he opening the old armourie, put arms into the hands of the Mamalukes ſons, & Moores, D (his vaſſals) into the hands of the Iewes and Arabians alſo, and couragiouſly prepared for a greater and more mortall war than before. But foraſmuch as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, hauing almoſt loſt all his great artillerie, with many of his moſt valiant horſemen ſlaine in the former battels; he in his troubled minde did ſo caſt the doubtfull hopes of his laſt deuice, (which cruell neceſſitie wrung from him) that foraſmuch as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vſe policie; as he which of late hauing vnfortunatly made proof of his ſtrength, his forces yet al whole, thought it not good again to aduenture the fortune of a battell: neither was he in hope if he ſhould ſo do, to be able with his ſmall power and deſperat ſupplies to protract the war vntill the heat of Summer, as he deſired. Wherefore he reſolued by night to aſſaile the Turkes campe, and if E poſſibly he could, to ſet it on fire. For which his deuice he ſeemed to haue two reaſons: whereof the one conſiſted in the ſpeedie execution, that he might deſperatly attempt to doe ſome notable exployt in the night, before the enemie ſhould perceiue the weakeneſſe of his power, which was not great, and ſcambled vp on the ſudden; as alſo before he himſelf ſhould grow into contempt with the naturall Ægyptians; who deſiring nothing more, than to caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wauering mindes expected but ſome fit occaſion to rebell: The other was, That by the benefit of the night he might auoyd the danger of the great ordnance; which in ſudden accidents, and eſpecially in the darkeneſſe of the night, ſerueth to little or no purpoſe: in which kinde of ſtrength he had before to his great loſſe learned, that his enemies were too good for him. But theſe his reaſonable policies, when F all things were in readineſſe to haue put the ſame in execution, were in like manner as the firſt, ouerthrowne by the treaſon of ſuch as ſecretly reuolted from him to the enemie.

Tomombeius his purpoſe diſcouered to Selymus.

For Selymus vnderſtanding the whole plot by certain Mamalukes (which hauing the kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in miſerie, dayly forſook him) commanded his armie to be always in readineſſe, and making great fires in diuers parts of his campe, kept moſt carefull and vigilant watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to paſſe, G that the night following, Tomombeius approching his campe, was repulſed, with no ſmall loſſe of his firſt troupes which vnaduiſedly were gone on too farre: and had no doubt that night thereby receiued his laſt ouerthrow, but that he wiſely miſdoubting the vnwoonted light of the fires ſhining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe his haſting troups, which were themſelues with more haſte than good ſpeed marching into the verie mouth of the Turkes great artillerie, bent of purpoſe vpon them.

Tomombeius diſappointed of his purpoſe, by perſuaſion of his Chieftains retired to Caire: for the Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſe in plaine field, thought it beſt to proceed in another manner; perſuading him, with the whole ſtrength of his armie to man all the conuenient places of that great citie, otherwiſe expoſed to the enemies pleaſure, and ſo to keepe the Turkes H from entring. For they as men brought to this extremitie, that they muſt now fight for their dwellings, liues, wiues, and children; thought it more honorable, and better agreeing with their antient glorie, ſo to do in their ſight, and in the entrance of their houſes, than elſewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to Caire, furniſhed all their families and flat roofes of their houſes, with all manner of weapons: euery one of them now humbly requeſting the Ægyptians their neighbours, to take vp armes againſt the Turkes their antient and mortall enemies, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be cowardly ſlaine, their goods ſpoyled, and their wiues and children carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie; foraſmuch as the mercileſſe and greedie enemie, if he ſhould once get the victorie, would no whit ſpare them, although they ſhould as neuters ſtand looking on, and helpe neither partie: for victorie (as I they ſaid) alwayes full of inſolent pride, would know no friend but ſuch as with reſolute hand did their vttermoſt deuoire in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

The Egyptians diuerſly affected toward the Mamalukes.

There were many of the wealthieſt of the Ægyptians, who as they thought the change of the ſtate would be hurtfull to their trades and wealth, ſo were they readie in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: ſo on the other ſide there were many of the middle ſort of the citiſens, and a far greater multitude of the baſeſt ſort of the vulgar people, who hauing little or nothing to loſe, liued in hope now to make a gaine of other mens loſſes; and withall, remembring what miſerie and ſlauerie they had endured about the ſpace of three hundred yeares, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themſelues cloſe in their houſes, expecting the laſt euent of wars; and ſecretly reioycing in their hearts, that the time was K come (God ſo appointing) wherein their outragious and cruell maſters ſhould be iuſtly and worthily puniſhed for their oppreſſion and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, was, That the reuenge ſhould be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wiſhed ſpectacle they well hoped ſhortly to fill their deſirous eyes.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the citie, appointed vnto euery ſtreet a particular captain, in euery publique place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could poſſibly be done or deuiſed; and that which in ſo great a calamitie and danger was of all other things the hardeſt, with cheerefull countenance and vndaunted courage made ſhew of greateſt hope. The Mamalukes alſo, beſide the neceſſitie (which in caſes of extremitie is of power to encourage and make deſperate the faint hearted L coward) prouoked with emulation, ſtraue amongſt themſelues, who ſhould beſt performe all the duties of worthie captaines and ſouldiers: for euery one of them according to his conceit and deuice, cauſed great ditches or great timber logs to be caſt ouerthwart the ſtreets; ſome in couert trenches ſet vp ſharpe ſtakes, whereupon the enemie falling vnawares might be gaged, otherſome according to their ſtore, furniſhed the windowes and fronts of their houſes in the greateſt and moſt open ſtreets, with harquebuſiers: all which things with many moe, were done with ſuch celerity, that none of the beſt and moſt honorable of the Mamalukes refuſed to handle a ſpade or a mattocke, or to put his hand to any other baſe labour; ſo that nothing could be ſooner deuiſed, but it was forthwith performed.

This great and antient citie of Caire was not compaſſed with any walls, yet were there M diuers gates and entrances which led vnto it: whereof one broad ſtrait ſtreet came directly from the Eaſt gate vnto the caſtle and middle of the citie; the reſt were ſo narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillerie could poſſibly be brought, or ſoldiers enter without great danger. Into this place eſpecially had Tomombeius conueied his chiefeſt ſtrength; for that he knew his enemies

A enemies muſt of neceſſitie come in that way for the largeneſſe of the ſtreets;the other parts of the citie he kept with leſſe garriſons.But the innermoſt part where the caſtle ſtood, was kept with a verie great & ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſoldiers : that whither ſoeuer the clamor of the enemie or danger of the battell ſhould call, they might ſpeedily from thence come with reliefe. For why,that citie of all others the greateſt,could not with ſo ſmall power as Tomombeius then had, be in euery place & entrance ſufficiently defended: for within the circuit of Memphis (now called Caire) are contained three great cities, which ioined one to another with ſtragling bridges,make one citie, whereof the greateſt and moſt populous, is at this day called New Caire. It lieth in length ſix miles,alongſt the riuer Nilus,from which it is equally diſtant a mile : the breadth thereof,exceedeth not a mile and a quarter.In the midſt therof B is a caſtle ſtanding vpon a little riſing ground,ſomewhat higher than the reſt of the city;more notable for the beautie and greatneſſe thereof,than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many princely gardens, a faire ſtreet with many large galleries, diuers faire tilt-yards and courts, with ſtately chambers opening euery way : the vtter part thereof was garniſhed round about with towers,fortreſſes, and beautifull battlements,from whence all parts of the citie,the riuer Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides,were moſt pleaſantly to be ſeene.
Not far from this princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man,the water wherin deriued from the riuer Nilus,is on euery ſide incloſed with moſt ſtately buildings ; and is a place of wonderful pleaſure,when as a man ſtanding at a window may take both fiſh & foule,wherof there is in the lake great ſtore. Another lake there is far greater and fairer than this,in form C of a triangle, in the vttermoſt part of this new citie of Caire toward Bulach: it is filled at the riſing of Nilus by a great ſluce made of ſtone with yron floudgates, and being ioyned to the great riuer by a broad channel,is able to beare ſmall boats and barges ; wherin gentlemen for their diſport vſed to ſolace themſelues both by day & night in courting their miſtreſſes.The houſes were all gallantly built afront al about the lake,with porches garniſhed with open galleries, and paued with ſmooth marble euen to the brim of the lake! there the citizens in their more proſperous times vſed to row vp and downe in boats,and with pleaſant muſicke to delight the liſtening eares of the hearers.On the Eaſt ſide of this lake ſtood a moſt ſumptuous & ſtately pallace,the late worke of queene Dultibe wife of the great Sultan Caietbeius, for maner of the building and inward beautie far exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleaſant D place:for the wals gliſtered with red marble,and pargeting of diuers colors, yea all the houſe was paued with checker and teſſeled worke;the windowes and gates were made of alablaſter, white marble,and much other ſpotted marble;the poſts & wickets of maſſie yuorie, checkered with gliſtering black ebonie, ſo curiouſly wrought in winding knots,as might eaſilier ſtay than ſatisfie the eies of the wondering beholder : neither was the furniture in it inferiour to the magnificence of the building,but ſuch as might fitly anſwer both a princes ſtate,& a womans quaint deſire. All which things ſhortly after (Selymus hauing obtained the victorie)carried to Conſtantinople;not ſparing the very wals,but plucking them down,ſo to take out the curious ſtones whole. Beſide the goodly buildings about that lake, in euery place of New Caire was to be ſeene the faire houſes of the chiefe Mamalukes, more commended for their E commodiouſneſſe,than for the manner of their building. The reſt of the buildings of the city was but low,repleniſhed with the common ſort of baſe people.There are yet extant in diuers places of the citie,three churches of the Chriſtians;wherof one is holden in greater reuerence than the reſt,for the fame of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod,to haue repoſed herſelfe with her child Chriſt Ieſus the Sauiour of the World : another dedicated to the virgin Barbara : and the third to S. George,which amongſt thoſe nations are of great fame.Vnto the citie of New Caire, the citie of Bulacha is ioyned almoſt with continuall buildings. It is of an high and ſtately building, lying cloſe vnto the riuer Nilus,and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men,that they might at their pleaſure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous riuer.
F There land all the ſhips which come vp the riuer;yet the great meeting of the merchants is at New Caire.On the other ſide of the riuer ouer againſt Bulach, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaues of Date trees,the dwellings of poore fiſhermen and watermen. A little aboue Bulach is old Caire,which is alſo ioyned vnto the new city with continual buildings; yet diſtant from it about two miles and an halfe, and ſtandeth alſo faſt by the riuer of Nilus.

The pyramides of Egypt.

Ouer againſt it in the midſt of the riuer is an Iſland, notable for the pleaſantneſſe of the gardens and banqueting houſes therin: in it is an antient temple, famous for the loue of king Pharaos daughter and the danger of Moſes (a moſt antient hiſtorie, yet euery where there ſtill freſh in memorie.) But moſt part of the buildings of old Caire, are now grown into gardens & rude ruins. It is ſuppoſed by many probable coniectures, that there ſomtime ſtood the antient citie of Memphis. Vpon the banke of the riuer, the late Sultan Campſon built a ſumptuous tower, ouertopping the caſtle in new Caire, to conuay water thither out of Nilus; which being by many wheeles and ingenious deuiſes forced into the top therof, and there receiued into great ciſterns, was from thence by pipes of ſtone & lead, conuaied into all places of the kings great pallace at new Caire. About fiue miles diſtant from old Caire on Affricke ſide, ſtand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Ægyptian kings vanitie; whoſe proud names and titles Time hath worne out of thoſe huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpoſe made for the vaine eterniſing of their fame and endleſſe wealth; ſo that of them it may now well be ſaid, Miramur periÿſſe homines? monumenta fatiſcunt: Interitus ſaxis nominibuſque venit.

What wonder we that men doe die? the ſtately tombes do weare:
The verie ſtones conſume to nought, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the ſepulchers of the old Ægyptian kings, diuided into chappels, garniſhed with ſtone of great price curiouſly wrought. Yet are thoſe places loathſome of ſmel, and for darkneſſe thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almoſt ſwarued vp with rubbiſh, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth and ſwarmes of remiſe flying about their eares. Some hauing got to the tops of them, report, that the watch tower of Alexandria, and the mouth of the riuer Nilus where it falleth into the ſea, is from thence well to be ſeene: and that for the great height of them, a man cannot ſhoot an arrow ſo high as the midſt of the lower tower wheron the ſpire ſtandeth. Of theſe outragious buildings, are written many ſtrange and almoſt incredible things, as that an hundred thouſand men ſhould be occupied continually by the ſpace of twentie yeres, in building of one of them: during which time, the charges for roots, garlike, and onions only, amounted to 1600 talents of ſiluer. Theſe wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondered at than the multitude of the people, who in number almoſt incredible go vp and downe euery ſtreet: but for moſt part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durſt not make any ſhew therof for feare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally liue with mutton, hens, and riſe, whereof the countrey yeeldeth plentie: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholeſome forced diſhes, and prouocations of gluttonie, which other nations had to their great coſt and hurt inuented. But againe to our purpoſe.

When Selymus vnderſtood aſſuredly, that Tomombeius was retired into Caire, and that the Mamalukes hauing thither aſſembled all their ſtrength, were reſolued there to proue the vttermoſt of their fortune: he with his army drew neerer vnto the citie, exhorting his ſoldiers to ſet downe themſelues that day for euer to vanquiſh and ſubdue their enemies, whom they had ſo many times before ouerthrown; & now a little to force themſelues for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labors and victories: which (as he ſaid) would be ſo many and ſo great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderat deſires imagined. Telling them moreouer, that there was but a few good ſoldiers left with the deſolat Sultan, who alreadie wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keep the field, had made choice to end their days in the fight & arms of their wiues and children. Beſide that, he made them beleeue, that he was voluntarily ſent for by the Ægyptians, deadly enemies vnto the very name of the Mamalukes, whoſe vtter deſtruction they earneſtly expected: and had therefore promiſed him for the rooting vp of that wicked & cruell kind of men, to aſſaile them as occaſion ſerued out of their houſes, & ſo to further his victory: yet neuertheles he ſaid, That the accompliſhment of the whole matter, & to make a ful conqueſt, conſiſted in the ſubduing of thoſe weak remainders of the vanquiſhed & ſcattered army; foraſmuch as they were not to be accounted as men

A quite ouercome, which did yet liue in hope, with weapons in their hands, poſſeſſed of the chiefe citie and ſeat of their Empire. Wherefore that they ſhould thinke, That in the fortune of that day, reſted the good or bad eſtate and condition of all their liues, honours, and fortunes. Aſſuring them, that it would be a matter but of ſmall labour and trauell, to bring it to a wiſhed end, if they would in that new kinde of fight (as they had alwayes valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct) but reſolue with themſelues, that they would ouercome.

This his ſpeech much inflamed the minds of his ſouldiers, but the hope of ſo great a prey much more: ſo that being in good order and readie, they expected but the ſigne of the aſſault. When Selymus entering by the gate called Baſuela, did at one inſtant thruſt in his horſemen at diuers places of the great citie; but his Ianizaries he brought in by the greateſt and largeſt B ſtreet. At the firſt entrance of the citie, horſemen encountred with horſemen, and made a bloudie fight in the narrow ſtreets and lanes: but the footmen placing their culuerins & falcons before, and ſuddenly diſcharging them where they ſaw the thickeſt troupes of their enemies, cleered the ſtreet directly before them. But when they came to the barricado's & trenches, and were by force to remooue the timber logges and other like things lying croſſe the ſtreets, and ſo to paſſe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other ſide valiantly withſtanding them; they fought with ſuch force and obſtinacie on both parts, that in the memorie of man was neuer a more fierce and cruell battell ſeene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turkes in that fight ſhewed the vttermoſt of their ſtrength and power: not ignorant, that in that, as in the laſt, they were to fight not for honour onely, but euen for their liues and empire; when as C greateſt rewards, or elſe extreame miſerie, were by dallying fortune on both ſides propounded both to the vanquiſhed and vanquiſher. At theſe barricado's the Turks receiued great loſſe, as alſo at the trenches; for they vnaduiſedly running on, the hindermoſt ſtil bearing forward the foremoſt, tumbled by heapes one vpon another into the couert trenches, and were there miſerably impailed vpon the ſharpe ſtakes, for that purpoſe before ſet vp by the Mamalukes. The women alſo and children, with manly courage threw downe ſtones and tyles, and ſuch other things from the tops of their houſes, and out at their windowes, vpon the Turks: and they on the other ſide as they could eſpie them, fetcht them off from thoſe high places with their harquebuſies, or elſe violently brake into the houſes from whence they were aſſailed, and there fought with diuers ſucceſſe. But moſt part of the Ægyptians, diligently obſer- D uing the fortune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for enemies) with diuers affection aſſailed ſometimes the Turks, and ſometime the Mamalukes, ſeeming ſtill notably to helpe that part whom they ſaw for the time to haue the better. Many cruell and moſt terrible incounters were at once made in diuers places of the citie: for as they croſſed from ſtreet to ſtreet, ſomtime the one, and ſomtime the other hapned vpon new troups of enemies, and they which as victors purſued their enemies afront, were by others following them at the heeles, ſlain downright; ſo that in the victorie no man could aſſure themſelues of ſafetie. The lanes and ſtreets (a moſt horrible thing to behold) did ſo flow with the bloud of them which lay by heapes ſlaine, that the duſt which at the firſt roſe wonderfull thicke, was quite layd, as with a plentifull ſhoure of raine: the aire was darkned with the ſmoke of ſhot, and ſhoures of E arrowes: and ſuch was the clamour of the people and ſouldiers, the clattering of armour, and report of the artillerie, that the earth ſeemed to tremble, and the houſes to fall downe.

A moſt mortall battel fought in Caire.

This dreadfull and doubtfull fight endured two whole dayes and nights without intermiſſion: yet ſo, that the Mamalukes in number few, and not able to endure ſo long labour & watchings, giuing ground by little and little, and forſaking their firſt munitions, retyred themſelues further into the citie. The third day, beſet with the greateſt dangers that could be, as to loſe themſelues with all that they had, (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their laſt attempts) they renewed the battell with ſuch reſolution, that they conſtrained the Turks to retyre a great way, and for haſt to leaue behind them certaine of their field pieces. With which repulſe it is reported, that Selymus diſpairing of victorie, commanded to ſet fire F vpon the houſes; mooued thereunto with iuſt diſpleaſure againſt the Ægyptians, for that Ionuſes Baſſa, now his greateſt man of war, had euen before his face receiued a dangerous wound in his head, by a ſtone caſt out at a window.

A long and terrible fight.

Now were the houſes pittifully burning, and the Ægyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercie. The Turks themſelues fought but faintly, expecting the ſound of the retreat: when newes was ſuddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other ſide of the citie, were by Muſtapha Baſſa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themſelues to flight, as to their laſt refuge. For Muſtapha by the ouerture of the Ægyptians and fugitiue Mamalukes, was directed to a faire broad ſtreet, where the Mamalukes had left their horſes readie ſadled and bridled; that if the worſt ſhould chance, they might thither retire, & taking horſe, ſpeed themſelues to ſuch places of refuge as they had before thought vpon. All theſe horſes, reſerued by the Mamalukes as their laſt refuge, Muſtapha tooke away, hauing before put to flight the garriſon which kept them, which was but weake, conſiſting for moſt part of horſe-boies, & muletors; as ſafe enough in ſuch a place of the citie as was leaſt to be ſuſpected and feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and vnexpected miſchances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes: who now ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet, and that dreadfull battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but onely by courage; being in their own iudgement ouercome, betooke themſelues to flight. Moſt part of them haſting to the riuer of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his proweſſe and policie) being tranſported ouer the riuer in boats, fled into the country of Segeſta: others of them hid themſelues in the houſes of the Ægyptians, and in the loathſome corners of the citie. A thouſand fiue hundred of the better ſort of the Mamalukes fled vnto the greateſt Temple of their vain Prophet: where after they had a great while valiantly defended themſelues as out of a ſtrong caſtle, becauſe they would not yeeld themſelues but vpon honourable conditions, at laſt ouercome with thirſt, wearineſſe, and wounds, together with the furie of the great artillerie, they yeelded themſelues to the pleaſure of the conqueror: part of whom the furious ſouldiers ſlew in the porch of the ſame Temple, and the reſt within a few daies after were ſent downe the riuer to Alexandria, there to be afterwards murthered.

Selymus hauing thus gained the victorie, forthwith ſent part of his armie to quench the fire then raging, and cauſed proclamation to be made through al the city, That all the Mamalukes which would yeeld themſelues within twelue houres, ſhould bee taken to mercie; but vnto ſuch as yeelded not within the appointed time, ſhould remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Ægyptians alſo that ſhould reueale the hidden Mamalukes, he propoſed rewards: but to ſuch as ſhould conceale them, he threatned to impaile them vpon ſtakes, and hauing ſold their wiues and children to burne their houſes: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeelded themſelues, & were forthwith caſt into yrons. All which were ſhortly after, contrarie to his promiſe, moſt diſhonourably murthered in priſon, becauſe (as it was giuen out) they ſought means to haue eſcaped. Many of the Ægyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelitie with the Mamalukes their old lords, beeing appeached by their malitious neighbours, moſt conſtantly died for their friends, for whoſe ſake they had vowed themſelues to death.

With this victorie the Turks growing inſolent, ranſackt euery place of the citie, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themſelues, and ſlew them, rifled the houſes of the Ægyptians, as wel friends as foes, & left nothing ſhut vp or in ſecret. And ſome there were, which at one time in the ſame houſes raged with couetouſneſſe, crueltie and luſt; euery man fitting his own humour, whereunto hee was by nature or cuſtome inclined: for that in time and place of ſo great libertie, moſt men, but eſpecially the common ſouldier, flattereth himſelfe to the full, making conſcience of nothing, but meaſuring all thing according to his inſolent and diſordered appetite. The ſame day that Selymus tooke Caire, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandement of Tomombeius, was gone to Thebais, to aſſemble the Arabians and to entertain new ſupplies) came to Caire; but finding all loſt, and ſeeing no poſſibility either by force or policie to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good againe to proue the fortune of war, which had ſo often with contrary courſe fruſtrated the endeuours both of himſelfe and his partakers, he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before giuen for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his followers (which were three Arabian captains, & a number of good horſmen) & being admitted to his preſence, in the midſt of his greateſt captaines boldly ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Gazelles his ſpeech to Selymus.

If fortune, whom by thy great valour thou haſt woone to bee thy friend, had not enuied our felicitie, thou ſhouldeſt not haue (moſt noble Selymus*, at this time, after that all things haue giuen place vnto thy valour) matter whereby thou mighteſt excell others in worthineſſe of mind alſo. Whilſt*

we

A we were in arms againſt thee for our liues and kingdom, our wealth and ſtate yet ſtanding whole, we alwaies as men proudly preſuming vpon their owne vaine ſtrength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turkes; yea to ſay the truth, we hated thee as became enemies: But now that wee haue to the vttermoſt of our power made proofe of thy force, and haue in all battels beene put to the worſe; admiring both thy wonderfull and diuine prowesſe, and moſt proſperous victories (not giuen thee without the prouidence of the immortall God) wee humbly come vnto thee by thy goodneſſe to better our hard and aduerſe fortune: that thou by ſparing and pardoning thy vanquiſhed and yeelding enemies (by which onely vertue men come neereſt vnto the gods) maieſt extend thy name and fame aboue the bounds of the reſt of thine immortall glorie. Wee haue faithfully ſerued Tomombeius, ſo long as hee held the ſtrength and maieſtie, yea but the name of a king, or liued in any countenance: but ſeeing hee is B (his Deſtinie ſo requiring) driuen out of his countrey, and wandereth the deſarts, with vncertaine report whether he liue or not; wee come vnto thee, rather as men of him forſaken, than ſuch as haue forſaken their Prince; readie to ſhew vnto thee our loyaltie and valour in our better condition and ſtate: if we may by thy goodneſſe, changing our hard fortune, liue and ſerue vnder thy worthie conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valor, wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greateſt enemies, and alſo deſiring to ioyne in league and friendſhip with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be moſt to be feared, receiued them all courteouſly: appointing vnto euery one of them an honourable pen- C ſion, and perſuading them to forget their old eſtate, willed them to looke for far greater things of his bountie. Not long after, when as the Moores and wild Arabians, with certaine Mamalukes that were fled to the citie of Achaſia, made incurſions into the country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turkes which went any thing far from the citie to ſeeke abroad for forrage, he ſent Gazelles with part of his armie to repreſſe them: who hauing quickly won and ſackt Achaſia, and ſlaine moſt part of thoſe aduenturers, to his owne great praiſe, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymus, honorably returned in leſſe time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the countrey of Segeſta (which is on the other ſide of Nilus towards Cyrenaica) miſerably beſet with ſo many miſchiefes, began to make head againe. There were come vnto him a ſtrong companie of Mamalukes from Alexandria, which D he had by letters ſent for out of the garriſon of that citie, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongſt the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that countrey) which promiſed him their helpe and furtherance. Beſide that, many of the Ægyptians, whoſe houſes and families were become a prey & booty vnto the inſolent Turks, promiſed him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raiſe ſuch a tumult in the citie, as ſhould eaſily worke the confuſion of the Turks; forasmuch as they all hauing endured moſt horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide thoſe moſt inſolent men to rage and raign ouer them. They ſent him word alſo, that the Turks huge army was now brought to a contemptible number, moſt part of them being ſlain in the battell at Caire: and the reſt being for the greateſt part brought to extreame weakneſſe E with wounds and ſickneſſe. For which cauſes, as Tomombeius his forces increaſed daily, ſo hope alſo, which neuer failed the poore vanquiſhed and diſtreſſed king, began now alſo to reuiue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miſerable eſtate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then moſt cruelly and deſpightfully went about vtterly to ſupplant him (of all other diſtreſſed princes moſt miſerable) ſeemed but then firſt to change her frowning countenance, and to promiſe vnto him more happie and proſperous ſucceſſe.

Albuchomar diſcouereth to Selymus the power of Tomombeius, and the trecherie of them of Caire.

Whileſt Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for authoritie and wealth the greateſt man by far in all the countrey of Segeſta, whether it were to auert the miſerie of the preſent war out of his countrey, or elſe by the pleaſure of his reuolt to gain the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things ſeemed to fawne, came and certified him F both of Tomombeius his ſtrength, & of the new practiſes of the citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus cauſed ſtrong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great citie: and ſuch citizens as he ſuſpected to fauor Tomombeius, he ſhut vp into the caſtle, which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the citie in his poſſeſſion: and placed al alongſt the Riuer, boates furniſhed with men and artillerie, to keepe and defend the farther banke of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his paſſage ouer. Yet conſidering with himſelfe, with how great danger he had ſo many times fought with thoſe deſperat enemies, and what a difficultie it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (protracting the war in thoſe vaſt and vnknowne countries, and ſtill preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing aſſure himſelfe of all his former victories) to prooue if he might be woon by clemencie and bountie, he reſolued to ſend Embaſſadours vnto him, to perſuade him to lay downe armes, and after ſo manie ouerthrowes, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the victor: and withall to promiſe him vpon the faith of a Prince, That if he would come in and ſubmit himſelfe, he ſhould of the curteſie and bountie of the conquerour, vpon conditions reaſonable repoſſeſſe that his late Kingdome, which he ſhould neuer be able by force to regaine. But if he would needs deſperatly proceed to make head againe, forgetting his offered grace, together with his own diſabilitie, he ſhould afterward when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne iuſt deſert neuer more find at the hands of his angrie enemie, any regard of his princely ſtate or dignitie.

The cauſes moouing Selymus to ſend Embaſſadors to Tomombeius.

For Selymus ſeeing himſelfe by the courſe of his victories drawn into a far country, and not without cauſe fearing with ſo ſmall a power as he had left, to be oppreſſed in that ſo great and populous a citie, euen with the verie multitude, men of doubtfull faith; thought it better by ſome honorable compoſition to aſſure himſelfe of ſome great part of that he had woon, than by going on, to thruſt himſelfe with his armie into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Beſides that, he was certainly aduertiſed, That the Mamalukes before fled into diuers countries, were in euery place leuying new ſupplies of horſemen: and that the fleet which gone into the Arabian gulfe againſt the Portugals, was dayly expected at the port Suezzia, wherein were three thouſand Mamalukes, vnder the leading of Amyraſes and Ray Salomon, two expert captaines, with great ſtore of good braſſe ordnance: by which good helpes Tomombeius ſtood in faire poſſibilitie to recouer his former loſſes, and to returne againe to Caire, whither he was by his ſecret friends moſt earneſtly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Perſians moſt induced him to think of peace: for feare that if the Baſſa whom he had left at the mountain Taurus, ſhould not be able to withſtand the forces of the Perſian King, he ſhould ſo be excluded out of Aſia the leſſer, and Syria alſo, before his fleet could from Conſtantinople arriue with new ſupplies of men and victuall at Alexandria.

Selymus his embaſſadors ſlaine by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore he ſent certaine of the moſt reuerend of his Turkiſh Religious, and with them ſome of the moſt honorable Ægyptians, Embaſſadors to Tomombeius: who paſſing ouer Nilus, into the country Segeſta, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous crueltie ſlaine by certaine Mamalukes which chanced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any ſuch matter, and to manifeſt their affection towards him, as alſo that they were not deſirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and inſolent fact vtterly brake Selymus his patience, and ſhortly after made an end of that mortall war, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruell nature, euen when he was nothing at all mooued, could by no means brooke that his enemies, ſo often vanquiſhed and put to flight, ſhould ſo lightly reiect his offers vnto them as the caſe ſtood, both honorable and profitable; and that worſe was, violate his Embaſſadors againſt the law of Nations, moſt religiouſly kept euen amongſt the moſt barbarous and ſauage people. Wherefore prouoked by ſo great an iniury, he carefully prouided for all things neceſſarie for his expedition into Segeſta againſt Tomombeius. And becauſe it ſtood not with his honour (as he tooke it) nor with the good of the preſent ſeruice, to paſſe the riuer by boats, he gathering together all the ſmall veſſels and lighters he could poſſibly, made therof a large and ſtrong bridge ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius vnderſtanding by his eſpials, and from his friends at Caire, of the preparations of Selymus, & of the bridge he had made, fearing alſo the reuolt of the country people, whom he probably ſuſpected to be alienated frō him, by the reuolt of Albuchamar, a man of ſo great power and authoritie amongſt them; determined once again to proue the fortune of battell, which had ſo often deceiued his expectation. For he iuſtly meaſuring of his own ſtrength, and finding himſelfe in all things inferior to his mightie enemie, wel ſaw that he was neither able to protract the wars, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to flie further into the deſarts, was as he deemed it, nothing elſe but to make ſhipwrack of that ſmall remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherefore by the aduice of his beſt captains

A (which was the laſt indeuot both of himſelfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the prouince of Segeſta with foure thouſand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermiſſion to come to the riuet Nilus. By that deſpetat attempt to deceiue the Turks, ſuſpecting no ſuch thing from their vanquiſhed & weak enemy: as alſo by celeritie to preuent the fame of his comming; hoping ſo by his ſudden & vnexpected approch to ouerthrow that part of the Turkes army which ſhould firſt paſſe the riuer, before they could poſſibly be relieued from the other ſide. Neither was hee deceiued in the computation of the time, which he hauing before exactly caſt, with the maner of his trauell, fel out ſo fitly, that he came to the place he deſired, euen at ſuch time as the Aſian horſmen were come ouer the bridge, as he had before gueſſed. The harbengers & B pages of Selymus his chamber, which were gone ſomthing further than the reſt, to make choice of the moſt commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors pauilion; by the riſing of the duſt, firſt perceiued the comming of the enemie: and Muſtapha the great Baſſa aduertiſed therof, ſuddenly raiſed an alarum: which ſo vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were already paſt ouer, & alſo on them that were on the further ſide of the riuer.

Tomombeius diſtreſſeth the Turks in paſſing the bridge made ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius preſently aſſailing his enemies, as yet but putting themſelues in order, and repairing to their enſignes, at the firſt onſet ſlew ſuch as made reſiſtance, and the reſt he diſcomfited and put to flight. Neither was Muſtapha the great commander (although he did what poſſibly he could, by his owne example to haue incouraged them) able either by his own inuincible courage or other perſuaſion, after his firſt rankes were ouerthrowne, to repaire his C diſordered battell, or ſtay the flight of his men: for in that ſo hot and ſudden a skirmiſh all was full of tumult, ſlaughter, doubtfulneſſe, and feare; and all alongſt the banke of the riuer, both aboue & beneath the bridge, were to be ſeen fearfull companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking vpon the riuer, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other ſide for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemy, tooke the riuer and there periſhed: others ſtriuing at the end of the bridge, to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes or others continually ſent from the further ſide, or els amazed with feare, fel into the riuer, & were there drowned: the bridge was ſo broad, that foure horſemen abreſt might eaſily paſſe ouer at once, and ſo great numbers of them in ſhort ſpace bee conueyed ouer. But when the great ordnance (the Turkes chiefe ſtrength) was alſo to be tranſported, fewer troupes of horſemen were ſent ouer, than either D the greatneſſe of the preſent danger, or ſuddenneſſe of the chance required. Neither did their great artillerie as then ſtand them in any ſtead, for that it could neithet ſo ſpeedily be conueied ouer, nor without great hurt be diſcharged from the hither banke to the further, by reaſon of their owne men ſtanding betweene them and the enemie.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmiſh came downe to the riuers ſide, filled a great number of boats and other ſmall veſſels with his Ianizaries with their harquebuſies, and withall haſted his horſemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes diſtreſſed on the further ſide: in which boats the nimble watermen vſed ſuch diligence in landing of ſome, and preſently in fetching ouer of others, that in ſhort time they had tranſported diuers bands of thoſe moſt ready and valiant ſouldiers: whoſe comming wonderfully comforted the E Aſian ſoldiers, euen now at the laſt caſt, and readie to haue giuen ouer. Canoglis alſo, the Tartar kings ſon and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horſemen to take the riuer, with loſſe of ſome few of his men recouered the further ſide, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that nation was not ſo much to be maruelled at, as they which by troupes with their horſes had oftentimes ſwam ouer the great riuers Taurus and Volga, no leſſe dangerous than was the riuer Nilus.

Tomombeius at the ſame time, for that he ſaw ſpeedy victorie to conſiſt in one thing eſpecially, ſerring his troupes together, ſtrained himſelfe with might and maine to haue gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away ſome few of the firſt boats, he might ſhut in his enemies already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were faſtened to the F banke, all the bridge with the Turks vpon it, might be born away with the force and violence of that great riuer: whereupon riſe a moſt cruell and deadly fight; for the reſolute Mamalukes in the front of their battell fought valiantly; and Muſtapha well conſidering the danger, had drawn to that place both his enſignes & his beſt ſoldiers: ſo that there was fought ſuch a fight, as a matter of ſo great conſequence required: the Mamalukes plainly ſeeing, that if they could obtain the place, they ſhould ſhortly after with little ado, ouerthrow all the former victories of their enemies. And the Turks no leſſe ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but loſt men that were already come ouer, and that the reſt of the army together with their Emperor ſo far from home, and in the midſt of his enemies, muſt of neceſſity ſhortly after run the ſame fortune. But Muſtapha well relieued by the Ianizaries and the Europeian horſmen, which were now come ouer in great number, not only receiued his enemies charge, but preſſing vpon them, gained ground, and by little and little inforced them to retire. This is that Muſtapha the Hungarian, and Baiazet his ſonne in law, which for his owne glory and perpetuall fame, built that notable, ſtately, and ſumptuous ſtone bridge (of the ſpoiles of this victorie) ouer the riuer Stremon, which at this day men paſſing ouer into Thracia, wonder at, as at a worke beſeeming the greatneſſe of the Roman Empire.

Tomombeius, to giue a time of breathing to his Mamaluks, who, their horſes for wearines now fainting vnder them, were not able longer to ſhew their wonted courage; & deſirous by them againe to proue the vttermoſt fortune of the battel, exhorted the Moores & Arabians, a while to charge the enemy, which thing they after the maner of their fight valiantly performed: and ſhortly after, the Mamalukes hauing a little breathed themſelues & their horſes, came in afreſh and renewed the battel; with ſuch fury, that Selymus doubting the victorie (although hee was by his moſt faithful counſellors perſuaded to the contrary) yet doubted not to aduenture the bridge, and in perſon himſelfe to go and relieue his diſtreſſed ſouldiers: who by his comming in, encouraged, and in the ſight of their Emperor deſiring euery man for his part by ſome notable ſeruice to deſerue both credit and preferment, repreſſed the fury of the enemie; who in ſhort time after, by the comming on of certain freſh companies of Ianizaries, were notably repulſed, and ſo at length put to flight: whom the horſmen which were not in the battel, purſued all the fields ouer. At length alſo the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the ſtream, were ſomwhat long before they could recouer the farther bank & come to their enemies) were now come in alſo, and with their ſwift horſes following the chaſe, augmented the ſlaughter. But Selymus aboue all things deſirous of Tomombeius, preſently commanded Muſtapha the great Baſſa, Gazelles, and Cayerbeius, with certaine freſh troupes of light horſemen, to purſue him at the heeles, and if it were poſſible not to ſuffer him to eſcape: for ſo long as hee liued, he could not aſſure himſelfe of any thing he had yet gotten. Theſe vigilant captains not vnmindfull of their charge, following faſt after him, ouertooke him the next day at the ſluce of a great deepe fen, where he had a little reſted himſelfe and his followers, being then about to cut off a wodden bridge, ſo to haue hindered the enemies purſuit. Some of his followers being there ſlaine, and ſome taken, he was againe inforced to flie. The third day when he had almoſt loſt all his men, and was come with ſome few into the territory of the Secuſſan prince, theſe great captains ſtill eagerly purſuing him, and denouncing vnto the poore country people which dwelt in villages thereabout, all extremities and tortures, if they did not with moſt diligent watch and ward ſo keep the paſſages of thoſe mariſhes, as that he ſhould not poſſibly eſcape; he was ſo beſet on euery ſide, that for ſafegard of his life he was glad to hide himſelf all alone in a foule deepe mariſh: where ſhortly after he the poore Sultan was by the diligent ſearch of the country peaſants found out, hidden among the flags & bulruſhes, ſtanding in the water vp to the ſhoulders, who deliuered him miſerably bound vnto the Turks. Shortly after he with certaine captaines & other of his chiefe friends taken in that flight, was brought to Caire. Selymus before reſolued to put him to death, and the rather for the iniurie done to his embaſſadors, would not ſuffer him to come into his preſence, but commanded him to be tortured, ſo to haue cauſed him to haue reuealed the great treaſures of Campſon his predeceſſour, which were thought to haue bin by him hidden: in which moſt horrible & exquiſit torments it is reported, that he with great conſtancie & ſterne countenance vttered nothing but certain deep ſighes & grones, ouercomming with patience the tyrannie of the proud conqueror: who after that, commanded him in baſe and ragged apparell, with his hands bound behind him, as a theefe or murtherer condemned to die, to be ſet vpon a foule leane cammel, & ſo to be caried in deriſion through al the publick & notable places of the citie; that the Ægyptians might ſee him, whom they but a little before had adored for their king, by change of fortune caſt into extream miſery, by moſt ſhameful death to end both his life & empire together: when they had thus deſpightfully led him as it were in triumph, & brought him to the chiefe gate of the Tomombeius taken & brought to Selymus.

Tomombeius tortured.

A citie called Baſuela, they there openly ſtrangled him with a rope: and that he might be the better ſeene, and become more contemptible to all that paſſed that way, they hanged him vp by the necke vpon an yron hooke in an arch of the ſame gate, and ſo left him to the worlds wonder. Palearius propounding him as a mirrour both of the better and worſe fortune, for all men to looke vpon, aptly deſcribeth both his happineſſe and miſery in theſe few verſes following:

The miſerab end of Tomombeius laſt Sultan of Egypt.

TOMOMBEIVS, THE LAST Sultan of Ægypt.

In Engliſh thus.

In all the Eaſt a king more bleſt was no where to be found, Nor in the Eaſt one more accurſt liu'd not vpon the ground, Than Tomombeius, Ægypts griefe, ſometime for ſtore of gold, Of power great for martiall force, and kingdome he did hold.
But taken by his cruell foe, may good example be Both to the happie and diſtreſt, of mans vncertaintie. H Why do'ſt thou fondly laugh? Why do'ſt thou vainly crie?
  Canſt thou from henceforth ſtay thy ſelfe, and thinke th'art borne to die?
My garments were the royall robes, I wore the crowne of gold, With richeſt ſtones moſt richly ſet, moſt glorious to behold:
My necke adorn'd with richeſt gems which I did ſometimes weare:
  but now truſt vp in ſhamefull rope, behold me hanging here.

The Ægyptians in doubt of their eſtate bewaile the death of Tomombeius.

This miſerie befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill, in the yere 1517, vpon the Munday in Eaſter weeke. There were many which ſhed teares to behold that ſo cruell and lamentable a ſpectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitifull lamentation ſeemed to deteſt that foule and vnworthie death of their late Sultan: notwithſtanding that the Ianizaries reproued them therfore, and threatned them with death, who like giddie braind fooles (as they termed them) enured to the ſlauery of the Mamalukes, ioyfully and thankfully accepted not of their deliuerance; for the Ægyptians were as yet vncertaine of their eſtate, and therefore as men in ſuſpence (not without cauſe) ſtood in doubt what ſhould become of themſelues: fearing leſt the Turks, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the princes of Europe and Aſia, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, ſhould with no leſſe inſolencie rage and tyrannize ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell Emperor. Beſides that, the wofull ſight of Tomombeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthy ſcorne of fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet freſh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and general fauor of the nobilitie, with good fame riſe vp all the degrees of honor both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignitie; and therfore grieued the more to ſee him by ineuitable deſtinie caſt downe headlong, ſo ſhamefully to end his life and empire together. A notable ſpectacle vndoubtedly amongſt the rareſt examples of worldy fragilitie, both to the happie and vnfortunat: the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themſelues in their greateſt bliſſe; and the other, to learne thereby with patience to indure the heauie and vnworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miſerable world. And ſo much the more did Tomombeius ſo hanging, moue men to compaſſion, for that the maieſtie of his tall and ſtrong bodie, and reuerend countenance, with his long and hoarie beard, well agreed with his imperiall dignitie and martiall diſpoſition. The ſame fortune with Tomombeius ran alſo diuers of the princes of the Mamalukes with ſome others of the common ſort alſo.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almoſt ſlaine, and no power of the enemie to be heard of in all Ægypt to renew the war: Selymus diuiding his forces, ſent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and prouinces of Ægypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battel of Caire hauing thruſt out the gariſon, and eaſily ſurpriſed the caſtle of Pharus (which the weake defendants choſe rather vpon hope of preſent reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull euent to defend) yeelded themſelues many daies before vnto the Turks. Damiata alſo, called in ancient time Peluſium, opened their gates, and ſubmitted themſelues to the victors. There was no citie betwixt the riuer of Nilus and the borders of Iudea and Arabia, which yeelded not to the obedience of Selymus. The kings alſo of Affricke bordering vpon Cyrenaica, tributaries or confederats of the Ægyptian Sultans, ſent their embaſſadors with preſents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) & eſpecially they of Affricke, who hauing loſt many of their friends and kinſmen in aiding Tomombeius, A would not (as it was thought) ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turkiſh obedience. This wandering kind of people, liuing for moſt part by theft, had filled the countries from Euphrates, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of Ægypt and Affricke vnto the Atlantick ſea, with huge multitudes of men; and being diuided into many companies vnder diuers leaders haue no certain dwelling places, but liue an hard and frugall kind of life in tents and waggons, after the manner of the Tartars: their greateſt wealth is a good ſeruiceable horſe, with a launce or a bundle of darts: they were alway at diſcord & variance amongſt themſelues, by reaſon whereof they could neuer agree for the expulſing of the Mamalukes, who otherwiſe had not bin able to haue ſtood againſt them, if they ſhould haue ioined their forces together. So that the late Ægyptian Sultans ſeemed to hold their ſtate and empire among ſo populous B a nation, rather by their diſcord than their own ſtrength: wherefore Selymus hauing now by fit men, vpon his faith before giuen, allured many of their chiefetains and greateſt commanders to Caire, honorably both entertained and rewarded them. By whoſe example others moued, came alſo in daily: and hauing receiued their rewards, gaue the oath of their alleageance to Selymus. Others which could by no faire promiſes or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other captains, and deliuered to Selymus, indured the paines of their vaine obſtinacie and malice. The other remote nations toward Æthyopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendſhip than the command of the Ægyptian Sultans, ſo now induced with the fame of the victorie, eaſily ioyned in like amitie with the Turke.

About the ſame time, Selymus ſent certaine troupes of horſemen to Suezzia, a port of the C red ſea (of old called Arſinoe) about three daies iourney from Caire: in which port Campſon the great Sultan (a little before the comming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and foure yeares trauell built a ſtrong fleet againſt the Portingals, who by their conqueſts in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian marchandiſe into the gulfe of Arabia, to the great hinderance of the Ægyptian kings cuſtomes: ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkiſh warres) Campſon had appointed one Amyraſes and Ray Salomon Generals, with a ſtrong power of Mamalukes and great ſtore of ordnance, againſt the Portingals. Theſe valiant captains hauing yet done nothing in the ſeruice they were appointed vnto, as they lay at Gidda (the port of the famous citie of Mecha, wherein is the temple of their great Prophet Mahomet) vnderſtanding of the death of Campſon, and of the comming of Selymus into Ægypt, D fell at variance betwixt themſelues; one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, & the other no leſſe deſirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Whereupon a mutinie ariſing among the ſoldiers, Amyraſes, who fauored Tomombeius, was inforced to flie to Mecha. But ſhortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to haue him, & threatning al hoſtilitie except he were forthwith deliuered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha, fearing to haue Gidda their port ſpoiled, and ſo ſent back again to the fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admirall alone, his aſſociat being taken out of the way, and by ſome notable fact to inſinuat himſelfe into the fauor of the conqueror, cauſed Amyraſes in the night to be caſt ouerboord: and giuing to the ſoldiers two months pay, and ſwearing them to the obedience of Selymus, in few daies ſailing came backe again to Arſinoë, where leauing the fleet, he came di- E rectly himſelfe to Selymus at Caire, of whom he was graciouſly receiued. After that, all the princes which were before tributaries or confederats to the late Sultans of Ægypt, euen to the confines of Dauid, the moſt mighty king of Æthyopia (whom ſome call Presbiter Iohn) without delay entred into the like ſubiection or confederation with the Turks.

Ægypt, with all the prouinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into ſubiection, Selymus about the beginning of Iuly, ſayled downe the riuer of Nilus to Alexandria (Cortug-Ogli, a famous pyrat of Halicarnaſſus, ſitting at the helme of his gallie) there to take view of his fleet but lately come from Conſtantinople with new ſupplies both of men and victuals, ſent from Pyrrhus Baſſa and his ſonne Solyman: which after he had well ſurueyed, and diligently viewed the wals of the citie, and of the caſtle of Pharos, he returned againe to Caire. In the meane F time, the Mamalukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandement murthered euery mothers ſonne, in the entrance of the priſon. At which time alſo aboue fiue hundred families of the nobleſt and richeſt of the Ægyptians were commaunded to remooue from Caire to Conſtantinople, and a great number of women and children, of the race of the Mamalukes, were tranſported thither alſo in ſhips hired for that purpoſe. Into this fleet beſides the kings treaſure and riches, he conuaied all the publicke and priuate ornaments of that moſt rich and G famous citie ; with ſuch a couetous and greedie deſire of ſpoile, that the verie marble ſtones, commended either for the excellencie of the workemanſhip,or beautie of the ſtone, were violently rent out of the maine walls,to his great reproch and infamie. Lying at Caire, he with great pleaſure beheld the riſing of the riuer Nilus, which had then ouerflowed the countrey next vnto it ; and that with ſuch a deſire,that he moſt curiouſly enquired of the old countrey men the meaſure aud nature of the riuer: for by the diuerſitie of tbe riſing therof (which they by certain markes and meaſures well find out) they prognoſticat ſometime aboundant plenty, ſometime extreame dearth,and ſometime reaſonable ſtore : when as the violent riuer moderatly or furiouſly breaking out, ſome while ſo drowneth the greateſt part of the country,that all the ſeed ſeaſon it lyeth vnder water,and at another time floweth ſo ſparingly,that in many H places it ſcarce layeth the duſt , thereby foreſhewing an vndoubted dearth:ſo that the Ægyptians then aſſure themſelues of plentie, when as Nilus keeping a meane, pleaſantly riſeth neither to the higheſt or loweſt markes of his inundation.

Cayerbeius the traitor made gouernour of Caire and Egypt.

The Mamaluke kingdome,together with the name of the Mamalukes, thus ouerthrowne, and the conqueſt of Ægypt ſo happily atchieued,Selymus reſolued to make his returu into Syria,and the rather,for that it was reported, That Hyſmael the Perſian King was comming with his armie into Meſopotamia, and ſo like enough to breake into Comagena. Wherefore hauing as he thought good,diſpoſed of all things,he left a ſtrong garriſon of his beſt ſouldiers in Caire,and appointed Cayerbeius that notable traitor,his deputy and great commander ouer all that great and new gotten kingdome of Ægypt, now conuerted into the forme of a pro- I uince, as it remaineth at this day. Which honourable preferment ſo vnworthily beſtowed, exceedingly both grieued and troubled Ionuſes the great Baſſa, before enflamed with the hope and iuſt deſire thereof: for now that Sinan Baſſa was dead,he puffed vp with the eſtimation of his owne worth and valour,and proud of the wound he had of late receiued in the pre-ſence of Selymus at the entring of Caire,and to the vttermoſt of his power,ſuffering no man to grow neere him in credit and eſtimation,thought himſelfe the onely man now left,to whom of all others,that eſpeciall and honourable charge ſhould in the iudgement of Selymus and of the whole armie of right be committed. Neither wanted he the generall good liking of the men of war,for immediatly after he was recouered of his wound,(when he in the moſt magnificent houſe of the Diadarie at Caire (which he in the victorie had rather of himſelfe vſur- K ped,than by the gift of Selymus obtained)daily kept princely cheere for all commers(no ſmall meanes to gaine the loue of the common ſouldiers) and gaue frankly to them all ; to ſome horſes,to ſome beautifull ſlaues ; to ſome money,plate,jewels,rich garments,faire armor,and ſuch like ; he woon vnto himſelfe ſuch fauour and credit,that whenſoeuer he ſhould (as the manner was)go to the caſtle vnto the Emperor,he was brought thither with a great and goodly traine of his fauourits and followers,as the man in all mens iudgement deſigned to the go-uernment of that great and rich kingdome. All which things higly offended the mind of Selymus,who as he was apt to ſuſpect,and cruell where he feared, ſo did he alſo (in ſecret) enuie great vertues,accompanied with too much honour and power.

Ionuſes enuieth at the preferment of Cayerbeius.

Ionuſes ſeing Cayerbeius the traitour thus vnworthily promoted, ouercome with griefe and L indignation (who as a man of a proud and hautie mind, tooke it as done to his owne diſgrace) yet colouring his inward diſcontentment by counterfeiting himſelfe ſicke for certaine daies came not abroad ; neuertheleſſe ſtill more and more tormented both with the iniurie (as hee tooke it) done to himſelfe,and the vnworthie preferment of the traitor, he could not ſo well contain himſelfe,but that in his choler ſome words fel from him,wherby his diſcontentment was perceiued.It hapned that Cayerbeius comming of courteſie to viſit him,and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drinke(which was water and Sugar,)after the manner of the Æ-gyptians)immediatly after he had drunke, felt ſuch grieuous and vnwonted gripings and tormentings in his ſtomacke and bellie,that many ſuppoſed him to haue beene poyſoned by the Baſſa : yet was he by the power and vertue of a more ſoueraigne and effectuall remedie pre- M ſerued. Which report, whether it were true or no,was vncertaine : but certaine it is, that it ſanke further into the mind of Selymus, than any man would haue thought. He had now alſo a little before heard,that many of thoſe rich Ægyptian families,which he had before commanded to be remooued to Conſtantinople, had for great ſummes of money obtained of Ionuſes (who

A (who had the whole ordering of that matter) that they might quietly and in ſafetie remaine ſtill in their owne countrie. Of which his couert dealing, great probabilitie was alledged by ſuch as repined at his honour, and ſecretly accuſed him, That thoſe princelike and exceſſiue charges and expences, which he was not able poſſibly to maintaine of his ordinarie penſion, were royally ſupported with the embeſeled ſpoile and reuenewes of that new gotten Kingdome. Which malicious ſuggeſtions, as they tended to the lightening of his credit, ſo alſo another crime (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further reſpect, is vncertaine) comming in the necke of the other, wrought his vtter diſgrace, and finall confuſion: for Selymus after the manner of great princes (who more ſeuerely to puniſh the former offences, notably diſſembling their preſent anger, expect but the occaſion of ſome new B crime) with vigilant eye waiting vpon his words and deeds, proſecuted him with a mortall and deadly hatred, with a full purpoſe to deſtroy him.

A few daies before it was certainly reported that Selymus would againe returne into Syria, the ſoldiers appointed to be left in garriſon at Caire, alledging the great diſtance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labors by them already indured, requeſted of the bountie of their moſt fortunat Emperour, that they might haue their wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (neuer ſparehanded to his men of war) eaſily granted, commanding Ionuſes the ſtately Baſſa, that the ſum they required, might be added to their accuſtomed wages, and ſo entered into his accounts for the wars. But he carried headlong with diſcontentment, made neither the treaſurers nor paymaſters acquainted with any ſuch matter as Selymus C had before commanded: of purpoſe, that the garriſon ſouldiers deceiued of their greater wages promiſed them by the Emperor, might euen at the firſt begin to hate and contemne Cayerbeius, as authour of ſo great an iniurie; that ſo the ſtate of Caire, and of that new gotten kingdome, diſquieted by the mutinie of the garriſon ſouldiers, Selymus inforced to change his former purpoſe, ſhould in ſtead of that ſtrange Gouernour (hated of the Ægyptians for his late treaſon, and not beloued of the garriſon ſoldiers, becauſe he was to them a ſtranger) of neceſſitie ſend ſome of his owne Baſſaes, a Turke, for the better ſtay and aſſurance of that wauering and mightie prouince. But all theſe things (as commonly wicked purpoſes haue their foule euents) fell out in fine far otherwiſe than he had in his troubled mind before conceiued. For Selymus being departed out of Ægypt, and now on his way almoſt as far as Ieruſalem, the D garriſon ſouldiers at Caire, the pay day being now come, and receiuing no more but their old accuſtomed wages, moued with that euill dealing (as contrarie to the Emperors promiſe and their generall expectation) began with more furie and rage than euer Ionuſes had before imagined, openly and inſolently to inſult and threaten the treaſurer and paymaſters, and with open mouth to raile vpon Cayerbeius their Gouernor. With which ſo inſolent and opprobrious ſpeeches hee aſtonied (as one not yet acquainted with the faſhions of the Turkiſh garriſons) together with the paymaſters, in beſt manner they could excuſed themſelues vnto the ſouldiers, requeſting them not to thinke ſo hardly of them who were altogether innocent in the matter, and with patience to vnderſtand the truth of the cauſe; wherein if they ſhould on E their part find any fraudulent or euill dealing, they craued no fauor, either refuſed any puniſhment. Thus Cayerbeius and the paymaſters ſeeking by all meanes to auoyd both the ſuſpition and the preſent danger: and the mutinous ſouldiers no leſſe haſtening to find out by whom they were ſo abuſed, and to be thereof reuenged, it was at laſt with much adoe agreed, That truſtie meſſengers ſhould forthwith be ſent to Selymus, who was not yet gone out of Iudea, to vnderſtand of him the truth of the matter.

Selymus commandeth the wages of his ſoldiers to be left in garriſon at Caire, to be augmented.

Theſe ſpeedy meſſengers hauing with wonderful celeritie diſpatched their iourney, ouertooke Selymus with his armie a little from Lariſſa in Iudea: and admitted to his preſence, orderly declared vnto him both the complaints of the ſouldiers, and the carefulneſſe of Cayerbeius and the paymaſters to excuſe the matter, together with the danger they were in, with all the other accidents whatſoeuer which had hapned ſithence the time of his departure from F Caire. Which complaint ſo incenſed the mind of Selymus with new paſſions of anger and choller, being already ſore alienated with former diſpleaſures, that he without farther delay commanded Ionuſes Baſſa to be brought before him to anſwer the matter: who although he were inwardly ſtrucken with the guilt of his owne conſcience, and ſurpriſed with a deadly feare, which appeared in his colour as pale as aſhes, ſeeing in the angrie face and countenance of his ſoueraigne the moſt certaine tokens of his heauie diſpleaſure: yet as he was a man of G great ſpirit, anſwered boldly, That he had forbidden the ſoldiers wages to be augmented, contrary to his maieſties command, not vpon any euil meaning to haue inuerted that mony to his own vſe, neither thereby to haue drawn any man of purpoſe into diſgrace, as was by ſome his malicious enemies ſuggeſted but; vpon great reaſon, therby to prouide for his maieſties cofers wonderfully emptied with thoſe late wars: beſide that, the conſtant report of new troubles like to ariſe out of Perſia, gaue good occaſion for him to ſpare vnneceſſarie charges: Wheras on the other ſide, as he ſaid, the garriſon ſouldiers were already inriched with the plentifull ſpoiles of Ægypt, & in a moſt goodly city poſſeſſed the ſumptuous houſes & lands of the Mamalukes, feeding vpon the goods of the Ægyptians, & had already receiued both greater pay & more bountiful rewards from him, than euer any ſoldiers had from any his predeceſ- H ſors the Othoman kings: in which caſe, if they were not paſt al modeſty, they might wel enough take it in good part, if they were ſomthing reſtrained in their vnreaſonable requeſts. He alledged moreouer, that great princes which retain their ſoldiers in reaſonable pay in time of peace and war, ought ſometime for warlike diſcipline, to require of them a moderation of their deſires; leſt whileſt they all ſtriue with greedineſſe for their priuat gain, there want mony afterwards in the common treaſurie to maintain a greater and more neceſſarie charge, wars ſtill riſing vpon wars; ſeeing that no commander, were he neuer ſo valiant or fortunat, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coine, the moſt proper inſtrument & very ſinues of war, anſwering vnto his other moſt heroicall parts & ſufficiencie. But as he was yet thus ſpeaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him; for if he ſhould haue ſuffered him in I longer diſcourſe to haue recounted his former deſerts & worthy ſeruice done, aſwell in the time of his father Baiazet, as of late euen in his owne preſence, he was like enough to haue had of them that were able to do moſt with him, interceſſors for him: and ſo without further delay, cauſed him euen there in his own preſence to be executed: ſaying moreouer, that others which would arrogantly preſume to preſcribe vnto their ſoueraignes what they had to do, ſhould for euer after by the example of that moſt inſolent ſeruant, be admoniſhed of their duty and condition. It is reported, that the ſouldiers in deſpight of Selymus wonderfully lamented the vnworthie death of this ſo worthy a man: for he, beſide his notable & rare valour, ſo many times to his great honor in ſundry battels approued, had by the dexteritie of his Grecian wit, comelines of perſonage, militarie eloquence, & gallant maner of liuing, ſo won the loue and K fauor of all men, that there was few or none in all the army which did not acknowledge himſelfe ſome way indebted & beholden vnto him, & did therfore condemne the Emperors crueltie. They then began to tel how Muſtapha ſyrnamed Caloger, a man of wonderful credit and authority both with BaiaZet & himſelfe, was in the heat of his furie ſlain without hearing: and that in like maner of rage, old Chendemus a man of greateſt honor & integritie of life, and of all the chiefetains which came out of the great Emperor Mahomets nurſerie, the moſt skilful, had bin for his graue and wholſome counſell onely, without cauſe murthered: neither was then Boſtanges his ſon in law forgoten: neither Cherſcogles (the one moſt honourable for the great place, he held in court and the marriage of BaiaZets daughter, and the other a man of no leſſe marke being his great Admiral, & bearing himſelfe high vpon his infinit wealth, but more vp- L on his wife one of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble gentlemen about 2. yeres before had their heads ſtrucke off, no man wel knowing wherfore; and their dead bodies caſt out at the court gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miſerable ſpectacle of their own miſerie and the Emperors cruelty. Yea the remembrance of his old tirannie (renewed as it were with this late outrage) preſented a freſh vnto al mens eys the reuerent old Emperor BaiaZet his father, with his two brethren, Achomates & Corcutus, by right both called vnto the empire before himſelfe; with many other yong princes of the Bloud, of great hope & expectation, who as all men knew, periſhed through the vnnaturall and execrable cruelty of this moſt mercileſſe man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him. Foraſmuch as he without all feare of God or regard of worldly ſhame, accounted no practiſe wicked, or deuiſe deteſtable, M that might ſerue for the better eſtabliſhing of his kingdome, and had ſet downe in his minde, (long before corrupted with ambition and tyrannie) That it was far better for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to be feared of all than beloued of many: and therfore ſpared no mans life, of whom he had but the leſt ſuſpition. Howbeit that the ſeueritie by him vſed againſt this ſo great a man

A and ſo gracious with the people, may in ſome ſort be excuſed, as iuſtly moued thereunto by the preſumptuous and malicious dealing of the proud Baſſa vnder-hand, contrary to the charge giuen him by his lord, to the peril of thoſe his great but late conqueſts both in Ægypt and Syria.

This great Baſſa, whileſt he yet liued and flouriſhed in the court, in nothing ſo much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the crueltie by him ſhewed vpon the perſon of the faire Lady Manto his beſt beloued wife. Who being a Greeke borne, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, whereunto her louely conditions were alſo anſwerable, was by Zebalia her firſt husband (a man of great honor) carried with him into the wars, as his greateſt treaſure and chiefe delight. But he ſlaine, and ſhe by misfor-B tune falling into the hands of the Turks (her enemies) remained ſo priſoner with them for a time; vntill that this great Baſſa Ionuſes ſhortly after (ſeeing her amongſt the other captiues there taken, ſo far to exceed the reſt as doth the Sun the leſſer ſtarres) ſurpriſed with her incomparable beautie, became of her amorous: and in too curious viewing of the captiue Ladie, was by her himſelfe taken priſoner. Where finding her outward perfections graced with no leſſe inward vertues, and her honourable mind anſwerable vnto her rare feature, tooke her vnto his wife; honouring her farre aboue all the reſt of his wiues and concubines: and ſhee againe in all dutifull loyaltie ſeeking to pleaſe him, for a ſpace liued in all worldly felicitie and bliſſe, not much inferiour vnto one of the great Sultaneſſes. But long laſteth not the Summer fruit of wanton loue, blaſted moſt time in the bloſſome, and rotten before it be well ga-C thered: for in ſhort time the Baſſa more amorous of her perſon, than ſecured in her vertues, and after the manner of ſenſuall men, ſtill fearing leſt that which ſo much pleaſed himſelfe, gaue no leſſe contentment to others alſo: began to haue her in diſtruſt, although he ſaw no great cauſe, why, more than his owne conceit, not grounded vpon any her euill demeanor, but vpon the exceſſe of his own liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be ouer purged) of it ſelf ſtil more and more in him increaſing, he became ſo froward and imperious, that nothing ſhe could ſay or do could now ſo pleaſe or content him, but that he ſtil thought ſome one or other, although he wiſt not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearefull was the iealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuſe but loue thoſe great perfections, whereat he could not enough wonder, although he found no contentment therein, tormenting ſtill both himſelfe D and her whom he ſo dearely loued with his owne paſſionat diſtruſt: vntill at length, the faire ladie grieued to ſee her ſelf thus without cauſe to be ſuſpected, and wearied with the inſolent pride of her peeuiſh husband, together with his imperious commands, determined ſecretly to depart from him, and ſo to returne againe into her owne country. Which her purpoſe ſhe diſcouered vnto one of her Eunuches, to whom ſhe had alſo deliuered certaine letters to be by him conuaied vnto ſuch of her friends, as whoſe helpe ſhe was to vſe in her intended flight: which letters the falſe eunuch opened, &ſo for the more manifeſting of the matter deliuered them vnto the Baſſa his maſter. Who therewith inraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his furie, with a dagger ſtabd her to the heart and ſlew her: ſo together with the death of E his loue, hauing cured his tormenting iealouſie. The liuely counterfeits of theſe two ſo notable perſonages thus vnworthily ſlaine, the one by the imperious commaund of his ſoue-raigne, and the other by the cruell hand of her husband, thou maieſt in the pages following behold, as they are by Boiſardus expreſſed.

Vnhappie ſhe with cruell hand, was by her husband ſlaine.

But leauing this great Baſſa with faire Manto vnto their reſt, his courſe thus run, to returne againe vnto Selymus; who now come into Syria, was by letters from the Himbracor-Baſſa or maſter of his horſe (whom he had left vpon the frontiers of his kingdome to attend the motions of the Perſians) aduertiſed, That the Perſian preparations which had raiſed ſuch a hoat rumor of wars in the beginning of Winter, was growne cold in the heat of Sommer; and that he had ſeene in all the time of his abode in thoſe quarters, none but certaine ſtragling companies, making ſhew as if ſome greater power had bin comming, which had many times made ſudden roads into the countrey, with whom he had ſundry times proſperouſly encountered;

& it was generally reported by ſuch priſoners as he had taken,& by his own eſpials alſo,that Hyſmael,troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars,had conuerted the greateſt part of his forces againſt thoſe nations: ſo the Winter now drawing faſt on, and deepe ſnowes alreadie fallen vpon the mountaine Taurus,he could not though he would that yeare looke after Aſia the leſſe,or Syria.There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell betweene the two riuers,Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement,and mony,ſet a worke to keep Hyſmael buſied,by inuading the Iberians and Albanians,which were vnder his protection:which thing he wrought by the means of Mahomet his father in law,the Boſphoran king,who being of the ſame language and nation, by rewards eaſily induced the needy captains of the Tartars his friends and confederats,to take vp armes againſt their neighbours.

Many men maruelled that Hyſmael the Perſian king neglected ſo faire an opportunity,wherby he might(as moſt men thought)haue thruſt Selymus quite out of Aſia and Syria,whileſt he was thus buſied in Ægypt,yea and eaſily haue deſtroied him,ſhut vp with all his power,eſpecially at ſuch time as the Ægyptian Sultans Campſon and Tomombeius made ſo great reſiſtance. But they which could better iudge of the matter,ſaw that Hyſmael was not of ſo great power and ſtrength abroad,as at home: for his armie for moſt part conſiſted of gentlemen,or ſuch as were by cuſtome bound to ſerue him in his defenſiue wars,voluntary men, and ſuch as ſerued without pay.Theſe as they were the moſt valiant horſemen of the Eaſt,ſo did they with ſingular valour worthily defend the kingdome of Perſia,and alſo as occaſion required,make war with their neere neighbours: but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no meanes away withall,accounting it a grieuous thing to depart from their wiues,vnto whom they are ſo addicted,that oftentimes they carrie them with them into the wars;and being a wanton & fine kind of people,are not able without wages to draw after them according to their accuſtomed manner,ſo many carriages and horſes as might ſerue both for their neceſſarie and wanton vſes. With which difficultie,the great king Vſun Caſſanes,Hyſmael his grandfather by the mothers ſide,was much troubled in his wars againſt Mahomet the great: but was now much harder for Hyſmael to doe, for that he hauing obtained his grandfathers kingdome by the meere good will of the people, eaſing them forthwith of their heauie impoſitions,alwaies thought the loue of his ſubiects(which is eaſily gotten with bountie and iuſtice)the ſureſt riches of his kingdome; and that to command only ouer the bodies and goods of his people,their hearts altogether alienated and loſt by moſt heauy and grieuous exactions, ſeemed not the part of a gracious and naturall prince,but of an outragious and momentarie tyrant. Whereas Selymus on the contrary part,who had by force,miſchiefe,and moſt deteſtable practiſes ſtept vp into his fathers ſeat,had after the manner of the Othoman kings repoſed his greateſt and moſt aſſured ſtrength in a ſeruile & mercinarie kind of men, whom he might for pay as his owne creatures, at his pleaſure draw farre from home, and as he beſt liked lead them from place to place,and countrey to countrey,for the enlarging of his empire,and eterniſing of his name: and therefore according to the qualitie of his people,deemed true and ready power to conſiſt only in money,and the ſeueritie of his owne command; whereby he had learned with moſt happie ſucceſſe, in ſhort time to obſcure all the victories of the former Othoman kings,with the greatneſſe of his owne.

All the Winter following,Selymus ſtaied with his armie in Syria,ſpending the time in viſiting the ports & cities of that prouince, and ſetting of things in order, for the better aſſurance thereof. But vpon the approch of the Spring, when he certainly vnderſtood,that by the procurement of Leo the tenth,then biſhop of Rome,the Chriſtian Princes were entered into conſultation to make war vpon him, and that ſupplications with great ſolemnitie were made for that purpoſe, and honourable embaſſadors ſent into all prouinces to ſtir vp the greateſt kings of Chriſtendome againſt him, he (leauing Gazelles his lieutenant in Syria) by great iournies returned to Conſtantinople: from thence as at hand to behold the deuiſes and motions of Chriſtian Princes his enemies. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to ariſe in the prouinces of Syria and Ægypt,foraſmuch as he well ſaw,that Cayerbeius and Gazelles,his lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themſelues (as well for old grudges, as for the late treaſon of Cayerbeius,the great cauſe of the ruine of the Mamalukes kingdome)would neuer agree in one againſt him, but rather with a certaine emulation ſtriue betwixt themſelues with diligence, faithfulneſſe,& moderation,who ſhould deſerue beſt in well gouerning the prouinces by him

A committed to their charge, as indeed they did during the ſhort time of his raigne.

Selymus being arriued at Conſtantinople, and purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, cauſed wonderfull preparation to be made for his wars, but eſpecially at ſea: whereby it was thought, that he would haue either attempted the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes (a great moat in his eye) or elſe ſome part of Italie. But as he was hatching this miſchiefe, or ſome other of no leſſe importance, and in the meane time delighted himſelfe with viſiting the cities of Grecia and Thrace, and ſolaced himſelfe in the pleaſant countrey about Hadrianople, he was ſuddenly attached with the hand of God, and ſtrucken in the reins of his backe with a canker: which melancholie and deuouring maladie contemning all cure, did by little and little ſo eat and corrupt his body, as that he before ſo much honored, became B now loathſome and odious both to himſelfe and others.

Selymus purpoſing to inuade the Chriſtians, ſtrucke in the reines of his backe with a canker.

As he lay thus languiſhing, his incurable diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Baſſa, whom of all others he moſt loued, ſaid, O Pyrrhus, I ſee I muſt ſhortly die without remedie. Whereupon the graue Baſſa tooke occaſion to diſcourſe with him of many matters: and amongſt others, that it would pleaſe him to giue order for the well beſtowing of the great wealth taken from the Perſian merchants in diuers places of his empire: perſuading him to beſtow the ſame vpon ſome notable hoſpitall for reliefe of the poore. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldſt thou Pyrrhus, that I ſhould beſtow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vpon workes of charity and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glorie and praiſe? aſſuredly I will neuer doe it: nay, rather ſee they be againe reſtored vnto the right owners. C Which was forthwith done accordingly: to the great ſhame of many Chriſtians, who minding nothing leſſe than reſtitution, but making ex rapina holocauſtum, doe out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out ſome ſmall fragments, to build ſome poore hoſpitall, or mend ſome blind way; a poore teſtimonie of their hot charitie.

Selymus lying thus ſicke to death, and rotting aboue the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to Hadrianople, ſent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greateſt Baſſaes, to prouide for the ſolemniſing of the great feaſt, which the Turks call Bairam (and is as it were their Eaſter) purpoſing to come after himſelfe at leiſure, as his weake bodie would giue him leaue: and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greateſt Baſſaes and priuie Counſellors. But ſuch was the furie of his foule diſeaſe, continually attainting him with intollerable D paines, that ſhortly after the departure of the other two Baſſaes, hee breathed out his cruell ghoſt, in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1520: neere vnto the citie Chiurli, in the ſelf ſame place where he had ſomtime moſt vnnaturally aſſailed his aged father Baiazet, with purpoſe to haue ſlaine him, had not the fortune of the old Emperor in a great battell preuailed both againſt his force and the treaſon of his owne people. Thus intending the miſchiefe he could not performe, cut off by a loathſome and vntimely death, he to the great ioy of all Chriſtendome ended his daies, when he had liued ſix and fortie yeares, and thereof raigned eight: which time of his raigne was nothing elſe but a moſt horrible and dreadfull time of bloudſhed. His dead bodie was afterwards ſolemnly by his ſon Solyman buried in a new temple at Conſtantinople, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather, had for that E purpoſe before built. Vpon his tombe is ingrauen in the Greeke, Turkiſh, and Sclauonian Tongues, this ſhort Epitaph.

The death of Selymus.

The iuſt iudgement of God.

Hic maximus adſum Selymus, qui orbem domui.
Non bella relinquo, ſed pergo inquirere, Non vlla me fortuna potuit euertere: Licet oſſa iacent, animus quærit.

Phi. Lonicerus Turcicæ Hiſtoriæ, Tomo primo, li. primo.

F In Engliſh thus:

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the World in feare:
  The World I leaue, but not the wars, which I ſeeke, though not here.
No fortunes force, or victors hand, could take from me the ſpoiles:
  And though my bones lie buried here, my ghoſt ſeekes bloudie broiles.

He vſed commonly to ſay, That nothing was ſweeter than to raigne without feare or ſuſpition of his kindred. A little before his death, he commended his ſon Solyman to Pyrrhus Baſſa, ſtraightly charging him, that after his death he ſhould leaue the Perſian, and turne his forces altogether vpon the Chriſtians. And the more to incenſe him to the effuſion of bloud, he left him the liuely counterfeit of himſelfe hanging at his bed ſide, with ſundrie bloudie precepts breathing forth his cruell and vnmercifull diſpoſition. The Inſcription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes, the ſonne and nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greeke Verſes to this ſence.

The Prince that ſafely ſeekes to raigne, and hold his ſtate in quiet reſt, Muſt neuer ſuffer troubled care to harbour in his princely breſt:
Nor thinke it ſinne to ſpill the bloud of his moſt neere and deareſt kin, Not of his brother, ſo there by aſſured ſafetie he may win.
Law, Faith, Deuotion, and ſuch like, to breake them all he muſt not ſpare, Nor conſcience make of any thing, to rid him from aſpiring care.
This is the way and onely meane that may protect a princes State, And ſet him ſafe without all feare, whileſt none may liue whom he doth hate.

The bloudie & tyrannical precepts left by Selymus to his ſon Solyman, which hee afterwards moſt aſſuredly kept as is to be ſeene in his life following.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclauonian tongue,

Of him that ſeekes to worke thy woe, deſerue not to be counted kind:
But take him for thy mortall foe, and plague him with reuenging mind.
The rotten lym is cut away for feare of doing further harme:
The gentle prince doth beare ſmall ſway, if no abuſe can make him warme.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to preſume of further grace, It doth but ſtrength to rebels lend, to thruſt their ſoueraigne out of place.

At the lower end of the ſame table was written in Turkiſh verſe.

What Prince in perſon dareth not in open field to meet his foe,
And there with vnapplauded heart, his deadly darts himſelfe to throw:
But hides his head for feare of harme, and ſhuns the danger of the field, When martial minds with courage bold withſtand their foes with ſpeare & ſhield: Let him well know, how that in vaine he beareth armes but for a ſhow, And that the honour of the field will neuer ſuch a coward know.
Ne let him hope to gaine the ſpoile by any warres he takes in hand, That feareth with couragious mind his enemies forces to withſtand.

SOLYMANNVS MAGNIFICVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR QVARTVS FLORVIT ANNO 1520
1.683

Hiſt. Turc. li. 1.

Imperij Solyman patrij moderatur habenas, Regnaque Chriſtianum cladibus vſque metit.
Antiquam capit ille Rhodon, Naxumque Parumque Tyrrheni infeſtat Littora curua maris.
Pannonios multo populatur milite fines, Et cingit muros clara Vienna tuos.
Inclyta Sigethi dum mœnia concutit armis, Cogitur, hinc Stygiam nudus adire domum.

His fathers Empire Solyman doth rule with mightie power, And Chriſtian kingdomes ceaſeth not with ſlaughter to deuour.
The antient Rhodes, with Naxos Iſle, and Paros he did take,
And on the coaſts of Italie did wofull hauocke make:
Faire Hungarie with armies great he often did annoy,
And with a world of men had thought Vienna to deſtroy.
But whileſt to Sigeth he laied ſiege, in hope the ſame to haue, Cut off by death in his great pride, went naked to his graue.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOVRTH AND MOST MAGNIFICENT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

THe death of Selymus was with all carefulneſſe concealed by Ferhates the only Baſſa then preſent, for feare leſt the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court getting knowledge thereof, ſhould after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancie of the empire, C ſpoile the merchants and ſtrangers in places where they lay in garriſon, and eſpecially in the imperial citie; and not ſo contented, after their accuſtomed inſolencie preſcribe vnto the greateſt Baſſaes at their pleaſure. For preuenting whereof, Ferhates diſpatched a truſtie meſſenger with letters in poſt to Solyman the only ſonne of Selymus, then lying at Magneſia; certifying him of the death of his father; and that he ſhould deſerue well of his peaceable ſubiects by haſtening his comming to Conſtantinople, whileſt all things were yet in good order, in time to repreſſe with his preſence the feared diſordered proceedings of his men of warre.

D Solyman hauing to his great content peruſed the Baſſaes letters, as one deſirous enough of the empire; yet conſidering the cruel diſpoſition of his father (who vpon a meere iealous conceit of his aſpiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in diſlike of his fathers extream dealing, had practiſed moſt vnnaturally to haue taken away him by poiſon: which danger he eſcaped only by the carefulneſſe of his mother, who miſdoubting the worſt, cauſed the poiſoned rich ſhirt ſent to him from his father, to be firſt worne by one of his chamber, whereof he in ſhort time after died) and alſo that the letters were ſigned onely by Ferhates, and the newes not ſeconded from any of the other Baſſaes: fearing ſome hidden and ſecret plot of his father tending to his deſtruction, durſt not aduenture to remoue from his charge, but returned the meſſenger as one to whom hee gaue little or no credit. Ten daies thus ſpent, and the death of E Selymus nothing as yet ſuſpected; Ferhates vnderſtanding by his meſſenger the warineſſe of Solyman, and that he expected more aſſured aduertiſement, ſent preſently vnto the other great Baſſaes Pyrrhus and Muſtapha at Hadrianople, that they ſhould without delay repaire vnto the court: vnto whom at their comming hee declared the death of the Emperour. Which after they had ſeene to be true, they by another ſecret and ſpeedie meſſenger aduertiſed Solyman again therof, confirming thoſe letters with all their hands & ſeals: wherby Solyman now aſſured of his fathers death, preſently put himſelfe vpon the way, and by long and painfull iournies in few daies came to Scutarium, called in antient time Chriſopolis, ouer againſt Conſtantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and by him tranſported in a gallie ouer that ſtraight paſſage to Conſtantinople; where at his landing the Ianizaries by the appointment of their captaine were readie to receiue him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, vntill that Solyman being now in the midſt of them, the captaine with a loud voice ſaid vnto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long liue the great Emperor Solyman: which conſent of the men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh Emperours the greateſt aſſurance of their eſtate. And ſo with much triumph he was by them brought into the roiall pallace, and placed in his fathers ſeat in the yeare 1520: in which yere alſo Charles the fift was choſen Emperour of Germanie. The Ianizaries diſappointed by the Baſſaes of the ſpoile of the merchants, eſpecially Chriſtians and Iewes, receiued of the bountie of Solyman a great largious; and in the beginning of his raigne had their accuſtomed wages ſomewhat augmented alſo, to their wonderfull contentment.

Solyman was about twentie eight yeares old when hee began to raigne, and was at the firſt ſuppoſed to haue bin of a mild and peaceable diſpoſition: ſo that the princes to whom the name of Selymus was before dreadful, were now in hope that a quiet Lamb was come in place of a raging Lyon. But in ſhort time they found themſelues in their expectation far deceiued; and eſpecially the Chriſtian Princes bordering vpon him, vnto whom he became a far more dangerous enemie then was his father before him, conuerting his forces moſt part of his long raigne vpon them, which Selymus had almoſt altogether imployed againſt the kings of Perſia, and Ægypt, the greateſt Princes of the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

The firſt that felt his heauie hand was Gazelles Gouernour of Syria: who preſently vpon the death of Selymus, thinking himſelfe now diſcharged of the oath of obedience which hee had giuen to Selymus, but not to his ſucceſſors; and earneſtly deſiring to reſtore again the kingdome of the Mamalukes lately ouerthrowne, gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed Mamalukes, which ſpeedily reſorted vnto him out of all parts of Aſia and Africke: and alluring with rewards the leaders of the wild Arabians, with great numbers of the countrey people of Syria, diſcontented with the Turkiſh gouernment, entred into open rebellion, and by force of armes draue the Turkes garriſons out of Byrtha, Tripolis, and diuers other cities of Syria, taking them into his owne poſſeſſion. And the better to effect that hee had taken in hand, he ſent embaſſadors to Caire, vnto Cayerbeius, who had of Selymus receiued the gouernment of Ægypt, the vnworthie reward of his horrible treaſon; perſuading him by any means to take reuenge of the iniurie and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turkes garriſons to make himſelfe Sultan of Ægypt, and reſtore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the vttermoſt of his deuoire and ſeruice. But Cayerbeius, either not truſting Gazelles his old enemie, or aſhamed by new treaſon to augment his former diſhonor, or els (which was moſt like) miſdoubting his owne ſtrength in performance of ſo great an enterpriſe; after he had attentiuely heard what the embaſſadours had to ſay, cauſed them preſently in his own ſight to be put to death as traitors, and with all ſpeed certified Solyman therof: who without delay ſent Ferhates Baſſa with with a ſtrong army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and hauing in his power moſt of the cities of Syria, retired himſelf with all his armie into the ſtrong citie of Damaſco; whither at length, Ferhates the great Baſſa by long march came alſo. Gazelles reſolued to trie the fortune of the field, and ſo either by ſpeedy victorie or honourable death to end the matter, rather than to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſhut vp within the wals of the citie (vpon the comming of the Baſſa, valiantly iſſued forth with all his power, and gaue him battell; which for the ſpace of ſix houres was moſt cruelly fought, and many ſlaine on both ſides. At length Gazelles being oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly aſſailed on either ſide, was enforced to fight in a ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthie Generall and valiant ſoldier, honotably died together with his Mamalukes in the midſt of his enemies, leauing vnto them a bloudie victory. Gazelles thus ſlaine, the citie of Damaſco with all the country of Syria without any more adoe yeelded again vnto the Turks obedience, which the Baſſa took in ſo good part, that he would not ſuffer his ſoldiers to enter into the city, then richly reſtored with commodities of all ſorts, brought thither by merchants out of diuers parts of the world.

Gazelles ſlaine.

Syria thus pacified, the Baſſa went to Caire in Ægypt, and there commending Cayerbeius for his fidelitie, confirmed him in his gouernment; and enuaying againſt the cruelty of Selymus (ſo to pleaſe the Ægyptians) wiſhed them to hope for all happineſſe vnder the peaceable gouernment of the new Sultan Solyman. And ſo when he had ſet all things in order in both the prouinces of Syria and Ægypt, returned againe to Solyman.

The yeare next following, Solyman by the counſell of Pyrrhus Baſſa his old tutor (a mortall enemie vnto the Chriſtians) and by the perſuaſion of the Ianizaries reſolued to beſiege the ſtrong citie of Belgrade, otherwiſe called Taurunum, ſcituat vpon the borders of Hungarie, where the riuer Sauus falleth into Danubius. Which city his great grandfather Mahomet (ſurnamed named the Great, and before him the warlike Amurath) had with al their power, long time before to their great loſſe and diſhonour, vainly attempted. Wherein vntill that time were reſerued the enſignes, then taken from the Turks, to their no ſmall griefe, with other trophies of the glorious victories of the worthie captaine Huniades, and the great King Matthias Coruinus his ſonne. Wherefore Solyman ſending his armie before, was come as far as Sophia, a citie in Seruia (the place where the Turks great lieutenant in Europe is alwaies reſiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his comming: for they liuing at eaſe all the time that Vladiſlaus raigned, and now ſleeping in ſecuritie vnder the young King Lodouicus his ſonne, a man of no experience; who contenting himſelfe with the title of a King, ſuffered himſelfe to be pilled and poled by his nobilitie and great clergie men (inuerting all the wealth of the land to their owne priuat gaine) that he was not able to raiſe any ſufficient power to go againſt his puiſſant enemie; eſpecially his nobilitie, in whoſe hands reſted the wealth of his kingdome, promiſing him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardie ſouldiers, the ſcourge and terror of the Turks, was dead long before; ſo was alſo Matthias that fortunat warriour: after whom ſucceeded others giuen to all pleaſure and eaſe; to whoſe example the people faſhioning themſelues, forgot their wonted valour, and gaue themſelues ouer to ſenſualitie and voluptuous pleaſure: ſo that Solyman without let, preſented his armie before the citie of Belgrade, and with batterie and vndermining in ſhort time became Lord thereof, hauing loſt few of his people in that ſiege. How much the loſſe of that ſtrong citie concerned the Chriſtian common wealth, the manifold and lamentable miſeries which afterwards inſued by the opening of that gap, not vnto the kingdom of Hungarie only, but to all that ſide of Chriſtendom, did, and yet doth, moſt manifeſtly declare. It was woon by the Turkes the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt in the yeare, 1521.

After the taking of the ſtrong citie of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Conſtantinople, brake vp his armie and there lay ſtill almoſt all the yeare following. During which time, hee cauſed great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his ports, for rigging vp of a great fleet: which cauſed the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to looke about them, as men carefull of their eſtates, fearing that thoſe forces would ere long bee imployed againſt ſome or all of them.

About the ſame time Philippus Villerius a man of great wiſedome and courage, then following the French court, was in his abſence by the knights of the Rhodes choſen Great maſter of that honourable companie: who embarking himſelfe at Marcelles, after a long and dangerous iourney (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at ſea by Cortug-Ogli a famous pyrat of the Turkes, whoſe two brethren the knights of the Rhodes had but a little before ſurpriſed at ſea and ſlaine; and then held the third in priſon) arriued in ſafety at the Rhodes, where he was with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The great Baſſa, by whoſe graue aduiſe Solyman was contented in all his waightie affaires to be directed, conſulting with the other Baſſaes, of diuers great exploits which was firſt to be taken in hand, for the honor of their Emperour and inlarging of his empire, were of diuers opinions concerning the beſieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Baſſa of greateſt account, diſſuaded the taking in hand of that action, as too full of difficultie and danger: producing for proofe thereof the example of the great Emperor Mahomet, Solymans great grandfather; by whom it was vnfortunatly attempted, and in fine ſhamefully abandoned. But Muſtapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, ſaid, That the greatneſſe of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predeceſſors as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence firſt Amurath, and after him, Mahomet, two of the moſt warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great diſhonour been repulſed: and ſhould no doubt with like good fortune preuaile againſt the Rhodes alſo, being able (if need were) to bring more men before it than were ſtones in the wals thereof. Which he ſo confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that hee ſeemed to make no doubt of the good ſucceſſe of that war: preſumptuouſly affirming, that vpon the firſt landing of Solymans great armie, they of the Rhodes would without delay yeeld themſelues and their citie into his hands.

Amongſt others of great experience, whoſe opinions Solyman was deſirous to haue, before he would take ſo great a matter in hand, was the famous pirat Cortug-Ogli, a man of a miſchieuous and cruell nature; but of great experience in ſea matters. Who preſented to Solyman by Muſtapha and Ferhates, two of the greateſt Baſſaes, going before him, after due reuerence done, and commanded to deliuer his opinion, ſpake vnto Solyman, as followeth:

The greatneſſe of your deſerts (moſt mightie and puiſſant Emperour) maketh me (beeing by you ſo commanded) at this time frankly to ſpeake what I thinke may be for the glorie and honour both of your Maieſtie and Empire. I daily heare the pittifull lamentation of the miſerable people of Mitylene, Eubœa, Peloponeſus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all alongſt the ſea coaſt of Syria and Ægypt, bewayling the ſpoyle of their countries, the rauſacking of their cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinite and incredible calamities, which they dayly ſuffer of the croſſed Rhodian pyrats, no man withſtanding them: Many a time haue theſe wretched people holden vp their hands to mee for helpe, moſt inſtantly requeſting mee to bee a meane for them to your imperiall Maieſtie, whereby they might be protected from the iniurie, rapine, and ſlaughter of theſe cruell rouers. Wherefore in their behalfe I beſeech your ſacred Maieſtie, by the moſt reuerend name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, and by your owne moſt heroicall diſpoſition, to deliuer your afflicted ſubiects from theſe their moſt cruell enemies, and at length to ſet them free from the furie, captiuitie, and feare, of theſe pyrats, more grieuous vnto them than death it ſelfe: and conſider with your ſelfe, that this iniurie and inſolencie tendeth not ſo much to the hurt of your poore ſubiects and oppreſſed people in priuate, as to the diſhonour and diſgrace of your imperiall name and dignitie; which if any other Chriſtian King or Prince ſhould offer, your Maieſtie I know would not ſuffer vnreuenged: And will you then ſuffer theſe robbers, cut-throats, baſe people gathered out of all the corners of Chriſtendome, to waſte your countries ſpoile your Cities, murther your people, and trouble all your ſeas? For who can paſſe by ſea to Tripolis, Damaſco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcide, Lesbos, Chios, nay vnto this your imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, without moſt certaine and manifeſt danger of theſe rouers? What haue we heard euerie Spring this many yeares, but that the Rhodians had taken ſome one or other of your Ports, led away your people into moſt miſerable captiuitie, and carried away with them the rich ſpoiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things moſt diſhonourable, this they doe vnder your noſe, and in your ſight, in the middeſt and heart of your Empire. Pardon mee I beſeech you moſt Mightie Emperour, if I too plainely ſpeake what I thinke: For whatſoeuer I ſay, I ſay it to no other end, but that you ſhould now at length doe that which ſhould many yeares agoe haue beene done. Wee your moſt loyall ſubiects may not, nor ought not, for the increaſe of our Mahometan Religion, and for the enlarging of your Empire and Honour, to refuſe to aduenture our goods, our bodies, our liues, to all hazard and danger whithout exception. If you likewiſe be carried with loue of glorie and renowne, or rauiſhed with the deſire of neuer dying Fame; in what warres can you more eaſily gaine the ſame, or better imploy vs your ſeruants, than in vanquiſhing and ſubduing the Rhodes, the reputed bulwarke of Chriſtendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries? But ſome will perhaps ſay, your anceſtours haue in former times vnfortunately attempted that citie: ſo did they alſo Belgrade iu Hungarie: yet hath your happie fortune to your immortall fame brought the ſame vnder your ſubiection, beeing farre more ſtrongly fortified than it was in times paſt: and doe you then deſpaire of the Rhodes? Caſt off ſuch vaine and needleſſe miſdoubt. The Turkiſh Empire hath alwaies growne by aduentures and honourable attempts: Therefore make haſt to beſiege it both by ſea and land. If your ſubiects mourning vnder the heauie burthen of the Chriſtian captiuitie, built it with their owne hands for the Chriſtians; cannot they now at libertie, deſirous of reuenge, and fitted with opportunitie, with like hands deſtroy the ſame? If it pleaſe you to vouchſafe but to looke into the matter (moſt dread Soueraigne) you ſhall ſee that there is a diuine occaſion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, preſented vnto your moſt ſacred Maieſtie, now that the Chriſtians of the Weſt are at diſcord and mortall warre amongſt themſelues. Your Maieſtie is not ignorant, that in managing of wars, the opportunitie of the time is eſpecially to be followed; and that when occaſion ſerueth, all remiſneſſe and delay is to be carefully auoided: the changes of times are moſt tickle, and if you ſuffer your good hap now to paſſe ouer, you ſhall perhaps in vaine afterwards purſue the ſame when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious yong prince, prickt forward thus alſo by the perſuaſions of Cortug-Ogli and others, ſeeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humor: but moſt of all by the inſtigation of the Baſſa Muſtapha, reſolued to go in perſon himſelfe

A ſelfe againſt the Rhodes. And firſt to make ſome proofe of what ſpirit and courage Villerius the new choſen Great Maſter was of, in whoſe ſufficiencie the greateſt part of the defence of the citie was ſuppoſed to conſiſt: to him by way of a little cold friendſhip, he ſent a meſſenger with this ſhort Letter thus directed:

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greateſt Emperour of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, moſt Mightie King of Perſia, Arabia, Syria, and Ægypt; Lord of Aſia and Europe; Prince of Mecha and Aleppo, Ruler of Hieruſalem; and Maſter of the Vniuerſall Sea: to the reuerend Father, Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legat of Aſia, B greeting.

I am glad of thy kingdome and new promotion, which I wiſh thou maieſt long and happily enioy, for that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelitie exceed all them which before thee ruled in the Rhodes: from whom as my anceſtours haue withdrawne their hand, ſo I after their example ioyne with thee in amitie and friendſhip. Ioy thou therefore, my friend, and in my behalfe reioyce of my victorie and triumph alſo: for this laſt Summer paſſing ouer Danubius with enſignes diſplayed, I there expected the Hungarian King, who I thought would haue giuen me battell; I tooke from him by ſtrong hand Belgrade, the ſtrongeſt citie of his Kingdome, with other ſtrang holds thereabouts: and hauing with fire and ſword deſtroyed much people, and carried away many moe into captiuitie, as a triumphant conque-C ror, breaking vp mine armie, am returned to my imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, from whence farewell.

Solymans letter to Villerius, Great maſter of the Rhodes.

The Great Maſter hauing read theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, perceiued forthwith Solymans meaning, and that peace was offered him in words and ſhew, but war in deed and meaning. Which becauſe he was readie by force to repulſe, he rewarded the Turks meſſenger, and ſent backe with him another of his owne, a priuat perſon. For the Rhodians did ſeldome vouchſafe to ſend any honourable embaſſadours to the Turkiſh Emperours (with whom they for moſt part liued in hoſtilitie) either the Turkes to them. By this meſſenger he anſwered Solymans Letters with other of like vaine, as followeth:

D Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to the Turke.

I right well vnderſtand your letters which your meſſenger brought vnto me. The friendſhip you write of, is as pleaſing to me as diſpleaſing to Cortug-Ogli your ſeruant, who went about to haue intercepted me vpon the ſudden, as I came out of France: but failing of his purpoſe, ſtealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to haue robbed certaine merchants ſhips bound from Ioppe to Venice: but ſending my fleet out of my hauen, I ſtaied his furie, conſtrained the pyrat to flie, and for haſt to leaue behind him the priſes he had before taken from the merchants of Crete. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The anſwer of Villerius to Solymans letters.

By this anſwer Solyman perceiued, that he was well met withall in his owne fineneſſe, and E that he ſhould not ſo eaſily carrie the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himſelfe reſolued to trie his fortune therein, he called vnto him certaine of the chiefe commanders of his warres, to whom he opened his whole determination in this ſort:

Although I doubt not, worthie chiefetaines, but that you are of the ſame mind now that you haue beene alwaies of, in the inuading of other Nations; yet I haue thought it good in matters tending to the common glorie, and good of vs all, to vſe your generall aduice and counſell. Since the time that my father left this world, wee haue made warre with diuers Nations and people. The Syrians by nature vnconſtant, and prone to rebellion, we haue by force reduced to their former obedience. The Sophi, that mightie king, nephew vnto the great King Vſun-Caſſanes, by his daughter the ſiſter of king Iacup, in heart and deed our mortall enemie, not contented with the kingdomes of Aſſyria, Media, Armenia the greater, Perſia, and Meſopotamia, wee haue with our forces ſhut vp within the compaſſe of his owne dominions. The laſt yeare running through Hungarie, both on this ſide and beyond Danubius wee tooke Belgrade the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe in that Kingdome: And whatſoeuer elſe wee attempted, wee ſubdued. Yet for all that (to ſpeke plainely of my ſelfe) my minde greater in conceit than my Empire, and the bloud of Othoman, findeth no contentment in theſe victories. For whatſoeuer you haue yet done, although it be great, yet I deeme it all but little, in regard of your worth: my deſire carrieth me further. This haue I alwaies aboue all things moſt earneſtly deſired, to ſet vpon the Rhodes, and vtterly to root out all the ſtrength and forces, yea the very name of thoſe Rhodian ſouldiers. And haue not you alſo no leſſe than my ſelfe deſired the ſame? How often haue I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I haue expected the time that beeing diſcharged of other warres, I might heere employ my whole ſtrength and power. That we ſo long deſired, is now come: there was neuer greater opportunitie of good ſucceſſe offered, a great part of the walls of the citie of the Rhodes now lying euen with the ground; which cannot in ſhort time bee repaired, eſpecially in their want of coyne. Beſide this, the garriſon in the caſtle is but ſmall, and their aid from France farre off, which wil either come too late when the citie is loſt, or that which I rather beleeue, neuer. For neither will the the French King (being at mortall warres with the Germane Emperour, and Lord of Italie) ſuffer his ſtorehouſes to be diſfurniſhed, or his ports bared of the neceſſarie defence of his ſhipping. Neither doe you beleeue that the Spaniards (diſtreſſed at home with famine, warre, and ciuile diſcention) will eaſily come hither out of Sicilia and Campania with ſupplies of men and victuall. But you may perhaps thinke, that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Iſle of Crete, which I aſſure you is not ſo: for I know (although I will not now manifeſt the ſame) how I haue preuented that miſchiefe. Wherefore couragious ſouldiers (borne to the ſubauing of all Chriſtendome, much more of the Rhodes) with cheerefull hearts follow me your ſoueraigne againſt theſe your moſt perfidious and cruell enemies. How long I pray you will you ſuffer that ſtaine and diſgrace to ſticke vpon the Othoman Familie, and generally vpon all the name of the Turkes, which theſe Rhodians caſt vpon vs the laſt time they were beſieged? Which was not ſo much done by their valour, as by the vnfortunate counſell of my great grandfather Mahomet, calling home Meſithes Palæologus his Generall in that war, for one vnluckie aſſault. But admit that their valour gained them victorie, will you therefore alwaies ſuffer theſe pyraticall excurſions vpon our Maine and Iſlands? The ranſacking of cities and countries? The carrying away of your cattell and richeſt ſubſtance? The captiuitie and ſlaughter of your wiues and children? The ſlauerie of your neereſt friends and kinſmen. So helpe me great Mahomet it ſhall not ſo be: I vow in deſpight of Chriſt and Iohn, in ſhort time to ſet vp mine enſignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of Rhodes. Neither doe I ſeeke any thing vnto my ſelfe, more than the honour of the enterpriſe; the profit I giue vnto you my fellow ſouldiers, their coine, plate, iewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours, to carrie home with you vnto your wiues and children. Wherefore let vs now with all our forces and courage ſet forward to the beſieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpoſe thus made knowne, and the ſame with one accord of all his captains well liked: Pyrrhus the eldeſt Baſſa and of greateſt authoritie, who at the firſt diſſuaded the warre, ſtanding vp in the middeſt of the reſt, ſaid:

I cannot but much admire the great wiſedome and rare vertues of our young Emperour, who ſo wiſely and aduiſedly hath declared all the deepe counſels of a worthie chiefetaine in taking of warre in hand. Bleſſed be Mahomet, thrice and foure times bleſſed is this empire, bleſſed is our eſtate, and bleſſed are we with ſuch a Prince, which carrieth with him in his warres not onely men and habiliments of warre, but moſt deepe wiſedome and policie. Which wholeſome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our eyes, and would follow, we ſhould in ſhort time bring vnder our ſubiection not the Rhodes onely, but all the kingdomes of the Chriſtians. Yet beſide that which our Emperor hath moſt carefully and conſiderately deuiſed, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promiſes, rewards, and all other means whatſoeuer, to corrupt if it were poſſible the very chiefe and principall citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their moſt ſecret deuices and counſels: which how it may be wrought, I will in few words giue you to vnderſtand. I as a man indifferent, deſirous of peace and quietneſſe, will by meſſengers and letters induce the Great Maſter to ſend ſome honourable embaſſage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I can once bring him vnto, then let me alone with the reſt.

Solyman maketh preparation againſt the Rhodes.

This counſell of the old Fox pleaſed all the hearers wel, but aboue others the emperor himſelfe, who gaue him in charge with all diligence and ſpeed, to proue what he could doe: the other captains he commanded to prepare the greateſt forces they could, both for land & ſea ſeruice.

A ſeruice. Which preparation was ſo great both at Conſtantinople and other places, that it could not long be kept ſo ſecret, but that newes therof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of Februarie: which newes dayly increaſing and ſtill confirmed by more certaine reports, Villerius the Great Maſter for more certaine intelligence, ſent a Chriſtian of Epidaurus, who could perfectly ſpeake the Turkiſh language, as a ſpie to Conſtantinople; who by ſecret letters from thence gaue him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great fleet, and raiſing a mightie armie, aduertiſing him alſo of a wonderfull proportion of artillerie prepared for batterie: but againſt whom was not commonly knowne, ſome deeming it to be for the inuaſion of Italie, ſome for the Rhodes, others ſuppoſing it to be for Ciprus or Corcira: which diuerſitie of coniectures, made many (whoſe conceits auerted from themſelues the fortune B of that war) to be more careleſſe and ſecure. But whilest euery man was of opinion, that it was made againſt any man rather than himſelfe, certaine aduertiſement was giuen to the Rhodians from diuers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, That the Turkes did with extraordinarie diligence keep ſtrait watch and ward in all their ports thereabouts along the ſea coaſt, otherwiſe than they were before accuſtomed: which ſeemed to prognoſticate ſome farther matter than the defence of their frontiers. Villerius carefull of his charge, as the marke whereat the enemie aimed, prouided with all poſſible diligence great ſtore of victuall, armor, weapons, ſhot, powder, and whatſoeuer elſe neceſſarie for the defence of the citie.

Villerius prepareth to make reſiſtance againſt the Turkes.

The new wals of the citie, and Auergne fortreſſe, by Baſilius enginier to the Emperour Charles the fift (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Caractus the late Grand maſter, but not C yet finiſhed) was now with all diligent labour ſet vpon, euery man putting his helping hand vnto ſo neceſſarie a worke. Whileſt theſe things were with ſo great endeuour and labor a doing, a meſſenger came from Conſtantinople, (ſent from the old Baſſa Pyrrhus) a ſharpe witted and cunning fellow, who with much filed ſpeech in moſt ample manner doing his meſſage, by the way, painted forth the great towardlineſſe and courteous nature of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Baſſa his maſter: deliuering from both of them letters vnto the Great Maſter of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. to the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legat of Aſia, greeting.

D I am certainly informed that my letters are deliuered vnto thee; which for that thou vnderſtoodeſt them aright, I cannot expreſſe how much it pleaſed me. Truſt to it, that I am not contented with the victorie I got at Belgrade; I hope for another, nay I aſſure my ſelfe thereof, which I will not hide from thee whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from Conſtantinople.

Solymans letters to Villerius.

Pyrrhus, great Counſellour to the mightie Emperour Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes and Legat of Aſia, greeting.

E Your Letters, greater in meaning than character, I haue deliuered vnto our moſt mightie Emperor: but the bearer thereof I would not ſuffer to come to his preſence, leſt hee ſhould be too much offended with ſo baſe a meſſenger. Vnto whom from henceforth ſend men of worth commendable for their yeares and diſcretion, with whom his Maieſtie may (if he ſo pleaſe) conferre and conclude of matters concerning the common good: which thing if you ſhall doe, it ſhall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counſell. The meſſenger I ſend, bringeth letters vnto you alſo from our great Emperour; to whoſe diuine excellencie how you are to anſwer, you are alreadie admoniſhed. Farewell from Conſtantinople.

Pyrrhus Baſſa his letters to Villerius.

Theſe letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diuerſly. Such as altogether wiſhed for peace, meaſuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integritie, commended the counſel of Pyrrhus, ſaying, That he being an old man of great experience, was not ſo deſirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince & country: and therfore wiſhed by wiſdom to order that which the yong prince ſought for by war, fearing the vncertainty of mans fragilitie, the common chance of war, the violence of fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne moſt mightie kings with their ſtrong armies. G The perſuaſion of theſe men tooke ſuch effect, that one of the knights of the Order called Raimund March, a Spaniard a noble gentleman of great courage, and very eloquent, skilfull alſo in the Turkiſh tongue, and then Muſter-maſter, was appointed to haue been ſent Embaſſadour vnto the Turkiſh Emperour. Many there were of a contrarie oinion, which ſuſpecting fraud and deceit, ſaid it were good to beware of the enemies counſell: asking, to what end this embaſſage were? For ſhould wee proclaime warre (ſay they) againſt the moſt mightie tyrant, not yet our profeſſed enemie, who writeth all peace? Or ſhould we intreat for peace, no war as yet proclaimed; that he which as yet is afraid himſelfe, may now vnderſtand that he is of vs feared? Beſides that, with what ſecuritie, with what face can our Embaſſadors go, vnrequeſted H of the Turkiſh Emperor, without his ſafe conduct thorow thoſe countries which we daily burn & ſpoile? But they ſhall ſhew Pyrrhus the great Baſſaes letters forſooth, his protection, his credit and authoritie ſhall defend them from all iniurie and wrong; as though the ſeruant ſhould preſcribe laws to his maſter, & ſuch a ſeruant as is moſt like vnto his maſter (that is) cruel, falſe of faith, a hater of all Chriſtians, but eſpecially of vs Rhodians: whom the mercileſſe tyrant hauing in his power, with his nauy & army in readines, ſhall with cruel torture inforce to diſcouer vnto him our prouiſion, the ſecrets of our city and Order. This opinion of the wiſer ſort, was greatly confirmed by the too much curioſitie of the meſſenger which was ſent, who with all diligence enquired of the ſtate and ſcituation of the citie, of the number and I ſtrength of the Order. Wherefore in concluſion he was ſent backe againe accompanied but with one priuat ſouldier to carrie the Great maſters letters vnto the Turkiſh tyrant: the tenure whereof was thus:

Philippus Villerius Great Maſter of the Rhodes, vnto the Turke greeting.

Villerius his anſwer to Solymans letters.

That you are mindfull of me grieueth me nothing; and I am alſo mindfull of you. You repeat your victorie in Hungarie, wherewith not being contented you hope for another: nay you promiſe and aſſure your ſelfe thereof, before you haue attempted the war. Beware you deceiue not your ſelfe; mens expectations neuer deceiue them more than in warres. Farewell, from the Rhodes. K

The other letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect:

Philippus Villerius Liladamus Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Baſſa.

Villerius his anſwer to Pyrrhus the Baſſa his letters.

I haue adviſedly conſidered thy letters, with the behauiour and diſpoſition of thy meſſenger. As I contemne not thy counſell, ſo I will not follow the ſame, whileſt my men of warre do ſpoile the countries and ports of thy lord and maſter, which I beare withall, by reaſon of the iniuries they haue ſuſtained of the Turkiſh pirats. But I will call them home, and will ſend Embaſſadors vnto thy great Lord: ſo that thou before ſend me ſafe conduct vnder thy maſters great ſeale, for their ſafe comming and returne. Farewell, from the Rhodes. L

But theſe letters were neuer deliuered vnto the great Turke, or the Baſſa: for as ſoon as the Turkiſh meſſenger was come ouer into the maine, he preſently tooke horſe, which was there in readineſſe for him, and poſted towards Conſtantinople with as much ſpeed as he could, leauing the Chriſtian meſſenger his companion behind him, who returning backe againe to the Rhodes, and telling what he had heard and ſeene, gaue them all great occaſion to diſpaire of peace: whereupon Villerius ſent into Crete to hire certain companies of Cretenſian archers.

Villerius aduertiſed of the comming of the Turkes fleet.

In the meane time aduertiſement was giuen vnto the Great maſter by letters from the Iſland M of Naxos, That the Turks were readie to put their fleet to ſea with the firſt appearance of the new moone: which thing they moſt ſuperſtitiouſly obſerue in the beginning of all their great actions. The ſame newes was brought alſo by certaine merchants of the Iſland of Pathmos, who came to the Rhodes with a great ſhip laded with corne from Euboea, vnder the colour, of the ſale whereof, they (by the commandement of the Turkes, to whom they were tributaries)

A ries)diligently noted all that was done in the citie, ſhortly to be beſieged. The great maſter with no leſſe diligence, ſent diuers of his ſmall gallies amongſt the Iſlands and alongſt the maine,to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order,and captaine of one of theſe gallies, meeting with a great ſhip of the Turks laded with corne,tooke her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphonſus captaine of another of the gallies,lying in harbour in one of the Iſlands,and ſuffering his men to ſtraggle too far into the land,was ſet vpon by a Turkiſh pirat and taken.

About the ſame time the Turks by often fires made vpon the maine in the night ſeaſon, gaue ſigne vnto the Rhodians,that they were deſirous to haue ſome parly with them, as their manner was. Wherupon one Menetan a French man,one of the knights,by commandement of B the reſt of the Order,was ſent with a gallie well appointed to the maine to ſee what the matter might be,and with him was ioined Iacobus Xaycus a paymaſter for the gallies,that he might of the inhabitants of the place,and his friends there dwelling,diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended warre: for this Xaycus, beſides that he was a ſkilfull ſea man and one that knew the coaſt well,had alſo good experience in ciuile affaires,and was wonderfully be-loued & made of by the Turkiſh merchants whoſe language he had perfectly learned. Drawing neere the ſhoare,he found the Turkiſh merchants making merrie vpon the main,with their carpets,cotten wooll, and ſuch like merchandiſe about them as they vſed to exchange with the Rhodian merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto theſe merchants he gaue due ſalutations, gaging his faith for their ſafetie, & they likewiſe to him. But being requeſted to come aſhore C to make merrie vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be ſent for,who as they ſaid was not far off, he anſwered, that he could not ſo doe, except they would firſt deliuer a pledge for him a ſhipboord. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his needleſſe feare, willingly ſent their merchandiſe,& a pledge aboord the gallies. Xaycus then going aſhore, and embracing the Turkiſh merchants which met him: vpon a ſigne giuen,was forthwith beſet on euery ſide and taken priſoner,and by poſt horſes conuaied with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople, where he was with moſt exquiſit torments that could be deuiſed for any man to endure, enforced to confeſſe whatſoeuer his cruel enemies could deſire. After Xaycus was by treache-rie thus loſt, then began their prouident wiſedome to be highly commended, which were the occaſion,that the decree made for ſending embaſſadors vnto the Turke, was againe re-D uoked. The hoſtage giuen for Xaycus, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a ſimple countrey fellow whom the Turkes had of purpoſe well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his ſimple knowledge, anſwered to all things that were of him demanded; as that the Turks were making great preparation for ſea, vpon the coaſts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken vp many ſouldiers in the countries thereabouts to ſend into the frontiers of his dominions towards Syria, for defence of the ſame a-gainſt the Perſians. All which was true: for Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all ſuſpition of inuaſion (whom he knew carefully to obſerue his doings) ſent the ſouldiers whom he had leuied in the countries neereſt to the Rhodes, far away againſt the Perſian, as if he had meant nothing againſt the Rhodes,and ſo vpon the ſudden to ſet vpon them with his armie brought E out of Europe, before they were aware. But this his deuiſe ſerued to ſmall purpoſe; for the great Maſter perceiuing by many circumſtances,but eſpecially by that late calamitie of Xaycus that the Rhodes was the place the Turkiſh tyrant longed after; & fearing that delay might bring farther danger,cauſed a ceſſation from al other buſines to be proclaimed,vntil all things neceſſary for defence of the citie were accompliſhed: watch & ward was kept in euery ſtreet, the great artillerie planted vpon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of euery place, the publick armorie of all warlike prouiſion was open, all the ſtreets were ful of men carrying weapons,ſome to one place,ſome to another. At which time a general muſter was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where were found about 5000 men able to beare armes,among whom were 600 knights of the Order,& 500 ſouldiers of Crete,the reſt were F for moſt part mariners,able bodies,who in the time of the ſiege did great ſeruice,encouraged by their ſea captains: the Iſland people which repaired into the citie,ſerued to little other purpoſe but to dig and carry earth vnto the rampiers:and the citizens (except it were ſome few of the better ſort) were for the moſt part weak and of ſmal courage,nor able to indure any labor or paines,and yet hardly to bee kept in order and gouerned, great ſpeakers, but ſmall doers, greater in ſhew than in deed. The Great Maſter hauing carefully prouided and ordered all things needfull for defence of the citie, and fearing nothing more than the faint hearts of the citizens, cauſed them all to be called together; for incouragement of whom, hee ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Villerius his Oration vnto the Rhodians,

Valiant Gentlemen and worthie Citizens, wee heare that the Turke our mortall enemie is comming againſt vs, with a huge armie raiſed of diuers Nations: from whoſe naturall crueltie and wonted periurie except we defend our ſelues by force, one and the ſelfe ſame danger is like to befall me, my knights, and you all. For we haue with common conſent and hand grieuouſly ſpoiled him both by ſea and land, and you are by booties taken by ſtrong hand out of his dominions, inriched: and at this day we keepe his people in grieuous ſeruitude, and he ours; but he iniuriouſly, and we moſt iuſtly: For his anceſtours (wearie of the darke dennes and caues of the mountaine Caucaſus, their naturall dwelling) without right, title, or cauſe, incited onely with couetouſneſſe, ambition, and the hatred of our moſt ſacred religion, haue driuen the Chriſtians out of Syria: and afterwards oppreſſed the Grecians in Grecia; where not contented to haue deſtroyed the people, with one ſimple kinde of death (as barbariſme is euer cruell and mercileſſe) they haue with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments butchered many thouſands of that Nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whoſe miſchiefe exceedeth his yeares) an euill neighbour to all men, not contented with the dominions of Arabia, Syria, Ægypt, the greateſt part of Aſia, and of many other places moe, ſeeketh in tyrannie, murther, ſpoile, periurie, and hatred againſt Chriſt and Chriſtians, farre to excell: and forceth himſelfe to the vttermoſt of his power, to take from vs our Iſlands, and to ſubdue the Chriſtian Countries; that ſo at length being Lord of all, and commander of the World, hee may at his pleaſure ouerthrow the Chriſtian cities, kill the Chriſtians, and vtterly root out the Chriſtian name, which hee ſo much hateth. For the repulſing of which intollerable iniurie, wee haue eſpecially choſen this Iſland of the Rhodes for our dwelling place, becauſe the ſame ſeemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous Nation. We haue done what in vs lay, holpen by you: we know by proofe your great valour and fidelitie, which we now haue not in any diſtruſt. Wherefore I will not vſe many wordes to perſuade you to continue in your fidelitie and loyaltie, neither long circumſtance to encourage you to play the men: ſithence worthie mindes are not with wordes either encouraged or diſmayed. But concerning my ſelfe and my Knights of the Order, I will ſpeake a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Chriſtian Princes and other my knights of the Weſt will in good time ioyne their forces, are moſt readie and preſt to defend your ſelues, your children, your wiues, your goods, the monuments of your anceſtours and ſacred Temples, dedicated to the ſeruice of our God. Which opinion, that it may remaine firme and fix in your minds, if nothing elſe, my faithfulneſſe in your warres, my bodie not yet altogether ſpent, but able enough to endure paines and trauell, the nobilitie of theſe worthie knights of the Order, their loue towards you, and their hatred towards your enemies were ſufficient to confirm: but beſide this, the ſtrength of this citie, which this noble Order hath with infinit charges ſo notably fortified with ditches, wals, towers, and bulwarkes, againſt all the force and furie of Artillerie, is ſuch, as that no citie may worthily bee compared, much leſſe preferred before the ſame. It is wonderfully ſtored with all kind of weapons and warrelike prouiſion: we haue layed vp plentie of wine, fleſh, and corne, in vaults, ſo that neither wet weather nor wormes can attaint the ſame: of wood and wholeſome water not to be taken from vs, things neceſſarie for men beſieged we haue plentie, and able men ynow for the defence of the citie. All which things promiſe vnto vs aſſured victorie, and ſuch end of the warre as we wiſh for. Beſides this, Neceſſitie, which giueth courage euen vnto cowards, will enforce vs to fight. Yet ſtandeth on our ſide true Religion, Faith, Conſcience, Deuotion, Conſtancie, the loue of our Countrey, the loue of our Libertie, the loue of our Parents, Wiues, Children, and whatſoeuer elſe we hold deare: Whereas they bring with them the proud command of their captaines, Infidelitie, Impietie, Inconſtancie, a wicked deſire of your bondage, of your bloud, and the bloud of your parents, wiues, and children. Out of doubt (beloued citizens) our good God will not ſuffer ſo many good vertues to be ouercome by their foule vices. Wherefore be you in minds quiet and ſecure, and trouble not your ſelues with forboding feare of your enemies; onely continue in the fidelitie and loyaltie which you haue alwaies kept inuiolate and vnſpotted toward this ſacred and honourable fellowſhip, in moſt dangerous warres, and hardeſt chances of fortune: and if need ſhall ſo require, with couragious hand ſhew your valour againſt your enemies, and make it knowne vnto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and Engliſh, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkiſh pride, and to auert their fleets and armies from Italie, which they haue ſo many yeares threatned with fire

A and ſword: and will no doubt thither with all ſpeed haſten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth to ſpeake) they ſhould here preuaile. Neither will his ambitious youth, in courage, falſhood, and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitate him in that, that hauing ouerthrowne the Romans in the great battell at Cannas, knew not to vſe his victorie: but he will preſently with more than Cæſars celeritie, bring forth the treaſures his father got in Egypt, and with great fleets and huge armies inuade Apulia, Calabria, and Scicilia: from whence he will foorthwith breake into France, and afterwards into Spaine, and other Chriſtian Countries, raging through them with all kind of crueltie. But I am carried away further than I purpoſed, and then need is; For your fidelitie and valour (moſt worthie citizens) to endure the ſiege, and repulſe the enemie, is ſuch, as needeth not my perſuaſion; and of greater reſolution, than that it can be ſhaken with the dangers incident to men beſieged: yet the grea- B teſt and moſt forcible miſeries of all, which is hunger and thirſt, I aſſure you, you ſhall neuer feele; which pinching calamities for all that, ſome people (in faithfulneſſe, courage, and valour nothing comparable to you) haue neuertheleſſe moſt conſtantly endured. For they of Petelinum, beſieged by the Carthaginenſians, for want of victuall, thruſt their parents and children out of the citie, the longer to hold out the ſiege, and liued themſelues with hides and leather ſod or broyled, and leaues of trees, and many other homely things, by the ſpace of eleuen moneths: and could not be ouercome vntill they wanted ſtrength longer to ſtand vpon the wals, & to hold their weapons in their hands. They of Caſilinum, beſieged by Hannibal, held out vntill a poore mouſe was ſold for much money. You muſt of neceſſitie keepe watch and ward in your Stations; if your houſes chance to be beaten downe with the enemies artillerie, you muſt haue patience: for why, they ſhall be repaired againe, and it is not a matter of ſuch C importance, that we ſhould therefore yeeld vnto our enemies, in whoſe courteſie and fidelity no aſſurance is to be repoſed. For beſides that he is by nature cruell and vnfaithfull, he can by no meanes be gentle and faithfull towards vs, which haue done him ſo much harme, who onely (as he himſelfe ſaith) haue oftentimes to his griefe interrupted the courſe of the victories of him the conqueror both of ſea and land; whom he hath ſo many times aſſailed by open force with all his ſtrength, wit, craft, deceit, and pollicie: yet alwaies hitherto in vaine, Almighty God ſtill protecting vs, whom aboue all things (moſt deare citizens) I wiſh you to ſerue and call vpon, for except he keepe and defend the city, the watchmen do but watch in vaine.

This cheerfull ſpeech wonderfully encouraged the hearers, eſpecially the vulgar ſort, eaſily carried away with pleaſing words. But whileſt they in their iolitie dreame of nothing but D of triumph and victorie, the wiſer ſort poſſeſſed with care, ceaſed not to do what in them lay, to procure, That the good commonly forewiſhed, might in fine come to effect. Among others Clement Biſhop of the Greekes, a man both for his place and deuout manner of liuing had in great reputation amongſt them, laboured earneſtly by dayly exhortations, to perſuade the Greekes his countriemen in that great and common danger with heart and hand to ioin with the Latines in defence of the citie: for although the gouernment was altogether in the Great Maſter and his Knights, which were Latines, yet the people both of the Iſland and citie were for moſt part Greekes, who liked not altogether ſo well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did many times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time ſo ordered by the E good perſuaſion of the Biſhop, & good gouernment of the Great Maſter, that they all agreed as one man to ſpend their liues in defence of the citie; and were ſo far from feare of the comming of the barbarous enemie, that many of the vulgar people, in whom appeareth commonly more heat than wit, wiſhed rather for his comming than otherwiſe. But looke what they had fondly wiſhed, proued afterward to their coſts ouer true. For within a few nights after, the Turks by fire made in the night time vpon the maine, gaue ſigne of parley vnto the Rhodians. Whereupon a gallie well appointed, with a long boat, was preſently ſent forth to ſee what the matter was: which drawing neere vnto the ſhore, was hailed by a Turke, accompanied with a troupe of horſemen, deſiring the captaine of the gallie to ſend ſome on ſhore, with whom they might more conueniently parley: which thing the captaine refuſing, What, ſaid the Turke, art thou afraid of Xaycus fortune? to whom the captain in threatning manner anſwered againe, Xaycus whom you haue contrary to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I truſt not; but if you haue any thing to ſay let me heare it, or els get you further off, otherwiſe I will ſpeake to you by the mouth of the cannon. Then one of the Turkes comming to the water ſide, laid downe letters vpon a ſtone, ſaying, that in them was contained that they had in charge: which ſaid, he preſently ſet ſpurs to his horſe, G and departed with the reſt of his companie. The captaine ſending out his long boat for theſe Letters, found them directed in this ſort:

Solyman, by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, moſt mightie Emperour of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, &c. vnto the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to his knights, and all his people in generall.

The purport of which Letter was as followeth:

Solymans threatening letters to the Rhodians.

The compaſſion I haue of my diſtreſſed ſubiects, and the great iniurie you doe me, hath mooued me to wrath. Wherefore I command you without delay to yeeld vnto me the Iſland and citie of the Rhodes, H willingly and charitably graunting you leaue ſafely to depart with all your riches, or to tarrie if you ſo pleaſe vnder my obeiſance, your libertie and religion in no part infringed with any tribute or impoſition. If you be wiſe, preferre friendſhip and peace before bloudie warre: for vnto them which are by force ſubdued, are reſerued all extremities which the miſerable vanquiſhed vſe to ſuffer of the angrie conqueror: from which neither your owne force, nor forreine aid, nor huge wals, which I will vtterly ouerthrow, ſhall be able to defend you. Fare you well. All which ſhal aſſuredly be performed, if you ſhall make choice rather of my friendſhip, then of my force: wherein you ſhall neither be deceiued nor circumuented. I take to witneſſe God the Creator of heauen and earth, the foure writers of the Euangelicall hiſtorie, the fourſcore thouſand Prophets deſcended from heauen, and amongſt them our higheſt Prophet Mahomet, the reuerend ghoſts of my father and grandfather, and this my ſacred and imperiall head. From I our pallace at Conſtantinople.

When theſe letters were openly read in the counſell chamber at the Rhodes, ſome were of opinion, That it was good to anſwer the Turkiſh tyrant roundly, therby to giue him to vnderſtand that they were not afraid of his threats: otherſome thought it no wiſedome with hard words to prouoke ſo great an enemie to further diſpleaſure. Thus whilſt euery man would haue framed an anſwer according to his owne diſpoſition, in concluſion it was agreed vpon, to giue him no anſwer at all.

The ſame day thoſe letters came to the Rhodes, which was the fourteenth day of Iune, one K of the Turks great commanders at ſea with thirty gallies, the forerunners of the Turkiſh fleet, arriued at the Iſland of Chos, famous in antient time for the birth of Hippocrates the great phyſition, and the wonderfull picture of Venus left there vnperfect by Apelles, which for the excellencie thereof neuer man durſt afterward take in hand to perfect: which fruitfull and pleaſant Iſland was then at the arriuall of the Turks, part of the dominion of the Rhodes. The Admiral of this fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the corne which was then almoſt ripe, with the countrie villages round about. With which iniurie, Preianes Gouernour of the Iſland (a man of great courage and valor) moued, with a choſen companie of footmen, and certain troups of horſemen, ſuddenly ſet vpon the Turkes, in diuers places diſperſed abroad far into the countrie, with ſuch a terrible crie of the countrie people, and inſtruments of war, L that the Turks being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had bin mad, and were many of them ſlaine without reſiſtance; and had not the gallies lien neere the ſhore, to receiue them that were able to flie thither, there had not one of them which landed eſcaped the hands of the Iſland people. The Turks hauing receiued this loſſe, left the Iſland, and put to ſea againe.

The Rhodians for feare of the Turkes deſtroy their ſuburbes and places of pleaſure without the citie.

The Rhodians for the moſt part now aſſured and out of doubt of the comming of the Turks, by the perſwaſion of Gabriel Pomeralus vicemaſter, and other men of great experience, pluckt downe the ſuburbes of the city, & laid them euen with the ground, their pleaſant orchards alſo & gardens neere to the citie, they vtterly deſtroied; the great maſter for example ſake beginning firſt with his owne, being a place of great delicacie, lying vnder the wals neere M to the French Bulwarke: & taking into the city all ſuch things as they thought needful for the induring of the ſiege, they vtterly deſtroied al the reſt, were it neuer ſo pleaſant or commodious, within a mile of the town, leauing all that ſpace as euen and as bare as they could poſſibly make it, to the intent, that the enemy at his comming ſhould find nothing neere the city wherof to make vſe. But whilſt the pleaſures & delights of the ſuburbs are thus in defacing, another

A more heauie and wofull ſight preſented vnto the eies of the citizens, filled the city with greater mourning and penſiueneſſe than did the comming of the enemy. The miſerable multitude of the poore countrey people, ſome bringing wood, ſome corne, ſome cattell, ſome foules, and other ſuch neceſſaries as they had out of the countrey into the city (for ſo the Great Maſter had commanded) after whom followed great numbers of women and children weeping, with diſchiueled haire, ſcratching their faces and tearing themſelues after the manner of the countrie, wringing their hands, and caſting vp their eies to heauen, beſeeching God with heauie countenance and flouds of teares to defend the noble citie of the Rhodes, and themſelues from the fury of their enemies. Which multitude of country people with their prouiſion being packt vp into narrow roomes in the houſes of the citizens, and their cattell ſtaruing for B want of fodder, afterwards corrupted the aire; whereof inſued rotten agues and the flix, during the time of the ſiege. But after the city was giuen vp, ſuch a plague and mortalitie followed, as deſtroied great numbers of the Turkes and poore Chriſtians, which knowing not whether to go, choſe rather there to die, than to forſake their natiue country.

The Generall of the Turkiſh fleet which landed in the Iſland of Chos, and was of purpoſe ſent by Solyman to prouoke the Rhodians to battell at ſea; before he with his whole power came to beſiege the Iſland, came daily with twentie gallies halfe thoſe narrow ſeas ouer, betwixt Lycia and the Rhodes, leauing the reſt of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontorie called Gnidum (not far from the citie of Rhodes) readie to aid him as need ſhould require: this manner of brauerie he vſed many daies together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians C out of their hauen to giue him battell; knowing, that if he ſhould therein obtaine the victorie, it were at that time little leſſe than the taking of the citie, or if hee could by cruell fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, hee ſhould therein doe his maſter good ſeruice, and greatly further his victorie by diminiſhing the number of the defendants. When he had madaies without intermiſſion in this proud manner come halfe ſeas ouer, and ſometimes paſſing further came and lay at the mouth of the hauen, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be ſo braued at their owne doores, moued with the intollerable inſolencie of this proud Turke, by their continuall importunitie cauſed the Great Maſter to call a counſell, to conſider whether they ſhould fight with this fleet of the Turks or not. The counſellors by the appointment of the Great Maſter aſſembled: the Chancellor, a man of great authori- D tie and ſpirit, famous for his noble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turks was to be fought withall, ſaid:

The Chancellor his ſpeech perſuading the Rhodians to fight with the Turkes gallies

So great diſgrace was not longer to be ſuffered, but preſently reuenged: For (ſaid he) the hugie fleet of the Turkes, I doe not ſay at whoſe force and ſight, but at whoſe very name many men doe tremble and quake (which for all that is vnto vs no great noueltie, for euery yeare we heare of the like) is as a head to be ioyned vnto theſe pyraticall gallies, as members; and then will it be moſt expedient (which will be a moſt eaſie thing for vs to doe, hauing the better both for ſtrength of ſhipping and number and valour of men) to giue that great head ſuch a blow and wound, by cutting off theſe limbes, that it ſhall euer after ſtagger and faint for want of ſtrength: or elſe there is no other fleet at all prepared againſt vs to follow this, and then this diſcomfited we ſhall be at quiet. Which thing in my iudgement (though others which feare their owne ſhadowes and the falling of heauen, ſay otherwiſe) is moſt like to be true: for the great Turke is not ſo ſottiſh to come hither, the fitteſt time of the yeare being ſo farre ſpent, in the latter end of Iune, to beſiege this citie, and ſuch a citie as hee knoweth to bee moſt ſtrong, wanting nothing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant ſouldiers, from whence his anceſtours haue beene with loſſe and ſhame repulſed: when as the remainder of the Sommer will bee ſpent before he can encampe himſelfe and place his batteries; and Winter time as you know is vnfit for euery ſiege, eſpecially in this Iſland, wherein they can find no hauen or harbour to reſt in. Wherefore on God his name let vs ſet vpon our proud enemies: and let vs not for a few threatening words ſent vnto vs from a fearefull youth, vpon a fineneſſe and policie leſt we ſhould follow the tayle of his fleet bound for ſome other place, ſit ſtill like cowards within our wals with our hands in our boſomes, as men which for feare and dread durſt not ſhew their heads. Which our cowardiſe and want of courage we forſooth call Fabius his policie: But I would to God we were like Fabius, but I feare we ſhall proue more like Antiochus, the Ætolians, the Vitellians, all whoſe courage conſiſted in words, vainly hoping to gaine the victorie by ſitting ſtill and wiſhing well. But the helpe of God is not to be gotten with womens prayers and ſupplications or theſe faint-hearted polices, which cowards call aduiſed counſell . but victorie is gained by aduenturing and expoſing our ſelues to danger and perill.

With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he ſo moued the multitude , which commonly conceiueth moſt courage vpon the greateſt vncertainties, that they deſired that they might fight; ſaying, That they would waſh away that foule diſgrace with the bloud and ſlaughter of their enemies: for why, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they ſaid) to do it withall.

For all this, the grauer ſort of the counſel (without whoſe conſent the maſter might in ſuch caſes doe nothing) thought it not good in ſo dangerous a time to aduenture any great part of their forces, which they ſhould afterwards want for the defence of their city. The Turkiſh Generall deceiued of his expectation, and perceiuing that the Rhodians would not be drawne forth to battel at ſea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called Villanoua; where caſting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the corne all thereabouts which was now almoſt ripe, but forſaken of the people as a thing deſperat: as for the people themſelues, they were all fled, and had retired themſelues either into the citie of the Rhodes, or elſe into ſtrong caſtles in other places of the Iſland.

At the ſame time certain troupes of horſemen ſent forth to haue skirmiſhed with the Turks that were burning of the corne, were by a meſſenger ſent from the Great Maſter, commanded to retire: for the prouident Generall ſought by all meanes to reſerue his ſoldiers for greater dangers, which he juſtly feared in the expected ſiege: during which time he ſhewed himſelf a moſt politicke captaine and braue ſoldier, he would many times by day eat his meat with his ſoldiers, as one of them, & moſt part of the night keep watch himſelfe, walking vp and down, reſting himſelfe when hee was wearie vpon ſome ſtone or piece of timber, or other homely ſeat, as it chanced. In time of aſſault he was alwaies more forward and aduenturous than the graue counſellors wiſhed, fearing neither ſhot nor enemie: yet did he alwaies more commend diſcreet counſell grounded vpon reaſon, than proſperous actions commended but by their euents. And that which a man would wonder at, amongſt ſo many cares in middeſt of ſuch diuers & dangerous chances, he carried alwaies ſuch a grace and maieſty in his cheerful countenance, as made him to be of the beholders both reuerenced and loued. All the time he could ſpare from the neceſſarie cares of his weighty charge, from aſſaults, & the naturall refreſhing of his body, he beſtowed in praier & ſeruing of God; hee oftentimes ſpent the greateſt part of the night in the church alone praying, his head piece, gorget, & gantlets lying by him: ſo that it was often ſaid, that his deuout prayers and carefulneſſe would make the city inuincible.

The 26 day of Iune early in the morning, newes was brought into the citie from the watch tower ſtanding vpon S. Stephens hill about a mile from the citie, That a moſt hugie fleet was deſcried at ſea, making thitherwards all alongſt the Weſterne coaſt of Lycia. This bad newes much troubled the city, although it was not of moſt men vnexpected; all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, euery man meaſured the greatneſſe of the danger by the meaſure of his owne feare, & ſuch a pittiful crie was in euery place as is vſuall in cities preſently to bee beſieged. Hereupon publicke praiers were made through all the citie, and euery man with great deuotion beſought the God of heauen, That as it was his pleaſure that the Rhodians ſhould at that time bee the champions of the Chriſtian religion, ſo hee would giue them ſtrength & victorie againſt their enemies, and to turne the calamities of war vpon the enemies of his Name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the city were ſhut vp, & people from al places ran vnto the wals, great flocks of women, children, and aged men not able to ſtand without a ſtaffe going forth of their houſes to gaze vpon the dreadfull fleet (wherein was aboue 200 ſailes as is reporred) filled the ſtreets, the tops of the hie towers & houſes. The formoſt of the fleet was the Admiral of Calipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his nauie, & to aſſaile the city by ſea: the Rearadmirall was Cara Mahometes an arch pirat, who was afterwards ſlain with a great ſhot out of the citie. The Viceadmirall in the middle of the fleet with a great ſquadron of gallies, hauing a faire Weſternly wind, ſtrucke ſaile directly before the mouth of the hauen (which was on both ſides defended with two ſtrong towers wel furniſhed with great artillerie) & began to row toward the city: wherupon an alarum was raiſed, the trumpets ſounded, & many haſted vnto the bulwarke which defended the left ſide of the hauen, which the enemy ſeemed to direct his courſe vnto; & was indeed more ſubiect to danger than

But the Turke ſeeing himſelfe in danger to be ſunke with ſhot from the bulwarke, was glad to get himſelfe further off vnto the reſt of the fleet: the Rhodians from the wals with loud outcries ſcornfully deriding him for his fooliſh attempt. This great fleet in exceeding brauerie and triumph paſſing by the citie in ſight of the Rhodians (ſtanding vpon the wals with enſignes diſplaied) did not more terrifie them, than they were themſelues terrified to behold the ſtrength of the citie, and cheerfulneſſe of the defendants. But paſſing on, they came to the promontorie which the inhabitants call Bo, about three milies diſtant from the city, Eaſtward. Which ſmall harbor being not able to receiue ſo great a fleet, many of the gallies were inforced to ride it out at ſea, where they were by ſhot out of the citie oftentimes indangered & inforced to get them further off. Whilſt the enemy was there landing his great B ordnance & other inſtruments of war prepared for the ſiege, chuſing a place for his camp, tranſporting his land ſouldiers from the maine into the Iſland, viewing the ſtrength and ſcituation of the citie, and in what place he might with moſt eaſe aſſault the ſame: the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle, but ſunke diuers deepe ſounds in many places of the citie neere vnto the wals, to diſcouer the enemies mines; and fortified their bulwarkes with greater rampiers; in which work euery man put too his helping hand without reſpect of age or calling. The Grand Maſter about that time ſent Lodouicus Andugus one of the knights of the Order, into Spaine to Charles the Emperor; & Claudius Ducenuillus another of the Order alſo, to Rome to the Cardinals, & Italian Knights of the Order; and from thence into France vnto the French king with letters: crauing the aid of theſe Chriſtian princes, for reliefe of the city, by ſea & land C beſieged. But all in vain, for they caried away with the endleſſe grudge of one againſt another, or reſpecting only their own ſtates, returned the embaſſadors with good words, but no reliefe.

At this time Preianes Gouernor of Chios (of whom we haue before ſpoken) a man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent ſoldier both by ſea and land, valiant & thereto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought vp in the wars from his childhood; when hee had by the ſpace of two or three daies hid himſelfe in the rockes at ſea, for feare of the Turks great fleet, came by night in a ſmall pinnaſſe to the Rhodes, hauing deceiued the Turks watch: at whoſe comming the Rhodians wonderfully reioyced, for the ſoldiers repoſed greater confidence in no man, than in him: and if any great exploit were to be don, him the Maſter truſted aboue any other: he alwaies in armes during the ſiege, incouraged the ſouldiers, ſear- D ched the watch, ſuruaied the bulwarks, repaired the breaches, & ſuch labors as others accounted extream miſeries, he cheerfully indured, as if they had bin but his pleaſures and recreations. At the ſame time alſo, Gabriel Martiningus of Brixia, a moſt skilfull enginier, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whoſe induſtrie and cunning, 55 mines which the Turkes did with infinit labor and charge make (by reaſon of the ſpringing of the water, and hardneſſe of the rockes) during the ſiege, were all by countermines diſappointed and defeated.

The citie of the Rhodes is ſcituate on a plaine ground, on euery ſide to be beſieged, onely Northward it is defended with a goodly hauen, from whence it lyeth all Weſtward: betwixt it and the hils round about it, lieth a ſtony plain ground, not verie broad, but of greater length; theſe hils are ful of ſprings, and orchards planted with Oliues, Fig-trees, Vines, and ſuch other fruits as ſuch drie and ſandie ground will beare. But what by nature wanted, was by the hand and induſtrie of man ſupplied; for it was compaſſed about with a moſt ſtrong double wall, and deepe trenches, threatening the enemie with thirteene ſtately towers: and ſure againſt all aſſaults, with fiue mightie bulwarks: with diuers goodly faire gates: and that which was the greateſt defence of all, within the citie was alwaies kept a moſt exact and ſtrait form of warlike diſcipline. A Turkiſh woman ſlaue, conſpireth to fire the citie.

The enemie was not buſier without the citie in placing his batterie, but traiterous minds were as buſie within to haue betraied the ſame. A Turkiſh woman, ſlaue to one of the rich citizens, had conſpired with certaine other her complices, at ſuch time as the Turks ſhould giue aſſault vnto the towne, at one inſtant to ſet on fire the houſes wherein they dwelt in diuers places of the citie, that the defendants drawne from the wals to quench the fire, the Turkes in the meane time might the more eaſily enter. But this treaſon was in good time reuealed, and the offenders worthily executed.

The painfulneſſe of the Turkes pioners.

The Turks deceiued by the Chriſtian mariners.

The Turks had not as yet placed their batterie, when as they tooke a certaine hill, whereon ſtood the church dedicated to Coſmus and Damianus, directly ouer againſt the Engliſh ſtation: from thence (as it ſeemed, rather for exerciſing of their ſoldiers than for any great harm they could do ſo far off) they began with ſmall battering pieces to ſhoot into the citie: and afterwards they began to dig mines, and to caſt vp trenches: for the performance of which kind of worke, and for the filling vp of the towne ditches, they had brought with them fiftie thouſand pioners, men better acquainted with country labor and keeping of cattell, than with wars; which being inforced vnto their labor day and night, ſomtime with ſtripes and ſomtime with death, did with incredible celeritie bring that to paſſe, which was before thought impoſſible. They cut waies through the moſt hard ſtony rocks, raiſing the plains as hie as mountains, with earth brought two miles off, and laying the mountains euen with the plaines, & yet they neuer wrought in ſafetie, but were miſerably rent in ſunder with the great ordnance out of the towne: and that which moſt of all troubled them, the Rhodians ſallying out vpon thoſe ouer-labored people, hauing neither courage nor skil to defend themſelues, but truſting only to their heeles, ſlew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others alſo appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their feare) fiercely purſued & ſlew down-right. And when many others iſſuing out of the campe in great companies, thought to haue relieued their fellowes, the great ordnance before of purpoſe placed to moſt aduantage, ſo thundred from the wals among the thickeſt of them, that the ground lay couered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turks. With which manner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enemy, the Turks for their more ſafety wrought moſt vpon their mounts by night, keeping moſt ſtrong watch for defence of their pioners, which for more aſſurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their artillerie againſt the places which the Rhodians vſed to ſallie out at: which did not ſo much keep them in, as the feare of weakning themſelues by often ſallies, knowing that one man was vnto them a greater loſſe, than vnto the enemie an hundred. Amongſt others which in the beginning of this great ſiege forced the vttermoſt of their deuices to the deſtruction of the Turks, were certain mariners, who hauing the Turkiſh language perfectly, by leaue of the Graund Maſter (diſguiſing themſelues in the habit of Turkes) departed by night out of the hauen in a ſmall boat, loaded with apples, plums, peares, millons, grapes, & ſuch other fruits as the time of the yeare afforded; and in the darkneſſe came along the coaſt, vnto that part of the Iſland wherunto the paſſage was out of the main. There as if they had bin Turks come from the maine, they landed their commodities, which the Turkiſh ſoldiers bought greedily. When they had thus ſold their fruits, and in ſelling therof diligently noted the ſpeech and talke of the ſoldiers concerning the ſiege, and were now readie to depart, certaine Turks which greatly diſliked the hard beginning of this ſiege, ſeeing themſelues if they did but ſtir, in danger to be ſet off with ſhot out of the towne, earneſtly requeſted the mariners to take them with them into the maine: which to doe, at the firſt the marriners diſſembling, refuſed, as a thing dangerous; & beſides that, their boat was too little to receiue ſo many as would willingly haue gone with them. Yet with much adoe, they ſuffred themſelues to be intreated to take in ſeuen or eight, ſuch a number as they could wel maſter; who in hope of paſſing ouer into the maine, were (contrary to their expectation) brought priſoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Preianes brought vp to the top of the higheſt tower of S. Iohns church, from whence they might ſee all about the country, and well deſcrie all the maner of the Turks camp, which they ſimplie diſcouered vnto the captain, and whatſoeuer els they were demanded: and amongſt other things confeſſed, that the ſouldiers were greatly diſcontented with the ſiege, hauing in the beginning thereof loſt ſo many men, and that they were readie to riſe in mutinie againſt their captaines, and would hardly by them

A be commanded out of their trenches and cabbins, ſaying, that all they did was but loſt labour; and that they ſhould find it another peece of worke to win the Rhodes, than they had at Belgrade: wherefore if they were wiſe, they ſhould in time depart before they had receiued further harme both from the enemie, and for want of neceſſaries, wherewith the ſouldiers began alreadie to be pinched. Al which was then ſuppoſed to haue bin ſpoken by the captiues to pleaſe him in whoſe power they now were: yet it appeared afterwards to be all true. For Pyrrhus Baſſa conſidering the troubled ſtate of the camp, & the general diſcontentment of the ſoldiers, whom he was at that time gladder to pleaſe than to puniſh, writ vnto Solyman at Conſtantinople, That if he would the ſiege ſhould goe forward, he ſhould without delay come in perſon himſelfe to the campe, for that the ſouldiers without regard of ſhame were ready to B riſe in mutinie and to abandon the ſiege, refuſing to be commanded by their captaines.

In the meane time whileſt Solyman prepareth himſelfe to ſet forward, the Turkiſh captaines vnderſtood by certaine fugitiues (whereof in all wars ſome are to be found) that the high ſteeple of S. Iohns church ſerued them of the towne for a watch tower: for which cauſe, and for deſpight of the Croſſe ſtanding vpon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continuall ſhot to beat downe that tower; which whileſt they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himſelfe came into the campe the 28 day of Auguſt in the afternoone: where finding in his armie all the ſignes of cowardiſe and feare that could be ſpoken of or deuiſed, and nothing done according to the command of ſuch as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order, he tooke more griefe to ſee that great diſorder, than he did pleaſure C and good hope of two hundred thouſand ſouldiers which were in his armie. Yet, for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, againſt his owne people as well as the Rhodians, he moderated himſelfe betwixt his owne rage and the offence of his ſouldiers, and calling them together, cauſed them to be diſarmed, not leauing among them ſo much as a ſword: and compaſſing them in with fifteene thouſand harquebuſiers whom hee had brought with him well appointed, hee ſtept vp into his royall ſeat, there ſet on high for that purpoſe; where ſitting downe, he pauſed a good while without any word ſpeaking, as if he had conſidered with himſelfe, whether he ſhould onely puniſh the authors of the mutinie, or elſe with the puniſhment of many to reuenge ſo foule a ſedition, little differing from open rebellion. But following of himſelfe the milder reſolution, he thought it ſufficient to correct D the multitude and common ſort of ſouldiers with ſharpe and bitter words: and after generall ſilence made, brake out into this chollericke ſpeech.

Solyman commeth into the campe.

Slaues (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you ſouldiers, What kind of men are you now become? are you Turkes? men woont both to fight and ouercome? Verily I ſee the bodies, countenances, attire, and habit of my ſouldiers; but the deeds, ſpeeches, counſels and deuices of cowardly and vile traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceiued mee? that Turkiſh force and courage is gone, the valour and ſtrength both of bodies and mindes, wherewith the Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Egyptians, Seruians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirotes, Macedonians and Thracians were ſubdued, is loſt: forgetting your countrey, your oath, the command of your captaines, your obedience, and all other warlike E diſcipline; you haue againſt the Maieſtie of my Empire refuſed to fight, like cowards betaken your ſelues to flight, for vaine feare of death and danger, not beſeeming men of warre. If any man ſhould at home but haue named the Rhodes in your feaſts, amongſt your pots, in your aſſemblies or great meetings, you could then with your tongues bragge to pull it downe, you had much adoe to hold your hands: here, when I would make proofe of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps, that the Rhodians ſo ſoone as they ſaw your enſignes before their gates, would ſtraight way yeeld themſelues and their Citie into your power: Let all men ceaſe ſo to ſay or thinke, and beleeue me that know the truth, This baſe and infamous denne (which you ſee) is full of moſt cruell beaſts, whoſe madeſſe you ſhall neuer tame, without much labour and bloudſhed. Yet ſhall wee tame them; for why nothing is ſo wild but at length it may be tamed; which except I bring to paſſe, I am fully F reſolued and haue vowed vnto my ſelfe, Either heere to die, or ſpend my daies; And if euer I doe or ſay otherwiſe, let this my head, my fleete, mine armie, and Empire, bee for euer accurſed and vnfortunate.

Solymans chollerick Oration to his ſouldiers.

And ſo without further ſpeech, deſiring rather to be accounted of his ſoldiers gentle than ſeuere, he pardoned them all their former offences, and ſwore them all againe to his obedience. This mutiny ſo appeaſed, all things were afterwards done with better ſucceſſe, and greater care both of the ſouldiers and commanders. Firſt, they planted in diuers places twelue great bombards, wherewith they threw vp ſtones of hugie weight into the ayre, which falling downe into the citie, might breake downe the houſes and whatſoeuer elſe they lighted vpon: with the fall of one of theſe, the Great Maſter was like to haue bin ſlaine. Howbeit this proued a deuiſe of more terror than danger, for with 200 ſuch ſhot were but ten men ſlaine; which thing amongſt others, Apella a traiterous fugitiue declared vnto the enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himſelfe confeſſed being taken vpon ſuſpition and examined: for which his treaſon he was juſtly executed.

The Turks batterie.

The force of the batterie was more feared, wherein the Turks had planted fortie great pieces of batterie, and amongſt them twelue Baſiliskes (ſo aptly named of the ſerpent Baſiliſcus, who as Plinie writeth, killeth man or beaſt with his ſight) with theſe pieces the Turks battered the wals continually, but lying ſomewhat far off, did no great harme.

At the ſame time alſo Solyman cauſed batterie to be laid againſt the tower of S. Nicholas, ſtanding vpon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the ſea, defending the hauen vpon the right hand, where ſometime ſtood the great Coloſſus of the Sun, accounted the greateſt amongſt the ſeuen wonders of the world. Which caſtle was both ſtrongly and ſumptuouſly built at the charges of the Dukes of Burgondie, as appeared by their armes there engrauen in many places in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a French man, who had the charge thereof, with 200 ſouldiers, amongſt whom were 30 knights of the Order.

The Turks artillerie planted againſt the tower, was by the skilfulnes of the Chriſtian canoniers in ſhort time diſmounted with ſhot from the tower, and many of the gunners ſlaine: ſo that they were glad to ſurceaſe any more to batter the tower by day, but lying ſtill all the day they began to batter the ſame by night, wherein they preuailed no more than they had before done in the day time; for the defendants warily obſeruing ſuch places as were likeſt for the enemie to place his batterie in, did ſo aptly place their ordnance againſt the ſame, and to ſo good purpoſe, that the Turks ſwore, their doings were by ſome meanes diſcouered vnto the enemies. So when they had in vaine beſtowed 500 great ſhot, and made a ſmall breach which they durſt not once attempt to enter, they ſhamefully abandoned that place alſo.

Al this while Pyrrhus was buſie in working of mines to vndermine the citie, two and thirty of which mines the defendants fruſtrated with countermines; in which kind of worke many were loſt on both ſides: yet for all the carefulneſſe of the Chriſtians, the Engliſh bulwarke, was vndermined by the enemie, & vpon the fourth of September part thereof blown vp, with ſuch violence, that vnto them in the city it ſeemed at the firſt to be a generall earthquake; and therewith diuers Engliſh men were there ouerwhelmed. The Turks attempting preſently to enter, were by the Grand Maſter and his followers with great ſlaughter repulſed.

But Muſtapha the Baſſa comming on with freſh ſupplies, and crying out of the cowardiſe of them which retired, renewed the aſſault: where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe & cruell fight, the leaders cheerfully encouraging their ſoldiers, and they likewiſe doing what was poſſible for men to doe. All mens eares were filled with the thundering of the ſhot, noiſe of trumpets and drums, and crying of men. And vnto the Turks it ſeemed that ouer their heads it rained deadly ſhot, ſtones, and fire: for the townſmen and women mingled with the ſoldiers caſt downe vpon the Turks, fire, ſtones, timber, and whatſoeuer els came to hand: ſo that they vnable longer to indure the courage and force of the Chriſtians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any ſigne of retreat, euery man ſeeking to ſaue one: among whom as they fled, the great ordnance ſhot off from the wals made wonderfull ſlaughter. At this aſſault of the Turks were ſlaine (as ſome write) almoſt 2000, and among them the maſter of the Turks ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victorie the Chriſtians gained not without ſome loſſe; for beſides ſome few others that were ſlaine, fiftie knights of the Order (men worthie of eternall memorie) there ended their daies alſo.

The Turks aſſault the Engliſh bulwarke the ſecond time, and are againe repulſed.

The fift day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the perſuaſion of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, commanded a freſh aſſault to be giuen to the Engliſh Bulwarke, which was attempted by the Turkes with greater reſolution than the firſt. Seuen enſignes of the Turks were broken in by the ruins of the bulwarke, & had inforced the defendants, oppreſſed

A with number to giue ground, when the Graund Maſter comming in with the enſigne of the Order,guarded with a companie of moſt valiant knights, draue them out againe by force, and made good the place. Muſtapha ſeeing his men retire, couragiouſly reſtored the battell by bringing on of new ſupplie,and other captains with threats, ſtrokes,and terrour of death, enforced the ſouldiers (who had before turned their backs)now againe to fight. So that there began a more cruell fight than had before been from the beginning of the ſiege ; which was vnto the Chriſtians more dangerous,for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh ſhot. But in that extremitie no man regarded either danger,or life,only this they remembred,That thoſe were their barbarous enemies, whom they muſt either victoriouſly ouercome,or die therefore : with which furie the aſſault was continued by the ſpace of three B houres,vntill at length Muſtapha with his Turks diſcouraged,with the loſſe of 2000 of their fellowes,and of three great noble men,whom Solyman eſpecially fauored,and ſore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers,were inforced to retire. Few of the Chriſtians in reſpect of ſo many enemies, were ſlaine : yet had the enſigne of the Order bin then loſt, Ioachimus Cluys the enſigne bearer hauing both his eies ſhot out, had not Emericus Ruiaulx an Auernois, and one of the knights of the Order, with incredible courage reſcued the ſame.

After this ſecond aſſault,falling out ſo vnluckily vnto the Turks, Muſtapha the great Baſſa began to grow in contempt with Solyman : and Pyrrhus to keepe his credit by doing ſomething, with continuall batterie of 17 great pieces, did batter the mount neere vnto the Italian bulwarke. At which time alſo Caſſius Gouernor of Bythinia, another of the Turks great commanders, C laboured by vndermining to haue ouerthrowne the French bulwarke : ſo glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and maſter. But the indeauors of Caſſius was by countermines through the careful diligence of Gabriel Chierus, hauing charge of thoſe workes, fruſtrated : and Pyrrhus in the other place after hee had by hot aſſault ſlaine them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare vpon the citie, was againe with great loſſe ſhamefully repulſed, and by the commandement of Solyman cauſed to retire. At this aſſault the Gouernor of Eubœa, Solyman his Lieutenant generall, a man of great honour (if any of the Turks ſlaues are ſo to be accounted) was ſlaine, for whoſe death Solyman was exceeding penſiue and heauie.

Muſtapha the Baſſa finding himſelf in diſgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunat aſſaults D by him giuen at the Engliſh ſtation, determined if it were poſſible by a third to recouer his loſt credit : and for his better ſucceſſe therein, agreed with Achimetes another great commander, at the ſame time to aſſault the Spaniſh bulwarke : according to this reſolution Achimetes hauing with a mine ſuddenly blowne vp a great part of the wall of the Spaniſh ſtation, in the thicke of the duſt and ſmoke, preſently entered his men, who by the ruins of the wall recouered the top of the rampiers. Muſtapha alſo at the ſame inſtant hardly charged the Engliſh, ſo that in both places was made a hard and doubtfull fight. Muſtapha, deſiring nothing more than with better ſucceſſe now to redeeme his former diſhonour, did what he might to incourage the ſoldiers, calling vpon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodians on the other ſide mindfull of their former honour, with the E greatneſſe of the preſent danger, valiantly repulſed the enemie, and forced him with ſhame to retire. In this aſſault many Engliſhmen were ſlaine, and Preianes alſo ſore hurt, hauing before ſlaine many of the Turks. Muſtapha beſide the loſſe of his men, had alſo two of his enſignes taken by Chriſtopherus Vauldericke, Commendator of the German knights. Achimetes hauing won the top of the wals, had there ſet vp the Turkiſh enſignes ; but by the valiantnes of the defendants, & by means of certain ſmall pieces of ordnance, by Martiningus aptly placed in the houſes before the new made breach, and by force of ſhot out of the flankers on both ſides of the breach, wherof none fell in vaine, he was again inforced to forſake the wals and to retire.

The Engliſh bulwark aſſaulted the third time by Muſtapha.

The Turks enſignes aduan[illegible] to the top of the wals, are againe caſt downe.

The three and twentieth day of September, the Turkiſh captaines hoping by meanes of a mine which they had made againſt the Auergne bulwarke, to enter and win the citie ; appro- F ching the wals with great multitudes of ſouldiers, ready to haue entred vpon the blowing vp of the mine, which being met with a countermine out of the citie, wrought not ſuch effect as was by them expected : ſo that hauing receiued ſome harm, ſtanding in a place of great diſaduantage, and done nothing, they returned again into the camp. Yet all the expert captains probably coniecturing that the wal might be inwardly ſhaken by the mine, though it were not by them outwardly perceiued, cauſed that part of the wall to be moſt violently battered all the G reſt of that day and night following: and by the fury of their artillerie, made a faire and large breach. All that night was heard in the Turkes campe an vnwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had bin ſome great matter a doing; which the Rhodians coniecturing (as the truth was) to be a ſigne of ſome great aſſault to be ſhortly giuen.

Solyman reſoluing the next day with al his force to aſſault the new made breach, after he had by himſelfe in a melancholly mood walked vp and downe in his tent a great part of the night, ſent for the chiefe commanders of his army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth:

Your valour and wiſedome (worthie captaines) needeth not any exhortation, yet the deſperate madneſſe of our enemies maketh me to ſpeake vnto you theſe few words. Who whileſt they yet doe, as from H the beginning, as men without reaſon deſperatly defend their citie rent with our artillerie, ſhaken with our mines, their Churches and houſes beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worne out with ſlaughter, labour, and wounds, which muſt needs befall men ſo oftentimes aſſaulted, they worthily ſeeme vnto our ſouldiers men of inuincible force and courage; which opinion to haue remoued, much concerneth the happie and wiſhed ſucceſſe of our aſſault. Wherefore I would haue you with effectuall perſuaſion and bountifull promiſes to hearten on our men to the winning of this citie. Beſides this, you ſhall open vnto them my purpoſe and intent, and that they ſhould not thinke that they are brought hither to beſiege one citie; but that in taking this one, they ſhall vpon the matter make a way into all the dominions of the Chriſtians. Heere be the kinſmen, aliance, and friends of all the Kings, Princes, and Potentates I of Chriſtendome: heere is all our enemies treaſure, the ſpoile whereof promiſed vnto our ſouldiers may ſerue to great purpoſe to encourage them forward: here is the ſtore of ordnance, armour, and other warlike prouiſion which ſhall both furniſh vs, and in time to come miſerably confound the reſt of the Chriſtians. We ſhall beſide this, enioy a moſt goodly and rich citie, with a hauen of all others moſt commodious, from whence all things neceſſarie for war may at all times as occaſion ſhall require, by land and ſea be ſupplied: which as they ſhall be to vs things of great importance, ſo ſhall we deſpoile our enemies of far greater. This is their caſtle, ſtorehouſe, treaſurie, and armorie: this is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all ſuch as trouble the Turks by ſea: from hence ſhall we haue free ſcope and paſſage into Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Chriſtian countries. But as for your ſelues valiant captaines, when as I conſider how that you haue within theſe few moneths by your valour and wiſedome ſubdued vnto my Empire the ſtrong citie of Belgrade, which my great grandfather Mahomet that mightie K Emperour could not with all his power get; I reſt in great hope that theſe fierce and obſtinate Chriſtians ſhall not long be able to defend themſelues in theſe their dens and lurking places.

Hauing ended this ſpeech, the captaines euery one vnto his companie, made knowne what the great Emperors will and pleaſure was, and open proclamation made thorow all the camp, wherein the ſpoile of that rich city was all granted vnto the ſouldiers, as a prey and reward for the paines they were to take.

Solyman heauie with ſleepe and care, laied himſelfe downe vpon his pallat to take his reſt. But the Great Maſter (to whom the vnaccuſtomed ſtirre of the enemie portended ſome great matter) all that night in armes painefully viewed euery part of the citie, cheerefully encouraging his ſouldiers to remember, That they did watch for the ſafetie of their countrey, their L liues and libertie. It fortuned the ſame night, that a poore Chriſtian ſeruing a Turke in the campe, calling ſecretly vnto the watchmen vpon the wals, gaue them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to giue a generall aſſault vnto the citie. Which thing when the Great Maſter vnderſtood, becauſe he would haue nothing done raſhly or fearefully (as it commonly happeneth in things done vpon the ſudden) called together his Knights, and ſpake vnto them, as followeth.

I am glad ſacred companions and fellowes in armes, that the time is come when in one battell getting vnto your ſelues great honour, and defending your countrey, you may bee iuſtly accounted the M worthie defenders and reuengers of the Chriſtian commonweale and name. The people againſt whome wee are to fight to morrow, aſſaileth vs onely preſuming vpon their multitude: But if wee meaſure valour, not by number, but by courage and proweſſe, vndoubtedly a few reſolute men will eaſily ouercome a multitude of cowards. You know your enemie, and the manner of his fight: you are to fight

(moſt

A (moſt worthie knights) with them whom you haue alwaies vanquiſhed at ſea, and in iuſt battell ſometimes ouercome by land, at ſuch time as with their whole power they aſſaulted your wals: omitting in the meane time many hot skirmiſhes, wherein you euer put them to the worſt: Wherefore you and they in the aſſault to morrow ſhall haue ſuch courage, as conquerors and men conquered vſe to haue. Neither will they fight, becauſe they dare fight, but becauſe the great tyrant and violent command of their captaines enforceth them thereunto. Wherefore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Christian commonwealth hath conceiued of you, where you are, and what you haue taken vpon you; take vp your armes with iuſt furie and indignation, and fight againſt them, following one franticke youth, as if you ſaw your ſlaues bearing armes againſt you: whereunto you are inforced, not onely by the indignitie of the wrong by them offered, but alſo by neceſſitie, which of it ſelfe is of power to make cowards valiant and hardie. B For here we are in an Iſland from whence we cannot eſcape, and in a citie, whoſe rent and battered walls doe not ſo much protect and defend vs, as our weapons; wherefore to morrow we muſt heere either vanquiſh them, or die therefore: to morrow ſhall giue vnto vs either ioyfull victorie, or a moſt honourable death.

As he was yet thus ſpeaking, newes of approch of the enemie cauſed him to make an end: and euery man haſted with ſpeed vnto the place of his charge. The enemie comming faſt on, with a moſt horrible crie (as their manner is) fiercely aſſailed the citie in fiue places, where the Engliſh, Spaniſh, Italians, Narbonenſes, and Auergnoys had their ſtations. To the aſſault of euery of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thouſand Turkes. Muſtapha the Baſſa C calling vpon the name of his great Prophet Mahomet, and promiſing vnto the ſouldiers the rich ſpoile of the citie, fiercely aſſailed the Engliſh ſtation, from whence he had beene three times before ſhamefully repulſed. Pyrrhus the other great Baſſa, with like furie aſſaulted the Italian ſtation. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight, the Turks fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their liues and libertie. Neither was there any, of what degree or order ſoeuer, which did not that day fight for the defence of the citie. The prieſts and religious were not then exempted, but fought among other ſouldiers; women, children, and with them the aged fathers, beyond the ſtrength of their bodies and courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, ſome ſtones, which they had digged out of the ſtreets, ſome burning pitchbarrels, ſome hoops with wild fire, ſome ſcalding oyle, ſome boiling pitch: D which being caſt down vpon the enemies, troubled them ſo, as nothing was more feared; for vpon whomſoeuer it fel, it ſtucke faſt, and ſo ſcalded their bodies, that they were glad to caſt down their weapons to teare off their clothes, wherewith many of them rent off the skin and fleſh alſo. All which things fel ſo thick vpon the Turks, as if it had rained fire & ſtones, beſides the deadly ſhot, which amongſt ſuch a multitude of enemies neuer fel in vain. The Great Maſter hauing a careful eye ouer euery part of the city, after he had well relieued the Italian ſtation, which was at the firſt hardly diſtreſſed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus, one of the knights of the Order, with ſuch company as he thought conuenient for the ſafety of that place, & went himſelfe with the reſt vnto the Engliſh ſtation, which was then hardly laid to by the Baſſa Muſtapha. But whileſt he was there buſied in repulſing the enemie, & had now well E relieued the place, a ſudden crie ran alongſt the wals, that the Spaniſh bulwarke was already poſſeſſed by the enemy: with which heauy news he was not a little troubled, but leauing there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the knights of the Order, with a choſen companie of ſoldiers for the defence of that place; he with his guard haſted vnto the Spaniſh ſtation, which he found by a wonderful chance already taken by the enemy. In the beginning of the aſſault, certain Turks to ſhun the danger of the ſhot, had for feare hidden themſelues at the foot of this bulwarke, among the ſtones, which had before bin beaten downe with the batterie: in the meane time, other Turkes of the ſame regiment, vnder the leading of the valiant captain Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwarke, not medling with the bulwarke it ſelfe, as a thing of greateſt ſtrength: the valiant ſoldiers appointed for the defence of the bul- F wark, ſeeing their fellows & countrymen diſtreſſed faſt by them on the right hand, could not indure to ſtand ſtil as lookers on, but left the bulwark, & went to the place ſo hardly aſſaulted: where whilſt they were valiantly incountring the enemy, the cowardly Turks who had before hid themſelues for feare, hearing al ſtill ouer their heads, & therby gueſſing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawn thence to another place more diſtreſſed, to color their feare, & proue of a great piece vnto a place more conuenient for the annoying of the enemie, had laid downe their weapons) they ſuddenly ſet vpon them, ſlew them, ouerthrew the Chriſtian enſignes, and ſo became maſters of that ſtrong fort. The Turks without ſeeing that, wonderfully commended the valor of thoſe men, and blaming themſelues of cowardiſe, made great haſt through the midſt of the towne ditch to get vp into the bulwarke to helpe their fellows.

But in going through the ditch, they were ſo cut off with ſhot on both ſides out of the flankiers, that few of them could get vp into the deſired bulwarke. And the great Maſter with a crew of valiant ſouldiers, nothing fearing the armed enemie, now in poſſeſſion of the bulwark ouer their heads, with great reſolution ſcaled the ſame. In the mean time Hugo Caponus, a Spaniard, H thus again recouered, which had bin two hours in poſſeſſion of the enemie, and the citie deliuered of a wonderfull feare, the Great Maſter (well worthie of that name) leauing a ſufficient number of ſouldiers for the keeping of that fort, went with the reſt of his companie vnto the age

A age and wiſedome, and to Muſtapha for his wiues ſake, who was the tyrants naturall ſiſter ſometime the wife of Boſtanges.

All the time of this ſiege, the Turks great fleet, furniſhed with men and all manner of war-like prouiſion, lay before the entrance of the hauen without doing any thing at all: for the Admirall being no man of warre, ſeeing the mouth of the hauen chained, and the caſtles vpon the entrance full of ordnance, and ſtrongly manned, durſt not attempt either to enter the hauen, or beſiege the caſtle: for which his cowardiſe, and for that he had negligently ſuffered prouiſion both of victuall and munition to be conueied into the citie during the time of the ſiege, to the great reliefe of the beſieged, he was by Solyman adiudged to die a moſt cruell death: but by the mediation of Achimetes, one of his beſt men of warre, the ſeueritie of B that ſentence was changed into a puniſhment, vnto any noble mind more grieuous than death it ſelfe: for he was by Solymans commandement, openly ſet vpon the poupe of the Admirall gallie, and there as a ſlaue receiued at the hands of the executioner a hundred ſtripes with a cudgell, and ſo with ſhame was thruſt out of his office.

Solyman diſplaceth his Admirall and puniſheth him as a ſlaue.

After that Solyman had in ſo many places with all his power ſo long time in vain beſieged the Rhodes, his haughtie courage began to quaile, ſo that he was vpon point to haue raiſed his ſiege and left the Iſland, yea the griefe he had conceiued, went ſo neere him, that he many times fainted and lay ſpeechleſſe, as if he had bin a dead man. The remembrance of ſo many vnfortunat aſſaults, the death of ſo many worthy captaines, the loſſe of ſo many valiant ſouldiers (ſufficient to haue ſubdued a great kingdome) ſo much grieued him, that a great while C after he ſhunned the companie of men, and would not ſuffer himſelfe to be ſpoken withall: vntill at length he was againe by Abraham his minion, a man in whom he tooke ſingular pleaſure, recomforted, and perſuaded to continue the ſiege; for that Time (as he ſaid) which worketh all things, would at length tame the fierceneſſe of his enemies, whome the ſword could not vpon the ſudden ſubdue. In the meane time Solyman for his pleaſure, and to ſhew vnto the Rhodians, that he purpoſed not to depart, began to build a ſumptuous caſtle vpon the top of the mount Philermus in the eye of the citie. During which time diuers letters were ſhot into the citie with Turkiſh arrowes out of the campe, wherein many of Solymans moſt ſecret counſels were reuealed, and the reuolt of a great man promiſed, which the Rhodians by many circumſtances gathered to haue been Muſtapha, who could not eaſily forget the iniurie ſo lately D offered vnto him by Solyman: needs it muſt be ſome of Solymans ſecret counſell, otherwiſe he could not haue reuealed ſo great ſecrets as it were out of the boſome of Solyman. But ſee the chance, at the very ſame time, tidings came vnto Solyman, that Cayerbeius the Gouernour of Ægypt, was dead: in whoſe place Solyman ſent Muſtapha to Caire as Gouernour of Ægypt, by that honourable preferment again to pleaſe his diſcontented mind, after which time no more letters came into the citie.

Solyman exceedingly grieued with the repuls and loſſe receiued at the ſiege of the Rhodes, was vpon point to haue left the ſame.

Now the Turks began to make faire wars, their terrible batterie began to grow calme, and for certaine daies it ſeemed by the manner of their proceeding, that they purpoſed rather by long ſiege than by aſſault to take the town. Neuertheleſſe the enemies watching day & night E in their trenches, vſed all the policie they could, ſometimes offering vnto the ſouldiers vpon the wals great rewards, if they would yeeld vp the citie, and ſometimes threatening them as faſt: and to breed a diſlike amongſt the defendants, they would oftentimes ſay that Solyman deſired onely to be reuenged vpon the Latins, without meaning any harm vnto the Greekes.

It was now the beginning of October, and Winter began to grow faſt on, great raine, with terrible thundring & lightening, & mightie tempeſts, heauens threats, then fel ſo aboundantly, that the Turks before wearied in bodie with labour and wounds, were now alſo in minde diſcouraged. And that more increaſed their feare, the ſea was growne ſo rough, that the Admirall was not able in that open and dangerous ſea longer to ride it out with his gallies: but was inforced to ſlip his ankers, and as he might to run his gallies on ground. In theſe troubles wherewith both Solyman himſelfe and all his armie were at furtheſt of their wits, and almoſt F quite diſcouraged, Achimetes one of his moſt valiant and expert captains came to comfort him and promiſed if he would continue the ſiege, in ſhort time to make him an open way into the citie: vpon confidence whereof, Solyman to encourage his fainting ſouldiers, now ſcarce able for cold and lacke of courage to hold their weapons in their hands, cauſed them to be aſſembled before his pauilion, where from a high place, he comforted them in this ſort:

Achimetes, promiſeth to make a way for Solyman into the citie.

Solyman comforteth his ſouldiers and perſuadeth them with patience to endure the ſiege.

I am not ignorant (moſt valiant ſouldiers) what great things you indure for mine honour, and the glorie of mine Empire. This continuall threatnings of the heauens, this immoderate raine, this terrible thunder end lightening, the coldneſſe of the weather, the want of neceſſaries, with the manifold miſeries of this long ſiege, doe much perſuade me, to giue you leaue to lay downe armes and to take your reſt. But firſt let vs conſider if vnto men of courage it be not a diſhonour, for the tedioufneſſe of raine and tempeſt, to leaue vnto our enemies the victorie alreadie in our hands, and ſhamefully to forſake our trenches, forts, mounts, ouertopping not onely the wals of the citie, but mating the heauens, with ſuch other like works made with my infinit charge and your great trauell, all for the taking of this citie. Truely this warre either ſhould not haue beene taken in hand at all, or being once begun, is to bee ended for the honour of the Othoman empire. Which for ſo much as it could not be accompliſhed in Summer; the reputation of mine empire in common, and the regard of the commoditie of euerie one of you in priuat, enforceth me to performe it in Winter. For if wee ſhall from hence depart with our armie, who doubts but the enemie, not onely for deſire of reuenge, but alſo ſtrained by neceſſitie, hauing loſt all hee had of his owne, will prey vpon your countries, houſes, and goods, and will bring you, your wiues, and children, into a farre more miſerable ſlauerie and bondage, than that wherein he himſelfe now is? Wherefore I aduiſe you to continue the ſiege, and neuer to depart before you haue attained vnto the end of your deſires. And admit there were no neceſſitie in the matter, yet the honour and fame of the action ought to impoſe vpon you a reſolution both of bodie and mind to indure the ſiege: For the eies and countenances of all nations, eſpecially the Chriſtians, are fixed vpon you; whom when they ſhall vnderſtand not to be able to indure the field one Winter, they will of right call you Summer birds, which ſo ſoone as any ſtorme ariſeth looke after your houſes and places of repoſe. It is reported, that the Grecians for a ſtrumpet beſieged Troy ten yeares; and ſhall not the Turkes, vexed and oppreſſed with ſlaughters, robberies, inuaſions both by ſea and land, and that more is with the ſeruitude of 214 yeares, endure one Winters ſiege? They will ſay, that the terror of your name is but vaine, and that fame hath encreaſed the ſame (as many other things moe) which not ſeene, are more feared in far countries amongſt men of ſmall experience: And that now euerie man may ſafely enough abide your force, which make your inuaſions rather vpon a furie and brauerie than vpon any good reſolution, which in all kind of war (but eſpecially in beſieging of cities) is moſt neceſſarie: whereof many being by naturall ſcituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaides, Famine and Thirſt, ouercome and vanquiſhed, as it ſhall doe this citie of the Rhodes: againſt which beloued in armes there is a ſecret miſchiefe prepared, which may not in this open audience be publiſhed; for it is as neceſſarie that the vulgar ſort ſhould be ignorant of ſome things, as to know the ſame.

Many thought, that this was ſpoken rather of policie than vpon any good ground: and although his hot perſuaſion had little moued the cold courage of his deſpairing ſouldiers, yet the regard of dutie in that moſt loyall nation, with the greedie expectation of ſo great a ſecret, ouercame all other difficulties; ſo that they departed (at leſtwiſe in ſhew) contented to indure whatſoeuer ſhould befall.

Achimetes winneth the Vaumures of the Auergne bulwark, raiſeth a ſtrong penthouſe againſt the wall, and ſo vndermineth the ſame.

Achimetes authour of this great expectation, and the onely hope of Solymans ſucceſſe, came oftentimes and aſſailed the Vamures of the Auergne ſtation, which although they were not verie high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike captaine dayly attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the ſame, and ſo peſſeſſed of the place he ſo much deſired, deſperatly kept it vntill greater helpe came running in, who with wonderfull expedition (with matter for that purpoſe before prepared) clapt vp a ſtrong and defenſible couering in manner of a penthouſe againſt the towne wal, betwixt the wall and the Vaumure, vnder which they ſhrowded themſelues from the defendants; which was an eaſie matter for ſuch a multitude to do, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled vp ſo high, that the defendants could not out of the flankers ſcoure the ditch, nor yet without manifeſt danger come to caſt any thing downe vpon them from the top of the wals: for the Turks harquebuſiers which lying vpon their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the citie, ſuffered none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erſt thought themſelues at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a ſudden and an vnexpected miſchiefe: which at the firſt filled the citie with feare and heauie ſilence, which ſtraightwaies after brake out into pittifull outcries and lamentations. The Turks lurking vnder their penthouſe, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig vp the foundation of

A the wall; and Preianes forward and couragious to do what might be done threw downe vpon the Turks, fire, ſcalding oyle, burning pitch, wild-fire and ſuch things. But when the miſerable men which ſhrunke from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and preſently ſlaine if they made any delay, and freſh men ſtill thruſt on in ſtead of ſuch as were hurt or ſlain: the fatall worke begun the ſeuenth day of October, went apace forward, with the great and continuall labour of theſe wretched ſlaues. A great number of the common ſouldiers whom the Turks call Aſapi was imployed in this worke: of whom Solyman in this ſiege of the Rhodes, and other his expeditions, made not much more account but as of pioners to worke in mines and to caſt vp trenches, and oftentimes with their bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to paſſe ouer vpon: they by B the conſtraint of Achimetes vndermined the wall, and as they wrought, ſhoared vp the ſame againe with timber, whereunto they afterwards ſet fire, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wal; which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not far enough vndermined it, they aſſaied with great hooks and ſtrong ropes to haue pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordnance from the Auergne bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great ſlaughter, and fruſtrated all their long labor. Achimetes thus diſappointed of his purpoſe, ſtood in great doubt whether he ſhould giue ouer the enterpriſe, for that he ſaw he laboured in vain, or elſe in that dangerous place to expect ſome better hap, the onely meane to ſaue him from the tyrants heauie diſpleaſure; who as he knew meaſured all things by the euent. Solyman vnderſtanding by Achimetes that the wall (although it was not C ouerthrown as was expected) was yet ſore ſhaken and weakned with vndermining, cauſed his batterie to be planted againſt that part of the wal ſo vndermined: which ſo many waies weakned, & now ſore battered, fell downe daily more and more. For remedie wherof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raiſe a new wall, in ſtead of that which was beaten downe.

The miſerable ſtate of the common ſoldiers of the Turks; and the ſmall account is made of them.

At the ſame time, Solyman perſuaded by the generall opinion of all his great captaines, that the citie was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to giue another generall aſſault, cauſed proclamation to be made thorow his camp: wherein he gaue the ſpoile of the citie vnto his ſouldiers, and the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto them in few words, as followeth:

Fortune at length valiant ſouldiers, hauing notably proued your courage and patience, now offereth D vnto you the worthie rewards of your labour and paines. The victorie and wealth of your enemies which you haue ſo much deſired, is now in your hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mungrell people, of whom more are ſlaine than left aliue; and they not men, but the ſhadowes and ghoſts of men, feeble and ſpent with hunger, wounds, wants and labour; who will I know reſiſt you, not becauſe they ſo dare, but becauſe of neceſſitie they ſo muſt, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now reuenge your ſelues of the faſhood, crueltie, and villanies of theſe Chriſtians, and make them a wofull example to all poſteritie, that neuer man hereafter preſume to offer iniurie to a Turke, in whatſoeuer ſtate he be. The way is already open into the citie, there is a faire breach made whereby thirtie horſemen may at once enter, nothing wanteth but courage in you to aſſaile the ſame.

Solyman encourageth his ſouldiers to a freſh aſſault.

E The ſouldiers encouraged with this ſpeech of their Emperour, made great ſhew of cheerfulneſſe, and promiſed to doe their vttermoſt deuoire, threatning vnto the Chriſtians moſt horrible death and miſerable captiuitie.

In the meane time, the great ſhot flying continually thorow the breach, did beat downe many houſes in the citie; but the countermure new built againſt the breach ſtanding vpon a lower ground, it ſeldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling houſes, the horrible noiſe of the enemie, with the thundering of the great artillerie, wonderfully terrified the miſerable citizens: in euery place was heard the lamentation of women and children, euery thing ſhewed the heauineſſe of the time, and ſeemed as altogether loſt and forlorne. The day thus troubleſomely ſpent, the night followed much more troubleſome; and F after the night, the day of aſſault of all other moſt dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, the gliſtering enſignes of the enemie were ſeene flying in the wind, and the Turks cheerfull with the hope of ſpoile and victory, haſted towards the breach with great outcries and ſongs, after their countrey manner: and there before one of the gates of the citie called S. Ambroſe gate, ſet downe a great number of their enſignes deckt with garlands, in token of victory.

The diſtreſſed eſtate of the Rhodians and their couragious reſolution therein.

Turks great fleet alſo at the ſame time ſayling too and fro before the hauen, made ſhew as if it would haue aſſailed the citie on that ſide: who had ſeen the citie ſo beſet, would haue ſaid that it would at one inſtant haue bin beſieged both by ſea and land; and to moſt mens iudgements, it ſeemed that the Rhodian ſtate ſhould that day haue taken end & bin deſtroied. Yet for al theſe extremities, the Rhodians were nothing diſcouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the onely remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vpon the alarme giuen came running out of their houſes by heaps vnto the wals, like deſperat men oppoſing their bodies in ſtead of their battered wals againſt their enemies in defence of their countrey. There needed neither exhortation nor command of captaine, euery man was vnto himſelfe a perſuader to fight valiantly in defence of the citie; and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miſerable ſeruitude, the mockes and taunts they ſhould indure, if they ſhould chance to come into the proud enemies hand: all which was to be auoided either by honorable victorie or death. The Turks conducted by Achimetes, fiercely aſſailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (ſtanding vpon the ruins of their wals valiantly defended. In the meane time the diſmaied matrons and maidens, ſome in their houſes, with heauie hearts expected the wofull deſtruction of the citie & themſelues, otherſome in the Churches with floods of tears and lamentable cries, poured forth their praiers to the Almightie, crauing his helpe in that their hard diſtreſſe, and to protect them againſt their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both ſides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the city, if they did but a little more ſtraine themſelues: & therfore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out moſt terrible outcries: and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquiſhed, for they being ſo many in number, and in a place of ſuch indifferency, had not yet preuailed: beſide that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatneſſe of the common danger, and the ſight one of anothers valor, ſo that by their inuincible courage the Turks were inforced ſhamefully to retire. The Rhodians ſeeing their enemies turne their backes, gaue a great ſhout in deriſion of them: the Turks diſdaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they ſhould with a little reſolution maintain the aſſault they had begun) ſhould be ſo derided of a handfull of men as good as already vanquiſhed, with great indignation returned again to the breach, & more furiouſly aſſailed the Rhodians than at the firſt. At which time the citie had vndoubtedly bin taken, had not they which defended the ends of the wal, yet ſtanding on both ſides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their ſhot ouerwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the breach; & others with murthring ſhot out of the flankers of the new built wal ſo cut them in ſunder, that a greater ſlaughter for the time was hardly in any place ſeen. Achimetes beholding the wonderfull ſlaughter of his ſouldiers, and that he fought with great diſaduantage and loſſe, againſt deſperat men, who reſoluing to die, feared no danger, gaue ouer the aſſault, and againe retired: leauing behind him in the breach and town ditch, the carkaſſes of fiue thouſand of his dead Turks beſides many more which afterwards died vpon the hurts there receiued.

The Turks trouble the Rhodians with continuall alarms, and by caſting vp of trenches get into the city

This aſſault was giuen vnto the town the laſt day of Nouember, a day dedicated to S. Andrew: after which time the captains of the Turkiſh army, although they diſpaired not of the victorie, yet terrified with ſo great ſlaughter of their men, reſolued with one accord no more to attempt the city with any notable aſſault; but by ſundry great trenches to be made thorow the midſt of the ruins of the wals, to get into the city; & with matoks & pickaxes to ouerthrow the new made wall and another barricado which the defendants had made within the ſame: and in the mean time whileſt this was in doing, to keepe the Rhodians ſtill buſied with continuall skirmiſhes and alarmes. This deuiſe put in execution by the wonderfull labor of ſuch a multitude of people, ſerued the enemie to greater purpoſe than all that he had before done: who daily ouerthrowing or deſtroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in ſtead of them which were before ouerthrown, and by little & little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pul down many of their houſes, therwith to make new fortifications, and to make their citie leſſe, by caſting vp of new trenches: ſo that in ſhort time they were brought to that point, that they could not wel tel which place to fortifie firſt, the enemie was now ſo far crept within them: for the ground which the enemie had thus gained within the city, was almoſt 200 paces in breadth, & 150 paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now aſſure himſelfe of the victorie, and was by nature cruell and deſirous of reuenge; yet perſuaded by Achimetes and Caſſius (two of his moſt valiant captaines) that for the inlarging of his empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemencie: commanded Pyrrhus the old Baſſa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawne to yeeld their citie vpon reaſonable conditions. Whereupon the Baſſa ſent one Hieronimus Monelia, a Genoway, vnto the wals, who crauing of the defendants ſafe conduct, ſaid he had ſomething to ſay tending to the common good of the diſtreſſed city. Al mens minds were preſently filled with expectation of ſome great matter, & he commanded to ſpeake. Who anſwered, that he might not deliuer his meſſage openly, but would either by ſpeech in ſecret, or by letters deliuer the ſame vnto one Mathias de Via his countryman, one of the citizens of the Rhodes. When Fra. Fornonius, one of the knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a chollericke diſpoſition, whoſe great courage was well ſeene in all that ſiege (hauing as it is reported, with ſhot out of Saint Georges tower himſelfe ſlaine 500 Turks during the time of that ſiege) being now preſent, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of priuat conference with the enemie: bent his piece vpon the meſſenger, & cauſed him forthwith to depart without doing his meſſage. Many who in time of the aſſault feared not any danger, but were altogether become deſperat and careles of themſelues, after that they had vnderſtood that the enemie had offered parley, and that they began to conceiue ſome hope of life: reſorted vnto the Great Maſter, requeſting him, that he would prouide for the ſafetie of his louing people, whoſe warlike forces was with many aſſaults ſore weakned, the citie beaten downe about their eares, and moſt of them which were left, either wounded or ſick. They had (as they ſaid) now ſufficiently proued both their force and fortune: wherefore he ſhould do well, to beware, leſt while he were too long in conſulting, the enemie ſhould conceiue a further indignation in ſeeing his offers refuſed. With theſe and ſuch ſpeeches they inforced the great maſter to ſend embaſſadors to Solyman. The men that were ſent, were Anthonius Groleus a Frenchman, enſigne bearer for the Order, a man of great reputation for his wiſedome and experience; and with him Robertus Baruſius, a man of great grauitie, and skilfull in the Greeke tongue: for whom was receiued as pledges, a kinſman of the great captaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epirot which fled out of the city vnto the Turks, becauſe one of the Grecian captaines had ſtruck him with his open hand, a man of a ſharpe wit, and one that could perfectly ſpeake the Greeke, Turkiſh, and Italian tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongſt the enemies, beeing had of them in great regard although he was not knowne whileſt he dwelt in the citie, that he was any ſuch man. After that came alſo Solymans enterpreter, for he himſelfe could ſpeak no other language more than his owne, accounting it a great diſgrace, and againſt the Othoman empire to vſe any other language. The embaſſadors admitted vnto Solymans preſence, told him, That they were ſent to know, for what cauſe he had ſent to require parly? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had known nothing thereof, ſaid there was no ſuch matter: and commanding them preſently to void his campe, ſent them away with letters to the Great Maſter and the citizens, to this effect.

Solymans letter ſent to the great maſter and the Rhodians, by their embaſſadours.

If I had not compaſſion of humane infirmitie, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and hautie minds, into moſt dangerous and vnneceſſarie miſchiefs, truly I would not haue directed vnto you theſe letters at this time; but as you haue well deſerued, perſecute you with death and moſt miſerable ſeruitude: which how eaſie a thing were it for me to doe, you your ſelues know. But hauing now ſufficiently tried my force, if you be wiſe make proofe of my clemencie. You haue already ſatisfied your owne furie, your owne mad humour: and now adviſe your ſelues, lay your hand vpon your heart, and without delay yeeld your ſelues as I command; your liues I giue, I giue you your wealth, and more than that, your choice to tarrie there ſtill, or to depart: Refuſe not the grace frankly offered, which was of you to haue bin moſt heartily deſired. It ſhall not alwaies be lawful for you (as at this preſent) to make choice of both. From our campe.

Vpon the returne of the embaſſadors, the poore of all ſorts flockt together to the Great Maſter his houſe not far from the breach: where after the multitude of the common people was diſmiſſed, and the chiefe of the burgers ſent for, the imperious letter of the Turkiſh tyrant was openly read before the knights of the Order, and the better ſort of the citizens. Whereunto the Great Maſter accounting it both honor enough, and ſufficient tearme of life honorably to die, anſwered in this ſort.

You heard (ſacred fellowes in armes, and valiant citizens of the Rhodes) theſe imperious and ſorrowfull letters: whereunto how we are to anſwer, requireth no great deliberation: we muſt as reſolute men either yeeld or die, all hope of the victorie is gone, except forraine aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my counſeil, let vs with weapons in our hands, vntill the laſt gaſpe and the ſpending of the laſt drop of our bloud, like valiant men defend our faith and nobilitie receiued from our anceſtours, and the honour which we haue ſo long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it neuer be ſaid, that our honour died but with our ſelues. G

This ſpeech of the great Maſter ſeemed vnto many, heauier, than the imperious commandement of the Turkiſh tyrant: and a great while men ſtood ſilent, heauily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward geſture, more than by words expreſsing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke prieſt, with great compaſſion of mind (as it ſeemed) and teares trickling down his cheeks, brake forth into theſe words: H

And I would alſo hold my peace, if I were a priuat man; and not firſt of all in ſo great and troubled Aſſemblie, broach mine owne opinion. But foraſmuch as the regard of our common preſeruation, can wring a word out of no mans mouth; and all men know, that now is the time to ſpeake and ſay what euery man thinketh beſt, which ſhall neither alwayes nor long bee graunted vnto vs; I will not let it now ouerpaſſe and ſlip away: Wherefore let vs ſuppoſe, that no command of a moſt mightie prince beſieging vs, were come vnto vs, but that I were reaſoning as a priuate man with his neighbour, or one friend with another by the fire ſide, or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either partie, as men indifferent, not liking or hating (as men oftentimes do of princes affairs which concerne them nothing) and then (as I hope) my ſpeech ſhall be vnto you neither vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable. We Greekes and Latines, with ioyned armes, haue now theſe ſix moneths withſtood our deadly enemies, not onely abroad before our wals, but alſo in the very bowels of our citie, without any forreine helpe: which as wee haue of long time all vainely looked for, ſo are we now euery one of vs out of hope thereof. And yet our enemie either mooued with the ſecret goodneſſe of God, or elſe ignorant of our ſtrength and forces, ſpent with wounds, ſlaughter, ſickneſſe, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarly offer that vnto vs, which was of vs to be moſt of all deſired and earneſtly ſued for. Your publicke and priuate treaſures, the bodies of your ſelues, your wiues and children hee keepeth vnuiolated; he taketh from vs onely the citie, which he hath for moſt part alreadie beaten downe and taken. Worthie Great Maſter, and you moſt valiant knights, I haue knowne proweſſe and valour in many battels at ſea, but eſpecially in this ſiege; whereof ſeeing there is no more vſe in this our deſperate eſtate, I doe appeale vnto your wiſedom and diſcretion. Since all is now the conquerours, in that he leaueth vnto vs our liues and goods, that is to be accounted gaines, and the yeelding vp of the citie and Iſland no loſſe, which the victorious enemie alreadie commandeth: which although it be a heauie matter and grieuous vnto the nobilitie, yet your fortune perſuadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be mooued with any compaſſion, I account it better to yeeld, than to bee ſlaine our ſelues, or to ſee your wiues and children by law of arms to be led away before your faces into miſerable captiuity and ſeruitude. If any Chriſtian compaſſion remaine in your warlike mindes, I beſeech you ſeeke not the vtter deſtruction of this innocent people, who (I may with modeſtie ſay) hath not euill deſerued of you, whom Chriſt Ieſus, whom the enemie himſelfe, would haue preſerued. That I ſay this which I ſpeake vnto you for Chriſtian charitie, and for no other cauſe, let this be a ſufficient teſtimonie, That ſo long as you were able to reſiſt by your owne power, or hoped for aid from forreine princes, I neuer ſpake word, or once thought of yeelding: but now ſeeing the fatall ruine of all things about vs, our common eſtate brought vnto the vttermoſt extremitie, our deadly enemie in the heart of our citie, no hope, and that the warre cannot longer bee protracted; I wiſh you to yeeld, and for my part had rather make choice of peace than war, and to proue the enemies fauour, than his furie. I K L

Moſt of them there preſent, were of the ſame mind with the prieſt. But as nothing can bee ſo reaſonably ſpoken as to content al men, ſo this ſpeech was not of them al liked: ſome there were (though not many) which conſidering the harmes they had done vnto the Turkes, and doubting with what ſafetie they might yeeld themſelues into the power of that faithleſſe people, had rather to haue fought it out to the laſt man, and ſo to haue left vnto them a bloudie victorie. Amongſt theſe, one bold ſpoken fellow ſtept forth, and in preſence of them all diſſuaded the yeelding vp of the citie, in this ſort: M

A moſt reſolute ſpeech of a common ſoldier, diſſuading the yeelding vp of the Rhodes.

I haue not beene with any thing more vnacquainted, than to deliuer my opinion before princes, or in ſuch great and publicke aſſemblies, being alwaies more deſirous modeſtly to heare other mens opinions, than impudently to thruſt foorth mine owne. But now, ſeeing extreame neceſſitie will not longer ſuffer me to keepe my woonted courſe of ſilence, I will frankly ſpeake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be anſwered vnto the heauie meſſage and imperious command of the moſt perfidious tyrant. This cruell enemie hath ouerthrowne our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our citie, and as a moſt troubleſome gueſt liueth and conuerſeth with vs as it were vnder the ſame roofe. Such as liſt not longer to indure ſuch an vnwelcome gueſt and troubleſome neighbour, perſuade you becauſe he is troubleſome, to giue him all: but (worthie and ſacred knights) I am of farre different opinion; neither doe I thinke a poſſeſſion of two hundred and fourteene yeares is ſo lightly to bee deliuered vp, and the ground forſaken: but rather that this troubleſome intrudor is in like manner to be himſelfe troubled, and with deadly skirmiſhes continually vexed: whom after wee had by force of armes and vndaunted courage, maugre his head, held out fiue moneths, at length he brake into our city, not by any valour in himſelfe, but holpen by time, which tameth all things: and ſince his firſt entrance it is now almoſt fortie daies, in which time for all his haſt, hee hath ſcarcely got forward a hundred and thirtie paces, hindered by the blockes we haue laied in his way, and will not ceaſe continually to lay, if we be wiſe men and mindfull of our former valour. Deſtroy me you heauenly powers, before I ſee with theſe eies theſe ſacred knights to yeeld vp this famous citie of the Rhodes, the antient bulwarke of Chriſtian religion, vnto our mercileſſe enemies, polluted with the infamous ſuperſtition of Mahomet: who beſides the inſatiable thirſt they haue of our bloud, how faithleſſe and miſchieuous they are by nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our ſelues, but we may take example by the calamitie of Conſtantinople, the late miſerie of Eubœa, and that which later was, of Methone, as alſo by the Mamalukes at Caire, miſerably ſlaine contrary to the league, contrarie to the faith and promiſe by the Turkiſh Emperour himſelfe before giuen. What, doe you not remember how the death of the moſt noble captaines at Belgrade was of late procured by the faſhood, craft, and deceit of the ſame faithleſſe miſereants? Let vs then, being men of wit and vnderſtanding, truſt theſe mad beaſts, let vs giue our ſelues into their power, which haue no regard of right or reaſon, of religion or any thing elſe: whoſe couetouſneſſe and crueltie it is hard to ſay which is greater, which for theſe many yeres haue plotted and laboured nothing more, than how by policie or force they may vtterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they ſo deadly hate. They keep vs ſhut vp and beſieged now the ſixt moneth, feeling together with vs extream dangers and endleſſe labour, ſlaine by heapes before our wals and fortreſſes, and cannot be remoued hence with thunder, leghtening, ſtormes, tempeſts, and all the calamities of Winter, a time which giueth intermiſſion of all warre, both by ſea and land; ſo deſirous they are of reuenge, and greedie of our bloud: and that not altogether without cauſe, for we haue alſo ſhed theirs, and gladly would ſtill ſo do, if it lay in our power. But ſeeing it ſeemeth good vnto God otherwiſe, and that we are ſurpriſed with ineuitable neceſſitie, yet let vs whileſt we are at libertie, and haue power our ſelues, by honorable death amongſt the Chriſtian enſignes, eſchew the torments and reproches which our cruell enemies hope to inflict vpon vs: ſo ſhall we enioy eternall fame and glorie, prepared both in heauen and earth for ſuch as honourably die in defence of their prince and country: which honour it becommeth not them to enuie vnto thy moſt noble name and vertue, worthie Grand Maſter, which hauing for many yeares enioyed the commoditie and profit of peace, and greatly enriched by bountie of this ſacred militarie Order, refuſe now to beare this laſt burden of warre.

At theſe words an antient Greeke, for his wiſedome and diſcretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countreymen wrongfully touched, and the deſperat holding out of the citie vainly perſuaded, tooke hold, and interrupting this yong gallant, in anſwer of that he had ſaid, ſpake as followeth:

The former ſpeech notably anſwered by a Greeke, and the yeelding of the citie vrged.

That griefe of minde and deſperation can make men rather eloquent than wiſe, as you haue many times heard before this, ſo you might this day perceiue alſo, moſt valiant gentlemen: for aduiſed modeſtie neuer falleth into obloquie, neither confoundeth falſhood with truth; it deſireth not the ſlaughter of the citizens, it perſuadeth not furie, nor exhorteth men to madneſſe: but it is by nature ſo engraffed in many, that when they cannot by their owne wiſedome and policie deliuer themſelues from their troubles, they yet ſeeke to draw others into the fellowſhip of the ſame danger: ſo greedie haue malice and miſerie alwaies been of companie. But if you (worthie Commaunder) will giue me alſo leaue to ſpeake, a man amongſt his countrymen not of meaneſt place and authoritie, which thing both the preſent calamitie and vrgent neceſſitie might of you eaſily obtaine, I would alledge ſuch reaſons, and lay downe ſuch matter, as ſhould not only refell the copious and glorious words of this ſharpe witted Orator, ſcrapt together of purpoſe to flouriſh out the matter, but alſo ſuch as might ſtirre your mind to that which is honeſt, profitable, and neceſſarie; expulſing hatred, feare, trouble, or deſpaire. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not onely to bee a vehement Orator, but ſometime a man moſt terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and ſo mild, that he neuer had the heart to kill, nay not ſo much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruell, whoſe perfidious dealing he deteſteth, whoſe crueltie he accurſeth, whoſe manner of liuing he exclaimeth againſt, as altogether without law, without reaſon, without order, without regard: and now in time of truce, and whileſt the ſhowers of arrowes, yron bullets, fire and ſtones doth ceaſe, creeping out of his caue, maketh much adoe, and keepeth a great ſtirre; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words vall vpon death, whereof he hath hitherto ſhewed himſelfe too much affraid, and all forſooth (as hee ſaid) leſt hee ſhould be enforced to endure the mocking and ſcorning of the enemie. But this is meere pride, not Chriſtian fortitude or humilitie. But our enemie neither threateneth nor purpoſeth any ſuch matter, nothing ſo perfidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing vp the ſlaughter at Caire, Eubœa, Methone, and Conſtantinople, cities taken either by force or warlike policie, and not yeelded by compoſition, vpon faith giuen betwixt the beſieger and the beſieged: who becauſe he would ſpare vs, will not ſuffer vs to doe that whereby we ſhould vndoubtedly periſh. But whereof proceedeth this new found clemencie? This vnwonted fauor toward the people of the Rhodes? I am not of the tyrants priuie counſel, neither euer curiouſly ſought after the reaſon of another mans bountie, but am glad to receiue it when I need it. Yet for all that, I will not diſſemble what I thinke in a matter ſo doubtfull: he is willing (as I ſuppoſe) in this ſiege and conqueſt of the Rhodes, to ſhew vnto other nations whom he purpoſed to inuade, both his power and his patience: leſt alwaies ſatisfying his cruell nature, he ſhould make deſolation in places he would raigne ouer, and ſo for euer alienating the minds of men, be inforced to fight with all men with fire and ſword: by which rigour he hath not ſo much hurt his enemie as himſelfe. For this cauſe (as I ſuppoſe he leaueth vnto vs life and goods, leſt whileſt hee in going about to take them from vs by force, and we ſeeking to keepe them by deſperatneſſe, we ſhould both fall into great deſtruction, no leſſe lamentable vnto the conqueror than to the vanquiſhed. Beſides that, if he ſhould kill all here, truly he might then enter the breaches of the citie on the bodies of the dead, no men now left aliue to reſiſt him. But Lerus is ſhut vp, Arangia is ſtrongly fortified, Lyndus is by ſcituation impregnable: heere he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men; here he muſt begin a new warre, except he will haue the remainder of your warre, the fatall plague of his empire, to prey ſtill vpon his ſubiects: all which ſtrong places he ſhall haue without ſlaughter, without bloudſhed (as reaſon is) if he ſhould let you and vs poore wretches depart in ſafety with a little traſh. Except theſe worldy conſiderations haue moued him to mercy and compaſſion: then out of doubt it is wrought by diuine power and the ſecret fauour of God towards vs, and of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus crucified. Whereunto if you be men well aduiſed, if religious, if mindfull of the dutie of Chriſtians, it becommeth not you to oppoſe any obſtacle, and with the ruine of your ſelues to deſtroy this miſerable people, which for this halfe yeares ſiege, hath ſcarcely had ſo much reſt as might ſuffice the neceſſitie of nature, ſtanding for you in battell, induring both wounds and death for your honour and victorie: by whoſe faithfull labour and diligence you haue bin alwaies holpen both at home and abroad; whether you inuaded the Turke by land in Mytilene, Naupactus, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Peloponeſus; or els by ſea thruſt him out of the poſſeſſion of the Ionian or Ægeum: whereby it may appeare euen vnto a blind man, how iniurious it is, and farre from truth, to obiect vnto vs, That inioying the fruits of peace, we refuſe the charges of warres; nay we neuer refuſed warres. But now it is come to that point, that if we would neuer ſo faine make warres, we are not able ſo to doe, the flower of our youth being ſlaine: and the ſmall remainder that is left, not onely weakened in bodie with wounds, ſickneſſe, watching, and reſtleſſe labour; but alſo in mind diſcouraged, whileſt all things fall out proſperouſly to our enemies, and to vs aduerſe: the greateſt and beſt part of our great artillerie beeing broken with continuall vſe, which if it were whole, we could haue thereof ſmal vſe or profit, for want of pouder, which not only this city now wanteth, but alſo your ſtrong holds, Lerus, Lyndus, Halicarnaſus, Arangia. I was neuer deſirous or curious to look into other mens doings, much leſſe into your maner of war: but yet (Great Maſter) you cannot deny, but it is ſo, who haue cauſed ſoldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpowder ſecretly: by which policie you haue withſtood your forrein enemy theſe ſix months, & deceiued the trechery of one or two domeſtical traitors. But I gladly admit we haue al theſe

A things, I ſtand not vpon the truth, I ſay not what moſt men ſay, but I ſpeake to pleaſe a few: and ſuppoſe we wanted neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this, whether they would aduiſe you to vſe them to your defence, or to your deſtruction? For vnto both it cannot be, no more than at once to bee a freeman and a ſlaue. To vſe them to your deſtruction, that were madneſſe and ſenceleſſe pride, hatefull to God and man; you ſhould therefore vſe them to defence: but how ſhall we defend a citie (I doe not ſay, as the truth is) alreadie loſt and poſſeſſed by the enemie, wherein he raigneth, raungeth, and turneth all vpſide downe? but hauing the wals battered downe, a great breach in the Spaniſh ſtation, and another not like, but euen now as good as made in the Italian ſtation, how ſhall we be able to keepe this vnfortunate towne, battered and rent at the French, Engliſh, and Auergne ſtations, and the tower of S. Nicholas? Which if it were not ſo battered and bared of al warlike prouiſion, but ſound and thorowly furniſhed with B munition and victuall, yet neceſsitie enforcing, and reaſon perſuading, you ought to forſake it, forſomuch as all power of further reſiſtance is taken from you. Doe you not ſee how eaſily and almoſt without any trouble the enemie (by meanes of the caſtle he hath new built vpon the mount Philermo, not paſt two miles diſtant) can take from you all manner of prouiſion both by ſea and land, and reſtraine you from going out or in? Truely notable gentlemen, honourable for your martiall prowesſe, you ſee and haue long agoe foreſeene theſe things better than I, altogether ignorant in martiall affaires, altogether buſied in the trade of merchandiſe, and caring for my family; yet ſuffer me to ſay the truth. All the powers whereby this kingdome ſtood, are departed and gone; againſt the force of our enemies no policie of force remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or ſouldiers from heauen, and other ſuch like miracles, is in my iudgement more and more to prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he bee vnto vs mercifull. C Wherefore being deſtitute of all worldly helpe, let vs as we may, prouide for our ſafetie. I beſeech thee (worthie Great Maſter) by theſe my aged teares, by the naturall pietie ingrafted in thy noble nature, expoſe not this miſerable citie to the ſpoile of the enemie, our old and middle aged men to the ſword, our wiues and daughters to be rauiſhed, our boyes and youths to the vnnaturall filthineſſe of our barbarous enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and groſſe opinion of the vngodly Mahometane ſuperſtition. I would (noble knights) you had ſeene with what teares, with what mourning our heauie families and children crying about their mothers, ſent vs hither, and what praiers they made for vs at our departing: I would you knew with what minde and how great hope they expect their ſafetie from your clemencie and aduiſed reſolution.

D This ſpeech of the aged Greek might haue moued a heart of flint: but the Great Maſter, who in his countenance ſhewed a greater courage than his preſent ſtate required, commanding euery man to his charge: after the matter had bin thus moſt part of the night diſcourſed, gaue then no other anſwer, but, That he would be carefull of all their well doing. The next morning he ſent for Preianes, Martiningus, & a few other of the greateſt iudgement & experience, by whom he was fully reſolued, that the citie in ſo many places by the enemie laid open and ſhaken, was not poſſibly to be long defended: whereupon he cauſed a common counſell to be called of all the knights of the Order together with the burgeſſes of the citie: where after long debating, whether they ſhould fight it out to the laſt man, or yeeld vpon ſuch conditions as was to be obtained: it was by generall conſent concluded, that the city ſhould be yeelded, E and thereupon a decree made which was by the Great Maſter pronounced. Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemy for foure daies, but full of feare & danger. During which time, diuers of the Turks preſuming vpon the truce, came by great companies to behold the wals & rampiers of the citie: wherwith Fornouius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being ſore moued, in his choler without further command diſcharged a tire of great ordnance among the thickſt of them, contrary to the truce taken. At which time alſo the Rhodians receiued into the citie ſecretly by night a ſhip loaded with wines out of Crete, & in her Alphonſus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian gallies, & with him 100 voluntary ſouldiers all Latines, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senat: for at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turks F iuſtly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new ſupplies, which they ſuppoſed to haue bin far greater than in truth they were; without command of any captain or enſigne diſplaid, in great numbers thruſt in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the city as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiouſly aſſailed the defendants: In which conflict many were ſlaine and wounded on both ſides. But after the Turkes had to

The Great Maſter reſolued that the citie was not to be defended, calleth a common counſell of al his knights, and the burgeſſes of the citie.

A truce taken with the Turks for foure daies.

A barbarous fact

their coſt againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement they began that skirmiſh, ſo of themſelues they brake it off and retired. After the truce was thus broken, the captaine of the Turkes fencers, a bloudie cruell fellow, hauing taken three Chriſtians priſoners, cut off their hands, eares, and noſes, and ſent them ſo diſmembred into the citie with letters to the Great Maſter, charging him with the vniuſt breach of the truce, barbarouſly threatning within three or foure daies to make like example of him to all poſteritie. Amongſt others none was more troubled with this ſudden and vnexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Peruſinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three knights of the Order, men of ſingular wiſedome and grauitie, embaſſadours at that time in the Turkes campe: whom the barbarous people in their furie had vndoubtedly ſlaine or put to torture, if they had not feared the like meaſure to haue bin ſhewed to their hoſtages in the citie. But after that Nicholaus Vergotus, and Georgius Sandriticus, two of the Burgeſſes of the citie, were come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the citie, all their furie and rage was quickly appeaſed. Solyman for his greater maieſtie and the more terror of theſe meſſengers, beſet round about with his great armie, & guarded about with his Ianizaries in their richeſt attire & gliſtering armor, gaue them audience: who admitted to his preſence, with great humilitie offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld vp vnto him the citie. The chiefe points whereof were, That the Churches ſhould remaine vnto the Chriſtians inuiolated: That no children ſhould be taken from their parents: That no Chriſtian ſhould be inforced to forſake his religion and turne Turke: That ſuch Chriſtians as would tarrie ſtill in the citie, might ſo do at libertie, without paying any tribute for the ſpace of fiue yeares: That all they which would depart might go with bag & bagage, furniſhed with conuenient ſhipping and prouiſion as farre as Crete, & to carrie with them ſo much great ordnance as they pleaſed; and that the Chriſtians ſhould appoint a reaſonable day for the time of their departure. Al which articles Solyman condeſcended vnto and ſolemnly ſwore faithfully to performe the ſame. But how they were indeed performed the writers of that age do much vary: it ſhould ſeem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken, but ſo performed as pleaſed the conqueror: certaine it is, that many great outrages were through militarie inſolencie committed by the proud Turkes vpon the poore Chriſtians, contrary to the mind of Solyman. Iacobus Fontanus a Ciuilian, and at that time one of the judges of the city (out of whoſe writings this hiſtorie is for moſt part collected) reporteth, That the Turks not expecting the departure of the Chriſtians, brake into the citie vpon Chriſtenmas day, by the gate called Coſquinium, polluted the Temples, ſhamefully abuſed the Chriſtians, & made hauock of all things: and that he himſelfe, falling into their hands, after he had with ſuch mony as he had, redeemed himſelfe, hauing not ſufficient to content all their greedy deſires, was by them hardly intreated & grieuouſly beaten. The Great Maſter by the counſell of Achimetes, putting on ſuch ſimple attire as beſt beſeemed a vanquiſhed man that was to humble himſelfe before the conqueror, went out of the citie into the camp, attended vpon with a few knights of the Order: where after he had waited in the raine moſt part of the day, before Solymans tent, at laſt he had a rich gowne caſt vpon him, & ſo brought into the proud tyrants preſence. Where after they had a while at the firſt, with piercing eies one earneſtly beholden the other; the Great Maſter humbling himſelfe before him, was in token of grace admitted to kiſſe his hand, and welcomed by Solyman in this ſort.

Solyman his ſpeech vnto the Great Maſter.

Although (ſaid he) I might worthily and iuſtly infringe the articles I haue preſcribed concerning the yeelding of the Citie, with thy moſt wicked croſſed compiers, the people of the Rhodes, and thee eſpecially ſuch a capitall enemie, from whoſe deſerued puniſhment, neither faith nor oath ought to ſtay a moſt iuſt conquerour: yet I haue determined to bee not onely gratious and mercifull vnto thee ſo great an offender, deſeruing exemplarie puniſhment, but alſo liberall and bountifull: who if thou wilt by weldoing amend the grieuous tranſgreſſions of thy former life, I promiſe vnto thee moſt honourable entertainement, great preferment, and the higheſt places in my Empire, in my armie in time of warre, and in counſell in time of peace. Not to refuſe this mine offer, both thy preſent eſtate perſuadeth thee, and the Chriſtians (whoſe quarrell thou tookeſt vpon thee to defend againſt me, with better beginning than ſucceſſe) deſerue at thy hands no better: for what ſhould let thee forſaken of all thy friends, a man as it were betraied and vanquiſhed, to caſt thy ſelfe into the perpetuall faith

and

A and protection of a moſt mightie and mercifull conquerour, of himſelfe offering thee this vndeſerued grace and fauour.

Whereunto the Great Maſter preſently anſwered:

Moſt Mightie and gracious Emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthie captaines, I deſerue not; neither is my preſent eſtate and deſert towards you ſuch, as that I dare or ought to refell the ſame: yet I will ſpeake freely in the middeſt of your victorious armie, a man vanquiſhed in preſence of the conquerour, whoſe great mercie I neuer deſpaired of, and whoſe faith I neuer doubted: I had rather now I haue loſt my ſoueraigntie, forthwith to loſe my priuat and vnfortunate life; or elſe for euer
B hereafter to liue in obſcurity, than of my people to be accounted a fugitiue rather than a vanquiſhed man: For, to be vanquiſhed is but chance of warre, and of ſo great a conquerour no ſhame to him that is conquered: but afterwards to forſake his owne people and to turne to the enemie, I account it ſhamefull cowardiſe and treacherie.

The reſolute anſwere of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

Solyman maruelling at the courage and maieſtie of the hoarie old prince, in his ſo great extremitie, diſmiſſed him, and ſent him again into the citie, guarded with his owne guard, vntill he was come into his pallace: and vnto euery one of the knights attending vpon the Great Maſter, was giuen a rich garment, in token of Solymans fauor. Within a few daies after Solyman comming into the citie, went to viſit the Great Maſter alſo: whom he found buſie in pac-
C king vp his things againſt his departure. Here when the Great Maſter falling downe vpon his knees would haue worſhipped him, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do: but with his hand putting aſide his vaile of maieſtie (which manner of reuerence the Turkiſh Emperors giue only to God, and their Great Prophet Mahomet) tooke him vp and ſaluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great Maſter for his wiſedome and deſcretion now to him no leſſe admirable, than he was before in time of war for his valour and courage, ſpake in this ſort:

Solyman commeth into the citie vnto the Great Maſter.

If my fortune and ſucceſſe had beene anſwerable to my heart and courage, I ſhould heere be in this citie, rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But ſithence the fatall Deſtinies would needs ouerthrow the Rhodian eſtate, I am glad that you are the man before all other by fortune aſſigned, D of whom I ſhall receiue both force and grace. And vnto you, amongſt many other your rare and worthie praiſes, this ſhall not be the leaſt, That you vanquiſhed the Rhodes and ſhewed mercie. By this meanes you haue ioyned vnto your dreadfull power, the fame of clemencie and courteſie: an honour not of the higheſt to be deſpiſed, by which alone wee come neereſt vnto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keepe the conuentions of the late peace inuiolate, which your owne clemencie perſuaded you to grant, and neceſſitie inforced vs to take. I ſhall now bee an eternall example of the Turkiſh Emperours clemencie and vertue, more than if I had by and by at the firſt yeelded my ſelfe: Obſtinate wilfulneſſe hath made thy glorie and mercie now famous thorow the whole World, and vnto the Worlds end.

The ſpeech of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

E Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter, anſwered:

It is to me a great pleaſure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choice of peace before warre, which I would thou couldeſt haue liked of from the beginning: then truely thou ſhouldeſt at this time haue receiued of my great and mightie Maieſtie, more good than thou haſt indured harme: Which that I haue done vnto thee, not for any hatred, but onely for deſire of Soueraingntie, thou mayſt gather by this, That I ſuffer thee and thine to depart hence at libertie, with all your wealth and ſubſtance: for I make not warre, thereby to heape vp wealth and riches; but for honour, fame, immortalitie, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the propertie of a king royally deſcended, by ſtrong hand to take from others, and to inuade others; not vpon a greedie and couetous mind, but for the honourable F deſire of rule and ſoueraigntie: which whileſt my neighbour withſtandeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remoue him.

The notable anſwere of Solyman to the great Maſter.

But the tyrant (as many ſuppoſed) ſpake all this by way of diſſimulation, hauing as it was commonly bruted, giuen order for the rigging vp of a great ſhip, & certain gallies, for the ſudden den

dentranſporting of the Great Maſter and the knights of the Order to Conſtantinople,which G report ſeemeth to haue bin but feigned either of malice, or elſe by ſuch as leaſt knew Solymans mind:for if he had ſo purpoſed,who ſhould haue let him,hauing them al in his power.
Iouius in his little treatiſe Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fifth,reporteth that hee himſelfe heard Lilladamus the Great Maſter ſay,That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended vpon with thirtie thouſand men,there was not any man heard to ſpeake a word, but that the ſouldiers went as if they had bin obſeruant Friers: and that when hee came to aske leaue of Solyman that hee might depart,he was ſo courteouſly vſed of him, that turning himſelfe to Abraim the Baſſa, whom hee aboue all men loued,ſaid,Truely I cannot but grieue to ſee this vnfortunat old man,driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence ſo heauily.

The Great Maſter embarking himſelfe with his knights and ſuch other as were willing to H depart, in veſſels and gallies prepared for that purpoſe, departed out of the Iſland on Newyeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by ſea in that Winter weather,landed at laſt at Meſſana in Sicilia, from whence,he afterwards ſailed into Italie, and ſo trauelled to Rome where he was honorably receiued by Adrian the ſixt of that name then Biſhop there, a Hollander borne,ſometime ſchoolemaſter to Charles the fiſt, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had bin as forward in the ſhort time of his Papacie to haue relieued the Rhodes,as hee was to maintaine Charles his quarrell againſt the French king, it is not vnlike but that famous citie had been relieued,and the Iſland in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians at this day. Thus Solyman,whileſt the Chriſtian princes were at diſcord amongſt themſelues,to his great glory and no leſſe griefe of all good Chriſtians, entered the Rhodes the 25 day of December,a day I Solyman entreth into the Rhodes on Chriſtenmas day, in the yere 1522.

dedicated vnto the natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt,in the yeare 1522, after it had bin by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended againſt the Infidels by the ſpace of 214 yeares,ſince the time they by force tooke it from the Infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being ſo long holden as was poſſible,againſt all the power of the Turks,was yeelded vp when it had bin ſix moneths beſieged. At this ſiege Solymon loſt a great part of his army; for beſides them that were ſlaine at the aſſaults,which were many,thirtie thouſand died of the flix.

Solyman ſendes Ferhates Baſſa againſt Alis-beg the mountaine prince.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Baſſa Gouernor of the Marches of the Turkiſh empire,alongſt the riuer of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman went with a great army againſt Alis-Beg, whom the Turks called Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to ſay,king Suar his ſon: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar-Oglis. K This Alis after he had betraied his vnckle Aladeules the mountaine king, vnto Sinan Baſſa,was by Selymus left chiefe Gouernor of that large and wild country alongſt the borders of Armenia and Capadocia,wanting nothing of the honour of a king but the name onely, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his honour, and fearing leſt hee ſhould take vpon him the abſolute gouernment of that countrey (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladeules the late king, being now all dead) and ſo to make himſelfe king,eſpecially if he ſhould ioine in friendſhip with the Perſian king: after the manner of ambitious men, purpoſed by any meanes to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore ſent Ferhates to eaſe him of that care.The Baſſa without making any ſhew of hoſtilitie,marching with his army along the confines of his countrey,as if it had beene but to looke to his L charge,when he was come as neere as he could to Alis, without miſtruſt,thought good to aſſay if he could by policie bring that to paſſe which he was otherwiſe with great danger to attempt

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

A Solyman after he had thus ſubdued the Rhodes, and diſpoſed of the Iſland as he liked beſt, returning to Conſtantinople, brake vp his armie, and for the ſpace of three yeares after followed his pleaſure, not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many yeres after, the rich and flouriſhing country of Italie,(ſometime miſtreſſe of the world, was miſerably afflicted and rent in pieces by Charles the fift(then Emperor)and Francis the French king, the one enuying vnto the other the glorie of the Empire: and he not content therwith, ſeeking with immoderat ambition to make himſelfe lord of all Italie: moſt of the other Chriſtian princes and ſtates being at the ſame time either by the one or by the other, drawne into the fellowſhip of that war, to the great trouble and ſore weakning of the Chriſtian commonweale.
Whereupon Solyman waiting all occaſions that might ſerue for the inlarging of his empire, B and annoying of the Chriſtians, thought it now a fit time for him to ſet his foot into Hungarie, wherinto he had alreadie laied open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knew right well that Lewes then king of Hungarie was but yong, altogether vnacquainted with the wars, commanding ouer his headſtrong ſubiects (eſpecially his rich prelates and nobility) no otherwiſe than pleaſed themſelues, being himſelfe rather by them altogether ouerruled: beſides that, he was in good hope, that the other Chriſtian princes neere vnto him, either carried away with regard of their owne eſtate, would not, or els before vnto himſelfe by league faſt bound, could not affoord vnto him any great aid or ſuccour: the Germanes hee knew would make ſmall haſt vnto ſuch wars as ſhould yeeld them much danger, and but ſmall pay. As for the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, Charles the Emperor, and Ferdinand his brother, although they C were ioyned vnto the young king with the neereſt bonds of alliance (Lewis hauing married Mary their yongeſt ſiſter, and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewis his ſiſter) yet was there as he thought ſmall helpe to be expected from them; Charles hauing his hands full in Italie, and Ferdinand altogether careful of himſelfe: and that Sigiſmund king of Polonia would for the yong kings ſake breake the antient league he had with the Turkiſh Emperors, he could hardly be perſuaded: as for other Chriſtian princes farther off, he ſtood not in any great doubt. Thus hauing with himſelfe ſingled out this young prince the Hungarian king, whom he had in his greedie mind already deuoured, he ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Seruia with a mightie armie of two hundred thouſand men before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his comming (ſo blind and ſenceleſſe was that ſtate, which D now ſleeping in ſecuritie, had long before loſt thoſe eies which euer watcht, and neuer ſpared coſt or paines to keep the ſame in ſafety) in ſtead of whom were others come in place, ſharpe of ſight, and too too prouident for that concerned their owne aduancement, but blind as beetles in foreſeeing this great and common danger (wherwith they were ſhortly after all quite ouerwhelmed) vntill it was now brought home vnto their own dores. The yong king of himſelfe but weake, by reaſon of his youthfull yeres, and nothing ſtrengthned by them for whom he had moſt done, and ſhould haue bin his greateſt ſtay, was wonderfully diſmaied with the fame of the approch of ſo mightie an enemie: yet the better to withſtand him, he ſent embaſſadours with all ſpeed vnto the Chriſtian Princes his neighbors, requeſting their aid againſt the common enemy, but all in vaine. In the mean time, after the antient manner of his country E he gaue out generall ſummons for the aſſembly of his counſell for the warres: whether his great ſtipendarie prelats (of duty bound to appeare) came with their troupes of euill appointed horſemen, and not halfe full, who alſo deliuered in leſſe ſummes of money by far, than of right they ſhould haue done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common warre.
And the temporall nobilitie, forgetting the warlike diſcipline of their famous anceſtours, as freſh water ſoldiers which had ſeen the Turkiſh emperor in his ſtrength, & but litle acquainted with ſome light ſkirmiſhes or ſmall inuaſions, in their vain brauerie made light account of the Turks, proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would eaſily ouerthrow the great numbers of them, if euer they came to handie ſtrokes. But aboue all the reſt, one Paulus Tomoreus, Archbiſhop of Colocia, ſometimes a Minorit, who had before F bin in diuers light ſkirmiſhes againſt the Turks, with great inſolencie did ſo confidently brag and boaſt of the victorie he vainly dreamed of, that in his ſermons vnto the ſoldiers, and in open talke with the nobilitie (if he could haue done ſo much as he vaunted of) it ſhould ſeem that he himſelfe had been enough to haue ouerthrowne the Turks whole armie.

report ſeemeth to haue bin but feigned either of malice, or elſe by ſuch as leaſt knew Solymans mind: for if he had ſo purpoſed, who ſhould haue let him, hauing them al in his power. Iouius in his little treatiſe Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fifth, eporteth that hee himſelfe heard Lilladamus the Great Maſter ſay, That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended vpon with thirtie thouſand men, there was not any man heard to ſpeake a word, but that the ſouldiers went as if they had bin obſeruant Friers: and that when hee came to aske leaue of Solyman that hee might depart, he was ſo courteouſly vſed of him, that turning himſelfe to Abraim the Baſſa, whom hee aboue all men loued, ſaid, Truely I cannot but grieue to ſee this vnfortunat old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence ſo heauily.

depart, in veſſels and gallies prepared for that purpoſe, departed out of the Iſland on New-yeares day at night: aud after long and dangerous trauell by ſea in that Winter weather, landed at laſt at Meſſana in Sicilia, from whence he afterwards ſailed into Italie, and ſo trauelled to Rome where he was honorably receiued by Adrian the ſixt of that name then Biſhop there, a Hollander borne, ſometime ſchoolemaſter to Charles the fift, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had bin as forward in the ſhort time of his Papacie to haue relieued the Rhodes, as hee was to maintaine Charles his quarrell againſt the French king, it is not vnlike but that famous citie had been relieued, and the Iſland in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians at this day. Thus Solyman, whileſt the Chriſtian princes were at diſcord amongſt themſelues, to his great glory and no leſſe griefe of all good Chriſtians, entered the Rhodes the 25 day of December, a day I dedicated vnto the natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt, in the yeare 1522, after it had bin by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended againſt the Infidels by the ſpace of 214 yeares, ſince the time they by force tooke it from the Infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being ſo long holden as was poſſible, againſt all the power of the Turks, was yeelded vp when it had bin ſix moneths beſieged. At this ſiege Solymon loſt a great part of his army; for beſides them that were ſlaine at the aſſaults, which were many, thirtie thouſand died of the flix.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Baſſa Gouernor of the Marches of the Turkiſh empire, alongſt the riuer of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman went with a great army againſt Alis-Beg, whom the Turks called Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to ſay, king Suar his ſon: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar-Oglu. K
This Alis after he had betraied his vnckle Aladeules the mountaine king, vnto Sinan Baſſa, was by Selymus left chiefe Gouernor of that large and wild country alongſt the borders of Armenia and Capadocia, wanting nothing of the honour of a king but the name onely, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his honour, and fearing leſt hee ſhould take vpon him the abſolute gouernment of that countrey (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladeules the late king, being now all dead) and ſo to make himſelfe king; eſpecially if he ſhould ioine in friendſhip with the Perſian king: after the manner of ambitious men, purpoſed by any meanes to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore ſent Ferhates to eaſe him of that care. The Baſſa without making any ſhew of hoſtilitie, marching with his army along the confines of his countrey, as if it had beene but to looke to his L charge, when he was come as neere as he could to Alis, without miſtruſt, thought good to aſſay if he could by policie bring that to paſſe which he was otherwiſe with grear danger to attempt by force. The vanitie of of Tomoreus.

But when all the kings army was aſſembled, and a generall muſter taken, there was hardly found fiue and twentie thouſand men in all, horſe and foot. So that the fooliſh hardineſſe of G Tomoreus, and others ſo forwards to giue the Turks battel, was of moſt wiſe men diſliked. The old ſouldiers and men of great experience ſaid plainly, That it was meere folly and madneſſe with ſuch a handfull of men to giue battell vnto the enemie, who would bring eight times ſo many moe into the field as they were. Wherefore ſome wiſhed, that the yong king ſhould be withdrawn from the eminent danger: among whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble captain, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh wars, gaue counſel, that the perſon of the yong king ſhould for the ſafety of the common ſtate, whatſoeuer ſhould happen, be kept out of danger in the ſtrong caſtle of Buda. But the vnruly ſoldiers with open mouth impugned his wholſome counſell, and ſaid plainly, That except the king himſelfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was alſo the raſh prelat Tomoreus, perſuading them with all ſpeed to H giue the enemie battell, and that the noble yong king vnder the protection of Almighty God ſhould in perſon himſelfe go & giue the ſignall of battell againſt his enemies. The king ouer-ruled by this vnlucky counſell, vpon a brauerie without reaſon ſet forward with his army, and came to a place called Mohatchz or Mugace, which is a little country village not far from Danubius, almoſt in the middle between Buda and Belgrado. And now Balybeus with 20000 horſemen (the forerunners of the Turkiſh army) was at hand, at which time the commanders and captaines of the kings armie, entred into counſell, Whether it were better to incamp their armie within their waggons alongſt the riuer of Danubius, and ſo to expect the comming of Ioannes Sepuſius, countie of Cilia, and Vayuod of Tranſyluania (who was then ſaid to be comming towards the king with his Tranſyluanian horſemen, of all other fitteſt to haue incoun- I tered the Turkes, or els to march on forward, and preſently to giue them battell: But Tomoreus, who now commanded all, knowing that vpon the comming of the Vayuod, hee was to giue place, and himſelfe to be commanded, (which vnto ſo proud a man was no ſmall griefe) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carrie away the glorie of the victorie he ſo vainely hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but haſting headlong to his owne deſtruction, did with ſuch vehemencie impugne the wholſome counſell of others, who would haue expected the comming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke perſuaſions, drew on the vnaduiſed yong king into moſt apparent and manifeſt danger. For Balybeus diuided his horſemen into foure battels, which by turnes skirmiſhed with the kings armie without intermiſſion, and gaue the Hungarians no leiſure to reſt either day or night, but continually whee- K ling about, kept them in ſo ſtrait, that no man could without great danger go to water his horſe at the ſide of Danubius, which was faſt by, or once to ſtir out of the campe, but were inforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which neceſſitie Tomoreus was enforced to put the armie in order of battell, and there was now no remedie, but he muſt of neceſſitie fight for the honor of his prince and country. His battell was ranged all in length, and his horſmen not altogether (as it was thought) vnfitly placed here and there by troups among his footmen, leſt the Turks (being in number eight to one) ſhould with their multitude compaſſe them round, and ſo inforce them to fight as it were in a ring: for now was Solyman come alſo with all his huge armie. The Hungarian tents defended with a ſmall garriſon, were left a little from the armie on the right hand, incloſed round about with wagons, one chained to a- L nother: neere vnto the which, Tomoreus Generall of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether vndiſcreetly placed a troupe of choſen horſemen for defence of the kings perſon against all vncertain euents of the battel. But this day (vnluckie to the Hungarian name, but vnto the king himſelf moſt fatal and vnfortunat) ouerthrew that his purpoſe, deuiſed too late for the ſafetie of the kings perſon: for at the firſt incounter the Hungarians, although they had receiued no harme by the Turkiſh artillerie (being mounted too hie, of purpoſe as it was thought, the gunners being for moſt part Chriſtians) were eaſily beaten down and ouerthrowne, oppreſſed by the multitude of their enemies, eſpecially Tomoreus with the reſt of the prelats & nobility being almoſt all ſlaine together, & the Hungarian horſmen alſo either ſlaine or but to flight. All things going thus to wracke, a companie of Turks aſſailed the camp, which was hardly defen- M ded by the weake garriſon. Which thing the troupe of the choſen horſmen appointed for defence of the kings perſon, beholding, could not be ſtaid, but that they would needs help them which defended the camp. The yong king ſeeing all his armie diſcomfited, & himſelf forſaken of the horſmen which he was in hope ſhould haue garded him, betook himſelf to flight.

But as he was making ſhift for himſelfe, thinking to haue paſſed ouer a fennie ditch, his horſe A in plunging out, fell backwards vpon him into the ditch; where being heauie loaden with armour not able to helpe himſelfe, hee was in the middeſt of the filthie ditch in the mud moſt miſerably drowned. Some few horſemen eſcaped out of the battell, the reſt were either ſlain or taken priſoners. This woful battell neuer ſufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miſeries of that worthy kingdome, was fought the 29 day of October in the yeare 1526.

Solyman hauing obtained this victorie, marched on directly to Buda, the regall ſeat of the Hungarian kings, which was deliuered to him with the caſtle, vpon condition, that he ſhould not violate any man either in perſon or goods, and at his departure to leaue the ſame againe vnto the Hungarians: all which things he (according vnto their requeſt) faithfully performed. B Being entred into the caſtle, he wonderfully commended the ſame, but lodged not therein, becauſe it is by their antient law forbidden the Turkiſh Emperor to lodge within any walled place which is not his owne. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his campe alongſt the riuer of Danubius.

Whileſt Solyman lay thus at Buda, ſeuen bloudie heads of the Biſhops and greateſt of the nobilitie (ſlaine in the late battell at Mohatchz) were preſented to him, all ſet in order vpon a wodden ſtep: wherat he ſmiled, to ſee his courtiers laying their right hands vpon their breſts, and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obeiſance, to ſalute them by name, and in deriſion to welcome them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what euery one of them was, it is reported that he moſt of all de- C teſted Ladiſlaus Salcanius the great Biſhop of Strigonium, for his miſerable couetouſneſſe, that being a man of infinit wealth, refuſed to ſpare part therof vnto his ſoueraigne, requeſting the ſame at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconſiderat raſhneſſe, for that he being a clergie man, would buſie himſelfe ſo far in matters not belonging to his vocation: on the contrary part, he commended Franciſcus Perenus Biſhop of Veradium, a man honorably deſcended, for his wiſe counſell (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true prophet foretelling the common ſlaughter enſuing, had ſharply ſaid in the counſell at ſuch time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, & was not by any means to bee remoued from that his fatall opinion, That he did foreſee what that their Frier-like Generall would the next day doe; and that he would with ſo great an enterpriſe effect no more, but D to make one holiday the more in the Chriſtian kalenders, in remembrance of 30000 Hungarian martyrs, moſt miſerably ſlaine of the Turkes in an vnequall battell, for defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion (for at that time, they which willingly expoſed themſelues to death in defence of the Chriſtian faith, were all accounted for martyrs.) Georgius Sepuſius and the others, he called raſh fooles, that would aduenture with ſo ſmall ſtrength to incounter ſo ſtrong an enemy. At ſuch time as the counterfeits of king Lewis and Mary his wife were ſhewed vnto him, he honorably ſaid, That he was ſorrie for the yong king, that it was his euill hap to haue ſo vnaduiſed counſellors in a matter of ſo great importance, as to perſuade him againſt all reaſon to fight at ſo great diſaduantage: & that he came not into Hungarie to take his kingdome from him, but only to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by the Hungarians: and that E if he had eſcaped the danger of the battell, he would aſſuredly haue againe reſtored vnto him the kingdome of Hungarie, contenting himſelfe with ſome ſmall tribute: and that it ſhould haue bin vnto him honor enough to haue ſaued the nephew of Sigiſmund king of Polonia his confederat, ſo ſtrongly allied with the honorable houſe of Auſtria. Al which he commanded to be told to Marie the Queene, who was for feare fled from Buda to Poſſonium. Which might perhaps all ſeeme to haue bin either diſſemblingly ſpoken, or falſly reported of the equitie and courteſie of the barbarous king, if he had not ſhortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bountie and liberalitie, without any deſert, giuen the ſame kingdom of Hungar to Ioannes Sepuſius, not borne of any royall bloud, and then retaining the mind of a very enemie. After that, he took away three goodly images of braſſe of antient workemanſhip, which F were placed in the entrance into the kings pallace, by that renowned king Mathias Coruinus the great fauourer of rare qualities and vertues: theſe images repreſented the formes of Hercules with his club, of Appollo with his harpe, and Diana with her bow and quiuer: all which hee placed in the tilt-yard at Conſtantinople, as a trophie of the Hungarian victorie. Howbeit theſe images were ſince taken downe by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, and molten (as contrary pieces of artillerie of moſt excellent and curious workmanſhip; and certain braſen pillars of chamfred worke, which ſupported the Chapiters of the gates. He taried at Buda about twen-tie daies: in which time to ſatisfie the cruell nature and greedie deſires of his ſouldiers, hee ſent out diuers troupes of horſemen into the countrie thereabout, by whom all the countrey betwixt Rab and the riuer of Tibyſcus was, by that ſudden and vnexpected incurſion ſo deſtroied, that it is reported that aboue an hundred and fiftie thouſand people of all ſorts were either ſlaine or led away into moſt miſerable captiuitie. All which done, he returned againe by the ſame way he came, to Conſtantinople.

Ioannes Sepuſius, Vayuod of Tranſiluania, aſpireth to the kingdome of Hungarie.

About the ſame time Ioannes Sepuſius Vayuod of Tranſyluania, with a great power came now too late into Hungarie to haue aided the king: but glad, as was thought, of his death, as tending to his owne aduancement; forasmuch, as he was now (the king beeing dead without H iſſue) a man of greateſt account among the nobilitie of Hungarie. Wherefore as one of a deep and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtaine the kingdome, hee began cunningly to labour diuers of the noblemen one by one, and inſtantly to requeſt them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honour of their countrey, in ſuffering the royall dignitie of that an-tient kingdome to be transferred vnto a ſtranger, of ſuch a nation as happily loued them not:
for why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had receiued in former times, in chuſing forreine kings and ſtrangers to rule ouer them, and in following their vnfortunat enſignes againſt the Turks; which thing the wofull miſeries of times paſt might I notably prooue: which either Sigiſmundus of Bohemia, or Ladiſlaus the firſt, of Polonia, by their vnfortunat battels, once at Nicopolis, againe at Gulumbarium, and laſt of all at Varna, had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to ſpeake, nay once to remember the harmes recei-ued by the long cowardiſe of Ladiſlaus, or this late raſhneſſe of his ſonne King Lewis, would make any noble minde to bluſh and be aſhamed: vnder whoſe gouernment all militarie diſcipline, and the glory of Hungary, might well be thought to be vtterly loſt. And he ſaid there remained of the nobilitie of Hungarie, men honourably deſcended of moſt antient houſes, worthie of the kingdome, which bare noble mindes, and were of ſufficient courage, diſcretion, and power, in this time of common heauineſſe to reſtore the honor of the eſtate, and worthily to defend the kingdome: amongſt whom (ſaid he) I would not be accounted ſo baſe minded, or heauie headed (although there bee many which for the honour of their houſes K and wealth may ſeeme to goe before me) that I will therefore confeſſe, that any of them is for valour, proweſſe, or fortune, better than my ſelfe, either for conducting of an army, or go-uernment of a kingdome: for I ſhall be a king of courage and valour ſufficient, if by your fauourable good will I ſhall be thought worthie of your conſent and ſufferages. The Vayuod taking this courſe, by his earneſt ſute and labor had won the good wils of many, and ſo much the eaſier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greateſt nobilitie among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into Bohemia vnto king Ferdinand, who was then greatly buſied (by reaſon of a parliament there ſummoned) in procuring the fauour of the nobilitie and commons of that Realme, againſt the time of the parliament, wherein he was in good hope to bee choſen king; as he was in ſhort time after.

At the ſame time the Hungarians were with great ſolemnitie celebrating the funerall of L their late king: whoſe dead bodie after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole by the demonſtration of one Cotriſcus one of the ſquires of his bodie, who was preſent when he was drowned, and ſo was brought out of the fens of Mohatchz to Alba Regalis, where it was with great pompe buried amongſt the ſepulchres of the other kings of Hungary his pre-deceſſours. Which ſolemne funerall once ended, the generall militarie parliament (by the au-thoritie and voice whereof the kings of Hungarie were by their antient lawes and cuſtomes to be choſen) was called: in the ſhutting vp whereof, Iohn the Vayuod hauing in that common heauineſſe no competitor, nor any of the greateſt nobilitie which durſt ſtand againſt him, was with the great applauſe and conſent of all there preſent choſen king. To whom forthwith Pe- M trus Berennus came and preſented the antient crowne of the kingdome of Hungarie, which was in his keeping, made after an homely faſhon of pure gold, with which the lawfull kings of Hungary vſed alwaies to bee ſolemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the crowne of Stephanus firſt King of Hungarie, and was by an antient cuſtome alwayes kept in the Caſtle

Iohn Sepuſius the Vayuod choſen and crowned king of Hungarie.

A of Vicegrade. And ſo Iohn the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and conſecrated by the hands of Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, lately choſen in ſtead of Ladiſlaus Salcanius, ſlaine in the battel at Mugace, & by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus Biſhop of Vacia, whom he choſe for his Secretarie. And vnto Americus Cibachus he gaue the honour of the Vayuod of Tranſyluania, being but a little before choſen Biſhop of Veradium. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen vnto the kingdome by the nobilitie which followed him out of Tranſyluania, men of great B account both in peace and warre: amongſt whom deſcended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Peſchenius, Nicholaus Gleſſa, and Ianus Docia. But whileſt this new king is in this ſort buſied in rewarding his friends, and ſtrengthening himſelfe in his kingdome, he was aduertiſed that Ferdinand his competitor of the Hungrian kingdome was choſen king of Bohemia: who out of the old controuerſie betwixt Mathias Coruinus and Fredericus the Emperors great grandfather, alleadged great claime vnto that kingdome, deriued from the time of Ladiſlaus, who was reported to haue beene poiſoned at the time of the ſolemnization of his marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who affecting the kingdome of Bohemia, ſhortly after obtained the ſame. And now it ſeemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdome C of Bohemia, and ſtrengthened with the power of his brother Charles the Emperour, not forgetting his right, might vpon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdome of Hungarie, vnto him (as hee pretended) of right belonging euer ſince the time of Albertus the Emperour.
Neither did Ferdinand beſide the ſtrength of Auſtria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of diuers of the princes of Hungarie: hauing in his court many of vnquiet ſpirit, halfe fugitiues, deſirous of change, which enuied at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had beene taken from themſelues, more worthie thereof than he) by the raſh and tumultuous fauor of the vulgar people. For beſides Bator, who in moſt mens iudgement might moſt worthily haue required and obtained the kingdome, there were others alſo almoſt of like nobilitie and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Ianus Scala, Gaſper Scredius, Baltaſor Pamphilus, and Ferentius D Gnarius; to whom alſo was ioyned Paulus Bachitius borne in Seruia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometan religion, to auoid the Turkiſh ſlauerie, got away vnto the Chriſtians, and hardly eſcaped from the battell of Mohatchz. By the perſuaſion of theſe noblemen, Ferdinand of his owne diſpoſition readie enough to claime his right, eſpecially a kingdome, and truſting vnto his ſtrength in Auſtria, Bohemia, Rhetia, Stiria, and Carynthia, marched directly towards Buda. With whoſe comming, Iohn the new king being wonderfully troubled, as a man beſet with want of all things, hauing neither ſufficient ſtrength whereupon to reſt in his new got kingdome, neither any great aſſurance of the fidelitie of his ſubiects, like enough either for feare, or of their naturall inconſtancie, to fall from him, determined not to abide the comming of his enemie to Buda: but exhorting his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and giue place to his euill fortune for a time, with ſuch power as he had brought with him out of Tranſyluania, & ſuch other as he could otherwiſe E leuie, he paſſed ouer the riuer to Peſtum: and not daring any where thereabouts to reſt, by long marches paſſed ouer the riuer Tibiſcus, and there incamped at Tocai, which was a ſtrong caſtle vpon the further ſide of the riuer. His departure being knowne, Ferdinand marching on, obtained Buda without reſiſtance: where he ſtaied a while, and conſulted with his captaines, Whether he ſhould purſue his flying enemie, or not. But it was quickly reſolued, That the diſcouraged enemie was to be ſpeedily purſued, before hee ſhould gather greater ſtrength, or enter into greater policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed al his armie vnto the nobilitie of Hungarie, his friends, whom we haue before named; who marching with all ſpeed poſſible, came to the riuer Tibiſcus: where paſſing ouer vpon a bridge made of boats which they brought with them in waggons for that purpoſe, they came with enſignes diſplayed vnto the caſtle of Tocai, where the king lay with his armie in order of battell. But terrified F with the ſudden comming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatneſſe of the danger, tooke a courſe vnto himſelfe rather ſafe than honourable: for his captaines deſiring nothing more than to ioine battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, perſuaded him to withdraw himſelfe a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fel out otherwiſe than wel, to reſerue himſelf vnto his better fortunes: as for themſelues they would moſt reſolutely fight againſt thoſe traiterous fugitiues, foraſmuch as it were great diſhonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuſe battell being offered by the enemie. Amongſt the chieftaines of the kings armie, Ferentius Budo an old captain of great experience and courage was chiefe, to whom the King deliuered his Enſigne with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his ſoldiers: he himſelfe ſtood in the maine battell with the Hungarians, placing the Tranſyluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands armie, Valentinus Turaccus led the maine battell with the Hungarians, vnder Ferdinands Enſigne; ſtrengthned on the one ſide with troupes of horſemen out of Styria, and on the other, with the horſemen of Auſtria. But Paulus Bachitius (according to the manner of the Turkiſh wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a companie of light horſemen lay cloſe in ambuſh in a conuenient place for that purpoſe, a good diſtance off, againſt the left wing of the enemies armie, readie as occaſion ſhould ſerue, to take his moſt aduantage. It was not greatly needfull for the captaines to vſe any perſuaſions to encourage their ſouldiers, readie enough of themſelues to fight. The great ordnance once diſcharged, the armies came faſt on and ioyned battell, where the wings of both battels fought with diuers fortune. The Styrian horſemen were not able to endure the force of the Tranſyluanians, but were put to the worſe. And on the other ſide, the left wing of Bodo his armie, conſiſting for moſt part of raw and vnexpert ſoldiers, was by the horſemen of Auſtria ouerthrown. At the ſame time both the main battels (being almoſt all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that ſo eagerly, as ſeldome had bin ſeene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a freſh charge giuen by Ferdinands horſemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his army fighting moſt valiantly, was diſordred and put to flight: Bodo the General laboring to reſtore the battell, and to ſaue the enſigne to him before by the King deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horſemen taken. The other captaines ſeeing all loſt, and paſt hope of recouerie, betooke themſelues to flight: all the Kings Artillerie and Enſignes were taken by the enemie. The king ſeeing the ouerthrow of his armie, for ſafegard of his life fled into Polonia. Ferdinands captaines following the courſe of the victorie, entred into Tranſyluania; where the people yeelding themſelues at the firſt, all the whole prouince ſubmitted it ſelfe vnto the authoritie of Ferdinand. Bodo and the reſt of the noblemen that were taken priſoners, with the enſignes taken from the enemies, were ſent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his liberty promiſed, could not be perſuaded to renounce his oath giuen to king Iohn, and to beare armes againſt him, he was by Ferdinand his commandement caſt into a darke dungeon, where ſhortly after conſumed with ſorrow and griefe, he miſerably ended his life.

The battell of Tocai, betweene the armies of King Iohn and king Ferdnand.

King Iohn flies into Polonia.

Ferdnād crowned king of Hūgarie at Alba Regalis.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally ſubmitting themſelues vnto him) was by their common conſent ſaluted King, and crowned with the ſame old Crowne wherewith King Iohn had bin crowned, which the ſame Perenus (a man of little conſtancie) brought vnto him; and with him was alſo crowned Anne his wife, the only ſiſter of the late king Lewis. All which ſolemne ceremonies were celebrated at Alba Regalis, the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. Ferdinand by rare felicitie thus poſſeſſed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into Bohemia, and left his deputies for the gouernement of the kingdome of Hungarie: theſe were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed viceroy, with whom he ioyned Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, who had alſo reuolted from king Iohn; and made Beretbſaxtus Secretarie, and Alexius Turſonus a Morauian, Treaſurer.

King Iohn thus miſerably diſtreſſed, and thruſt out of his kingdome by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronimus Laſcus, a man for his honorable diſcent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongſt the Polonians: who glad of ſo honorable a gueſt, was more careful of nothing, than with all poſſible kindeneſſe and curteſie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in ſo many calamities with the loſſe of his kingdome: he frankely promiſed vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not ſmall) for the recouerie of his former eſtate; and that which more was, for the reuiuing of his former felicitie, the vttermoſt of his wit and deuice, which in the compaſſing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. That bountifull entertainment of this poore king by Laſcus, was not altogether vnpleaſant to Sigiſmund K. of Polonia, although (becauſe he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was ioyned in friendſhip and alyance) he ſeemed to moſt men plainly to forget himſelfe, in ſhewing ſo ſmall kindneſſe vnto K. Iohn, whoſe ſiſter Barbara he had ſomtime married: which was the cauſe that Laſcus forgot no point of curteſie in entertaining his gueſt, and yet the credit of Sigiſmund with king Ferdinand not toucht. But when

A when they had ſpent almoſt a month in conſultation & debating of matters too and fro, Laſcus accuſtomed with his deep wit ſharply to reaſon, and aduiſedly to determine of moſt weighty cauſes, at laſt reſted vpon this one point, That ready helpe in ſo hard and deſperat a caſe was only to be hoped for of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a moſt mightie prince and of an honorable diſpoſition, anſwerable to his greatneſſe, would not reiect the humble praiers of an oppreſſed and exiled king: eſpecially, if that being by his mer- B cie and power reſtored, he could be content for ſo great a benefit to hold his kingdome, as of the bountie of the Othoman kings. For Laſcus ſaw that Solyman (ſo great and proud an Emperour) was not ſo deſirous of kingdomes (whereof he had ſo many as could not eaſily be reckoned, then commanding ouer a great part of the world) as of glory and renowne, wherewith he vnderſtood him to be wonderfully delighted aboue all other kings of the Eaſt, naturally carried away with that windie vanitie. This counſell (as in effect it proued) was vnto king Iohn wholeſome and reaſonable, if a man do but reſpect the poore eſtate of a king, ſo greatly wronged, liuing in exile, but reſpecting the Chriſtian common weale, it was vndoubtedly moſt dangerous and lamentable, for one mans particular profit to bring the whole ſtate into moſt dreadfull and horrible danger: but the ſicke minds of worldly men, liuing in ſmall hope of C doing wel, & at the point of deſparation, refuſe no worldy remedies, be they neuer ſo doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon rhis reſolution with the king, Laſcus deſirous by noble actions to encreaſe the honor of his name, tooke the matter vpon him, and went as embaſſadour from the exiled king to Solyman to Conſtantinople. The report was, that Sigiſmund did not only not ſtay him, but ſecretly gaue him his ſafe cōduct with letters of credence, wherin he commended him vnto the Baſſaes & other great men in Solymans court, deſcended of the Polonian bloud, as his faithfull and louing ſubiect ſent thither vpon an extraordinary and ſpeciall embaſſage. Laſcus as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, with wonderful dexteritie had in ſhort time won the fauor, not of the Baſſaes only, but of the other courtiers alſo; preſenting them with ſuch gifts as might for the fineneſſe and rareneſſe thereof, rather than D for the value (as he thought) be moſt acceptable and pleaſing to their wiues: for amongſt that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whether they proceed of ſimple good will, or other reſpect, is no great difference. Amongſt the great Baſſaes at that time of greateſt power and authoritie, was Luſtebeius, or rather Lutzis, who had married Solymans ſiſter; and Abraham borne at Parga, a baſe village in Acarnania, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then viſier or chiefe of the Baſſaes, and keeper of the Emperors ſeale, and was by his office to ſubſcribe all ſuch grants or letters as paſſed from the Emperor: by which his great place, and the ſpeciall fauor he had with Solyman, he in magnificence, power, & authoritie, far exceeded all the reſt of the Baſſaes, doing whatſoeuer pleaſed himſelfe; & that with ſuch ſoueraigntie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly ſaid, he was the commander of his thoughts. Laſcus thus inſinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Baſſaes without an interpretor, for that he could wel ſpeake the E Sclauonian tongue (the familiar ſpeech of the Turkiſh courtiers) earneſtly ſolicited the kings cauſe, wonderfully commending him: for at his firſt comming, after he had ſaluted Solyman, & was about to haue declared the cauſe of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkiſh court referred to the Baſſaes: for Solyman vſed not to admit any Chriſtian to talk with him in his court. Laſcus requeſted of Solyman, by the Baſſaes, That king Iohn wrongfully thruſt out of his kingdom by Ferdinand duke of Auſtria, & the treaſon of certain of the Hungarians, might by the Turkiſh power be again reſtored vnto the kingdom of Hungary, which he would hold by homage of the Turkiſh Emperor, as of right belonging vnto him, ſince the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs & ſubduing his enemies, had by law of arms (fortune ſo iudging) gained the ſame. Promiſing that king Iohn, who for his worthines was by the generall good liking of the Hungarians lawfully choſen to be their king, and ſo after the F antient maner of that kingdom crowned, if he were now receiued into Solymans protection, & by him reſtored, ſhould neuer forget ſo great a benefit, but alwaies moſt faithfully and thankfully to honor the maieſtie of Solyman, paying him ſuch yerely tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe, and to make it knowne to all men, that he was his vaſſall. Which thing if it would pleaſe him to grant, it ſhould be no leſſe honor & glory to Solyman himſelf, than profitable and comfortable vnto the diſtreſſed king. For beſide, that heroical kings are compared vnto gods, Laſcus counſelleth king Iohn to craue aid of Solyman.

rather for giuing than receiuing:it was eaſie to be ſeen,how greatly it did concerne the profit G of the Othoman kings to bee neighboured with a weake and tributarie king, rather than with Ferdinand,a prince of great power, lately choſen king of Bohemia, ſupported by the ſtrength of his brother Charles the Emperor,commanding ouer the warlike nation of the Germanes ; which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continuall heauie warre vpon his borders,and the ſafe enioying of a moſt aſſured peace.Beſide that, it concerned the Turks to beware,that ſuch things as they had got by the ſword,they ſhould alſo by the ſword defend,&not to ſuffer any one to grow greater than the reſt in riches and power.For it might ſo fall out,that Charles,growne to be a prince of mightie power, might draw the reſt of the Chriſtian princes to ioine with him in the common cauſe of the Chriſtian religion, & in that quarrell,as the Chriſtian kings of Europe had in former time done,with vnited forces to ſeeke H to recouer againe what they had before loſt; whoſe force it would bee hard to withſtand.
Theſe things being ſharply deliuered,& by the Baſſaes againe reported to Solyman,who ſtanding at a ſecret window,had before heard them as they were by Laſcus to the Baſſaes declared;it was no great labor to perſuade the Turkiſh Emperour,of himſelf deſirous of glory and ſoueraigntie, againe to vndertake the Hungarian war, and to grant king Iohn his requeſt,promiſing according to the ſucceſſe of the victorie,to giue him that he deſired,ſo that he would faithfully performe what he had promiſed,and not ſhew himſelfe therefore vnthankfull.

Solyman granteth Laſcus his requeſt.

In the meane time,Ferdinand vpon great reaſon thinking it neceſſarie by all means poſſible to confirme himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Hungarie : and fearing no force but the Turks,determined to proue Solymans diſpoſition, and to ſeeke for his friendſhip;hoping by I reaſonable meanes to compaſſe it, by ſhewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of iuſtice)his antient title and claime, and that hee was by the antient lawes of the countrie right heire thereof: thinking that Solyman hauing obtained ſo many victories,and ruling ouer ſo many kingdomes,would now at length giue himſelfe to peace,as a man contented with his glorie already gotten. His deſire was,to be receiued into his friendſhip,and to ioine with him in league vpon the ſame conditions which Ladiſlaus and his ſon Lewis had for certain yeares before obtained of the Othoman kings,and Sigiſmund king of Polonia then alſo with like quietneſſe inioied.Wherfore hauing found out a fit man,whom he might ſend vpon this embaſſage to Conſtantinople (one Ioannes Oberdanſcus, a Hungarian) K he furniſhed him accordingly, and gaue him gifts,ſuch as hee thought good to beſtow vpon the great Baſſaes. But when Oberdanſcus was come vnto Conſtantinople, he found Solyman harder to bee intreated than hee had before hoped, and the Baſſaes altogether vnwilling to heare of any league: for although he was courteouſly receiued of Solyman,and moſt patiently heard,whileſt he both eloquently and diſcreetly before the great Baſſaes,deliuered his embaſſage;yet in the ſhutting vp of all,he receiued no more but a proud and inſolent anſwer;for Solyman ſaid,it was far from the manner of his anceſtors,to receiue them into grace and fauor which had done iniurie vnto the Othoman name : wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to inuade another mans kingdome,and to thinke to hold it to himſelfe; foraſmuch as his old title and claime which he ſtood ſo much vpon, was altogether extinguiſhed and loſt L by law of armes,by his late victorie againſt king Lewis; for which cauſes he adiudged him vnworthie of his friendſhip and fauor,purpoſing ſharply to reuenge the wrong he had receiued; and proclaiming war,to come againe into Hungarie with ſuch a power as ſhould be ſufficient to inuade Ferdinand either in Auſtria or Germanie. Wherfore in ſtead of friendſhip and league he denounced vnto him all the calamities of war : and ſo commanded the embaſſadour with ſpeed to depart from Conſtantinople. But Oberdanſcus when hee was come backe againe as farre as Vienna,and had there told the kings lieutenants,of the threatning words of Solyman, and that he would ſhortly come thither with his armie, he was not of any of them beleeued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherefore to ſhun the hatred of them which miſtooke truth for falſhood, hee made haſt to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at Spires,labouring for M voices to further his ſuit,for that at the next aſſemblie of the ſtates of the empire, which was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himſelfe as he well hoped,was to be choſen King of the Romanes. The newes brought by Oberdanſcus, did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreſeeing as it were what would happen : for that the Turkiſh tyrant vſed not lightly to breake ſuch promiſes, but to performe them to the vttermoſt : and that more increaſed his care, he knew he ſhould come in euill time to craue help of the Germans, for the defence of his kingdome in Hungarie againſt ſo mightie an enemie; eſpecially his brother A Charles the Emperour being buſied in his wars in Italie, and he himſelfe wanting money the only means to raiſe an armie to withſtand the Turke. The Spring now come, and all things freſh and greene, Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, hauing leuied an army of an hundred and fifteene thouſand men, ſet forward from Hadrianople, his European horſmen going before him conducted by Abraham the great Baſſa, and Achomates Michael-Ogli, Generall of the Acanzij or voluntarie horſemen: and his Aſian ſouldiers led by Behrambeius Baſſa following after him; he himſelfe with his Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court keeping in the middle. And marching on in this ſort, came in fifteene daies to Belgrade, where King Iohn accompanied with Laſcus and ſuch of the Hungarian nobilitie as tooke his part, came vnto him, B of purpoſe to make himſelfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him, and doing him all the honour he poſſibly could, to requeſt him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. Solyman with graue and yet friendly countenance, raiſing himſelfe a little from the cuſhion whereon he ſat, gaue him his right hand, proteſting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more deſired of God, than to be able to relieue diſtreſſed Princes, eſpecially ſuch as were wrongfully oppreſſed by his enemies: wherfore he willed him to be of good comfort, promiſing of his bountie frankly to beſtow vpon him whatſoeuer he ſhould in that war win with the ſword from the enemie. King Iohn obtained this rare fauor of Solyman by the earneſt mediation of Abraham the commanding Baſſa, whom he had before at Conſtantinople by his embaſſador Laſcus ſo woon with gifts and requeſts, that he thorowly tooke vpon him the de-C fence of the kings cauſe: wherein Laſcus was eſpecially holpen by Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his ſon, who then followed the Turks campe, and was for his fathers ſake and the great ſufficiencie hee held himſelfe, had in great reputation amongſt the Turks, and in ſuch fauor with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perſuade him to any thing he would. For this Aloyſius Grittus, borne and brought vp in Conſtantinople, and wonderfull eloquent in the Turkiſh tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himſelfe, and the great port he kept in his houſe, ſo thorowly poſſeſſed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himſelfe ouer the hauen to Pera, to ſolace himſelfe in Grittus his pleaſant gardens and banquetting houſes, which he had there moſt ſumptuouſly made after the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefe man in receiuing of the Turks cuſtomes.

Solyman commeth into Hungarie with a great armie.

King Iohn commeth to Solyman at Belgrade.

D The fame of Solymans comming directly from Belgrade to Buda, ſo terrified the citizens of Buda, that they almoſt all forſooke the citie and fled vnto other places further off, ſome to Strigonium, ſome to Alba Regalis, ſome to Poſſonium: ſo that at his firſt comming he entered the citie (almoſt deſolate) without any reſiſtance: the caſtle holden by a garriſon of Germans, he commanded to bee beſieged. The captaine of the caſtle was one Thomas Nadaſtus, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honor of his houſe, & his qualities anſwerable to the ſame, graced with ſingular learning: he perceiuing his ſoldiers diſmaied with the ſight of ſo great an armie, and willing to ſurrender vp the caſtle, as beſeemed a valiant captaine, forbad his ſouldiers to haue any talke with the enemie, commanded the great E artillerie to be bent and diſcharged vpon the Turks: and ſeeing his ſouldiers ſlacke and timorous, reproued them of cowardiſe and treaſon, threatning them with ſhamefull death if they did not hold out the ſiege to the vttermoſt, & ſhew themſelues valiant men, both for the honor of their country, & of king Ferdinand whoſe pay they receiued, & of whoſe bounty they were to expect rewards and preferments anſwerable to their deſerts. But they miſdoubting by the running too & fro of the Turks, that the caſtle was vndermined, & ſmelling, or at leſtwiſe imagining themſelues to ſmell the ſent of the gunpouder, which they ſuppoſed to be in the mine, & doubting to be preſently blown vp, were ſtruck with ſuch a ſudden feare, that neither the fear of future puniſhment, neither the ſhame of ſo foule a fact, nor the reuerence of ſo worthy a captain could ſtay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer vp the F caſtle: which when they could by no means perſuade the reſolute captain to conſent to, but that he ſtil with ſtern countenance exclaimed againſt their cowardiſe and treaſon, they laied hands on him, & bound him hand & foot, & ſo preſently concluded with the enemy to yeeld to him the caſtle, ſo that they might in ſafety depart thence with bag & baggage: which their depart with their baggage towards Poſſonium, as was before agreed: and the Ianizaries comming into the caſtle, hauing looſed the captaine, were about to let him goe alſo; Solyman aduertiſed of the trecherie of the garriſon ſouldiers, and of the fidelity of the captaine, changing his mind, iudged ſuch villanous minded men vnworthy of his mercy, & in deteſtation of their perfidious dealing with their captaine, gaue them all to his Ianizaries to bee ſlaine: but to the captaine himſelfe he offered honorable entertainment, which when he refuſed, Solyman courteouſly ſent him away, holpen therein by the commendation of king Iohn, although his ſiſter was married to Stephanus Maylat his deadly enemie. Which bloudie execution done by the commandement of the bloudie tyrant, the Turks ſaid was not only lawfully done, but alſo to the immortall glorie of his name in the execution of iuſtice; which might peraduenture ſeem reaſonable, if the perpetuall hatred of that moſt barbarous nation againſt the Chriſtians gaue H not iuſt occaſion of ſuſpect, that it proceeded rather of their antient malice, than of any regard of iuſtice. For why ſhould the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his ſafe conduct, be thought worthy of ſo cruell death? when as Solyman himſelfe in puniſhing the periurie of another, ran into wilfull periurie himſelfe, peruerting the commendation of iuſtice which he ſo much deſired, by his moſt bloudie and vniuſt ſentence.

Solyman contrarie to his promiſe cauſeth the garriſon ſouldiers after they had deliuered the caſtle, to bee ſlaine.

Buda the chiefe citie of Hungarie thus taken by Solyman, he reſolued forthwith to beſiege Vienna the chiefe citie of Auſtria: in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other cities of leſſe ſtrength both of Hungarie and Auſtria would without any reſiſtance be yeelded I vnto him. Wherefore he ſent before him Achometes with the voluntarie horſemen, who according to the manner of the Turkiſh wars, running thorow the heart of Hungarie, & entring with fire and ſword into Auſtria, paſſed by Vienna, miſerably burning and deſtroying the country before him as far as Lyntz. The poore people not knowing where to hide themſelues from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women diſmaid, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what els they could, as things ſaued out of the midſt of the fire. For whatſoeuer fell into the enemies hand, was loſt without recure: the old men were ſlain, the yong men led away into captiuitie, women rauiſhed before their husbands faces, and afterwards ſlain with their children, young infants were ript out of their mothers wombs, and others taken from their breſts were cut in pieces, or elſe thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes, yeelding vp againe that breath which they had but a K little before receiued; with many other incredible cruelties, which were then by the merciJeſſe enemie committed. Solyman himſelfe ſhortly after followed theſe forerunners, and ſetting forward with all his armie from Buda towards Vienna, by the way tooke the caſtle of Altenbourg, whether by force or compoſition, is diuerſly reported: of the garriſon ſouldiers there placed by king Ferdinand, he reſerued 300 Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his campe. He alſo aſſaulted the little city of Neapolis ſeuen times in one day, and was as often repulſed: but being loath to ſpend any longer time about a towne of ſo ſmall importance he forſook that, & held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the ſix & twentie day of September, and incamped in fiue places round about the citie, with ſuch a world of people, that vnto them which viewed his campe from the higheſt tower in Vienna, it ſeemed that the ground was for the ſpace of eight miles all couered with the multitude of his tents and people. L King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his embaſſadour Oberdanſcus receiued the hard anſwere from Solyman, alwaies ſtood in doubt of his comming; and beſide his owne forces (which were not great to oppoſe againſt ſo mightie an enemie) craued aide of the Chriſtian Princes his neighbours, eſpecially of the Princes of the Empire: Who granting him aide againſt the common enemie, appointed Fredericke Countie Palatine of Rhene and Duke of Bauaria, Generall of their forces. But whileſt the Germaines after their manner, ſlowly ſet forward, and made leſſe haſt than the greatneſſe of the preſent danger required; Solyman comming in the meane time, had ſo belaied the Citie, that it was not poſſible for the Duke Fredericke by any means to get into it, but was glad to ſtay with his armie at Chremſe M about twelue miles from Vienna. A few daies before by good hap, vpon the report of the loſſe of Buda, twentie thouſand ſoldiers horſemen and footmen out of diuers countries, were in good time come to Vienna: Amongſt theſe, the chiefe Commaunders was Philip the Solyman commeth to Vienna

Vienna badly fortified.

A ſent thither but a little before with a few companies of horſemen and footmen by Fredericke his vncle, who was comming after with a greater power himſelfe, but was now ſhut out of the city by Solyman) Nicholaus countie of Salma, the L. William Rogendorff, ſteward of the Kings houſhold, Ioannes Cazzianer, a noble man of Croatia, and afterwards Gouernor of Vienna: and next vnto them, Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardecus, Leonardus Velſius, Hector Kamſack, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongſt the Germans. The citie of Vienna as it was of ſome good ſtrength toward the North, by reaſon of Danubius, ſo in other places it was at that time neither by art nor nature ſtrong. The ditches, ſuch as they were, were altogether drie, and eaſie to be paſſed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the antient ſimple manner of fortification of cities: for B before that time neither had king Ferdinand, fearing no enemie, neither they of Vienna, who had not of many yeares ſeene an enemie, had any care to fortifie the citie: but as men altogether buried in ſecuritie, and nothing fearing the comming of ſo mightie an enemie (although they were therof before admoniſhed by Oberdanſcus) had not ſo much as caſt vp any rampire or bulwarke, more than at the gate of Carinthia, wheron they might conueniently place their great ordnance: ſo that of 100 great pieces, and 300 others of leſſe charge, which might haue wonderfully annoyed the enemie, a great part ſerued to no vſe, for want of conuenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the ſudden comming of the enemie, and the ſhortneſſe of the time gaue leaue, ſuch bulwarkes as they could vpon the ſudden, they caſt vp, and planted their ordnance thereon. The citie was diuided into diuers quarters, and to euery part a ſtrong C garriſon appointed for the defence thereof, all the gates of the citie were mured vp, except ſuch as were of purpoſe reſerued to ſallie out at. Now had Abraham the great Baſſa encamped himſelfe vpon a high hil, where ſtood a ruinous caſtle, from whence he might ouerlooke all the citie, yet ſo, as that he lay out of the danger of gun ſhot. Becrambeius, Solymans great commander in Aſia, lay at the gate called Purgatoria, neere the church of S. Vlderich. In the third campe towards the riſing of the hils, lay Michael-Ogli, towards the church of S. Vitus. At the Scottiſh gate toward Danubius, lay the Aſapi, with diuers companies of the Ianizaries: which with ſhot out of their trenches, ſuffred no man to appeare vpon the wals in that quarter without moſt manifeſt danger, and poured ſuch ſhowers of arrowes ouer the wals into the citie, as if they had fallen out of the clouds, that hardly could any man ſtir in the citie vnarmed, but D hee was forthwith wounded. Solyman himſelfe lay neere vnto S. Markes church, compaſſed about with the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court, defended alſo with the brick wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whileſt the Turks were thus incamping themſelues, the Chri-ſtian defendants oftentimes fortunatly ſallied out vpon them, and ſlew many of them. In one of which ſallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant captaine, with certain old ſoldiers of the Spaniards was ſlain, fighting moſt valiantly at the gates of the caſtle: and in another skirmiſh Chriſtophorus Zetlitz a man of great courage, ſallying out of the city with 500 horſemen, euen vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with ſix others of his company; who were all compelled by the Turks to carrie ſo many heads of their ſlain fellowes vpon poles, and ſo E preſented vnto Solyman: of whom he inquired many things as wel concerning Ferdinand him-ſelfe, and where he was, as concerning the princes which had the charge of the city, whether they were in hope to defend the ſame againſt his mightie power or not. Whereunto Chriſtophorus aptly and wiſely anſwered, although not altogether ſo truly, That king Ferdinand lay not far off at the citie of Lintz, expecting the aſſembly of a great armie: and that the princes of Germanie, Bohemia, Morauia, and of diuers other places were comming vnto him, with great aid; ſo that if he would but ſtay a little vntill his forces were come together, he ſhould then ſee whether of them were of greater ſtrength and power: foraſmuch as it would not be long before the king would come and giue him battell: as for the princes in the citie, he ſaid he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the ſouldiers from the higheſt to the loweſt, had ſolemnly ſworne to defend the citie, and not to giue it ouer, vnto the laſt man, F repoſing their hope not in the wals and fortreſſes thereof, but in their weapons and valor, being men of great reſolution, and not eaſily to be vanquiſhed or diſcouraged. With which an-ſwere although Solyman was a little moued, yet diſſembling his preſent heat, ſaid, he had hetherto made war againſt diuers nations, and alwaies had the victorie, whereof he doubted not now alſo: but as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to ſaue or kill at his pleaſure: yet to make them know that he could ſhew mercie vnto his vanquiſhed enemies, he frankely granted them their liues and liberty: charging them, that after they were again returned into the citie, they ſhould in his name wiſh the defendants of themſelues to yeeld vp the city, which it was impoſſible for them long to defend againſt his mightie power, which neither the ſtrong city of Belgrade, nor the famous citie of the Rhodes were able to withſtand; and to accept of ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould grant vnto them; promiſing, that amongſt other things proceeding of his infinit bountie, he would take order, that they ſhould in ſafetie depart thence with bag and baggage: in which doing, they ſhould well prouide for the ſafety of themſelues and of their goods by flying vnto his mercy in time, before the fury of the war was growne to further extremitie: all which it would be too late to expect after the victorie, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murther, and miſerable deſtruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to conſider of the matter, and not fooliſhly to refuſe that was now frankely offered them of mercie, which they ſhould not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or tears: for why, he was reſolutely ſet down (as he ſaid) not to depart thence before he had taken the citie. When he had thus ſchooled them, he gaue vnto euery one of them three hungarian duckats, & ſo ſent them away. They being receiued into the city with great ioy, made relation vnto the princes and great captains, of all the threatning and proud ſpeeches of the Turkiſh tyrant: which they tooke in ſuch diſdaine, that they would not vouchſafe to returne him any anſwer. Solyman not a little diſpleaſed, that his great words were ſo lightly regarded, by way of deriſion ſent word to the citie, That if they wanted help, he would ſend them the 300 Bohemians, whom he tooke in the caſtle of Altenburg: to whom anſwere was returned by them of the citie, That they needed no helpe from him, wherefore he might diſpoſe of his priſoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceiued, that Vienna was not to be won with words, nor the defendants to be diſcouraged with great lookes, wherefore he begun to vſe his force, & with ſuch ordnance as he had brought with him, to batter the wals: which becauſe it was not great, but fitter for ſeruice in field than for batterie, did not much more harme than to beat down the battlements & ſuch like ſtandings, made of timber and boords in manner of galleries, hanging here & there ouer the wall, for the ſmall ſhot to play out of, a ſimple deuiſe in ſtead of flankers. His great artillerie prouided for batterie was comming vp the riuer of Danubius, which he daily looked for; but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward captaine, hearing of the Turkes comming vp the riuer, went out of Poſſonium with certain ſmall veſſels wel appointed, & meeting with the Turks, ſet vpon them with ſuch courage & reſolution that he ſlew many of them, and ſunke diuers of their boats and pinnaces, amongſt whom were they which were bringing vp Solymans great pieces for batterie to Vienna; which was there all ſunke in the riuer, with the boats that brought it. By this good ſeruice, Solyman was diſappointed of his great artillerie, and the citie deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus hauing made great ſpoile amongſt the Turkes, and loſt ſome few men, returned with victorie to Poſſonium. Yet another part of the Turks fleet comming vp to Vienna, at the firſt comming brake downe all the bridges: for a little aboue the citie, the riuer of Danubius diuiding his channell, maketh diuers Iſlands, which by ſundrie bridges are ioined together, ouer which lieth the way from Auſtria vnto the citie. This fleet ſo kept the paſſage, that no man could without danger either by water or by land go in or out of the citie. Solyman hauing loſt all his pieces for batterie, & ſeeing how little he preuailed with his field pieces, fel to vndermining of the city, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This work, as the Turks chiefe hope, was with wonderful labor & diligence attempted in 15 ſundry places: which was not ſo ſecretly done, but that is was by drums laid vpon the ground, by baſons filled with water, & ſounds made into the earth perceiued by the defendants, and ſo with countermines met withall, that moſt part of thoſe works were vtterly fruſtrated, & in them 8000 of his Turks either ſlaine or buried quicke.

Eight thouſand Turkes loſt in the mines.

Solyman to buſie the defendants that they ſhould not ſo perfectly diſcouer his mines, diuided his army into foure parts, appointing them orderly to ſucceed one after another in giuing alarums to the town, that filling their eares with continuall noiſe, he might keep them alwaies occupied. In the midſt of which hurly burly his mine-workes went forward with all ſpeed poſſible, neither was he in that his expectation deceiued: for one of the mines brought to perfection vnperceiued by the defendants, and ſuddenly blown vp, ſhook and ouerthrew a great part

A part of the wall neere vnto the gate which leadeth towards Carinthia; whereat the Turkes gaue a great ſhout, as if the citie had now bin taken, and withal couragiouſly ſtepping forward, preſſed in on all ſides, by the ruines of the wall to haue entred the breach, charging the defendants with their ſmall ſhot and Turkie arrowes as thicke as haile. Who on the contrarie part like reſolute men ſtood in the face of the breach, with more aſſurance than the wall it ſelfe, receiuing them with deadly ſhot and puſh of pike, in ſuch furious manner, that the Turks for all B their multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the aſſault, began to retyre. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, ſent in new ſupplies, and ſo renewed the aſſault before giuen ouer, but with no better ſucceſſe than before: for hauing receiued a great ouerthrow, as men forgetting both dutie and martiall diſcipline, they retyred, not expecting any ſigne of retreat. At this aſſault ſo many of the Turks were ſlaine, that the ground neere vnto the town lay couered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies. Not long after, the wall was blowne vp in two places more, ouer againſt S. Clares church; by which breach, being not verie great, the Turks ſeeking to haue entred, made a bloudie fight with the Germans which defended that place; which they ſought ſo deſperatly to haue entred, that without regard they thruſt one another vpon the points of their enemies weapons; who gliſtering in good armour, readily receiued them C being for moſt part naked men, and ſlew them without number, and ſo inforced them againe diſorderly to retyre, hauing before filled both the breaches with their dead carkaſes. Three dayes after enſued a moſt cruell fight, when as another part of the wall (neere vnto the gate of Carinthia, and not far from the firſt breach) was ſo ſuddenly ouerthrowne, that the Turks thorow the new made breach ſeeing the Chriſtians as they ſtood readie to come to the defence thereof; and likewiſe the Chriſtians them, now approching; for eagerneſſe and haſt on both ſides threw away their pieces and bowes, and came to handie blowes in the middle of the breach; the Turks with their ſcimiters, and the Germans with their long ſwords. At which time, as the Chriſtian captaines encouraged their ſoldiers with cheerefull perſuaſions; ſo the Turkiſh commanders enforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The aſ-D ſault began ſo terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly fight was neuer ſeen from the beginning of the world: which was with great reſolution maintained by the Turks, for that many of their moſt valiant horſemen forſaking their horſes, thruſt in with their targets and ſcimiters, or elſe with their launces amongſt the Ianizaries and other footmen, and there fought moſt deſperatly. At laſt, after this furious fight had endured by the ſpace of 3 houres, and many of the Turks beſt captaines and ſoldiers lay dead vpon the ground by heapes; the Turks ſeeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the aſſault, and retyred to their campe.

The Turkes repulſed from the breach.

A moſt terrible aſſault.

The Turks the third time repulſed.

Long and tedious it were to recount euery aſſault giuen during the time of that dreadfull ſiege, with euery particular accident not vnworthie the remembrance, which for breuity wittingly I paſſe ouer. Yet among the reſt, the moſt valiant leader (though afterward vnfortunat) the Lo. William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiuing many of the Turks ſtragling diſorderly abroad in the countrey, one day vpon the ſudden ſallied out vpon E them with certain troups of horſemen, with ſuch violence, that at the firſt onſet he ouerthrew them, and hauing them in chaſe, did ſuch ſpeedie execution, that of 5300 ſcarce 140 eſcaped his hands: after which time his name became terrible vnto the Turkes. Solyman was exceedingly grieued with the often & bloudie aſſaults by him in vain giuen to the city; but purpoſing now to proue the laſt and vtmoſt of all his forces, he called to him the chiefe Commanders of his army, whom at the firſt he ſharply reprooued as men of no courage, which being many times as good as poſſeſſed of the victorie, had moſt cowardly, contrarie to the maner of that victorious nation, turned their backes vpon their enemies, in the breaches alreadie halfe woon: wherefore he willed them to pluck vp their hearts, & to make all things readie for a new aſſault, wherin he expected that they ſhould with couragious forwardnes and reſolution, recompence their late cowardiſe: for why, he accounted it a great diſhonor to forſake the ſiege F begun; wherfore they ſhould reſolue the next day as victorious conquerors to take the city, or elſe there as faint hearted cowards to end their days. The next day after this heauie charge giuen, which was the fifteenth of October, the great commanders of the Turks army with all their forces aſſailed the citie, thruſting their men into the breaches by heaps, as if they would, if no way elſe, yet with verie multitude (if it had bin poſſible) haue diſcouraged or ouerborne the Chriſtians: they were come to handie blows, and the fight was in euery place moſt terrible, ble, the Chriſtian defendants ſtill repulſing them with greater courage than they were able to G aſſaile them. Beſides that, to the great aduantage of the defendants, many pieces of their great ordnance skilfully mounted in places moſt conuenient, and continually diſcharged among the thickeſt of their enemies as they preſſed on, made of them ſuch ſlaughter, and ſo cut them off, that being thorowly diſcouraged, they ſhrunk backe, and could no by any threats or command of their captaines be thruſt forward; chuſing rather to be ſlaine of their own captaines (as ſome of them were) than to be rent in ſunder with the murthering ſhot of the Chriſtians. So that the captaines ſeeing now no other remedie, gaue ouer the aſſault and retyred, leauing behind them many thouſands of their dead Turks in the towne ditches.

The Turks repulſed.

The next day after this aſſault, Solyman deſpairing to win the city, and fearing the comming of King Ferdinand and the Countie Palatine with a ſtrong armie, as it had been to him reported, conſidering alſo that Winter was now comming faſt on, determined to raiſe his ſiege: and H to colour the diſhonour thereof, he ſent certaine of the chiefe priſoners which he had taken, richly apparelled, with their purſes full of money, into the citie, to tell the captaines, that he came not with purpoſe either to beſiege or take the city, but to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by his enemie king Ferdinand, and to haue fought a battell with him for the kingdom of Hungarie: whom foraſmuch as he could not draw vnto Vienna, he would remooue thence to ſeeke for him, as his capitall enemie: wherefore they ſhould do well to yeeld themſelues; which if they would, he promiſed not to enter their citie, but to receiue both the citiſens and ſoldiers into his protection, reſeruing vnto them their liues and goods, with perpetuall freedome. Which his offer the defendants ſcornfully refuſed, as proceeding of meere deſparation. I The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous cruelty cauſed all the priſoners in his armie to be ſlaine; which pittifull outcries was of the ſouldiers heard into the city, not knowing what the matter ſhould be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemy, they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their owne bloud, a moſt lamentable ſpectacle to behold. Solyman purpoſing to forſake the ſiege, cauſed Abraham the great Baſſa to ſhew himſelfe in order of battell, as if he would haue giuen a freſh aſſault: in the meane time he himſelfe roſe vpon the ſudden with the reſt of his armie, and returned towards Buda in ſuch haſt, that he neither put any garriſon into ſuch places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Baſſa followed, keeping himſelfe a dayes journey behind him: and ſo in fiue dayes he arriued with all his K armie at Buda, 32 Germane miles from Vienna.

Solyman raiſeth his ſiege.

This ſiege was giuen ouer by Solyman about the ſixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to haue loſt eightie thouſand men, amongſt whom was his great Lieutenant of Aſia, with many other of his forward Captaines and beſt ſouldiers. Of the defendants few or none of name were loſt; but of the countrey people it is ſuppoſed that there was aboue ſixtie thouſand ſlain nnd carried away into captiuitie: all the country about Vienna was miſerably ſpoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turks cut downe to the ground. Solyman according to his promiſe reſtored Buda vnto king Iohn; who by ſolemne writing acknowledged himſelfe his vaſſall, and to hold the kingdome of Hungarie of him as his lord and ſoueraigne. Vnto him Solyman ioyned Aloyſius Grittus as his Legat, to helpe him to prouide ſuch things as L ſhould be needfull for the defence of that kingdome.

Solyman reſtoreth the kingdome of Hungary to K. Iohn.

It hapned one day whileſt Solyman lay at Buda, and had giuen king Iohn with diuers of the nobilitie of Hungarie acceſſe into his pauilion, that he fell earneſtly in hand with king Iohn, to pardon Paulus biſhop of Strigonium, and Petrus Perenus (who had taken part with king Ferdinand) and to receiue them into his fauor again: which men king Iohn in no caſe liked of, becauſe that they as traitors vnto their Prince and countrey, forgetting their faith and oath, had performed the like dutie to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation: wherin he ſhewing himſelfe vnwilling to be entreated, ſaid, That their mutable minds fraught with infidelitie, would neuer containe themſelues within the bounds of loyaltie, but find occaſion to commit ſome fouler treaſon than they had before. Whereunto M Solyman ſtraining his voice a little, as one ſomewhat moued, moſt honorably replied, Can any thing (ſaid he) happen vnto thee in this life better or more honorable, than if by thy kindeneſſe thine enemies ſhall be of all men accounted ingratefull, that is to ſay, men noted with eternall infamie; when as in thy ſelfe the commendation of a good and courteous Prince ſhall for euer remaine? And ſo not long

A long after, fearing the cold of Winter then approching, dangerous for his beaſts for carriage, eſpecially his camels, bred and brought vp in the hot countries of Aſia, he ſet forward to Belgrade, and ſo trauelling through Thracia, returned to Conſtantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungarie and Auſtria, Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the ſeuenth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, with a ſtrong army beſieged Florence, by his lieutenant Daualus, (who might haue done much againſt the Turkes, if he had been ſo well imployed) labouring by all meanes to repreſſe the libertie of the citiſens, whereunto they had but a little before aſpired, and to bring them againe vnder the ſubiection of the familie of Medices, whereof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoo he brought to paſſe, inueſting Alexander the Biſhops nephew in the dukedome of Flo- B rence, and afterward giuing him his baſe daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thruſt out of the kingdome of Hungarie by Solyman, and the dukedom of Auſtria waſted by the Turks, with the citie of Vienna in danger to haue been loſt. Which common calamities might well haue mooued both the Emperor and the Biſhop, to haue had more regard of, than by oppreſſing the libertie of one free citie, to ſeeke how to ſerue their owne priuat reſpects.

The yeare following, which was 1530, Solyman with great ſolemnitie and triumph, after the Turkiſh manner, circumciſed three of his ſonnes, Muſtapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Conſtantinople.

Solyman circumciſeth his three ſonnes.

Solyman hardly diſgeſting the diſhonour he had before receiued at Vienna, and oftentimes C ſolicited by King Iohn, for aid againſt Ferdinand, who with greater ſtomacke than power ceaſed not continually to moleſt him: but moſt of all prickt forward with the inſatiable deſire of inlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Othoman kings, accounting his neighbor princes alwayes his enemies, and their dominions the obiects of his victories, and ſpoile for his ſouldiers; raiſed ſuch an armie, as for the greatneſſe thereof might worthily haue bin a terror vnto the world: not ſo much purpoſing the protection of king Iohn, which he in ſhew moſt pretended; neither the ſiege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted, as the conquering of Auſtria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the reſt of King Ferdinands dominions, and ſo afterwards of all Germanie. For the accompliſhment whereof, he had in his immoderat deſire prefined vnto D himſelfe the ſpace of three yeares, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not performe in more than ſo many hundreds. It was commonly reported, that the proud tyrant would many times ſay, That whatſoeuer belonged vnto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, foraſmuch as he was rightfully poſſeſſed both of the Imperiall ſeat and ſcepter of Conſtantine the Great, commander of the world, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of Armes woon from Conſtantine the late Chriſtian Emperour, whom he ſlew at Conſtantinople. And therefore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as he had occaſion to make any mention of Charles the Emperour, he would proudly, and as it were in diſdaine terme him by the name of the King of Spaine, but neuer by the name of Emperour.

The diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes, and the great troubles euen then ariſing in Germany E about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly aduertiſed, that Solyman was in perſon himſelf ſetting forward with his huge armie, ſent vnto him three Embaſſadors; whereof Leonardus Negarola, a noble gentleman well learned, and skilfull in diuers languages, was chiefe, with rich Preſents, and reaſonable offers to entreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of Seruia, were by him curteouſly receiued, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other anſwer, but that they ſhould follow his campe, and attend his further pleaſure. The report whereof brought a generall feare vpon all Germanie, but eſpecially them of Auſtria, in whoſe freſh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their countrey, their brethren and friends ſlain, their wiues and children led away into captiuitie, their goods & cattel loſt, their houſes and fields burnt, and thouſands of other grieuous calamities which they had F endured in the late inuaſion of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in verie good time a little before, for a while well appeaſed the diſſention then ariſing in Germanie about matters of religion; putting them in hope of a free and generall Councell to be holden for the deciding of all ſuch matters: & in a great aſſemblie of the States of the empire to be holden at Ratisbon, ſhewing the greatneſs of the imminent danger, ſo puiſſant an enemie threatning vnto them all

King Ferdinand ſends Embaſſadors to Solyman the calamities of war, with the manifold miſchiefe like to enſue, if they ſhould in ſo vnfit time fall at varience amongſt themſelues: offering with great reſolution, to goe in perſon himſelfe with all his old expert ſoldiers, in defence of the common Chriſtian cauſe; ſo much preuailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embaſſadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardneſſe, and all other matters for that time ſet apart, agreed all with one conſent, at a prefixed day to ſend vnto Vienna ſuch warlike forces as they had in any time before ſet forth for the defence of the Chriſtian religion, & the maieſtie of the Empire. Wherupon he wrot vnto Alphonſius Vaſtius (his lieutenant generall in Italie, and one of the greateſt captaines of that age) that he ſhould without delay call together the old captaines, and to leuie ſo many companies of harquebuſiers as they poſſibly could; and with them and the Spaniſh ſoldiers to repaire forthwith vnto him into Auſtria. He alſo enioyned Andreas Auria his Admirall, that he ſhould with like diligence rig vp a ſtrong fleet of gallies & merchants ſhips, and to go againſt the Turks Nauie into Grecia. At the ſame time he ſent for his choice horſemen out of Burgondie and the Low-countries, and many noble gentlemen and old ſouldiers out of Spaine: for the guard of his owne perſon he entertained twelue thouſand Germanes, ſuch as had longeſt ſerued in his wars in Italie, ouer whom commanded Maximilian Herberſtene and Tamiſius, both famous captaines. At the ſame time Clement the ſeuenth then Biſhop of Rome, although his coffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine wars, which had coſt him ten hundred thouſand duckats; yet to make ſome ſhew of his deuotion in ſo dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare vnto the Emperor; after he had with grieuous exaction extorted from the Clergie a great maſſe of money (whereunto his rich Cardinalls contributed nothing, as if it had bin a thing vtterly vnlawfull for them, in ſo good a cauſe to haue abated any jot of their pontificall ſhew in the court of Rome) ſent the young Cardinall Hippolitus Medices his nephew, being then about twentie yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the wars than for the Church, as his Legate vnto the Emperour, accompanied with mo good captaines than clergie men, and his coffers well ſtuffed with treaſure: whoſe comming to Ratisbone was vnto the Emperor and the Germanes verie welcome; for beſides that hee was a young gentlemen of verie comely perſonage, and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for thoſe wars (beſides the companie he brought with him) eight thouſand Hungarian horſemen, of all others beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh wars.

The preparation of Charles the emperor againſt Solyman.

Strigonium beſieged by King Iohn.

King Iohn vnderſtanding, that the formoſt of Solymans great armie were come as far as Samandria in Seruia, thought it now a fit time to wring from king Ferdinand ſuch townes as hee yet held in Hungarie; wherefore he ſent Aloyſius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his eſtate) to beſiege Strigonium, which is a citie of Hungarie ſcituat vpon the ſide of Danubius, about thirtie miles from Buda, the caſtle thereof was at that time holden with a ſtrong garriſon of king Ferdinands: whereunto for all that Grittus layed ſuch hard ſiege both by the riuer and by land, that the defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to hold out, eſpecially if Solyman ſhould take that in his way, as it was moſt like he would; ſent for reliefe to Cazzianer, a warlike captaine then gouernor of Vienna, and General of all King Ferdinands forces: by whoſe appointment certaine ſmall frigots were ſent downe the riuer of Danubius, from Poſſonium, well manned; who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks fleet (which ſo kept the riuer, that nothing could that way poſſibly be conueyed either in or out of the caſtle) ſhould by their vnexpected comming open that way. But Grittus hauing intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which though they ſerued King Ferdinand, made no great account to flie ſomtime to the one part, ſomtime to the other, as beſt fitted their purpoſe; preſently reſolued to ſend his fleet vp the riuer, and by his ſudden comming to oppreſſe his enemies, in like ſort as they had thought to haue done him. And the more to encourage his ſoldiers, he promiſed great rewards to all ſuch as ſhould performe any extraordinarie piece of ſeruice in that action: and ſo hauing thorowly furniſhed all his fleet with good ſoldiers, but eſpecially with Turkiſh archers, ſent them vp the riuer to ſeeke their enemies: who fearing no ſuch matter, as men ſurpriſed with the ſame miſchiefe they had prepared for others, were at the firſt exceedingly diſmayed; yet conſidering that they were reaſonably wel prouided for their comming (although they yet wanted ſuch helpe as Cazzianer had appointed to ſend them) they thought it a great ſhame to flie, and therefore putting themſelues in order of battel, came down the riuer, & with great courage encountred their enemie. There began a ſharpe & cruell fight, many being ſlain

A and wounded on both ſides: but at laſt they of Poſſonium not able longer to endure the deadly ſhot of their enemies, and eſpecially of the Turkiſh archers, (who with their arrowes ſore gauled both the ſoldiers and the mariners) they turned their backs and fled: in which fight of ſixtie frigots which came from Poſſonium, only thirteene eſcaped, with Corporanus the Generall, all the reſt being either ſunke in the fight, or elſe taken by the enemy, being run aſhore and forſaken by the Poſſonians, truſting more vnto their legs by land, than their oares by water. Beſides this loſſe of the Frigots, there was ſlain of the Poſſonians almoſt fiue hundred. After this victorie, Grittus hoping that they in the caſtle of Strigonium, diſpairing now of reliefe, and fearing the comming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off to batter or vndermine the caſtle, (wherewith he perceiued he little preuailed) purpoſing by lying ſtill, and keeping them in the caſtle from all reliefe, to inforce them in time to forſake the place. Thus whileſt the diuided Hungarians with their owne hands inconſiderately ſought one anothers deſtructi- B on, with the ruine of their countrie; Solyman the great enemie of all Chriſtians was readie at their backs to deuoure both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spaniſh ſoldiers in Italie, drawne together by Vaſtius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one ſort of men and other, was about 20000, whereof almoſt the third part was not ſeruiceable: for the old ſoldiers enriched with the long wars in Italie, and the ſpoyle of the rich country of Lumbardie, wherein they had of late bin billited, brought with them all their old gotten ſpoyles and ſubſtance, not forgetting ſo much as their women, and whatſoeuer elſe ſerued their pleaſure: for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vnneceſſa- C rie people, all which ſerued for no other vſe but for the ſoldiers pleaſure, and to conſume victuals. Which their licentious wantonneſſe Vaſtius deſiring to reforme, gaue ſtrait commandment thorow all the campe, That they ſhould leaue behind them all ſuch vnneceſſary bagage, and appointed what carriages ſhould ſuffice for euery companie. Whereat the ſouldiers began at the firſt to murmure, and preſently after to ariſe vp in mutinie: for many of the captains being rich, and diſliking of that long and dangerous expedition, couertly incited the common ſoldiers to crie out vpon Vaſtius the Generall, for their pay alreadie due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter ſet on foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one voice ſaid flatly, That they would go no foot further before they had receiued their pay. Vaſtius although he well perceiued that tumult to be raiſed by ſome of his enemies, which D ſought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the preſent to diſſemble the matter, & yeelding to the neceſſitie of the time, to content the mutinous ſoldiers with one months pay, promiſing them their full contentment, at ſuch time as they ſhould come vnto the emperor: and ſo when he had with much ado appeaſed that tumult, he ſet forward into Germany.

Mutinie among the Spaniſh ſoldiers.

Immediatly after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with ſuch cheerfulneſſe offered themſelues to that ſeruice, that euery captain brought with him twice ſo many in his companie as was expected: ſo that Vaſtius (who before doubtfull of their forwardneſſe in ſo dangerous a war, eſpecially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late wars receiued great harmes, had by great and earneſt perſuaſions induced diuers of the nobilitie, and others of the better ſort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after E them great numbers of their friends and tenants, as indeed they did) was now glad to ſend backe again many of the common ſoldiers, by reaſon of the multitude; and alſo to his great diſcredit, and the offence of many, full ſore againſt his will to diſplace moſt part of thoſe forward gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made captaines; who to their, no ſmall charge had gallantly furniſhed themſelues according to their degrees and places: for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he ſhould bring; and alſo giuen commandement, That reiecting the reſt, he ſhould commit the leading of them onely to thoſe old expert captaines, of whoſo valour and diſcretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria Rubeus, Philippus Torniellus, Ioannes Baptiſta Caſtalius, Fabritius Maramaldus, Pyrrhus Stipcianus, and Camillus Columna, being all men of great worth, and F approoued faith towards the Emperor.

In theſe Italian companies were fourteene thouſand ſelect footmen, beſide many other braue men who voluntarily reſorted from diuers places to Vienna. After theſe footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thouſand horſemen, and certaine troups of Grecians and Spaniards, and with them came many noble gentlemen out of all parts of Italie, who had before G bin great commanders, but now ſerued as priuate gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great ſhame to tarrie at home as cowards, and not to be preſent in that religious war.

The Emperour alſo about the ſame time hauing taken view of his horſemen come out of the Low-countries moſt excellently appointed, and ſhipping his great ordnance, whereof hee had bought great ſtore at Nurembergh, departed downe the riuer from Ratisbone to Lyntz.
The riuer of Danubius neuer carried ſo many veſſels and ſoldiers ſince the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that preſent: and yet beſides them which went down the riuer by ſhipping, the pleaſant bankes on both ſides were filled with great companies of horſemen and footmen paſſing all alongſt the riuer vnder their colours, with their drums and trumpets H ſounding, which altogether made the moſt glorious ſhew that a man could well behold vpon earth.

Solyman commeth into Hungarie.

Gunza beſieged by the Turks.

The huge armie of Solyman.

Solymans proud letters vnto the emperor Charles and king Ferdinand.

In the meane while, Solyman in ſix and fiftie days march come to Belgrade, thruſt ouer the great riuer Sauus by bridges made in diuers places, an infinit number of his horſmen into Hungarie; and leauing Danubius on the right hand, turning a little vpon the left, marched directly towards the rich countrie of Stiria, called in antient time Valeria, and now Stiermarke. By the way as he went he came to the little towne of Gunza, which one Nicholas Iuriſchitz (a man of an inuincible courage) kept with a ſmall garriſon of his owne. This towne ſtandeth in a Plain not far from the citie of Sabaria, built ſquare, and but of a ſmall compaſſe, not verie ſtrongly walled, a poore obſcure thing, neuer famous till now by the great diſhonour that the Turkiſh I Emperor Solyman there receiued. Abraham the chiefe Baſſa (who ſo abſolutely commanded among the Turks, as if Solyman had receiued him into the fellowſhip of the Empire with himſelfe) was very deſirous to ſaue this captain Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a man of great courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at ſuch time as he lay Embaſſadour at Conſtantinople: wherfore he attempted firſt by gentle perſuaſions and large offers, and afterwards by moſt terrible threats, to induce him to yeeld the town to Solyman. But finding him ſo reſolutely ſet downe, that he was neither by faire nor foule means, but only by force to be remoued out of his town; he incloſed the ſame round about with the huge armie of the Turkes, and by mines ouerthrew the walls in three places. Which ſudden breach whileſt the gariſon ſouldiers moſt valiantly defended againſt the furious aſſault of the Ianiziaries on the South K ſide of the towne, the Baſſa planting his field pieces vpon the hils on the North ſide, did from thence grieuouſly annoy the defendants: who fiercely aſſailed by their enemies before, and beaten with the great ordnance behind, were grieuouſly diſtreſſed. Wherwith the worthy gouernor ſomwhat troubled, though not much diſcouraged, ſuddenly of timber and boords raiſed vp a curtaine twelue foot high, at the backs of his ſoldiers, wherewith they were ſo couered from the ſight of their enemies, that they could not make any certain ſhot at them, but only at that curtaine at all aduentures, not doing any thing ſo great harme as before: and with deſperat and reſtleſſe labor, in deſpight of all the Turks great power, repaired the breaches, in as ſtrong manner as at the firſt. In the meane time 200 of the Turks horſemen ſtragling from the campe, and ſeeking after bootie into the countrey as far as Neoſtat, were by the Hungarian L horſemen intercepted, and all ſlaine or taken; whoſe heads the Hungarians brought to Vienna, and the more to encourage the ſoldiers which daily repaired thither, in token of good lucke ſet them vp vpon ſtakes vpon the walls of the citie. Then was it certainly known of the priſoners, that Solyman had in his campe fiue hundred thouſand men, and three hundred field pieces, which were not of greater bigneſſe but that a camell might well carrie one of them, being taken from the carriage: for why, Solyman purpoſing by deſtroying the countrey before him, to draw the Emperor vnto battell, had (as they ſaid) brought no greater pieces of batterie with him. Which report of the priſoners was alſo confirmed by the Embaſſadours of king Ferdinand, whom Solyman gaue leaue to depart at Gunza, giuing to euery one of them a gowne of veluet and a piece of plate, with letters vnto the Emperour and king Ferdinand his M brother; wherein proudly vſurping the titles of many kingdomes, he moſt inſolently wrot himſelfe lord & ſoueraign of almoſt all countries and nations. But the effect therof was, That he was come into Hungarie, to reuenge the wrongs which they had done vnto King Iohn his friend and vaſſall; and would with fire and ſword enter their countries, and by the power of God

A God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the fauourers of iuſt quarrels, giue them battell, if they durſt meet him: wherfore if they would as valiant & couragious princes meet him in the field, he would in one battell end that quarrell with them, and in reward of the victorie either win or loſe the empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while layen at the ſiege of Gunza, and thereto giuen diuers ſharp aſſaults, being ſtill with great loſſe and diſhonor repulſed, he in the ſpace of foure daies caſt vp neere vnto the towne ditch two great mounts of faggots and earth, as if they had bin two great mountaines, of ſuch height, that they onertopped not the wals only, but euen the higheſt towers in the towne; (by which wonderfull worke the greatneſſe of the Turks army might eaſily be coniectured:) one of theſe great mounts he caſt vp directly againſt the face of the town, and the other at a corner of the ſame, to flankier along B the wall; from whence he did with his ſhot not onely beat them which appeared vpon the wals for the defence therof, but them alſo which vpon occaſion went too & fro in the ſtreets.
Theſe mounts being with incredible celeritie brought to perfection, the town ditch filled vp, and many of the defendants either ſlaine or wounded vpon the wals, the Turkes gaue a moſt furious aſſault at the place which was before ſhaken with the mine: againſt whom the valiant captain as need was in that extreame danger, oppoſed all the ſtrength he had left. But the Turkes ſtill preſſing on with their infinit multitude, were got vp to the top of the walls with eight enſignes, from whence they had repulſed the defendants: which being all either wounded or wearied, ſhrouded themſelues vnder the defence of their penthouſes, being nether able nor of courage to make further reſiſtance, ſo that the wals were now abandoned, & the town C there left without defendants: when ſuddenly ſuch a great clamor was made by the loud outcries and lamentation of the women and children and other fearefull people, that the Turkes which had recouered the top of the wals, ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, thinking the towne to haue bin full of ſouldiers, ſtood as men aſtonied & diſmaid, whereupon the defendants began again to take courage, and to ſhew themſelues: at whoſe ſight the Turks poſſeſſed with a needleſſe feare, forſooke the wal, & could not by any perſuaſions or threats of their captaines bee brought on againe to the aſſault. The town was that day in all mens iudgements defended by the mightie power of God, and not by the ſtrength of man. It grieued the proud tyrant aboue meaſure, that ſo baſe a towne ſhould ſo long hold out againſt all his power, ſo that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to raſe it down to the ground, & not to leaue any ſigne thereof D remaining: which he would vndoubtedly haue in time performed, had not Abraham the great Baſſa (by whoſe counſell he was altogether directed) otherwiſe perſuaded him: who waiting a fit time, when his choller was paſt, told him, that it was not worth his name & greatnes, to ſpend his time & forces vpon ſo ſmal a town of no importance, by raſing wherof he ſhould neither get honor nor profit: for why, no man would maruell, if he with ſo puiſſant an armie ſhould take ſo ſmall a thing, eſpecially by long ſiege, wherby the ſtrongeſt places are inforced to yeeld; & when he had ſo taken it, it would be accounted a greater honor for ſo little a town to haue holden out ſo long, than for him to haue with ſo great forces in long time conſtrained it: but if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as the chances of war are vncertaine, that hee ſhould by any occaſion be conſtrained to leaue it, he ſhould thereby get no ſmall diſhonor: wherefore it E were more wiſedome to ſpare his ſoldiers labor in ſo ſmall a matter, whereof he was not to expect either honour or profit, & for to reſerue them for his greater deſignes, & not vainely to ſpend his forces & time in beſieging of ſo baſe a village, from whence he might now depart with leſſe diſhonor than he could afterwards, when he had proued the vttermoſt of his forces, and yet in the end glad peraduenture to forſake it: wherfore it were more for his honour to raiſe his ſiege, & calling the Gouernor of the town vnto him, to giue him the town as it were of bounty, than to ſpend ſo many good men as he muſt needs caſt away in the winning of it by force: with theſe & like reaſons the Baſſa preuailed ſo much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthy gouernor of the town was by a herauld at arms ſent for to come to the great Baſſa, Solyman diſdaining (as it ſhould ſeem) to ſpeake with him himſelf. The gouernor being ſent for, F though he was grieuouſly wounded, & in ſmal hope of life, yet ſtoutly refuſed to com to any parly, except he were firſt wel aſſured both by ſafe conduct & good hoſtages for the ſafety of his perſon, & that nothing ſhould be exacted of him, not befitting his religion & honor: which ſtout anſwer cauſed Solyman & the Baſſa to think, that his ſtrength was not yet ſo weakned, but that he was ſtill able to hold out the ſiege: and thereupon, that he required for his ſafetie was forthwith granted, aud two men of great account ſent for hoſtages for him into the citie with G Solymans ſafe conduct. Which being receiued, the Gouernor went forth, and was by Abraham the great Baſſa honoraby receiued into the campe, and commanded to ſit downe by him in his tent: where he was by him firſt by the way of courteſie demanded, whether he had recouered his old infirmitie wherewith he was troubled at ſuch time as he was ſent embaſſador vnto Solyman at Conſtantinople? After that, whether the wounds he had receiued in the laſt aſſault, were dangerous or not? But laſt of all, & that which moſt concerned the matter, vpon what hope he alone had ſo long and ſo obſtinatly withſtood the mightie Sultan Solyman, when as all his neighbours round about him had ſo willingly ſubmitted themſelues? ſaying further, that he maruelled much why hee repoſed any confidence in the lingring king Ferdinand.

His anſwer to the Baſſa.

Whereunto the Gouernor modeſtly anſwered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered H of his old diſeaſe, and that his wounds were without danger: but as concerning his holding out, he ſaid, that he for his great wiſedome knew, that it was the duty of a good ſoldier valiantly to withſtand his enemies, & not to be troubled with any euill hap, or diſcouraged with any chance of war: as for himſelfe, he ſaid, when mans helpe failed, he had repoſed his full truſt in God, by whoſe power he had bin hitherto preſerued, which as he well hoped ſhould neuer faile him at his need: and that king Ferdinand was not ſo far off, but that he would before it were long be there preſent with a great army: wherfore he did not greatly maruel, that he was not relieued before that time, foraſmuch as many lets and occaſions might chance which might hinder the kings purpoſe, conſidering that fortune always by nature vnconſtant, was in nothing more like vnto her ſelfe in her vnconſtancie, than in martiall affaires. The Baſſa I wondering at the inuincible courage of the Gouernor, ſaid, That although the great Emperor Solyman might now at his pleaſure vtterly deſtroy the towne, with all that therein was, yet being by nature of a moſt honorable and mild diſpoſition, and a great louer of valiant and couragious men, had commanded him in his name to giue him that town, & the liues of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour ſhewed in the defence thereof: yet ſo, that hee ſhould ſweare obedience vnto him, and receiue ſome few Turks into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the ſame. The politicke Gouernour knowing that of 800 valiant ſouldiers, hee had ſcarcely a third part left, and them alſo ſore weakned with wounds and want of reſt, thought it neceſſarie to make his peace in beſt ſort hee could: for what could haue hapned vnto him more wiſhedly, than with his great honor to keep the town ſtil, & with the loſſe of a few pleaſing K words to deliuer himſelfe, with ſo many of his friends, from extream feare and perill?
and ſo in all his talke ſhewing no ſigne of feare, and with great words ſetting forth the ſtrength of his garriſon (which was indeed brought to an extreame weaknes) ſaid he was ready at the firſt to haue yeelded vp the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at Conſtantinople, but was alwaies letted by the Germans and Spaniards which were there in garriſon, fierce and cruell ſoldiers, whoſe hard hearts were (as he ſaid) hardly intreated to ſuffer him at that time to come out of the citie into the campe: wherfore he could promiſe to be a friend to all ſuch Turks as ſhould paſſe that way, and to relieue them with ſuch things as his waſted country could affoord; and further in token of his ſubmiſſion, to ſet vp one of Solymans enſignes in the chiefe tower of the city: but as for receiuing any Turks into gariſon, in token that he had L yeelded vp the towne, he was willing ſo to do, but that he was greatly afraid they ſhould bee euill intreated by the Germans & Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turks: whereof it was to be thought, that new wars would eftſoone ariſe. In concluſion, he ſo cunningly vſed the matter, that the great Baſſa was contented with this ſmall token of ſubmiſſion, that he ſhould receiue in at one of the gates of the citie, one of Solymans captains with ten Ianizaries: which being don accordingly, & they courteouſly for a while entertained & again diſmiſſed, the great Baſſa held himſelfe with that ſimple ſubmiſſion well contented: when as the Gouernor had neither German nor Spaniard as then in garriſon.

Solyman departeth from the ſiege of Gunza.

So when Solyman had with his great armie lien at the ſiege of Gunza by the ſpace of 28 daies, and in that time to his great loſſe aſſaulted the ſame thirteene times, he roſe with his army, glad of a little fained ſubmiſſion for the ſafegard M of his honor: and leauing Vienna on the right hand, whither moſt part of the Chriſtian armie was aſſembled, took the way on the left into Carinthia, and ſo came to the riuer Mura, and from thence to the citie Graria. This turning of Solymans out of the way from Vienna, where he knew his enemies lay, put al feare out of the minds of the Chriſtians, which they had

A before not without cauſe conceiued,inſomuch,that he but a little before feared as a prince of great pride and power,ſhamefully repulſed at the little town of Gunza,and now ſhunning his enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had beene running away for feare. Which diſgrace the Turks ſought by diuers excuſes to couer, as that the ſtrong citie of Neoſtat lay betwixt him & Viena,which could neither without much difficultie be taken,nor danger left enemy behind him: beſides that,Winter began to approch, which cauſed him (as the Turkes gaue it out) to content himſelfe with the ſpoile of the rich countries betwixt the riuers of Savus and Dranus,and ſo in good time to returne againe to Belgrade. But they which ſeemed to ſee farther into the matter,were of opinion,That Solyman vnderſtanding by his eſpials,and ſecret aduertiſement from his friends, that the Princes of Germanie had with one B conſent ioined their forces with the emperors,brought out of Italy,Spaine,and the low countries,which at his ſetting forth he leaſt feared ; and that the Chriſtian army in number great, conſiſted not of raw ſouldiers,but for the moſt part of ſuch as had been trained vp in warres, men both for courage and ſkill nothing inferiour to his Ianizaries and beſt men of war;choſe rather to take the ſpoile of the countrey,as he might with ſafety,than to aduenture his perſon and ſtate to the hazard of a moſt doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Caſon ſent with 15000 horſmen to ſpoile Auſtria

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandement of Solyman, ſent Caſon with 15000 of his voluntarie horſemen (who in Solymans expedition againſt Vienna, had run thorow the countrey of Auſtria as far as Lyntz)charging him without ſtay to ſpoile all the country far and neere which lyeth between Danubius and the Alpes,thereby to learne C what he could of the ſtate and ſtrength of the Emperours camp ; and by doing all the harmes he could poſſibly,to leaue a moſt lamentable remembrance of the Turks being in Auſtria. Caſon was of himſelfe forward enough, and deſirous of the ſpoile : but ſo much the more, for that he was by the former road into that countrey become both famous and rich : wherefore diuiding his horſemen into three companies not far diſtant one from another, hee ſuddenly oppreſſed an infinit multitude of all ſorts of people in the fields and countrey villages as hee went;all which he either ſlew without mercie,or carried away as miſerable priſoners. Thouſands of men and women tied together in chains and ropes, were by the cruell Turks enforced to run as faſt as their horſes;the countrey villages were all burnt downe to the ground,and in them the poore children of the Chriſtians, whoſe parents were either ſlaine or carried away D captiues: ſo that al the country euery way almoſt for the ſpace of 150 miles,was couered with ſmoke and fire, within three miles of Lyntz ; where king Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himſelfe farther off to Strabinga,where his brother Charles the Emperor lay. This cruell Turke according to his charge, hauing with fire and ſword without compaſſion wrought all the woe he could poſſible vpon the poore Chriſtians, and now loded with the ſpoile of the country and multitude of priſoners,began to returne the ſame way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the ſiege of Gunza,where he left him, or neerer hand at Neoſtat comming towards Vienna. But he as is aforeſaid, riſing with ſmall honour from Gunza, and fearing the power of the Chriſtians,was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropoliticall city of Stiria, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Mura ; which turned to the vtter deſtruction of Caſon and E all his followers : for as ſoone as it was perceiued by the burning of the countrey all about, that the Turks were come neere to Lyntz,the Chriſtian captaines with their companies went out of the campe,ſome one way ſome another, as was thought moſt conuenient for the meeting with of theſe miſchieuous Turkes,which neuer reſted in one place : wherein they vſed ſuch diligence in taking the paſſages,that it was not poſſible they ſhould eſcape vnfought withall. Foure companies of Spaniſh and Italian horſemen vnder the leading of Lewis Coue a valiant captain,firſt lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto Neoſtat,and deſperately charging them,were by the Turks for moſt part ſlaine: But Caſon perceiuing how he was on euery ſide laied by the Chriſtians in the vallies betwixt Neoſtat,Sabaria,and Veſprinium,the night following with more than barbarous crueltie ſlew foure thouſand of the Chriſtians he had be- F fore taken priſoners, becauſe hee ſhould not be hindered by them in his flight ; and diuiding his armie into two parts,about midnight began to ſet forward, vſing the benefit of the night to haue eſcaped from his enemies out of theſe vallies wherein he was encloſed. One part of this army led by Feriſes taking the way Southward,did with incredible labor cut a way thorow the thicke and ouergrown woods(a thing thought altogether impoſſible) and ſo with little Caſon diſcomfited by the Palatine,and ſlaine.

tle or no loſſe came to Solyman into Styria. Caſon with the other part of the armie breaking out of the valley of Storamberg,chanced vpon the Palatine(Generall of the forces ſent from G the German Princes)who with ten thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſemen, and certaine field pieces brake the battell of the Turkes,and ſlew of them a great number: in which conflict Caſon his chiefe enſigne was taken.He fighting moſt valiantly in the rereward to giue others time to eſcape, was himſelfe there ſlaine: whoſe gallant head-piece preſented afterwards to the Emperour,confirmed the report of his death.They which eſcaped from the Palatine,in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis,and the Marqueſſe of Brandenburg,by whom they were ſlaine like beaſts. The Hungarian horſemen led by Valentinus Turacus,lighting vpon them which fled from Lewis and the Marqueſſe,had the killing of them for the ſpace of ſeuen miles; and of all others did vpon them the cruelleſt execution, following them hard at the heels with their freſh horſes, and fiercely inſulting vpon them in their owne language. H Thoſe few diſperſed Turks which eſcaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the countrey people about Veſprinium and the lake of Balaton,which came out on euery ſide in hope of ſpoile, who ſhewed them ſmall fauour: ſo that of 8000 which were with Caſon, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

The ſlaughter of the Turkes.

The Emperour vnderſtanding that Solyman was gone as farre as Gracia in Stiria,called his chiefe captains together into the caſtle of Lyntz,to know their opinions,whether it were beſt to follow the enemie into Stiria or not. The cities of Lyntz, Gracia,and Vienna,are ſcituat almoſt in forme of a triangle: but from Lyntz to Gracia is three good dayes journey of bad I rough way by horſe. Some ſaid it was beſt to fight with the Turks in that vneuen mountaine countrey,where the Turks chiefe ſtrength conſiſting in the multitude of his horſemen,ſhould ſtand him in ſmall ſtead,but ſhould be inforced to trie the battell with his footmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Chriſtians. This counſell although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the moſt approoued captaines,ſo mooued the Emperour, that he preſently ſent Apontius a Spaniard (the moſt famous captaine Antonius Leua his lieutenant) to take view of that paſſage: who ſhortly after returned againe to Lyntz, bringing word that all the countrey as he went was deſolat and for feare forſaken of the inhabitants: but concerning the place of the enemies abode,he could learne no certaintie. Whereupon it was by generall conſent concluded,that they ſhould all goe to Vienna, whither all the ſtrength of the Germans was already aſſembled,there to take a general view of the armie,and to giue the enemie K battell if he ſhould againe returne. Some there were of great courage which openly diſliked of that going to Vienna; ſaying,that the Emperour ſhould rather in that diſtreſſe of the prouinces of Stiria and Carinthia purſue his enemie,than turne out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgement, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid, It was one thing to inuade, and another thing to defend: ſo that the Emperour might with honor enough encampe himſelfe in the fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the baſe expedition and vaine brags of his proud enemie,who a far off challenged him into the field,and then like a coward durſt not come neere him.

Charles the Emperour his power at Vienna.

The Emperor comming to Vienna,and taking a generall view of the armie,found therein two hundred and ſixtie thouſand men, whereof 90000 footmen, and 30000 horſemen were accounted old expert ſoldiers,& of them many whole companies and bands, of ſuch as had before bin Generals, Captains Lieutenants, Antients,or other officers and men of marke in L other armies,and now were content to ſerue as priuat men. It was thought that ſo many worthy captains and valiant ſouldiers,were neuer before in the memorie of man aſſembled together into one camp: for the princes and free cities had not ſent thither common ſoldiers,but their choſen and approued men; ſtriuing as it were amongſt themſelues, who ſhould ſend the beſt. All the flowre and ſtrength of Germanie from the riuer of Viſtula to the Rhene, & from the Ocean to the Alpes,was by the princes of the empire and free cities either ſent thither, or of themſelues voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all Germanie ſhould as it were with one conſent,be glad to take vp arms for their cōmon ſafety,in defence M of their honor and libertie; eſpecially againſt people brought out of the furtheſt parts of Aſia, Syria, and Ægypt. Beſide the great number of Spaniards, Italians,and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off,ſtrengthened with them of Silicia and Morauia. There were alſo ſome troupes of Polonian horſemen,not ſent thither by publicke authoritie,but ſeruing

A as voluntary men: king Sigiſmund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not raſhly to break the league he had made with Solyman; ſo leſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of the Chriſtian common cauſe, by notable diſſimulation left place for ſuch of his ſubiects as would (as if it had bin without his knowledge) to ſhew their valour in the moſt honourable warre.

The order of the Chriſtianitie.

The Chriſtian army ready to receiue the enemie, lay in a great field neere vnto Vienna, in this order: three great ſquadrons of pikemen, ſtanding one ſquadron a great way diſtant from another, were ſo placed againſt the enemie with like and equall front, that all the horſemen diuided into two parts, might well bee receiued into the great ſpaces betwixt the three ſquadrons: for it was not thought conuenient to oppoſe ſo ſmall a number of horſmen in open field without the footmen, againſt almoſt 300000 of the Turks horſemen. The right wing B of the horſemen was led by the Emperor himſelfe, and the left by king Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on euery ſide of the three ſquadrons of pikes, ſauing in thoſe places which were left open for the horſemen, about thirtie paces off, were placed twentie thouſand nimble harquebuſiers ranged in length, and but fiue in a ranke; ſo that whileſt the firſt diſcharged, the ſecond, and after them the third, and ſo the reſt readily and orderly comming on, might without let deliuer their bullets vpon their enemies: neither was it thought any diſaduantage to place them ſo thin, for that if they found themſelues by the enemies oppreſſed, they might eaſily retire amongſt the pikes, ſtanding faſt at hand. Before the harquebuſiers was planted the great ordnance, whereof the Emperor had ſuch ſtore, and ſo well placed, that he could there-C with (as with a moſt ſure trench) haue compaſſed in his whole army. Only the Hungarians, men well acquainted with the manner of the Turks fight, choſe to lie in the open field in two great wings, vnder the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble gentlemen beholding this goodly army, wept for ioy, conceiuing a moſt aſſured hope of victorie, if the proud enemy durſt with all his forces ioine in battell. But Solyman, who by all means ſought with his great number of horſemen to keep the wide and open fields, certainly aduertiſed both of the Emperors ſtrength and the manner of his lying, got him ouer the riuer of Mura, and at Marpurge by bridges which he made on the ſudden, paſſed ouer the great riuer Dranus. And ſo he which that Summer held almoſt all the world in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of the ſucceſſe of thar war; hauing with all that his huge power where-D with he threatned the world, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in euery place either ouercome, or els ſhamefully repulſed; left Stiria, and returned the ſame way hee came, directly betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus, to Belgrade, and ſo to Conſtantinople; leauing here and there ſome remembrance of his barbarous crueltie, and ſtil looking behinde him if the Emperour were not at his heeles: at ſuch time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horſemen did ſtill purſue the taile of his army. It is reported, that he carried a way with him 30000 Chriſtians into captiuitie, beſides many thouſands of poore countrey people ſlain by the mercileſſe Turks; but eſpecially by Caſon and his followers: and ſo to his eternall infamy was twice in the ſpace of a few years driuen out of Germanie. The Emperor vnderſtanding of Solymans departure, determined with all ſpeed to returne into Italie; although king Ferdinand E his brother moſt earneſtly intreated him before his departure, in ſo fit a time to imploy thoſe great forces againſt king Iohn, who now as it were forſaken of Solyman, might eaſily with ſo puiſſant an army haue bin thruſt not only out of Buda, but alſo quite out of the kingdome of Hungarie, wherein he was by Solyman as his vaſſall placed. But the Emperour, for that Winter began now to approch, and the plague was got into the camp, yea euen into his court, continued in his former purpoſe of departing into Italie: yet yeelding ſo far vnto his brothers requeſt, as to leaue behind him all the Italians, who ioyned with king Ferdinands own forces, were thought ſufficient for the accompliſhment of the Hungarian warre.

Solyman returneth.

Ouer theſe Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the meanes of Alphonſus Victius appointed Generall: but no order taken for the paiment of their wages, whereby the ſouldiers F might be the more incouraged to take in hand that warre, and alſo kept in obedience. Which thing at the firſt much offended the minds of the other captains, thinking themſelues diſgraced by the preferment of Maramaldus, a man of no greater account than themſelues: but as ſoon as it was known abroad, the vnder captains & officers of the bands, led with the credit and fauor of their old captains, ſaid plainly, That they would not go into Hungarie, except either King Ferdinand would in perſon goe him ſelfe, or elſe one of the great Commanders, Vaſtius

or Leua were appointed for their Generall: and the common ſouldiers ſaid flatly, that they would aske leaue to depart, except they had three moneths pay, which they knew well they ſhould neuer get of that poore king, already brought vnto great wants. Vaſtius to appeaſe this mutinie, trauelled greatly with his ſoldiers, perſuading them to remember the faith of ſoldiers, and by their conſtant perſeuerance to maintaine the honour they had got by their cheerfull comming: telling them, That valiant ſouldiers neuer wanted pay, furniſhing themſelues by their victories with all things neceſſary from the enemy. And as for Maramaldus their Generall, they had no iuſt cauſe to miſlike him being an old captain of great experience, for courage and policie not inferior to any of the greateſt Commanders, and placed by the Emperors owne appointment as a man moſt ſufficient, whoſe judgement they ought not in any caſe to diſlike. When Vaſtius had with theſe and ſuch like reaſons well appeaſed the tumultuous ſouldiers, and was gone out of the camp into Vienna, to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties, night the nurſe of ſedition came on, whoſe darkneſſe excluding all modeſty and feare, gaue further ſcope and place vnto the mutinous ſouldiers inſolencie. By chance there was at that time brought out of the citie into the campe very courſe, hoarie, moulded bread, which ſome of the ſouldiers hauing brought, and thruſting it vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſhewed it vnto their fellowes in great choller, railing againſt king Ferdinand, which in his owne kingdome in the beginning of the war had made no better prouiſion, but with ſuch corrupt and peſtilent bread to feed them being ſtrangers, which were onely for his defence and quarrell to aduenture their liues. And but a little before, a certaine Spaniard, beeing but a common ſouldier, comming into the Generals tent, and caſting the like bread down at the feet of Vaſtius, bitterly curſing the Emperour and king Ferdinand, had raiſed a wonderfull tumult: wherefore the Italian ſouldiers flocking together out of their tents, gaue many hard ſpeeches concerning their pay, their victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian war. There one Titus Marconius of Volaterra, a man of a troubleſome ſpirit, but reaſonably well ſpoken, was by the other ſouldiers ſet vp vpon a great heap of ſaddles, that he might be the better heard, and by diuers ſeditious captains requeſted frankly to ſpeake his mind, ſo far as he thought concerned the ſafety and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he ſpake vnto them in this ſeditious manner as followeth:

The ſeditious oration of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians.

And ſhall the Spaniards (ſaid hee) beloued companions and fellowes in armes, as you haue heard, goe into Italie? and to our great hurt againe returne into their old Wintering places? and that which I am aſhamed to ſay, as notable gueſts lie with our wiues? and wee Italians as baniſhed men fight this Winter with yce and ſnow in Hungarie? and that forſooth for a moſt beggarly King, and him alſo to the Hungarians a forrener and meere ſtranger, againſt a naturall borne Prince, of his ſubiects well beloued and ſtrongly backt with the power and wealth of the Turkiſh Emperour? And that which might iuſtly grieue any couragious mind, vnder the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and haſtie crueltie, hath ſo furiouſly thruſt vs thorow with his ſword, that hee ſeemeth not more to deſire the name of a captaine for any thing, than for the killing and murthering of vs now his ſouldiers. Neither can I beleeue that you, who haue oftentimes beene captaines and antients your ſelues, will be ſo mad, as to ſerue vnder a common captaine, without hope of any pay, of any prouiſion, of victorie, or returne. Truely it delighteth me not ſo much to haue come hither for the honour of the Italian name (no more reckoned of than a ruſh) although I haue eleuen times ſerued; as it doth this day aſhame mee to ſee this ſhamefull end of the warre, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall dignitie is no ſhame, nor equitie in rewarding the ſouldier: for Kings now adayes make account of ſouldiers onely according to their neceſſitie; this is it alone that giueth vs pay, this is that getteth vs loue, this is it maintaineth our reputation: all which, peace once by victorie obtained, leeſe their grace. So fareth it with vs at this preſent (fellow ſouldiers) the Emperour and his brother king Ferdinand, deliuered from the feare of a moſt dangerous warre, to eaſe themſelues of this multitude of vs, ſeeke to thruſt vs into Hungarie as beaſts to the ſlaughter, by the ſpending of our bloud hoping to purchaſe vnto themſelues victorie; and by the loſſe of vs to take no harme themſelues, though the Turks and Hungarians ſhould with ſword and famine vtterly deſtroy vs, ſhut vp with the yce of Danubius and the ſnow of the Alpes. But peraduenture you vnderſtand not theſe deuiſes, no more than you vnderſtand what this terrible and bloudie * comet, ſhooting his beames towards Italie, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatall either to Solyman or Cæſar, but rather threatneth vnto vs death and

At this very time a great blazing ſtar was ſeene in the firmament at Vi- [illegible] deſtruction; for they with like counſell full of ſafetie and diſcretion, would not open any way vnto their owne deſtinies, but warily withdrew themſelues one from the other, and ſhunned all the dangers of the field. Wherefore if it were lawfull for them, without any blemiſh of their Maieſties, ſo notably to prouide to keepe themſelues out of danger, when as on each ſide halfe the world lay as a reward of the victorie; ſhall not we looke to our ſelues, that we be not thruſt thither from whence appeareth no hope of returne, but with vtter deſtruction, when as we may do it without offence, and by good right, eſpecially ſeeing no pay is offered vs. Thus you ſee what a goodly end is made of this notable war, wherein only we the Italians, in ſtead of commendation and reward, reape iniurie and diſgrace: and are peraduenture of purpoſe exiled into Hungarie, that this floure of chiualrie being drawne out of Italie, and ſent far out of the way, colonies of Spaniards and Germanes may be placed in our ſteads. Truly it ſeemeth hard dealing, to be ſent out of the way into a barbarous countrey, where we ſhall find all hoſtilitie, and no place of refuge to receiue vs, being diſtreſſed. Beſides this, we ſhall alſo whether we wil or no, feele how heauie and intolerable it will be both to our bodies and minds, to endure the miſeries of this Winter and dangerous war: and in the meane time, with no ſmall hearts griefe imagine what things our children, our brethren, our kinſemen, yea our wiues, ſuffer at home of the Spaniards and Germanes. Wherefore worthie companions, it concerneth vs more at this time to haue a good foreſight, than valiantly to fight. The occaſion preſented vnto vs for our ſafety and welfare, ſtandeth vpon a tickle point, it muſt be done without delay, and we muſt hie vs hence before that the Spaniards truſſe vp their baggage; and ſo preuenting the emperors formoſt companies, come firſt our ſelues into Italie: for if we ſhall ſtay but a little to conſult vpon the matter, Vaſtius and our other proud commanders will preſently be here, the verie betrayers of the Italian bloud, who for their owne gaine and our miſchiefe, haue brought vs into theſe ſtraits; who I know will moſt earneſtly entreat vs, and with many ſubtelties ſeeke to ſeduce vs, by offering vs great pay, and whatſoeuer elſe we ſhall require; which will all prooue but words. But you, if you be men, refuſe to talke with them, as with your common enemies, or rather in reuenge of their old iniuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this aſſemblie valiant men, for courage and integritie of life their betters far, which can leade you forth, order your battell, and fortunatly vſe this your courage and forwardneſſe. Wherefore if you be wiſe ſet forward reſolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your haſt; for the full accompliſhment of your deſire conſiſteth in your haſt onely.

8000 of the Italians in mutine, forſake their captaines, and returne into Italie.

Marconius had no ſooner made an end of this mutinous ſpeech, but the tumultuous ſouldiers in euery band began highly to commend and approoue the ſame, and by and by ſuch a confuſed noyſe was heard through all the aſſemblie, as vſeth to riſe amongſt the diſcontented vulgar people, readie to riſe in armes: but the drums preſently ſtriking vp a march, they made no longer ſtay, but without delay pluckt vp their enſignes, and forward they goe directly towards Neoſtat. In this tumult, in ſtead of their old captaines, which either were not then preſent, or refuſed to go with them, they choſe others to be their Leaders: who once named by the ſeditious multitude, might in no caſe without danger refuſe to take the charge vpon them, were they neuer ſo vnwilling. Theſe were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two twins of Millan, called Gluſſani: who drew after them eight thouſand ſouldiers; the reſt partly for ſhame, and partly for feare, ſtayed ſtill with Maramaldus their new appointed General. When they were thus gone, Vaſtius and diuers other great companies hearing thereof in the citie, poſted after them ſix miles, and at length ouertaking them, requeſted them to ſtay, and not to diſhonour themſelues with ſo foule a fact; telling them that their pay was readie for them; and omitting nothing wherewith they might haue bin moued to ſtay, mingled their prayers with grieuous threats: but they reſolutely ſet downe, would neither heare nor ſtay; but as men inraged with furie and their owne guiltie conſcience, with ſterne looks diſcharged ſome ſmall ſhot vpon them. Whileſt Vaſtius would there haue ſtayed the companie, and did what he poſſibly could by threatning and otherwiſe, to haue terrified their leaders, and to haue brought them backe, he was oftentimes in danger to haue bin ſlaine. In the end hee was glad to forſake them, and to returne as he came. King Ferdinand by this ſudden departure of the Italians, for that time diſappointed of all his hope of recouering the kingdome of Hungarie from king Iohn; in great choller wrot vnto his ſubiects of Styria and Carynthia, whereby the Italians were to paſſe, That they ſhould ſhew them no manner of curteſie in their paſſage: whereupon inſued great hurt on both ſides. Yet for all that, theſe Italians in deſpight of what could be done, at length recouered Tiliauentum in the borders of Italie, where they disbanded ded themſelues,and returned euerie man to his owne dwelling, leauing King Ferdinand vnto G his owne forces. The Emperour alſo breaking vp his armie at Vienna, and purpoſing now as before,to returne into Italie,appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to go formoſt with the light horſemen,with whom alſo he went himſelfe: after him followed Vaſtius with the Spaniards; two dayes after came the Cardinall, whoſe traine was of all the greateſt: laſt of all followed the mercinarie Germanes: in which order he returned in ſafetie into Italie.

This was the end of thoſe wonderfull preparations made by the two great monarchs Solyman and Charles the fift, in the yeare 1532, which held the world in great ſuſpence with the fearefull expectation of ſome maruelous alteration; and ſo much the more, for that at the ſame time appeared a great blazing ſtar by the ſpace of fifteene dayes. All which for all that, H God ſo appointing,ſorted to far leſſe harme than was of moſt men feared.

Auria goeth againſt the Turks.

Now whileſt Charles the Emperour was thus in armes againſt Solyman in Auſtria, Andreas Auria by his appointment,with a fleet of thirty fiue tall ſhips and fortie eight gallies,wherein he had embarked twentie fiue thouſand good ſouldiers well appointed, did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turks in Peloponeſus. With this fleet Auria departing from Meſſana in Sicilia, and paſſing alongſt the coaſt of Italie,into the Iönian,neere vnto the Iſle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admirall, with a fleet of ſixtie gallies ſet forth by the Venetians for defence of their Territorie: who offered vnto Auria all poſſible kindeneſſe, but excuſed himſelfe,that he could not ioyne with him in that war againſt the common enemie, by reaſon of an old league betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, which Solyman I had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians ſtood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the Emperour and Solyman, offering like kindeneſſe to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readineſſe to fall out with either, if they ſhould by ſea or land offer any iniurie to their State: wherein they bare themſelues ſo indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the ſelfe ſame inſtant aduertiſed Auria, That Hymerales the Turkes Admirall lay with his fleet of ſixtie Gallies euill appointed, in the Bay of Ambracia, where hee might eaſily be ſurpriſed; and gaue likewiſe warning to him of the comming of Auria with a ſtrong fleet, wiſhing him in time to prouide for his better ſafetie, by retyring his fleet into ſome other place of more aſſurance: which he preſently did; for knowing himſelf too weak, hee departed from Ambracia, to the ſtrong hauen of Calcide. Which thing with other like, K well conſidered,might giue iuſt cauſe to any Chriſtian heart,to bewaile the ſtate of that time, wherein the Chriſtian Princes being either in mortall wars amongſt themſelues,or intangled by Solyman with leagues of no aſſurance,omitted the faireſt opportunitie that could haue been wiſhed for the abating of the Turks greatneſſe: for if the Venetians ioyning their forces with Auria,had in time purſued the Turkiſh Admirall, it was like,that not onely all Solymans power at ſea had bin vtterly diſcomfited; but alſo moſt part of Grecia,mindfull of their antient empire and libertie, and then readie to haue rebelled, and ioyned hands with the Chriſtians, might haue been recouered out of the Turkiſh thraldome; yea and the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople greatly indangered,few or none being left for the defence thereof,beſide yong Ianizaries and effœminate Eunuchs, the heartleſſe keepers of the Turkes Concubines; Solyman L himſelfe being then far off in Hungarie, and hauing drawne with him the greateſt ſtrength of his Empire.

Auria beſiegeth Corone in Peloponeſus.

Auria taking his leaue of the Venetian Admirall, with much honour done at ſea on both ſides; was ſhortly after aduertiſed,That the Turks Admirall was fled to Calcide. Wherefore now out of hope to do any good againſt him, he directed his courſe to Corone (which is a ſtrong citie vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, about twelue miles diſtant from Modon) with purpoſe to beſiege it: which when he had well viewed,and conſidered of the ſtrength thereof,he laid ſiege thereto both by ſea and land,battering it moſt terribly at one time with fourteen great pieces of artillerie by land, and a hundred and fiftie by ſea, ſo that a more terrible batterie had not beene lightly heard of: for all that, the Turks valiantly ſtood vpon their defence, and manfully repulſed the Italians, which vnder the leading of the Countie of Sarne M aſſaulted the citie by land. The Turkiſh garriſons lying about in the countrey of Peloponeſus,did what they might to haue relieued the citie; who by the valour of the ſaid Countie were diſcomfited,and Zadares their chiefe leader ſlaine: whoſe head,with others of the ſlain Turks,were ſet vpon ſtakes,to the terror of the defendants.

A At length the Turks wearied with aſſaults, and terrified with the thundring ſhot which neuer ſeaſed, and driuen alſo from their greateſt ſtrength towards ſea, by the deſperate aſſault of certaine reſolute Chriſtians, whom they had now full ſore againſt their wills receiued as it were into their boſomes; fearing alſo to want victuall and pouder, if they ſhould longer hold out without any hope of relief, yeelded the citie and caſtle to Auria, vpon condition that they might in ſafetie depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards there placed, and the Chriſtian Greeks which dwelt in the citie ſworn vnto them, Auria put to ſea with his fleet, and ſailing againe by Zazinthus, came to Patras another antient citie of Peloponeſus, which he eaſily tooke and ranſacked: for the Turks diſtruſting the ſtrength of the Citie, had ſtrongly intrenched themſelues neere vnto the Caſtle; which B place alſo, together with the caſtle, they in ſhort time yeelded to Auria; couenanting, that they, & eſpecially their wiues, might with their garments only depart in ſafetie into Ætolia: which was by Auria ſo preciſely performed, that when three thouſand of them paſſed along through the armie of the Chriſtians, ranged on both ſides, and ſome of the ſouldiers began rudely to handle ſome of the women, and to take from them ſome of their jewels, he cauſed them preſently, to the terror of others, to be hanged. Auria leauing his armie at Patras, with commandment to follow him by land, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Peloponeſus, vntill he came to the ſtrait of Naupactum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the gulfe of Corinthia, parting Peloponeſus from Ætolia, with a ſtrait ſomewhat narrower than the ſtrait of C Helleſpont. Vpon this ſtrait ſtood two caſtles, the one called Rhium, vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, and the other Molycreum in Ætolia, which Baiazet had wonderfully fortified, and ſtored with ordnance for the keeping of that ſtrait. Auria threatning all extremitie vnto the captaine of the caſtle on Peloponeſus ſide, if he did enforce him to plant his batterie, ſo terrified him, that he without delay yeelded vnto him the caſtle; couenanting onely, That he and his ſoldiers might in ſafetie depart thence: which granted, and the Turks departed, Auria gaue the ſpoile of the caſtle vnto his ſoldiers which came with him by ſea: whereby he ſo offended the mindes of the other ſouldiers which came by land from Patras, that they were about to haue forſaken him. The other caſtle vpon Ætolia ſide was not ſo eaſily taken, being valiantly defended by a garriſon of old Ianizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in D the end by furie of the ordnance a breach was made, wherby the Chriſtians forcibly entring, ſlew three hundred of the old garriſon ſoldiers, not taking any one to mercie: the reſt fled into a ſtrong tower in the midſt of the caſtle, where ſeeing no remedie but that they muſt needs fall into the hands of their enemies, they deſperatly blew vp themſelues, and the tower, with a great part of the caſtle, with gunpouder, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed all the ſea coaſt to haue bin ſhaken with an earthquake; and the gallies which lay a bow ſhoot off, were almoſt ouerwhelmed with ſtones blown out ſo far off. The great ordinance taken in this caſtle was valued at 70000 duckats; whereof certaine pieces of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with Arabian letters written vpon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Genoa; and in remembrance of the victorie, mounted vpon the bulwarke at the mouth of the hauen. All theſe things thus E happily atchieued, Auria ſtrongly fortified the citie of Corone, ſtoring it both with munition and plentie of victuall, committing the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards; promiſing of his owne charge to relieue him whenſoeuer he ſhould need, if the Emperor ſhould defer to do it. The ſtrait of Naupactum laid open, Saluiatus with the gallies of Malta ſcoured all alongſt the gulfe of Corinth, doing great harme vnto the Turks which dwelt on both ſides of the gulfe, ſpoyling and terrifying them euen as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approching, Auria receiuing letters from the Emperor, of Solymans departure out of Hungarie, returned with his fleet loaded with the ſpoile of the Turks, to Naples, and ſo from thence home to Genoa.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was the yere 1533) it was rifely reported F that the Turks were comming with a great fleet toward Peloponeſus: and not long after, Mendoza gouernor of Corone, by letters aduertiſed Peter of Toledo, Vizroy of Naples, That he was both by ſea and land hardly beſieged by the Turks; and that he would to the vttermoſt of his power valiantly defend the citie, ſo long as he had any prouiſion of victuall: Wherfore he moſt earneſtly requeſted, That if the Emperour would haue the towne kept, hee ſhould in time ſend him reliefe, whereupon the oppreſſed Grecians taking heart, were like ynough to

to rebell,and to helpe to expulſe the Turks quite out of Peloponeſus. But aboue all things he forgot not to craue ſpeedie aid of Auria,and to put him in minde of the faithfull promiſe he had made to relieue him at his need. Vpon this newes,Charles the Emperor commanded Auria his Admirall,to rig vp a conuenient fleet for that ſeruice,promiſing forthwith to ſend vnto him twelue gallies, which he had new built in Spaine. Hee alſo requeſted the Knights of Malta to aid him with their gallies againſt that common enemie. Wherefore Auria hauing with wonderfull celeritie rigged vp thirtie tall ſhips, and as many gallies, came to Naples to take in his ſoldiers: there the old garriſons of the Spaniards which for want of pay were riſen in mutinie againſt the great commander and Generall Vaſtius and the Viceroy, and had riſeled the citie of Auerſa, and done no little harme all about in the countrey of Campania, were again pacified by a pay giuen vnto them,and preſently embarked for Corone,vnder the command of Rodericus Macicaus their General; at which time alſo Fredericke of Toledo the Viceroy's ſon,with a companie of braue gentlemen went aboord,vowing vnto the ſacred war that their firſt ſeruice.The knights of Malta came thither alſo with their gallies. But whilſt theſe things were a doing,Auria to incourage them of Corone,for feare leſt they diſpairing of help, ſhould fall to ſome hard compoſition with the Turkes; ſent Chriſtopher Palauicine a reſolute yong gentleman of an inuincible courage, with a moſt ſwift gallie to Corone: who by daylight paſſing through the midſt of the Turks fleet,ſafely recouered the hauen,to the great joy of the beſieged Chriſtians: and ſhortly after when he had well viewed all things he was ſent for,with the ſtrength and manner of the enemies lying,and filled the minds of the defendants with aſſured hope of ſpeedie reſcue; about noon time of the day he ſuddenly brake out again through the midſt of his enemies, and as it were miraculouſly eſcaped in ſafetie, for all that they could do,although they ceaſed not to giue him chace ſo long as they were in any hope to haue ouertaken him. Auria departing from Naples,came to Meſſana,where he certainly informed of the enemies force both by ſea and land,with the number of their gallies,and ſeeing that the chiefe hope of relieuing of the citie conſiſted in celeritie, ſtaied not for the gallies he expected out of Spaine, but held on his courſe towards Grecia: for it was told him,that the enemies fleet dayly increaſed,by the comming in of the Turkiſh pirats; and that Aſſem-Beg (otherwiſe called the Moore of Alexandria, an arch pirat) was ſtill looked for, in whoſe good directions the Turkiſh captaines repoſed the greateſt hope of their victorie. When he was come as far as Zazynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, That Luſtibeius Baſſa (or rather Lutzis Baſſa the Turks great Admirall,and Solymans brother in law) with Solyman of Acarnania,and the Moore (men for their skil at ſea,of great fame and reputation)lay before Corone, with 80 gallies manned with diuers companies of the old Ianizaries; ſo that it was thought a matter of exceeding perill for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he tooke the aduantage of ſome proſperous gale of winde. Wherefore Auria to haue yet more certain knowledge of the enemies fleet,ſent before him Chriſtopher Palauicine with one gallie,again to view the manner of the enemies lying: who paſſing the promontorie of Acrites, ſaw all the Turkes great fleet lying in verie good order before the citie: and ſo returned to Auria, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turks fleet was greatly increaſed, & lay readie as it ſhould ſeem to giue him battell as ſoon as he ſhould approch the citie. For all that, Auria nothing diſmaid with the greatneſſe of the Turks fleet,made no ſtay,but ſtil kept on his courſe, and with a faire gale of winde paſſing the promontorie of Acrytes, came directly towards Corone. Two great gallions,of all the fleet the moſt warrelike ſhippes,came formoſt; whereof the one was Auria's own,which he had built with a wonderfull charge;and the other was of Sicilia. Theſe two great ſhips were appointed by Auria to turne a little vpon the left hand; and at ſuch time as the enemie ſhould ſet forward from the ſhore, to caſt anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occaſion ſhould ſerue, they might as out of two ſtrong Caſtles, beat the Turks gallies with their great ordnance, wherewith they were for that purpoſe wonderfully ſtored. Next vnto theſe great gallions followed the other warlike ſhips with ful ſails: after whom came the gallies in three ſquadrons, wherof Saluiatus had the leading of the right wing, which conſiſted of the Biſhop of Rome's gallies & them of Malta: in the left wing and neere vnto the enemie, commanded Antonius Auria: and in the middle was Auria himſelfe. At the firſt ſight of the Chriſtian fleet, the Turks mooued not from the ſhore, but diſcharged their ordnance at them afar off, and then begun to ſet forward and to draw neerer; eſpecially the

The order of Auria his fleet before Corone.

A the Moore, who with greater courage than the reſt, aſſailed the ſide and rereward of the fleet: for the Chriſtians keeping on their courſe right forth to Corone, and turning nothing to the left hand, as was before appointed, ſeemed as if they had fled; and ſo much the more, for that the gallies in the right wing, for feare of the Turkes great ordnance, did fet a great compaſſe farther off into the ſea, and many of the middle ſquadron and of the left wing alſo, had diſorderly thruſt themſelues in amongſt the ſhips, although they had receiued little or no harme of the enemies great ſhot.

The Chriſtian fleet diſordred.

In this confuſion of the Chriſtian Nauie, the Moore requeſted Lutzis the Admirall, not to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, wherein the Chriſtian fleet might eaſily haue bin ouerthrowne: but whileſt LutZis doth ſlowly and conſideratly ſet forward, Auria in the meane time had put B his fleet again in order, and with a faire wind was come to Corone. Two of the ſhips by the way falling foule one on another, ſtaid behind, being not able to keep way with the reſt: about which all the Turks gallies preſently flockt, and tooke the leſſer of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudie fight had woon the forecaſtle & waſt of the ſhip: when Auria, accounting it no ſmal diſhonor to haue his ſhips ſo ſurpriſed at his heeles, cauſed all his gallies to turne againe vpon the enemie, to reſcue thoſe ſhips. The Turks ſeeing that, and with the Weſternly wind by little and little fallen down ſo far with the ſhips, that they were come within the danger of the ſhot of the town, began with great ſtir to forſake the ſhips, and to betake themſelues to their oares, and ſo in manner C of flight withdrew themſelues. Whom Auria purſued a good way to Modon, thundring in their poupes with his great ſhot, which he liberally beſtowed amongſt them: whileſt in the mean time Antonius Auria came to reſcue the two diſtreſſed ſhips. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their cloſe fights, began now as men reuiued, to ſhew themſelues, and couragiouſly to make reſiſtance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their reſcue, entring with wonderful celeritie on euery ſide, ſlew and tooke 300 Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred thoſe ſhips, and were there left by the ſudden departure of their fellows. Amongſt whom was taken one Ioſuphus an old captain of 1000 Ianizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gaue a faire ſuit of apparell & a chain of gold, and ſo ſet him at libertie without any ranſome; thereby to prouoke the Turks to the D like kind of curteous dealing with the Chriſtians. Aſſam-beg the pyrat, and the other captaines of the Turks fleet, wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admirall, for that he would not then fight with the Chriſtians, when as he was thereto moſt earneſtly requeſted both by the Captains and ſoldiers in generall, and had a faire opportunitie of victorie offered at ſuch time as the Chriſtians fleet was diſordred: but he excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, That it was giuen him in ſpeciall charge from Solyman the Emperor, That he ſhould in any caſe reſpect the ſafetie of his nauie, and not to come to the hazard of a battell. The Turks which beſieged the citie by land, vpon the approch of the Chriſtian fleet, forſooke their trenches and fled: at which time Mendoza the gouernor ſallying out, tooke great ſtore of victuall and warlike prouiſion which the Turks had for haſt left behind them. So Auria to his great honor hauing driuen the Turks E from Corone both by ſea and land, furniſhed the citie with ſtore of corne, wine, victuall, pouder, and ſhot; and committed the defence thereof to Macicaus and the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples: comforting the Greeks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure thoſe calamities of war; telling them that the Emperor would the next Spring make war againſt the Turks both by ſea and land in Peloponeſus, and free them from the Turkiſh bondage. And ſo imbarking the old garriſon of Spaniards, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were brauing the Turks Admirall, hoping thereby to draw him out of that ſtrong harbor to battell. But when he ſaw that the enemie could by no meanes be allured out of his ſtrength, or aſſailed as he lay, he departed thence to Corcyra, and ſo backe againe to Meſſana in Sicilia.

F Within a few dayes after, Aſſam-beg the Moore of Alexandria and moſt famous Pyrat, lying in wait for the Merchants ſhips of Venice comming out of Syria with merchandiſe, by chance met with Hieronimus Canalis vpon the coaſt of Crete: where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruell battell; wherein of the Moores thirteene Gallies, foure were ſunke, three taken, and the reſt hauing loſt moſt part of their rowers, fled to Alexandria. In this fight was ſlaine three hundred Ianizaries which were going to Caire, and a thou-thouſand other Turks: of all them that was taken, there was ſcarcely one ſaued, but the Moore himſelfe, who grieuouſly wounded in the face, for ſafegard of his life was glad to diſcouer himſelfe: for the Venetians maintaining their ſtate by trade & traffique, do of all other ſhew leſt fauor vnto pyrats. When the Moore had made himſelfe knowne vnto Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his wounds, and either of them began with notable diſſimulation to excuſe the matter to other, ſaying, That they were both deceiued by the likeneſſe of the gallies, & miſtaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that, they knew one another right well. For the Moore ſaid, that he tooke thoſe Venetian gallies for to haue bin part of Auria his fleet: and Canalis excuſed himſelfe, by ſaying, that he miſtooke him for Barbaruſſa, who a few yeares before had ſurpriſed three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their embaſſador ſought to excuſe what was done, as a thing happening by errour and miſchance: of which excuſe Solyman accepted, and ſaid moreouer, that Canalis had done wel and ſouldier like, to repulſe by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the emperors gallies ſtaying behind the reſt of the fleet, were neere vnto the promontorie Palinurus, vpon the coaſt of Apulia, intercepted and carried away by Sinam, ſurnamed the Iew, a notable pyrat of that time alſo.

The garriſon ſouldiers of Corone deſire of their general to be brought to ſome ſeruice.

Macicaus gouernour of Corone goeth out to ſurpriſe Andruſſa.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want victuals, eſpecially wine and fleſh: for the Turks had ſo blocked vp the city, that nothing was to be had out of the countrey; wherefore the ſouldiers requeſted Macicaus their Gouernour and Generall, to lead them forth to ſome piece of ſeruice againſt the enemie, forſomuch as they were not to hope for any relief elſwhere before April, wiſhing rather valiantly to die like men in fight againſt the Turks, than to languiſh within thoſe dead wals for want of victuall. But Macicaus mindfull of his charge, ſought by many reaſons to diſſuade them from ſuch purpoſe, ſhewing them what an offence it were raſhly to depart out of the city committed to their cuſtody, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they ſhould ſpeed neuer ſo wel; & that thoſe wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be ouercome by ſparing and patience: and therefore told them plainly, that he was reſolutely ſet downe to keep the city for the Emperor, and to indure all hardnes, rather than to incurre the infamie, That he had forſaken the citie, and betraid his garriſon. Yet for all this, the matter was ſo vrged by Didacus Touarres and Hermoſilla, both great captains, and by the generall importunitie of the ſoldiers, that Macicaus was inforced to yeeld to their deſire, and to promiſe them to goe: yet earneſtly proteſting, that he did it altogether againſt his will, rather inforced than perſuaded vnto that, whereof he had no great hope of ſucceſſe. Among other that were ſo forward in this action, was one Barbatius, a moſt valiant Greeke, who could perfectly ſpeake the Turks language, and of all others beſt knew the by-waies and ſecret paſſages of the countrie: he vndertooke to bee their guide, and by vnknown waies to bring them vnto the enemies vndiſcouered in the dead time of the night, when as they feared no ſuch matter. So Macicaus commending the cuſtodie of the citie to Liſcanius and Mendeſius, with charge that they ſhould ſuffer no man to goe out of the city after his departure, for feare of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemy, ſet forward about ten a clocke in the night towards Andruſſa, Barbatius being his guide, who ſhunning the common beaten waies, brought them by ſecret and vncouth paths that night halfe the way to Andruſſa: but vpon the riſing of the Sun he brought them into a ſecret woody valley, where they reſted and refreſhed themſelues all that day, and ſetting forward againe at night, came to Andruſſa before day. In this towne, which was of no great ſtrength, lay one Caranus, a warlike captaine with three thouſand footmen, whereof the one halfe was of the Ianizaries; and in the ſuburbes lay Acomates with a thouſand choſen horſemen, with which garriſon the Turks kept all that ſide of Peloponeſus in awe. Macicaus brought by his guide vnto the place where his enemies lay, went directly to the towne to haue ſurpriſed it: Hermoſilla in the meane time ſtanding ſtill with certain companies of Spaniards ouer againſt the place where the horſemen lay. But this could not be don with ſo great ſilence, but that ſome of the horſeboies being awake, diſcouered them by the fire in their matches; who firſt awaked the negligent watchmen, and afterwards raiſed an alarme in the ſuburbs: whereupon Hermoſilla couragiouſly ſet vpon the horſemen, beeing altogether vnreadie, and ſlew many of them before they could arme themſelues, and ſet fire alſo vpon the ſtables wherein the Turks horſes ſtood, with the rage whereof many of the Turkes periſhed, with their horſes and armour. Great and terrible was the

A noiſe raiſed vpon the ſudden in the ſuburbs,but eſpecially of the horſes,which burnt as they ſtood faſt tied in the ſtables,or by chance breaking looſe, ran vp and downe with their tayles and maines on a light fire ; by occaſion whereof, an alarum was raiſed in the towne, and the Turks to got the wals before the Spaniards could enter. Macicaus himſelf laboring to break in at a poſterne,was ſhot in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlaine: diuers others neere vnto him were there ſlaine alſo. The Turks perceiuing the ſmall number of their enemies, ſallied out vpon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermoſilla, who had alreadie made great ſpoile amongſt the horſemen,by whoſe skilful direction,the Spaniards retired in ſo good order,making many ſtands,with their harquebuſiers all drawn into the rereward,that ſuch of the Turks as were moſt forward to purſue them,did by their death cauſe the reſt to make leſſe haſt. Acomates B with ſuch of his horſemen as had eſcaped the fire,haſted thither alſo,bringing with him two hundred harquebuſiers, which he had cauſed his horſemen for haſt to take vp behinde them vpon their horſes : but whileſt he ſought eagerly to be reuenged vpon his enemies,and with too much heat preſſed on with the formoſt,he was ſhot into the bodie with a bullet and ſlain. So the horſmen which had before receiued a great loſſe as they lay in their lodgings,accounting it in their good haps that they were not there all ſlaine, and hauiug now loſt their captain,ceaſed any further to purſue their enemies,but returned. The Spaniards and Greekes, although they were wearied both with their long march and euill ſucceſſe,retired ſtill as reſolute men,ready to fight,and ſo teturned to Corone. Preſently after,the Turkiſh garriſon remoued from Andruſſa to Megalopolis, now called Londarium : after whoſe departure the C Chriſtian ſouldiers of Corone came thither and buried the dead bodies of their ſlaine fellows (which till then lay vnburied) and brought backe with them the head of Macicaus their late General,which the Turks had there ſet vp vpon a long pole,which they honorably buried at Corone. Not long after,the plague began to grow hot in Coron,ſo much the more grieuous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which cauſes,the Spaniards as men at once inforced with many extremities, imbarked themſelues with all the great ordnance,and ſuch Greekes as would go with them, in certaine ſhips which came with corne out of Sicilia,and ſo departed, leauing the towne emptie for the Turks to come vnto.

Macicaus ſlain

Corone forſaken by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported,that the Spaniards left Corone not without the ſecret conſent of the Emperor,which was the rather thought to be ſo, becauſe that they which forſook the D place,receiued thereby no diſgrace,and the Emperor himſelfe had offered to giue the towne to Clement Biſhop of Rome,the Venetians and the knights of Malta,who all refuſed to receiue it, as loath to be at ſo great a charge in keeping a place ſeruing for no greater purpoſe ; the very cauſe why the emperor was ſo willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Biſhop had by meanes of Aloyſius Grittus made a motion of a peace, to haue bin concluded for ten yeres betwixt Solyman and the Chriſtian princes,and thereupon the towne to haue been againe deliuered vnto the Turkes : which peace Solyman was not altogether vnwilling to grant, beeing then wholly bent to inuade the Perſian king. Ferdinaud was alſo in good hope that his brother Charles the Emperour, would for the yeelding vp of that towne haue couenanted with the Turke ſome great matter for his benefit in Hungarie, which as was thought would alſo haue E been eaſily obtained. But whileſt the Emperor drawne diuerſly with the conſideration of his honour in keeping it,and of his profit in giuing it vp,ſtood too long in reſoluing,the towne in the meane time was by the Spaniards (their neceſſitie daily increaſing) abandoned,and ſo left to the Turks for nothing.

Solyman now purpoſing to turne his forces againſt the Perſians,of whom he had in the frontiers of his dominions receiued great hurt,eſpecielly in Comagene; renewed the league hee had with the Venetians, and ſome other Chriſtian princes : but of all other his affaires with the Chriſtians,he was moſt carefull of the intereſt he had already gotten in Hungarie. For it was reported,that king Iohn his vaſſall induced by the continuall ſolicitations of his ſubiects, was deſirous of peace with king Ferdinand, vpon condition that hee might quietly enioy the F kingdome during his life : and after his deceaſe it to remaine to king Ferdinand and his heires.
Wherfore Solyman, that nothing ſhould be there done in his abſence without his knowledge, ſent Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his ſon (of whom we haue before ſpoken (a man both for the honour of his houſe, the good carriage of himſelfe, and the ſpeciall commendation of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa,in great credit with him : with commiſſion as his Lieutenant to bee aſſiſtant vnto king Iohn, in ſuch magnificall ſort, as that without him the king might conclude nothing in matters of ſtate, concerning either peace or warres, with any other the Chriſtian princes. With this proud commiſſion from the grand Seignior, Grittus entred into Tranſyluania, then a part of the kingdome of Hungarie (much about the ſame time that Solyman ſet forward from Conſtantinople againſt the Perſian) attended vpon with ſeuen thouſaed perſons of one ſort and other, among whom were Vrbanus Batianus, and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian captains with their companies, and many of the Turks Ianizaries alſo. At his firſt comming, to make his authority the more known, he ſent out his proud command vnto the great men and Gouernors of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to repaire vnto him as great Solymans deputie, authoriſed by him to heare and determine all the controuerſies and matters of ſtate concerning the kingdome of Hungarie. At that time Americus Cibachus Biſhop of Veradium, a man of great nobilitie and power, withall ſingularly well qualitied, was Vayuod or Gouernor of Tranſyluania, an honor next vnto the king: he vnderſtanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making ſmall haſt to welcome him, as one not greatly mooued with his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus, who deſired nothing more than at his firſt enterance to haue confirmed the opinion of his authoritie in the minds of the vulgar people by the preſt and ready attendance of the Vayuod. But it was commonly bruted, that the ſtout Biſhop vpon a Chriſtian zeale deteſted the friendſhip of the Turkes, and could not well brooke that they ſhould be too much acquainted in his prouince, for feare leſt that fruitfull country abounding with men and horſes, ſhould by one means or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to Baxouia when hee vnderſtood by many meſſengers, that the Vayuod was comming with a great traine, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with diuers gallant troups of horſemen, in warlike manner appointed: for the Biſhops of Hungarie being wonderfull rich, were by old cuſtome bound to keepe great numbers of horſemen, which as occaſion ſerued they vſed to bring into the field againſt the Turke; accounting it great honor with their religious hands to defend the cauſe of religion. But then eſpecially the nobility of the country wel appointed reſorted on euery ſide, on courteſie to honour and countenance their great Biſhop and gouernor, at whoſe commandement they were: inſomuch as the Biſhops retinue made ſhew of a good army. Which thing moued Grittus exceedingly, that he ſhould be enforced contrary to his expectation to parley with the Biſhop in the open fields, as with an enemie in ſight of all their followers. Hereof roſe enuie, a deadly miſchiefe alwaies repining at another mans honor; when as the one ſwelling with Turkiſh pride could not then abide any equall, & the other iealous of his honor, could by no means indure any ſuperior, in ſuch place as he had the ſoueraigntie of. When theſe two great men had met together in the open fields, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any ſhew of friendſhip or good will: Grittus inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, couertly threatned to be reuenged vpon al ſuch as ſhould make ſo light account of his authoritie: and immediatly as he departed from the banket, taking his cap from his head (which was after the Turkiſh manner made of a high faſhion, of rich Sables) and opening it with both his hands, ſaid, This cap wil not hold two heads, and therefore it muſt be fitted to one, and ſo put it on againe. Ianus Docia one of the Hungarian captains, his followers, who deadly hated the Vayuod (for that he had long time before, for his malapert ſpeech in a great aſſembly, giuen him a blow with his fiſt) tooke hold of that ſpeech of Grittus, as a fit occaſion for him to worke his reuenge: and ſaid, Your honor maketh a fit compariſon, neither can this prouince containe two equall gouernors or commanders, nor you euer enioy your power and authoritie, except you doe this day with ſpeedy and manly reſolution defend both Solymans credit and your owne. You know not this proud beaſt Americus, whoſe pride and inſolencie if you but ſay the word, I will quickly put downe: for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the king, and of you hee maketh no account at all, for why, he aſpireth vnto the maieſtie of a king, and ſaith that the Vayuodſhip of Tranſyluania well beſeemeth a king; for that in this country Decebaldus the Dacian ſometime raigned, whom the warlike Emperour Traian with all the force of the Roman empire hardly ſubdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly ſet himſelfe foorth than he, neither more craftily or cunningly diſſemble to ſerue his turne. Indeed he hath for faſhion ſake preſented your honor with a few ſimple preſents, and giuen you his hand alſo, better koown for his falſhood than his faith; to the intent that when you are once paſt his countrey, he may ſcoffe and ieaſt at your decrees: verily he deadly enuieth at your

A your honor and felicitie, and grudgeth in his heart, that you ſhould ſet down the laws of peace and war in Hungarie: and whereas he doth manifeſtly aſpire vnto a kingdome, hee feareth you aboue all others, leſt you ſhould trouble his deſignes, abate his credit, and chaſtiſe his inſolency. Verily, he that thus maligneth your happineſſe, and contemneth your authority, is not to be ſuffered, but by good reaſon to be taken away: therby at this your firſt entrance to defend the credit of your commiſſion & honor of your name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithleſſe companion, and a ſecret enemy, eſpecally when you ſhall leaue him at your backe behind you: for when he ſhall as occaſion ſerues ſhew forth his hidden malice, he ſhall ſo much the more ſlily and deſperatly indanger your perſon. Grittus enraged with his ſpeech more than before, thought it beſt to make haſt, and to vſe his authoritie to the full; he commended Docia, and promiſed him in ſhort time to requite his good will towards him, eſpecially if he B would by ſome notable attempt abate the Biſhops pride. It is reported, that Grittus gaue him no other charge, but to take the Biſhop, that ſo hee might after the Turkiſh manner haue ſent him in chains to Conſtantinople, & beſtowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronimus Laſcus the Polonian, who in hope of that honorable preferment vnto him promiſed by king Iohn, had done him great and faithfull ſeruice, as his embaſſador both vnto Solyman, and alſo vnto the French king. But when king Iohn perceiued that he could not conueniently without manifeſt danger place him, being a Polonian (who could ſcarcely ſpeak the Hungarian language) gouernor ouer ſuch a warlike people; he as it were inforced by neceſſitie, preferred this Americus the Biſhop of Veradium, a man of them both reuerenced and feared: Which ſo grieued Laſcus, a man of great ſtomacke and experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would C neuer admit any excuſe of the kings, but alwayes after complained, that he was by the king deluded.
Yet for all that, he kept himſelfe within the bounds of loyaltie, & inioyed certain lands and townes which the king had giuen him in the borders of Polonia, and eſtranged neuertheleſſe from him in mind, was now become one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his means vnto Solyman; and for that cauſe was not ſo forward to doe the king ſuch ſeruice as he had in times paſt. Now by the commandement of Grittus, a ſtrong companie of Turkiſh horſemen, and certaine troups of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia; who ſecretly departing that night from Baxouia, came ſuddenly to the Vayuods campe, hauing a little before by his Hungarian ſpies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by reaſon of the great heat, without any watch or guard, attended on only with his pages and houſhold D ſeruants, as a man without feare; & that all the reſt of his retinue lay diſperſed in the countrey villages round about. All which ſerued ſo well for Docia his purpoſe, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death ſo nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his enemies) was ſuddenly oppreſſed by Docia his ſoldiers: ſo that whileſt he was yet lying in his bed, & ſcarcely well awaked by his chamberlaines and the noiſe of the enemie; Docia breaking into his tent, cut off his head as he lay. All they which lay neere, amazed with the ſuddenneſſe of the matter, fled away for feare, and left their horſes and other things for a prey to the Turks and other of Docia his followers. Docia hauing done ſo great an outrage, returned to Grittus, preſenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which hee brought in his hand by the eare. Laſcus was then preſent, but altogether ignorant of the murder, who as a man moued with a naturall compaſſion in E ſo ſudden & horrible a fact, and forgetting al former grudge (as in like caſe it oftentimes chanceth) ſtood as one diſmaid, nothing reioicing at the vnworthie death of his enemy. To whom Grittus turning himſelfe, ſaid, Laſcus, Doeſt thou not know this ſhauen pate, truly it is a great mans head, but of ſuch a one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Laſcus replied, Truly though I loued him not, yet I thought it not ſo whileſt it ſtood vpon his ſhoulders; diſallowing therein the crueltie of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiuing, began to repent him of that was done, & ſaid openly, that although he was worthily ſlain, yet he could haue wiſhed rather to haue had him taken priſoner. The report of this horrible murder once bruted abroad, the Biſhops kinſmen & friends, yea almoſt all the people of that prouince riſe vp in arms againſt Grittus, to reuenge the death of the reuerend Biſhop, whom liuing they had F both loued and feared. Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong, enter into arms with greater deſire, more heat, or quicker ſpeed: ſo that in few daies there were aſſembled together 40000 horſe and foot, vnder the leading of Stephanus Maylat a noble gentleman, who of all other moſt honored the Biſhop, & in that common griefe took vpon him as chiefe, the perſecuting of the authors of ſuch inhumane crueltie. Grittus perceiuing how grieuouſly the matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himſelfe what courſe were G beſt for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious people, the ſame was preſent death; and to returne and leaue the honorable deputation he had with ſo great expectation of all men taken vpon him, was vnto his aſpiring mind no leſſe torment than death it ſelfe. Thus perplexed, he with all ſpeed got himſelf with his followers to the ſtrong town of Mege, in hope to ſhreud himſelfe vntill ſuch time as the rage of the countrey people were either of it ſelfe appeaſed (as it oftentimes falleth out in ſuch ſudden tumults) or els he ſhould be relieued by king Iohn, or the Turks Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkiſh empire. The townſmen of Mege ſeeing Grittus accompanied with ſo many Turkes, ſhut the gates againſt him: yet at length by the perſuaſion of the two Hungarian captains Docia and Batizanus, they gaue him leaue to enter into the baſe town, hauing before retired themſelues with all their ſubſtance vnto the higher towne, which in manner of a ſtrong caſtle commanded H the lower. Here whilſt Grittus with all carefulnes fortifieth the place, and diſpatcheth the meſſengers vnto his friends abroad for aid, his enemies with hideous noiſe and outcries approching the town, at their firſt comming attempted to haue ſcaled the wals and rampiers therof: which thing whilſt they diſorderly did, with greater fury than diſcretion, they were eaſily repulſed, and many of them ſlaine by the Turks Ianizaries & harquebuſiers. After which loſſe, by the direction of Maylat their Generall, they withdrew themſelues out of the danger of the ſhot, & incamped on euery ſide of the town, hoping as the truth was, that their enemies vnprouided of victuall, could not long hold the place, but muſt of neceſſitie either ſtarue with famine, or yeeld it vp. In the mean time Grittus reſolutely induring all the calamities of a man I beſieged, fell ſicke, and ſo much the more for that he could heare nothing of any aide which he expected from his friends: for king Iohn glad in his mind of the diſtreſſe of the ouerſeer, or rather competitor of his kingdom, and alſo knowing that he could not without great diſcontentment of his ſubiects oppoſe himſelf againſt ſuch a multitude riſen vpon ſo iuſt a cauſe; yet for faſhion ſake ſent certain troups of horſmen to his reliefe: who not altogether ignorant of the kings mind, made ſuch haſt, as men that purpoſed not to come in time to do him good.

The cauſe why Laſcus the Polonian fell from King Iohn.

As for the Turks Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they enuying at his honor, flatly refuſed to depart from their charge, to relieue him, without expreſſe command from Solyman himſelfe: and Laſcus (before one of Grittus his chiefe followers, but now a beholder of his diſtres) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him ſome reliefe, as he promiſed, K did now in this extremity forſake him alſo. The citizens in the vpper town (who a great while had ſtood looking on from aboue as men indifferent) perceiuing the full reſolution of their countrymen to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherewith the Turks were incloſed, aſſailed them alſo from the high towne. Grittus thus beſet on euery ſide, offered vnto the Tranſyluanians a great maſſe of money, to ſuffer him to paſſe forward into Hungarie; but their furious minds more deſirous of reuenge than money, were not to be moued with any gold. In fine, he ſent rich iewels to the Gouernor of Moldauia his friend, to be ready at a certain houre when he would ſallie out of the towne, to receiue him with certain troups of horſmen; ſo if it were poſſible to ſaue himſelfe & his children. Grittus (whether it were vpon a doubtfull hope, or vrged by ineuitable deſtinie) ſallying out of the towne at the appointed time, with Solymans L commiſſion in his hand, and miſſing of the Moldauian, fell vpon Francis Schenden the late Biſhops nigh kinſman, and Maylat his familiar friend; who furiouſly running in vpon him with tumultuous ſpeech, violently caught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horſemen tooke him, being weake with ſickneſſe, and making no reſiſtance. His followers, eſpecially the Turks, incloſed on euery ſide, were either ſlain or taken. But Grittus himſelf being brought to the generals tent, beſet round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why hee had commanded the Vayuod to be ſlain, earneſtly proteſted, That he neuer commanded any ſuch thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his anſwer ſerued not his turne, all the Vayuods ghoſt. Whereupon he was by Maylat deliuered again to Francis Schenden to bee M executed, who without delay cauſed his head to bee ſtrucke off. The nobilitie and the Vayuods kinſmen (after the maner of that people) dipped ſome part of their garments in his bloud, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. This was the ſhamefull end of Aloyſius Gritus the duke of Venice his ſon, Solymans deputie in Hungarie, with whom he was in

A in ſuch credit as neuer was any Chriſtian abounding in wealth and worldly felicitie: but climing too faſt vp the euill ſtaued ladder of ambition, ſuddenly fell and neuer riſe more. The executioner ſtripping his dead body, found about him ſo many precious ſtones and jewels as were valued at fortie milions of duckats. And not long after, Laſcus ſent for by the king to Buda, was ſtraitly examined vpon torture concerning Grittus his commiſſion and purpoſes, and was in great danger of his life: but at laſt by the interceſſion of Sigiſmund king of Polonia, he B was ſet at libertie, & ſo fled out of Hungarie vnto Sigiſmund his court in Polonia: after hee had long time wearied himſelfe, and aduentured his life in the Hungarian ſtate. Docia the author of this Tragedie, was by the furious people afterwards rent in pieces, and ſo periſhed.

The riches found about Grittus.

The ſame time that Grittus went from Conſtantinople into Hungarie, Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor dreading no danger out of Europe, tooke in hand two great expeditions both at one time, the one by land into Aſia againſt the Perſians, & the other by ſea into Affrick againſt the Moores; promiſing vnto himſelfe in his inordinat deſires, the Monarchie of the whole world in ſhort time, if he might ſubdue theſe two great nations whom he had already in hope deuoured. But foraſmuch as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in diuers places ſo far diſtant done, omitting for a while the expedition made in perſon himſelfe againſt the C Perſians, we will firſt declare what he did by his Lieutenants againſt the Moores. Hariadenus, ſurnamed of the Chriſtians Barbaruſſa (who ſucceeding his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdom of Algiers in Affricke, had by many victories ſo inlarged the kingdome before gotten by his brother, that his name and power was now become terrible both to the Chriſtians and wild Moores, and his fame growne great in the Turkiſh court) was the chiefe author and perſuader of Solyman to inuade Affricke. But it ſhall not (as I thinke) be far from our purpoſe here briefely to rehearſe by what meanes thoſe two Mytilene brethren, baſely borne, crept out of a ſmal galliot vnto the maieſtie of great kings; that herein they which come afterwards may alſo admire the wonderfull changes and chances of theſe worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certaintie than a ſtage play.

Solyman at one time purpoſeth to inuade Perſia and Affricke.

D Theſe two brethren, Horuccius and Hariadenus, borne at Mytilene in the Iland of Lesbos, weary of the poore and baſe eſtate they led at home with their father, a renegate Grecian; ſtealing a little galliot, committed themſelues and all the hope of their good fortune to ſea, where by chance they conſorted themſelues with Camales, a moſt famous pyrat of that time; vnder whom Horruccius the elder brother, for his forwardneſſe became a captain; and growing rich by many purchaſes, and alſo ſtrong with gallies and ſlaues which hee had at ſundrie times taken, and at laſt conſorting himſelfe with Haidin, Sinam the Iew, Salec, and other leſſe pyrats (which afterwards became men of great fame and account) ouer whom he commanded as an arch pyrat, came ſeeking after purchaſe as far as Mauritania. At which time Selymes king of Iulia-Cæſarea, which now we call Algiers, was in armes againſt his brother Methemetes, competitor of the kingdom; who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his eſtate. Selymes glad of the comming of Horruccius & the E other pyrats his followers, with a great maſſe of money paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the reſt to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdom againſt his brother: which thing Horruccius ſo happily performed, (eſpecially by the means of his harquebuſiers, as then no ſmall terror to the wild Moores and Numidians) that in ſhort time he repulſed that ſauage people, and ſet Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a ſharp wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his ſeruice the kings mild and ſimple diſpoſition, void of all diſtruſt; and that the naked Moores were no ſoldiers, but a light and vnconſtant people, alwaies at variance among themſelues; and that the wandring Numidians liuing barely diuided into many factions, were eaſily by reward to be woon, or by force conſtrained; ſuddenly falſified his faith, & villanouſly ſlew Selymes the king, as he was bathing himſelfe, miſtruſting nothing leſſe than the falſhood of the pyrat, & in the ſame hurle murthring ſuch as he thought F would withſtand his deſire, and with bountie and crueltie ouercomming the reſt, ſo wrought the matter, that he was by generall conſent choſen king of Algiers. Thus of a pyrat become a king, he ſhortly after by policie ſurpriſed Circello (a famous citie about 60 mile diſtant from Algiers) by his ſouldiers ſent thither in the habit of marchants. After that, he by his brother Hariadenus (no leſſe valiant than himſelf) troubled al the Mediterranean ſea from Algiers with his gallies, & al his neighbors: himſelf by land with daily incurſiõs, leauing nothing vntoucht, which which might by force or policy be had; ſo that his power daily increaſed, men of ſeruice continually reſorting vnto him, as the chiefe man in al thoſe parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of Bugea, a citie famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometan ſchoole ſometime there kept: at the taking whereof hee loſt his right hand with a ſhot, and in ſtead thereof euer after vſed a hand of yron, wherewith hee obtained many worthie victories againſt his enemies: for neere to Algiers he ouerthrew an army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their Generall. And ſhortly after, at ſuch time as Hugo Moncada returning out of Italie with the old Spaniſh ſouldiers, landed in his country, he enforced him againe to ſea; where hee with all his expert ſouldiers either periſhed by ſhipwracke, or driuen on ſhore, were ſlain or taken priſoners by Horruccius, and thruſt into his gallies. At laſt hauing in ſundry battels ouercome the king of Tremiſſa, Charles the Emperor his confederat, and thruſt him out of his kingdome, he ſtirred vp both the Chriſtians and Numidians againſt him: ſo that comming to take Ora and Portus (two ſtrong holds kept by garriſons of Spaniards ſent thither to aid the king of Tremiſſa) he was by them and the Moores at the firſt repulſed, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where moſt part of his army being ſlain or taken priſoners, he with a few of his friends ſought to ſaue themſelues by flight ouer the deſart ſands; and ſeeing himſelfe hardly purſued by his enemies, ſcattered many pieces of gold vpon the ſands as he fled, thereby to haue ſtaied their haſtie purſuit: but they more deſirous of him than of his gold, followed ſo faſt, that at laſt they ouertooke him, and without further delay ſtrucke off his head, which was afterwards ſent into Spiane, and carried vpon a launce thorow all the townes and cities alongſt the ſea coaſt, to the wonderfull reioycing of the people, vnto whom he had in former time done great harme.

Horruccius ſlain, & his head carried aboue in Spaine.

Hariadenus ſurnamed Barbaruſſa, ſucceedeth his brother Horruccius in the kingdome of Algiers.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferiour to his brother neither in courage nor martiall prowesse, by the generall conſent of the ſouldiers tooke vpon him the kingdome of Algiers. He, made heire not onely of his brothers kingdome, but of his vertues and haughtie thoughts, and of the ſurname alſo of Barbaruſſa, began forthwith to aſpire vnto the empire of all that part of Affricke, accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too baſe to anſwer his deſires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terrour both to the Moores and Numidians, holding peace with ſome, and wars with others, as beſt ſerued his purpoſe; and with his gallies robbed and ſpoiled the coaſts of Spaine, Sardinia, and the Iſlands Baleares, fortune ſo fauoring him in al his enterpriſes, that he became both famous & fearful to his enemies. He ſlew Hames, a great commander among the Numidians, and chaſed Benchades and Amida, two of their greateſt princes, out of the country; and with like fortune at ſea, ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who ſore wounded, had much adoe to ſaue himſelfe by flight, when he had loſt diuers of his gallies. He alſo in battel at ſea ouerthrew Rodericus Portundus, Admirall of Spaine: in which fight the Admirall with his ſon were both ſlaine, and ſeuen of his gallies taken: in token of which victory, he ſent part of the rich ſpoile there taken, with the Admirals enſigne, as a Preſent vnto Solyman, wherby he became famous in the Turks court; but much more, after he had repulſed Auria from Cercenna, and taken two great Genoway ſhips which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition; the loſſe whereof filled the citie of Genoa with much ſorrow. All things ſorting thus according to his deſire, and his name become no leſſe terrible in Spaine, Italie, Sicilie, and the Iſlands of the Mediterranian, than it was in the greateſt part of Affricke; Solyman grieued with the loſſe of Corone, Patras, and the caſtles vpon the ſtraits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his Admirall being ſhamefully put to flight: by the counſel of his Baſſaes, but eſpecially of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, ſent Embaſſadours vnto him to Algiers; offering him the greateſt honours of his court, and to make him Admirall of all his fleet, if hee would forthwith repaire vnto Conſtantinople: for why, hee was the onely man in all mens iudgements, who for his yeres and great experience at ſea, as wel as for his inuincible courage, and glory of his late atchiued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to be oppoſed againſt the Chriſtian fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embaſſage ſent, and ſpeedily tranſported to Algiers by Zangalis, a famous pyrat, then Gouernour of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably receiued by Barbaruſſa, and audience giuen him. Barbaruſſa vnderſtanding the cauſe of his comming, was exceeding glad thereof, preſently conceiuing no ſmall hope of obtaining the monarchie of Affricke, if hee might once come to Solymans preſence,

His wonderfull ſucceſſe.

Solyman ſends for Barbaruſſa.

A and at large ſhew vnto him the ſtate of Affricke, and power of the Chriſtians; with their continuall diſcord amongſt themſelues. Wherefore without furthtr delay committing the protection of his ſon Aſenes (then about eighteene yeares old) and the gouernment of his new gotten kingdome to Ramada and Agis, two of his nigh kinſemen and aſſured friends, of whoſe fidelitie he doubted not: he with fortie of his owne gallies in moſt warrelike manner appointed, ſet forward with Solymans Embaſſadour towards Conſtantinople: where by the way hee met with a fleet of Genoway ſhips bound for Sicilie for corne, which after a ſharpe and cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the countrey of Elba, not far from Naples, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed Rhium a rich citie; where loading his gallies with the wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the inhabitants into captiuitie, he arriued at B Conſtantinople in the yeare 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was joyfully receiued, if it were but for the preſents which he gaue him: which were faire boyes and yong maidens ſumptuouſly apparrelled, eunuchs, and wild beaſts of Ly-bia, as Lyons, Leopards and ſuch like. But after he had certain dayes diſcourſed at large with the great Baſſa's, of the ſtate of Affricke, the ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and how the wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them ſeldomer ſent for, and offering himſelfe into their companie, was hardly admitted: for enuie (the inſeperable companion of growing honor) had quickely ouertaken him in the court, ſo that many men letted not openly to ſay, It had not bin the faſhion of the Othoman kings, to prefer pyrats (the worſt kind of theeues) to the honor C of their great Admirall; and that there wanted not, neither euer would want men both ver-tuous and valiant in the Turks court, which could with great honour maintaine and augment the glory of the Turkiſh empire both by ſea and land; whereas hee had againſt all right and conſcience, by ſhameful treacherie intruded himſelfe into another mans kingdom in Affricke, and there perſecuted the Mahometan princes and people, being of no religion himſelfe, as one that was borne of a renegate Greeke, and had from his youth liued as a mercileſſe pyrat, and common enemie of mankind. By which ſpeeches Barbaruſſa perceiued in how euill time Abraham Baſſa his beſt friend, and by whoſe means he was ſent for, was abſent from Court, who at that time was gone into Comagena, and wintred at Aleppo, with purpoſe (as Solymans forerunner) with the firſt of the next Spring, to paſſe ouer Euphrates againſt the Perſian. After D long ſuit, and much expectation, Solyman anſwered Barbaruſſa by Aiax and Caſimes two of the great Baſſa's, That all the matter concerning him ſhould be referred to the diſcretion of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, for that he was by his counſell eſpecially ſent for into Affricke: wherefore if he did expect any thing, he ſhould repaire vnto him in Syria, that according to his graue iudgement all things might be ordred. Barbaruſſa thus reiected into Syria, although he well perceiued that it tended to his no ſmall diſgrace; yet in hope by ſufferance to obtaine another kingdome, ſeemed contented with the anſwere, and reſolued forthwith to take vpon him that long and painſull journy: which the old king luſtily performed, and ſo poſting by land through Aſia the leſſe, & trauelling ouer the mountain Amanus, then couered with deep ſnow, came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably recei-E ued by the great Baſſa, and heard at large, to his ſo good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fitteſt to command the Turks power at ſea; & to that purpoſe writ commendatorie letters in his behalfe to Solyman: wiſhing him for his ſufficience to place him as the fourth with the other three Baſſa's of his counſell. After Barbaruſſa was again arriued at Conſtantinople with theſe letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the chiefe Baſſa had commended him to Solyman, it was a world to ſee how on the ſudden the face of the court was changed vpon him, euery man either for friendſhip or flatterie began now to ſpeake of his praiſes, and to extoll his worthines: who was now in all mens mouthes but Barbaruſſa? ſo great was the power and authoritie of the chiefe Baſſa, that being abſent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted ſufficient to prefer whom he pleaſed; and his letters lawes to the F reſt of the court. Barbaruſſa had brought with him from Algiers, one Roſcetes the elder brother of Muleaſſes king of Tunes, who wrongfully driuen into exile by his yonger brother, had liued certain yeres at Algiers, but now by the perſuaſion of Barbaruſſa was come with him to Conſtantinople, to craue aid of Solyman againſt the oppreſſion of his brother. Him Barbaruſſa oftentimes ſhewed vnto the great Baſſa's, and in his diſcourſes with them concerning the con-queſt of Affricke, ſet him out as a moſt fit inſtrument for ſubduing of the kingdome of Tunes,

His returne to Conſtantinople.

Roſcetes.

as a man whom the people more affected than they did Muleaſſes the vſurper. After long de- G liberation and conſultation had with the Baſſa's concerning the inuaſion of Affricke, Barbaruſ- ſa now admitted vnto the preſence of Solyman, in theſe or like words perſuaded him to that war, for the entrance whereunto we haue thus far digreſſed.

Barbaruſſa his ſpeech to Solyman to perſuade him to inuade Tunes.

What thing the Prieſts with loud voyce vſe to pray for, at ſuch time as the Othoman Emperors enter into the Temple to pray, the ſame thing doe I alſo wiſh vnto thee moſt mightie Solyman; which is,
That thou ſhouldeſt remember, thy progenitors by Iuſtice and religion to haue got for thee this Empire, than which, more magnificent and richer the gods haue not giuen to any: Fortune hath neuer deceiued them that troad that way, and thou hitherto haſt ſo traced their ſteps, that thou haſt eaſily ſurmounted their fame and glorie, adminiſtring Iuſtice to thy ſubiects; and inflamed with the hope of eternall praiſe, H making continuall war againſt the enemies of our religion, the true office of a zealous Prince. By this meanes is Belgrade taken, Rhodes woon, the King of Hungarie ſlaine in battell, Germanie twice harried and burnt: ſo that Charles, whom the Chriſtians would make equall to thy ſelfe in power and valour, with the great aid almoſt of all the Chriſtian Nations, terrified with the noyſe of thy armie, ſhunned battell. But foraſmuch as Empires, be they neuer ſo large, or victories be they neuer ſo glorious, can either ſatisfie the greatneſſe of an heroicall mind, or glut the ſame with glorie; thou haſt therefore ſent before thee thy victorious enſignes againſt the Perſians and Parthians, that thoſe Nations who haue wickedly fallen from our Rites, purified as it were by thy ſacred armes, may be again reclaimed to the antient rites of our religion. But be this vnto thy greatneſſe moſt honorable to attempt, and glorious to performe: I let it only be lawfull for me now growne an old man in the middeſt of armes and dangers, to declare what is expedient, and brieſely to open ſuch things as I haue by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and empire elſewhere. Neither would I haue you to take this as preſumptuouſly ſpoken of me: for Fortune hath enough, yea and more than enough fauoured my deſignes, whom from a poore cottage and bare hope, ſhe hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, yea vnto the title and maieſtie of a King. But vnto theſe things the gods could giue me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and ſent for, in Councell to diſcourſe of matters of greateſt importance: wherefore my aduice ſhall be vnto thee faithfull and with experience confirmed: which although it be all that it ſeemeth old men can do, yet in my ſound bodie remaineth ſuch ſtrength, that I dare both promiſe and performe vnto thee my good ſeruice at all aſſayes both by ſea and land. For vnto this onely courſe haue I bent my ſelfe day and night from my youth, following the purpoſe and counſell of my valiant brother Horruccius (who K to extend the bounds of our religion, perſecuted the Chriſtians both by ſea and land) deſiring nothing more, than that thy fleet and power might once be ioyned with my forces and direction, and ſo vnder thy good hap, to be either a commander, or elſe commanded: foraſmuch as it grieueth me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my deſires if the gods ſhall make me partarker, the Spaniards ſhall ſhortly be driuen quite out of Affricke, thou ſhalt heare that the Moores are gone ouer into Spaine, to repoſſeſſe the kingdome of Granado, that Tunes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to ſpeake of Sardinia and Corcyca, that Sicilia is ours: which once taken we ſhall ſtarue vp Italie, and on euery ſide diſtreſſe it with our fleet, being now weake and brought low by the diſcord of the Princes, and that part thereof both towards Sicilia and Macedonia readie to ſubmit it ſelfe vpon any condition, ſo it might caſt off the Spa- L niſh yoke. Thinke not, that either that ſtrength or vnitie is now in Italie, which was when thy great grandfather Mahomet hauing taken Hydruntum brought a great feare, not vpon Italie onely, but vpon other the Chriſtian Nations alſo: for by the good ſucceſſe of that warre, which all the Chriſtian Princes could hardly withſtand, he had vndoubtedly taken the citie of Rome, and ſo according to right and reaſon, againe vnited the Empire of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, as they were before in their antient glory. But he ſuddenly left the world, rapt to heauen, that he might leaue to thee (according to the appointment of the fatall Deſtinies, and reuolutions of the heauens) this worke of abſolute perfection. And yet my purpoſe is not, by putting thee in hope of ſo great and rare a triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the Eaſt againſt thy old and irreligious enemies, deſeruing all extremities: for thy nauie ſhall be ſufficient for me, whereof thou ſhalt haue no need in thy wars ſo farre within land; that whileſt thou art conquering Aſia, Affrica the third part of the world may in the meane time be brought vnder M thy ſubiection alſo. Where before all other things, Muleaſſes is to be driuen out of Tunes; a man of in-ſatiable couetouſneſſe, vnſtayed luſt, horrible crueltie, hated both of God and man; who hauing by trea-cherie ſlaine eighteene of his brethren or that which worſe is, cruelly burnt out their eyes, doth ſo raigne alone, that he hath left him neither kinſeman nor friend. For being as vnthankefull as perfideous, hee

A hath murthered all his fathers friends,who with great trauell had preferred him to the kingdome, ſo to make ſhort payment for ſo great deſert. With this beaſt we muſt haue to do,whom whileſt no man loueth, all men wiſh to periſh. The Numidians trouble him with dayly inuaſions, whoſe iniuries the infamous coward endureth with ſuch ſhame and reproach, that it ſhould ſeeme he had rather to ſuffer them than reuenge them. And yet this effœminate daſtard holdeth in chaines many valiant Turks,and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on euery ſide ſue for grace : and which is not to be ſuffered,exceedingly fauoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis,to the intent that Agis and Moſes, two valiant Tukriſh captaines,may be driuen out of the citie. This wild beaſt diſarmed of his claws and teeth, we ſhall eaſily deſtroy,if it be but for that we haue with vs Roſcetes his brother,whom the Numidians wiſh and long for : him muſt we vſe,if it be but for a ſhew, ſo ſhall the thing we deſire,be without bloud effected, as B ſoone as we ſhall but preſent our ſelues before the gates of Tunes. Then ſhall it be at your pleaſure, to ap- point whom you will haue to gouerne the Numidian kingdome : it ſhall be vnto me glorie enough, when the greateſt part of Affricke conquered, ſhall be peaceably deliuered into your hands at your return with the triumphs of Perſia. But by the way as I returne, I aſſure you vpon mine own priuat, ſo to vſe the matter,that the Chriſtians ſhall alſo haue good cauſe to bewaile their calamities : and if I hap to meet with Auria,he ſhall haue ſmall cauſe to reioyce of the miſchiefe he hath done : for him alone I challenge to per- ſecute,as my proper and peculiar enemie, both for the remembrance of the harmes wee haue receiued at his hands, and for the deſpight I haue at his fame ; who once taken out of the way, the ſeas ſhall be open only to you and your fleets. And beleeue me, he that ſhall be able to command the ſeas, ſhall eaſily alſo ſubdue the kingdomes by land.

C

But Solyman, who after the manner of wiſe Princes, vſed well to conſider, and afterwards with ripe iudgement to reſolue of ſuch matters as he had with attentiue eare hearkned vnto ; commending Barbaruſſa for his forwardneſſe in his ſeruice, for that time brake vp the counſel.
Not long after,a decree was made,according to Abraham the great Baſſa's aduice, That Barba- ruſſa ſhould be ioyned as fourth with the other three chiefe Baſſa's of Solymans counſel,and be made great Admiral ; ſo that all the Iſlands,ports,and people all alongſt the ſea coaſt thorow out Solymans Empire ſhould be at his command,and that it ſhould be lawfull for him to take vp ſuch mariners and ſoldiers for ſeruice at ſea,as pleaſed him in what place ſoeuer. This being ſolemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand deliuered him a ſcepter and a ſword, D willing him,by worthie deeds to performe what he had promiſed. After which, Aiax and Caſsimes the two great Baſſa's, with the Captaine of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe,from the court to the Nauie : at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that war at ſea,he had de-liuered vnto him out of Solymans treaſures, eight hundred thouſand duckets, and eight hundred Ianizaries.

Barbaruſſa is made Solymans great Admiral.

But foraſmuch as much it was that he did in the ſeruice of Solyman, and more is of him hereafter to be ſpoken ; it ſhall not be amiſſe here to preſent vnto the view of the world the ſterne but liuely countenance of this ſo famous a man (who liuing kept all the Miditerranian in feare) as it is by Boiſardus expreſſed,together with the Elogium following.

And ſo the Moores did ſtoupe to thee, by thy right hand diſmaid.
Lyparos will thee neuer loue, ne yet Corcyra ſtrong;
For that thou cauſeleſſe did'ſt to them ſo great and open wrong.

He ſpoileth the coaſt of Italie.

Barbaruſſa ſped of that hee deſired, ſtaied not long after at Conſtantinople, but departing out of Heleſpontus with eightie gillies and certaine galliots, ſhaped his courſe towards Italie, leauing Amurathes (a ſea captaine) with twelue gallies to tranſport Solyman and his armie, readie to ſet forward againſt the Perſian, ouer that narrow ſea into Aſia. Who after he had ſo done, ouertooke Barbaruſſa at Methone, who holding on his courſe to Affricke, and ſuddenly paſſing the ſtrait betwixt Italie and Cicilie, brought a great feare vpon both the countries; but paſſing by the bay of Hippona alongſt the coaſt of the lower Calabria, hee ſet vpon the towne of Saint Lucidius called in antient time Tempſa: which although it ſtood vpon a rocke and was reaſonable well walled; yet ſuch was the violence of the Turkes aſſault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with ſo much more hurt to the enhabitants, for that the

A Major of the towne, to keepe the people from flying away, had lockt vp the gates on the other ſide of the citie, from the enemie. From thence he with rich ſpoyle and many priſoners went to Citrarium, where he had learned of his priſoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This town forſaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without reſiſtance, ranſacked it, and burnt it, where he alſo fired ſeuen gallies not yet altogether finiſhed. But after he was come with his fleet as farre as the Iſland Capri, within the ſight of Naples, ſuch a terror was ſtrucke into the minds of all that dwelt alongſt that coaſt, That it was thought, if he had landed and gone directly to Naples, the Neopolitans would for feare haue abandoned the citie. But holding on his courſe, he came to Prochita, which he tooke and rifled: ſo paſſing by the port of Caieta, (which he might eaſily haue taken) he came to Spelunca, a towne in the hithermoſt part of the B Kingdome of Naples. They of the Towne diſmaied with the ſudden arriuall of ſo great a fleet, yeelded the ſame without reſiſtance. The enemie entring the town, tooke twelue hundred priſoners. Pelegrinus a chiefe man amongſt them of Spelunca, was fled into the Caſtle: him Barbaruſſa commanded to yeeld, which if he would preſently do, he promiſed to let him go free; but if he ſhould ſtand vpon his defence, hee threatned in ſhort time to make him repent his fooliſh hardineſſe, with the vtter deſtruction both of himſelfe and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay came out of the caſtle, and fell downe at his feet; who according to his promiſe gaue him his libertie, and with rare curteſie reſtored to him his wife, his ſonne, and niece, whom he had taken priſoners; who receiued them with many teares falling from their eyes for ioy.

C The ſame night alſo 2000 Turkes came from the fleet, through the rough and buſhie mountaines, to the citie Fundi, ten miles diſtant from Spelunca, in the vttermoſt borders of the kingdome of Naples, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that countrey, who a few yeares before taken at ſea, and ouerwearied with the heauie burthen of the Turkiſh ſlauerie, had reuolted to the Mahometan religion. But ſuch was the ſuddenneſſe of their comming, and their celeritie in entring the citie, that Iulia Gonzaga the Paragon of Italie, and the chiefe priſe which they ſought after, had ſcarce time to get to horſe halfe naked, and ſo with much difficultie to eſcape into the mountaines. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa (which thing he himſelfe afterwards ſeemed not to denie) mooued with the fame of her incomparable beautie, and wonderfull perfection, deſired exceedingly to haue taken her as a Preſent for Solyman. D The citiſens were for moſt part either ſlain or taken priſoners by the Turks, who loaded with the ſpoile of the citie, returned again to the fleet. Another part of Barbaruſſa's fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks tooke forſaken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountains, except ſome which for age or ſickneſſe could not ſhift for themſelues, whom the Turks ſlew, & ſpoyled the churches. Barbaruſſa thus ſcouring along the coaſt of Italie, and newes thereof daily brought to the citie of Rome, ſtrucke ſuch an exceeding terrour into the minds of the citiſens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Oſtia, they would generally haue forſaken the city. But he hauing well performed his promiſe made to Solyman for vexing the Chriſtians, and before reſolued of a greater matter he had to do, when he had watred at Pontia, paſſed ouer into Affrick with ſuch celeritie, that he was arriued there E before it was thought that he was departed from the coaſt of Italie. For Barbaruſſa to deceiue Muleaſſes king of Tunes, and to take him vnprouided, had giuen it out, that he would burn and ſpoyle the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries, eſpecially of Italie, Liguria, and Spain, in reuenge of the harme done by Auria at Corone and Patras. Which thing Muleaſſes the rather beleeued, vnderſtanding his proceedings vpon the coaſt of Italie. The Venetians hauing alſo at the ſame time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in ſome part leſſen Muleaſſes feare, That Barbaruſſa would imploy his Forces for Affricke: for then what ſhould the Venetians haue needed to haue made ſo great and chargeable a preparation. But that which aboue all other things brought him into ſecuritie, was for that he had by ſecret eſpials certainly learned, that his brother Roſcetes was kept at Conſtantinople, as a priſoner at large, vnder ſafe keeping: F which made him to think, that Barbaruſſa's forces were not prepared againſt him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his ſtate more indangered by any other meanes, than by producing the competitour of his kingdome, to whom his guiltie conſcience doubted, that both the citiſens of Tunes and the Numidians were for moſt part well affected.

member, was lineally diſcended of the antient kings of Tunes; who without interruption of G diſcent, or mixture of forreine bloud, had by the ſpace of 354 yeares mightily ruled the great kingdome of Tunes, from Tripolis to Bugia, almoſt 800 miles alongſt the Mediterranian, and into the Main as far as the mount Atlas: and for the long continuance of their ſtate, and largeneſſe of their kingdome, were worthily accounted the moſt reuerend and mightie amongſt the Mahometan kings of Affricke. His father Mahomethes, when he had with much glorie, and more pleaſure, raigned 32 yeares, perceiuing the end of his life to approch, had purpoſed to haue appointed Maimo his eldeſt ſonne (whom for his haſtie aſpiring he then held in durance) to ſucceed him in his kingdome: but ouercome with the importunitie of Lentigeſia his wife, a woman of haughtie ſpirit, who had by reward made a ſtrong faction in the Court for her ſonne Muleaſſes, he altered his former purpoſe, and appointed him his ſucceſſor: by H whom (as it was thought) the ſmall remainder of his owne old yeares wa ſhortened; Maimo the right heire of the kingdome in priſon, preſently murthered; ſeuenteene of his other brethren inhumanely executed; and three other, Barcha, Beleth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous crueltie with a hot yron of their ſight depriued; only Roſcetes the ſecond brother, and Abdemelech, eſcaping the hands of their vnnaturall brother, fled to Morhabitus a great Prince amongſt the Numidians: whither alſo their brothers malice perſecuted them, ſeeking by many practiſes to haue taken them away, and at laſt for a great ſumme of money to haue had them deliuered into his hands. Which mony the Numidian receiued, but ſuffered the diſtreſſed Princes, as if they had eſcaped againſt his will, to flie further to another Numidian prince I a friend of his called Bentaſes: where Muleaſſes by like practiſes as before, ſought to haue deſtroyed them, or to haue got them into his owne power. Thus chaſed by their brothers endleſſe malice, from Prince to Prince, and place to place, they for their more ſafetie fled at laſt to the citie of Biſcaris, farre into the maine land: where Abdemelech as one wearie of the world giuen ouer all, and betooke himſelfe to a ſolitarie life, and became a melancholie Mahometan Monke. But Roſcetes curteouſly entertained by Abdalla Prince of that citie, found ſuch fauour in his ſight, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage, and long time honorably maintained him as his ſonne in law, with ſuch carefulneſſe, that for feare of Muleaſſes practiſes, hee was ſeldome permitted to eat any other meat but ſuch as the Prince or his wife had before taſted. Muleaſſes thus raigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of ſo many K of his brethren, proceeded further, and murthered diuers of their children alſo. He cauſed alſo the Manſfet and Meſuar, men of greateſt authoritie in all the kingdome, his fathers graue counſellors, and his chiefe friends, by whoſe meanes eſpecially he had aſpired vnto the Kingdome, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their greatnes; or rather as ſome thought, grieuing to ſee them liue, to whom he was ſo much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with ſuch ſharp payment. And by the inſtigation of Lenteſia his mother, cauſed diuers of his fathers other wiues and concubines to be ſhamefully murthered; enueighing oftentimes againſt his father, that as an effeminate prince, had for his pleaſure maintained 200 wiues and concubines in his houſes of delight, by whom he had begot ſo many ſons competitors of the kingdome, that he had left him (as he ſaid) a laborious and endleſſe piece of worke, to deſtroy ſo great a L brood.

The ingratitude of Muleaſſes.

Roſcetes riſeth againſt his brother Muleaſſes.

Roſcetes aided by his father in law and the other Numidian princes, to whome the name of Muleaſſes, both for his crueltie againſt his owne bloud, and iniurious dealing againſt his neighbours, was become odious, paſſing ouer the riuer Bragada with a great armie, neere vnto Tunes met with Muleaſſes his armie, conducted by Dorax a valiant captaine, brother to Lentigeſia: where in a ſharpe conflict he ouerthrew his brothers Armie, and enforced Dorax with them that were eſcaped out of the battell, for ſafegard of their liues to flie into Tunes. Roſcetes purſuing the victorie, came and preſented his armie before the gates of the citie, in hope that the citiſens (whom he knew for the moſt part to hate the vſurping tyrant) would vpon the ſight of him, their right King, with ſo great an army, raiſe ſome tumult in the city, and let him in. There he lay by the ſpace of twentie dayes, ſtill expecting ſome innouation; M in which time the more to alienate the mindes of the people from Muleaſſes, and to ſhew how vnable he was to protect them, he burnt & deſtroyed all the Oliue and fruit trees, which grew moſt plentifully and pleaſantly all alongſt the countrey, from the ruines of old Carthage, to the walls of Tunes: which was vnto the citiſens, whoſe greateſt poſſeſſions lay there, a moſt heauie and lamentable ſpectacle. But Muleaſſes had ſo attempered their minds with faire ſpeeches

A ches, and large promiſes of recompenſing euery man to the full; for all ſuch harme as they ſhould ſuſtaine for his brothers furie in the countrey: and beſide that, had the citie in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his ſouldiers, that the citiſens either would not or could not reuolt to Roſcetes. The Numidian princes wearie of that long and vain expectation, according to the leuitie of that nation, accounting it no ſhame after victorie once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrinke away to their owne dwellings, perſuading Roſcetes alſo to prouide for himſelf whilſt he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherfore he fearing to be betraied by the Numidians, or circumuented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbaruſſa, then raigning at Algiers in great glorie, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill ſuch time as by his perſuaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to Conſtantinople, to B craue help of Solyman, by whom he was detained in ſafe cuſtodie: although it was in policie giuen out by Barbaruſſa, that he was in the fleet, and that he ſhould by Solymans power be reſtored to his fathers kingdome at Tunes.

Forſaken of the Numidian princes, he flieth to Barbaruſſa.

This was the ſtate of the kingdom of Tunes, at ſuch time as Barbaruſſa with Solymans great fleet, contrarie to all mens expectation, ſuddenly departing from the coaſt of Italie, landed in Affricke at Biſerta, a famous port of the kingdome of Tunes. They of Biſerta wearie of the gouernment of Muleaſſes, and of themſelues deſirous of change, as ſoone as they heard the name of Roſcetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernor, and receiued the Turks into the towne. For Barbaruſſa had before ſent certaine of Roſcetes his familiar friends aſhore, which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able to come yet on ſhore, for that he was (as C they ſaid) ſea-ſicke, and troubled him with an ague. Biſerta thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruſſa, hee preſently departed thence, and ſailing by Vtica, thirtie miles diſtant from Biſerta, and ſo keeping alongſt the coaſt, and paſſing the promontorie of Carthage, came before Guletta, a ſtrong caſtle within the bay of Tunes, ſo placed vpon a ſtrait, that it commandeth all the paſſage by ſea vnto the city of Tunes. Before this caſtle, Barbaruſſa in token of friendſhip, diſcharged all his great ordnance, which they of the caſtle anſwered with like: but being required to deliuer it vp to Roſcetes, they ſaid it ſhould be alwaies at his command that ruled in the city of Tunes. The newes of Roſcetes his ſuppoſed comming, flying ſwiftly by land from Biſerta to Tunes, and the great fleet once diſcouered, ſet all the citie on an vprore: for the citizens were in great expectation of their new king, both for the loue of Roſcetes, who had alwaies ſhewed D himſelfe to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and alſo for the hatred of Muleaſſes, whoſe tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long indured. Neither was hee ignorant what report ran of himſelfe, and how he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects; which was euidently to be ſeene in the eyes and countenances of the chiefe men of the citie. And that which more increaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of his diſtreſſe, made them any recompence for their goodly houſes and Oliue gardens, deſtroyed in the countrey by Roſcetes in the former wars: wherefore at ſuch time as hee came now out of the caſtle, and in the greateſt aſſemblie of his people, began to perſuade them to play the men, and to continue conſtant in theri obedience, promiſing vnto them ſuch reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed, and left him alone: yea E ſome of them vnder the color of friendſhip, and amongſt them Abdahar, then Meſuar (which was chiefe officer next vnto the king) perſuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, & forthwith to flie, for by chance at the ſame inſtant it was in euery mans mouth, that the Turks were euen at hand: which thing cauſed Muleaſſes, forſaken of his ſubiects, of himſelfe fearefull, and worthily doubting to be betraied, to flie in ſuch haſt out of the city, that he left behind him both his treaſure and iewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The firſt that reuolted was Abezes, a man of great authority, & Fetuches, captain of the caſtle, both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches preſently after the flight of Muleaſſes, brought out Roſcetes wife and children, whom Muleaſſes had long time kept in priſon, & to welcom their father, placed them F in the kings royall ſeat. Abezes alſo forthwith aduertiſed Barbaruſſa of Muleaſſes departure, & with what longing the people expected their deſired king, wiſhing him without delay to repaire vnto the city: and for a preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian horſe, richly furniſhed, and diuers others for his other chiefe captaines. Hereupon Barbaruſſa without longer ſtay ſet forward with fiue thouſand Turks, which he had already landed, & comming to the city, was of the citiſens ioifully receiued. But after long looking, when they could no where deſcry Roſ- cetes their ſuppoſed king, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, doubled G and redoubled by the Turks in their militarie acclamations, as they marched thorow the citie towards the caſtle; they began to diſtruſt, as the truth was, that in ſtead of their new king whom they ſo much deſired, they had receiued the Turkiſh gouernment, which they vtterly deteſted. Which ſuſpition once confirmed by certaine of Roſcetes friends (whom Barbaruſſa had brought with him of purpoſe to delude the people) who grieued to ſee the ruin of their natiue country, ſpared not for feare of the preſent danger to tell their friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Roſcetes, whom they had left in bonds at Conſtantinople: it was a wonder to ſee, how ſuddenly the minds of the people were changed, how ſpeedily they ran to their weapons, and how furiouſly they aſſailed the Turks, now fearing no ſuch matter, and were not as yet al got into tht caſtle. The chiefe leader of the citiſens in this H tumult, was Abdahar the Meſuar, who but a little before vpon the comming of the Turkes, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulneſſe of his ſubiects, had perſuaded Muleaſſes to flie; but now perceiuing himſelfe deceiued of his expectation for the comming of Roſcetes, and repenting of that he had done, ſought by all means to driue out the Turks, and to recall Muleaſſes.

And the more to animat the people, as he ſtood on high, from whence he might beſt be heard, hee cried vnto them with a loud voice:

The citizens deceiued of their expectation, riſe againſt the Turkes.

We are moſt villanouſly betraied (worthie citiſens) for Roſcetes, whom we expected for our lawful king, lamenteth his miſerie in chains, in priſon at Conſtantinople: and we, except we preſently play the men, and valiantly fight for our libertie, ſhall for euer ſerue as ſlaues to theſe forreine and mercileſſe pyrats.
The preſent danger of our eſtate telleth vs, that we muſt preſently and without delay take the occaſion I offered. Wherefore let all men that meane not to ſerue as ſlaues, and to be bought and ſold as beaſts, take vp armes againſt the faithleſſe Turks. I my ſelfe will be your leader: let vs therefore all with one conſent, with heart and hand reuenge this ſhamefull trecherie, defend our countrey and libertie with the antient honour and libertie of the Numidians.

There was now no time to ſtay, euery man had betaken himſelfe to his weapons; Muleaſſes was againe ſent for, who yet ſtaied in the ſuburbs, expecting what ſhould happen; many of the Turks were ſlain before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the citie was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons; the number of the citiſens was ſuch, as might eaſily haue expulſed the Turks, had they bin but reaſonably armed, or well conducted, which in a matter ſo ſudden, and with men altogether ignorant of ſeruice, was not poſſible. Yet they, armed with K furie, and encouraged with the multitude of themſelues, ſwarmed vp as thicke as was poſſible one of the bulwarkes of the caſtle, which they knew was eaſieſt to be gained, where the Turks had ſet vp one of their enſignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes ſo ouerwhelmed the Turks, that they were glad to forſake the place, & to retire farther into the caſtle to a place of more ſtrength: from whence and all alongſt the curtaine of the wall, they without intermiſſion diſcharged their great artillerie and ſmall ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of the naked Moores, making of them a wonderfull ſlaughter. Barbaruſſa although he was a man of an inuincible courage & great experience, all his life time well acquainted with deſperate dangers (the dreadfull ſteps of aſpiring minds) yet ſurpriſed with the ſuddenneſſe of the aſſault, ſhut vp in a place whereof he yet knew not the ſtrength, and not prouided of victual for L three daies, was with the due conſideration of theſe difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the diſordered furie of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne ſouldiers greatly diminiſhed; eſpecially when hee ſaw his owne men ſtill fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe diſmaied with the wounds and ſlaughter of their friends, ready to retire. Howbeit, by the comming in of Muleaſſes & Dorax, the aſſault twice before giuen ouer, was againe at both times renewed, with no leſſe deſperate furie than at the firſt, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous aſſault Halis of Maliga, a renegat Spaniard, but a moſt expert ſouldier, turning himſelfe to Barbaruſſa, ſaid, Muleaſſes returned into the citie.

If thou wilt ſaue thine honour, and hold this fort, we muſt ſallie out vpon this enemie, which hauing neuer ſeene a ſet battell, but onely acquainted with light skirmiſhes, will not be able to endure our charge M at hand, but ſhall in a moment know the price of their fooliſh hardineſſe; who as braineſicke men could neither indure the gouernment of their cruell king, ne yet thankefully receiue the authors of their deliuerance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the chifeſt captaines,

A taines, Barbaruſſa commanded Halis the author of that counſell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one inſtant to ſallie out at two ports of the caſtle: which they ſo re-ſolutely performed, that in ſhort time a wonderful number of the naked Moores lay dead vp-on the ground.

The citiſens of Tunes diſcomfi-ted by the Turks.

Abdabar the Meſuar himſelfe, was there ſhot thorow with a bullet and ſlaine: whereupon the aſſault was quite giuen ouer, the Moores retiring by companies backe into the city, and the Turkes ſtill purſuing them: where in the ſtreets for certaine houres, was fought a moſt cruel and bloudie battel. At laſt the citizens ouercome, forſooke the open ſtreets, and betook them to the refuge of their houſes; not ſo careful of their king, as of themſelues, their wiues, and children. And Halis with the reſt, wearied with the ſlaughter of his enemies, and ouer-B come with labour, heat, and thirſt, returned with victorie vnto the caſtle. It is reported that there was aboue three thouſand of the citizens ſlaine that day, and thrice as many hurt. Mule-aſſes thus diſcouraged, and vtterly deſpairing to recouer the citie, hardly eſcaped his enemies hands, by the good helpe of his vncle Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the riuer Bagrada, and came in ſafetie to Conſtantina (called of old time Cyrtha) the antient ſeat of the Numidian kings, but then a part of Dorax his dominion; where he was honourably maintained and protected vntill the comming of Charles the Emperour into Affricke. The night enſuing this battell, and the flight of the king, was reſtleſſe both to the citizens and the Turks, each of them for feare of other ſtanding vpon their ſtrongeſt guard.

Muleaſſes flieth

The citiſens of Tunes yeeld themſelues to Barbaruſſa.

C The next day, the citizens diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo many of their kinſemen and friends, and hauing no king now for whom they ſhould fight, craued pardon of Barbaruſſa for their raſh attempt, excuſing it by the name of loyaltie to their antient kings; offering to ſub-mit themſelues vnto him with all faithfulneſſe. Which their offer hee willingly accepted; knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his ſouldiers three daies, for lacke of victuall: ſo that all his hope and victorie gotten, might eaſily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citizens moued either with deſperation or deſire of reuenge, ſhould ioyne with the other Numidian princes, and beſiege him in the caſtle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by ſolemne oath on both ſide confirmed, whereby the citizens expreſly bound themſelues to the obedience of Solyman, & to Barbaruſſa as his lieutenant. All things thus ſet in D order in the citie of Tunes, & new magiſtrates and officers by him made, he laboured by all meanes to win vnto him the Numidian princes: which when he had eaſily brought to paſſe by gifts and rewards with thoſe needie princes, of themſelues prone enough vpon light occaſions to make or breake the bonds of friendſhip, hee ſent Aſan-aga an eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Ianizaries, & certaine pieces of great ordnance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of Tunes: which they in ſhort time performed, being in all places peaceably re-ceiued, onely the city of Caruenna held out a while, yet afterwards for feare of further harme receiued the Turks garriſon. But to leaue Barbaruſſa king of Algiers and Solymans great Ad-mirall, thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Tunes; and Muleaſſes in exile at Conſtantina, vntil he be againe reſtored vnto his kingdome by Charles the Emperor, as ſhall be hereafter delared: let E vs againe returne to the wars at the ſelfe ſame time vndertaken by Solyman in perſon himſelfe in Perſia, perſuaded thereunto (as we haue before ſaid) by Abraham the great Baſſa. Of whom a few words, that they which ſhall hereafter liue, may in him as in others, ſee in what ſlipperie place they ſtand, and what ſmal aſſurance they haue, which forſaking God, run headlong after theſe worldly vanities, and ſwelling with the fauours of great princes, are in a moment when they leaſt feare any ſuch fall, ſuddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miſerable ſpectacles of mans fragilitie in the height of their ſuppoſed bliſſe.

The deſcription of Abraham the Baſſa.

This great Baſſa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of vs Abraham, was borne in a poore countrie village neere vnto Perga, a towne in that part of Epirus which was called Buthrotia: who in his childhood was taken from his Chriſtian parents, by ſuch as by authoritie did take vp the F tribute children of the Chriſtians for the Turkiſh Emperour. A tribute of all tributes moſt grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, actiue of body, wel ſpoken, pleaſantly conceited, and ſharpe of wit; ſo that hee in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, to the admiration of many, learned both to ſpeake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vſed in the Turkes court, and could skilfully play vpon ſundrie kindes of inſtruments. And being yet a boy, ſerued Scanderbaſſa, a man of great authoritie and power, in the time

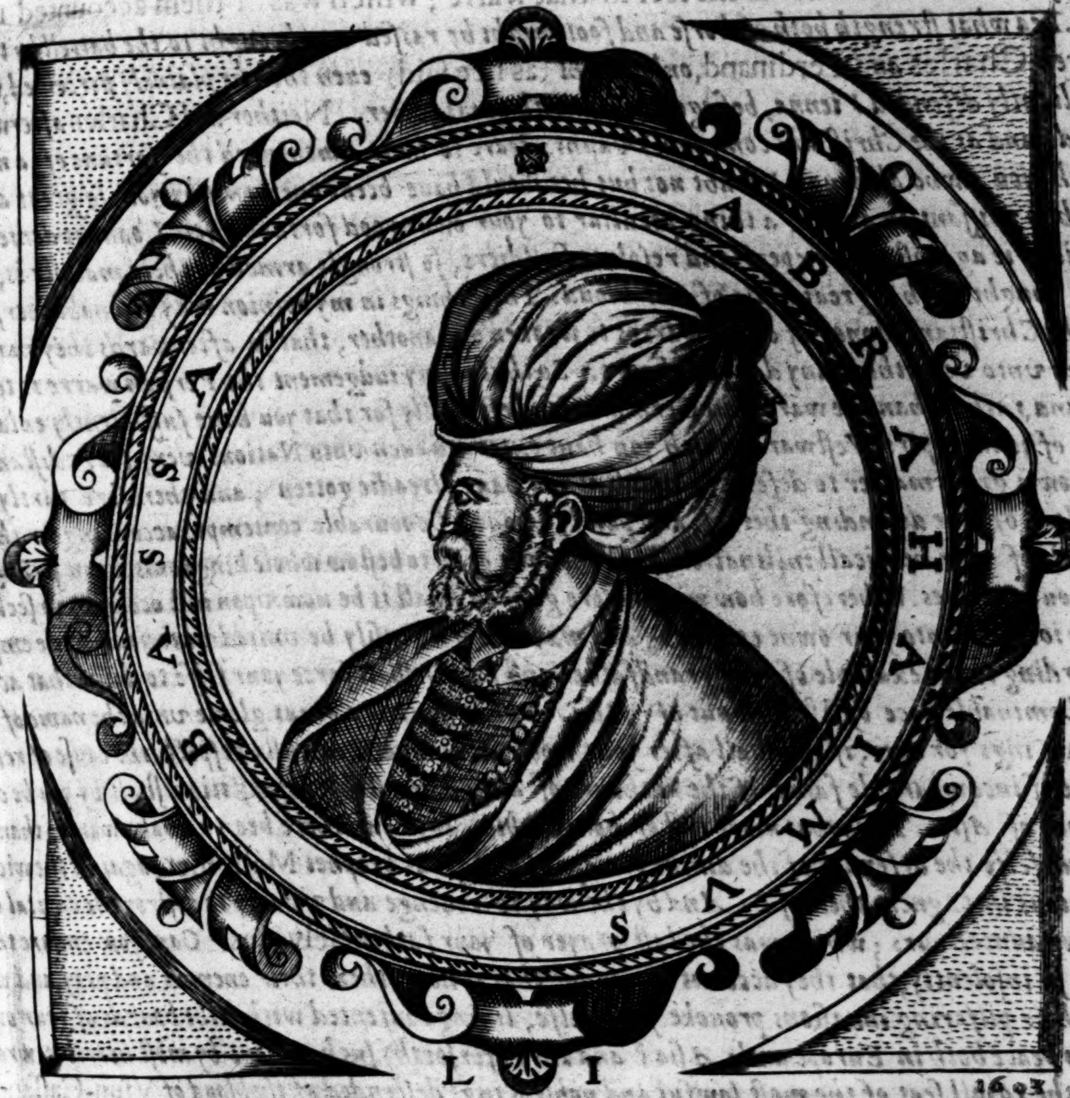
His bringing vp in the Court.

His great credit with Solyman.

time of Selymus the Emperor, in whoſe ſeruice he was inſtructed in the Mahometan religion: but giuing himſelfe to all manner of curioſitie and neatneſſe, he was wonderfully fauoured by the great ladie his miſtreſſe, and by her commended to her husband Scanderbaſſa, as a fit page to temper his melancholie and wayward diſpoſition, with his pleaſant conceits and deuices: wherein the Tetricall Baſſa finding him to excell, gaue him as a rare gift to Solyman the ſon of Selymus, his grand father Baiazet yet liuing: who tooke in him ſuch pleaſure, that the old Emperour cauſed him to be brought vp in the Court, in all princely qualities with Solyman (who was of like yeares vnto him) as his companion and playfellow. Where hee ſo framed himſelfe vnto the yong Princes diſpoſition in all points, that he was of him alwayes exceedingly beloued, and afterwards promoted to all the honors of the court, and made one of the Baſſa's, giuing vnto him in marriage the only daughter and heire of Scanderbaſſa his maſter, then dead, with an exceeding great dowrie. And after that made him gouernor of Caire: where he had not long remained, but he was againe ſent for to the court, as the man which gaue thereunto life, without whoſe companie Solyman was as one halfe dead. At length he made him Viſier, which is the chiefe of all the Baſſa's, and Preſident of his Councell, the greateſt honour in the Turkiſh empire next vnto the Emperor himſelfe. And to honor him yet more, he deliuered him his priuat ſignet, wherewith the Turkiſh Emperours neuer vſed to truſt any but themſelues: he might at his pleaſure grace and diſgrace whom he would, in court or elſewhere. What he commanded was done, and whatſoeuer he did was taken for well done. He might without the Emperours knowledge giue any office, yea the gouernment of whole Countries and Prouinces vnto his fauorits: his credit with the Emperor was ſo great, that hee did what he liſt, and no man durſt preſume to aske any reaſon why. And to ſay all at once, he wanted nothing of the maieſtie of an Emperor, but the name only; in ſtead whereof, he was commonly called the great Commander of all the Emperours forces. His houſe in Conſtantinople was of all other moſt ſtately, wherein was daily to be ſeene ſuch a multitude of his gallant followers, and ſuch a world of wealth and royall furniture, as that it might be worthily compared with the palace of a great Prince. Neither was he partaker of Solymans counſels in his weightie matters of ſtate only, but of his ſecret delights and pleaſures alſo: if hee were preſent, all was well; if he were away, nothing pleaſed: to be ſhort, he ſo poſſeſſed this great Emperour, that men commonly ſayd, The ſoule of Solyman liued in Abraham. Whereat many of the great men of the court ſecretly repined; but eſpecially Solymans mother, and Roxolana his faire Concubine whom of all women he held deareſt. His liuely and maieſticall countenance thou maiſt here behold.

ABRA-



Magnus es, & Getici gratia prona tyranni Seruit at ex alto magna ruina venit:

E Horum ne pereas proditione caue.

Right great thou art, and do'ſt command the fauour of thy King:
But ſuch great fauours oftentimes a greater fall doth bring.
The great Kings mother, wife, and all the Nobles hate thee ſore: Beware that by their wylie drifts thou periſh not therefore.

Abraham Baſſa perſuadeth Solyman to make warre vpon the Perſians.

This great commander, which might at all times be bold to ſpeake what he thought, vnto Solyman, ſought many times in his priuat diſcourſes betwixt them two, to perſuade him to forbeare to vſe his forces any farther againſt the Chriſtians, ouer whom he had ſufficiently alreadie triumphed, & to turn them vpon the Perſians, by whom he was daily iniured. Alled-F ging to him, that the Germans were a ſtrong & warlike people; who as they both in language and manners differed from the Hungarians, ſo were they alwayes at variance with them, and therfore much cared not though they were by him ſubdued: but if he ſhould begin to inuade any part of their country, he ſhould then ſoon ſee that iuuincible nation with their vnited forces vp in armes, readie to make ſtrong reſiſtance. And to prouoke Charles the Emperor (of all the Chriſtian princes the mightieſt) were not good, who of himſelf was able to bring into the field field moſt puiſſant armies of valiant ſouldiers out of his owne dominions: beſides the wonderfull concourſe of moſt reſolute men out of all parts of Chriſtendome, which would not ſpare to lay downe their liues at his feet in that warre; which was of them accounted moſt religious. Yea what ſtrength both of horſe and foot might be raiſed and brought to the battell by the two brethren Charles and Ferdinand, only might (as hee ſaid) euen then be plainely perceiued, when as they valiantly defended Vienna, beſieged by vs with great power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it ſeemed, and as the Chriſtians commonly vaunt, feare to haue adventured the fortune of a maine battell with you: who although I doubt not but hee ſhould haue beene ouercome by you ſo great a monarch with ſo puiſſant an armie, a thing peculiar to your owne good fortune; yet I cannot denie, but that the victorie againſt ſuch expert and reſolute ſouldiers, ſo ſtrongly armed as their manner is, muſt haue beene bought with a great deale of our bloud. Theſe things in my opinion may reſonably perſuade you to let the Chriſtians alone, by ciuile warres to weaken one another, that ſo afterwards they may become a prey vnto vs without any danger of ours. So that in my iudgement the Perſian warre is to bee taken in hand, rather than the warres in Germanie, and eſpecially for that you haue ſufficiently enlarged the bounds of your empire Weſtward, which you haue extended euen vnto Nations very farre diſtant. So that it is now a great matter to defend ſo much as you haue alreadie gotten; and therefore partly for the difficultie of the defending thereof, and partly vpon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bountie of your heroicall inclination, haue thought good to beſtow whole kingdoms vpon ſtrangers, yea halfe your enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious ſhall it be now vpon iuſt occaſion to ſeeke for that which ioineth vnto your owne confines; and may therefore eaſily be vnited vnto your owne empire: if you according to the example of your grandfather and father ſhall force your ſelfe to driue that accurſed and abhominable race of Iſmael out of Aſia. For it ſhall be a great glorie vnto the name of the Othoman Kings for euer, if you ſhall after your woonted manner zealouſly reſpect the cauſe of religion: a worke of incomparable fame, if the authours of a moſt deteſtable ſuperſtition ſhall by you be chaſed quite out of Aſia. For what more iuſt or honourable cauſe can there bee to make warre, than to profeſſe your ſelfe the defender of the diuine preceps of our great prophet Mahomet, againſt the wicked and irreligious impugners thereof? And by the way to reuenge and vtterly to deſtroy the capital enemies of your aunceſtours; which was the laſt prayer of your father Selymus. Can you endure them which rule ſo inſolently, that they account euerie one that is neere them their enemies and prey, and dare alſo with their pilfering inuaſions prouoke your ſelfe, liuing contented within the bounds of your owne Empire, in peace both in Europe and Aſia? and they (forſooth) ſuch as haue by moſt horrible wrong crept into the royall ſeat of the moſt lawful and noble Kings deſcended of the bloud of Vſun-Caſſanes: who after their woonted manner ſtill liue by rapine and robberie? Beleeue mee, Noble Emperour, if you ſhall vpon a zeale to your religion with your victorious hand take away this ſtaine and plague of Aſia, there ſhall vndoubtedly be erected vnto you ſo glorious and magnificent a trophie in the middeſt of Perſia, as may bee compared, yea preferred before the Triumphs of your victorious father Selymus. For it is not ſo much to haue deſtroyed the Mamalukes (by condition ſlaues) and the proude Sultans of Ægypt and Syria, as to haue ſubdued the Perſians, famous in antient time for their martiall proweſſe, who ſo oftentimes vanquiſhed by Alexander of Macedon, gaue vnto him the name of Great. Solyman prickt forward with many ſuch diſcourſes, daily ſounded in his eares by the Baſſa, began to yeeld to his perſuaſion. Whereof Abraham himſelfe greatly reioyced: for it was thought of many, that he did neuer in heart renounce the Chriſtian Religion, but was onely in outward ſhew a Turke, and in heart a Chriſtian. Which was the rather coniectured, for that he meruellouſly fauoured and protected the Chriſtian marchants, furthered by all means the leagues of the Chriſtian Princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Perſians. And the more to whet him forward, the Baſſa had cunningly inſinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearbe of Damaſco, a man in that time famous in Conſtantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceiued of his holineſſe and profound knowledge in the ſecret cauſes of things, and the art of Magicke; vſing him as a prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with aſſured hope of proſperous ſucceſſe: which thing the hypocritical wiſard, after the manner of ſuch deceiuers, ſlily performed, propheſying vnto him all happineſſe in ſo religious a warre, and ſo much (as hee ſaide) pleaſing God. This the Baſſaes purpoſe was much furthered alſo by Vlemus a noble and valiant Perſian, who hauing married the great Perſian King Tamas his ſiſter, was reuolted from him to Solyman, fearing to bee called to account for the extortion wherewith hee had grieuouſly

A oppreſſed the countries whereof he had the gouernment: and being wonderfully countenanced in Solymans court by the great Baſſa, did after the manner of diſloyall fugitiues perſuade Solyman by all means he could to take that war in hand, diſcouering vnto him the power, ſtate, and ſtrength of the Perſian kingdome (which hee could well doe) and plotting vnto him the eaſieſt way for the conquering thereof, offering alſo vnto him the vttermoſt of his deuoire. So Solyman filled with the vain hope of the conqueſt of Perſia, yeelded fully vnto the perſuaſions of the great Baſſa, and gaue out his commiſſions into all parts of his empire, for the raiſing of a mightie armie for the performance of ſo great an enterpriſe; commanding all his captaines and men of war to be readie at the citie of Nice in Bythinia at a certain day appointed. Which his purpoſe, although it was mightily impugned by his mother, and faire Roxola- B na his beſt beloued, as that which altogether proceeded from the Baſſa: the one alledging, with what euill ſucceſſe his grandfather and father had before him attempted that ſame war; the other aſſailing him with her paſſionat affections: but both of them indeed repining at the credit of the Baſſa, and in their hearts diſdaining, that ſo great a Monarch ſhould at the pleaſure of his ſeruant be led vp and down the world ſo far from their companie: for which cauſe they did what in them lay to haue ouerthrowne the purpoſe of Abraham, and to haue altreed Solymans former determination. But ſo ſtrong was the Baſſa's credit with his great lord and maſter, that all theſe great ladies deuices and prayers were as womens affectionat paſſions reiected, and the Baſſa's counſell (to their no ſmall griefe) in all things regarded.

Solyman reſolueth to goe againſt the Perſians.

Abrahams credit maligned by Solymans mother and Roxolana.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readines, Solyman ſent Abraham the Baſ- C ſa, and Vlemas the Perſian, before him into Syria with a ſtrong armie, to be readie with the firſt of the Spring to inuade the Perſian King. Which thing the Baſſa gladly tooke vpon him, and comming into Syria, wintered with his armie at Aleppo: whither Barbaruſſa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approching, Abraham ſent Vlemas the fugitiue Perſian Prince before him with the light horſmen, the forerunners of his armie, into Meſopotamia as his guide, becauſe the countrey was vnto him beſt knowne; following not far after himſelfe with all his armie. And marching ſtill forward in that manner, came at length without reſiſtance vnto the famous citie of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in antient time Ecbathana, as is probably by ſome coniectured: a great and rich citie, but vnwalled and of no ſtrength; where the Perſian kings, for the pleaſantneſſe of D the place, and freſhneſſe of the aire, vſed commonly to be reſiant in the heat of the yere. From whence Tamas the Perſian King was as then abſent, buſied in wars with Kezſen-baſſa, a Prince of the Coraſine Hircanians: ſo that the citiſens of Tauris deſtitute of all helpe, yeelded themſelues and the citie vnto the Baſſa at his firſt comming. Tamas the Perſian King vnderſtanding what had hapned at Tauris, drew neere with his power, warily expecting to haue taken the Turks at ſome aduantage, and ſo by policie to haue defeated his enemies, whom he was too weake to meet with in plaine battell. Which thing the warie Baſſa well perceiuing, for more aſſurance by ſpeedie courrours aduertiſed Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the enemies purpoſe, requeſting him with all ſpeed to repaire with his armie to Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a great armie, not by the way of Ancyra, Sebaſtia, Amaſia, the bor- E ders of Trapezond, and ſo ouer Euphrates at Arſenga, into Armenia, as his father Selymus had done before him, becauſe that way was thought longer and more troubleſome: but quite another way, on the right hand from Nice in Bythinia, to Iconium, and by Cæſaria to Malathia, where is the notable paſſage ouer the riuer Euphrates, burſting out by the vallies of the mountaine Antitaurus, from whence the plaines of Meſopotamia (then part of the Perſian kingdome) begin to open themſelues: through which countrey Solyman marched peaceably with his armie, paying the poore countrey people for whatſoeuer he tooke; and ſo in foure and fiftie dayes march, came from Nice in Bythinia, to the citie of Coim in Armenia the greater, which is ſuppoſed to be built in the ruines of the famous and antient citie Artaxata. But hearing ſuch newes as is aforeſaid from the Baſſa, he doubled his march, and ſo in ſhort F time after came and ioyned his forces with the Baſſa at Tauris. Tamas (who yet dayly expected the comming of the Georgian light horſmen) vnderſtanding that Solyman was comming againſt him with a world of men, thought it not good to abide the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemie, but with delay to wearie him out, that drew ſuch a multitude of people after him; and by taking of him at all aduantages, to cut off his people, ſpent with long trauell, wanting victuall, and falling into diuers diſeaſes; as it commonly chanceth to populous armies in G ſtrange countries, where the change of the aire, with the ineuitable neceſſitie alwayes attending vpon a great armie, moſt times cauſeth grieuous and contagious diſeaſes. Wherefore Tamas to ſhun the comming of Solyman, retyred further off into Sultania, about ſix days journey from Tauris. Whereof Solyman hauing knowledge, departed from that rich Citie without doing any harme therein; following after Tamas into Sultania, to joyne battell with him if he could poſſible: leauing behind him for haſt, a great part of his carriages and baggage, with fiue hundred Ianizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies. The citie of Sultania was in antient time one of the royall ſeats of the Perſian Kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no ſhew of the antient maieſtie, but onely in the churches by him ſpared.

Neere vnto this citie Solyman lay incamped many dayes, expecting that the Perſian King (in H reuenge of the iniuries to him done, and for the ſafegard of his honour) ſhould at length come out of the mountaines, and ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, and giue him battell. Which was a thing ſo far from Tamas his reſolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne ſtrength with his enemies, that he retired in ſuch ſort, that Solyman could by no means learne what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

Solymans army diſtreſſed with tempeſt.

The countrey neere vnto the citie of Sultania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on euerie ſide inuironed with hugie mountaines, whoſe tops are to be ſeene a far off, always couered with deepe ſnow: theſe mountains were in antient time called Nyphates, Caſpius, Coathras, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucaſus the father of mountaines; I and joyning one to another, ſome one way, ſome another, doe diuide moſt large and wide Countries. Whileſt Solyman in thoſe vaſt and plaine fields moſt fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, ſuch a horrible and cruell tempeſt (as the like whereof the Perſians had neuer before ſeene at that time of the yeare) fell downe from thoſe mountains (which was ſo much the more ſtrange, for that it fell in the beginning of September) with ſuch abundance of raine, which froze ſo eagerly as it fell, that it ſeemed the depth of Winter had euen then of a ſudden been come in: for ſuch was the rage of the bluſtring windes, ſtriuing with themſelues as if it had been for victorie, that they ſwept the ſnow from off the tops of thoſe high mountaines, and caſt it into the plaines in ſuch aboundance, that the Turkes lay as men buried aliue in the deepe ſnow, moſt part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe K to the ground with the violence of the tempeſt, and weight of the ſnow; wherein a wonderful number of ſicke ſouldiers and others of the baſer ſort which followed the campe, periſhed; and many others were ſo benummed, ſome their hands, ſome their feet, that they loſt the vſe of them for euer: moſt part of their beaſts which they vſed for carriage, but eſpecially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea Solyman himſelfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempeſt. Neither was there any remedie to be found for ſo great miſchiefes, by reaſon of the helliſh darkneſſe of that tempeſtuous night, moſt of their fires being put out by the extremitie of the ſtorme: which did not a little terrifie the ſuperſtitious Turks, as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no leſſe than the miſeries of the tempeſt, L was the feare of the enemie, whoſe ſudden comming they deadly feared: vntill that after ſo tedious a night, the Sun breaking out the next morning, with his cheerefull beams reuiued many, before readie to giue vp the ghoſt for cold, and gaue comfort vnto them all in generall, by diſcouering the open fields cleere of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to haue ſeen what miſerie that one night had brought into the Turks camp: the ground lay almoſt couered with bodies of the dead; & many liued but ſo, as that they accounted the dead more happie than themſelues. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible tempeſt was brought vpon them by the charmes and inchantments of the Perſian Magicians: whereas it was vndoubtedly by the hand of him who bringeth the proud deuices of Princes to naught.

Solyman troubled as well with the ſtrangeneſſe of the accident, as the loſſe he had receiued, M after he had a little refreſhed his diſcouraged ſoldiers, roſe with his armie, and tooke his way on the left hand into Aſſyria: Vlemas the Perſian perſuading him thereunto for many cauſes, but eſpecially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mahometes a friend of his, was gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to proofe, was not to be woon either by promiſe or reward, to betray the Citie. Wherefore Solyman reſolued to take A it by force: neither did his fortune faile him therein: for as ſoone as Mahometes vnderſtood that Vlemas was at hand with the forerunners of the Turks armie, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, (who as he thought would neuer haue come ſo far;) he not prouided to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie, and not beloued of the citiſens, fled out of the citie. Solyman comming, in ſhort time after was of the Babylonians receiued without reſiſtance. The citie of Babylon, commonly called Bagdat, riſe out of the ruines of the old citie of Babylon, ſo much ſpoken of in holy Writ: from whence it is not far diſtant, ſtanding vpon the riuer Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the riuer Euphrates. In this famous citie is the ſeat of the great Calyph, the chiefe Mahometan Prieſt, whom all the Mahometan Princes haue in great reuerence, and hath an old prerogatiue in the choice and confirmation of the B Kings of Aſſyria and the Sultans of Ægypt: of which Calyph, Solyman according to the old ſuperſtitious manner, receiued at his hands the enſignes and ornaments of the Aſſyrian kings, and with great bountie woon the hearts of the people; and thereupon reſolued to ſpend that Winter there, billiting his armie in diuers places of that fertile countrey. The other cities of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia alſo, namely Caraemida, Meredinum, Orſa, and Aſanceſa, hearing that Solyman had without reſiſtance taken Babylon, yeelded themſelues and receiued his garriſons. Yea the fame thereof was ſo great, that Embaſſadours came vnto him as far as Ormus, (a citie in the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Perſian gulfe, famous for the great traffique out of India thither) ſuing vnto him for peace. Thus the antient Citie of Babylon, C with the great countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, ſometimes famous kingdomes of themſelues, and lately part of the Perſian kingdome, fell into the hands of the Turks, and became Prouinces of the Turkiſh empire, in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had ſpent that Winter in great ioy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkiſh gouernement, placed a great commander, which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg, (which is as much as to ſay, the lord of lords) and vnder him diuers others for the gouernment of theſe Countries, by parts, which they cal Sanzacks, who are euer at the command of the Beglerbeg. Whilſt he thus wintered at Babylon, he cauſed Aſbender Zelibi (which is to ſay, Alexander the Noble) his great treaſurer for the wars, to be hanged, for that he had vnfaithfully dealt in his Office; and confiſcated all his goods.

Babylon yeelded to Solyman.

The countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia poſſeſſed by the Turks.

D Tamas hearing that Solyman was gone to Babylon, returned to Tauris: of whoſe ſpeedie comming the Ianizaries and other captaines there left by Solyman vnderſtanding, fled in haſte out of the citie, leauing all ſuch things as were committed to their cuſtodie, for a prey vnto the Perſian ſouldiers.

Tamas comes to Tauris.

Solymans armie being mightily increaſed by the comming vnto him of the great Baſſa of Caire, with the Sanzacks of Alexandria, Iudea, Syria, and Comagena; by the perſuaſion of Abraham and Vlemas, the Spring now well come on, departed from Babylon again toward Tauris, with purpoſe either to draw Tamas to battell, or elſe to his eternall infamie, before his face to ſacke that his regall citie. But Tamas aduertiſed of his comming, and knowing himſelfe too weake to giue him battel, forſooke the citie, and fled into the mountains of Hircania: E deſtroying all the countrey before him as he went, and carrying away the inhabitants, leauing nothing to relieue the Turkes ſouldiers, if they ſhould purſue him. Solyman vnderſtanding that Tamas was againe fled, ſent Vlemas with all the choice horſemen of his armie to ouertake him if it were poſſible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three days iourny, and ſtill found the country deſolate as he went, yeelding neither forrage for his horſes, nor reliefe for his men, and ſaw no hope to ouertake the king; he began as a prouident General, to forecaſt the extremities like to befal in his return thorow thoſe deſolat countries with the enemie at his heeles: and therupon in time retired back againe to Solyman, declaring vnto him what had happened. Who fretting in his mind, that the Perſian king was not to be drawne to battel, marched forthwith to Tauris, entring it without reſiſtance, the citiſens F ſubmitting themſelues vnto him: whoſe liues ſpared, he gaue that rich citie for a prey to his ſoldiers, who left neither houſe nor corner thereof vnranſacked, abuſing the poore citiſens with all manner of inſolencie; euery common ſouldier without controlment fitting himſelfe with whatſoeuer beſt pleaſed his greedie deſire or filthie luſt. Tamas had in this citie a moſt ſtately and royal palace; ſo had alſo moſt part of the nobilitie their ſumptuous & rich houſes, which by the commandment of Solyman were all raſed down to the ground, and the greateſt part of the beſt citiſens and beautifull perſonages of all ſort and condition, at his departure thence C carried away captiues. Solyman contenting himſelfe to haue done the Perſian king this diſgrace, in ſpoyling this his rich and royall citie,returned again towards Meſopotamia,deſtroying the countries all the way as he went, killing the verie beaſts and cattell, thereby the more to impoueriſh the Perſians, wiſhing to leaue nothing vnto them but penurie and miſerie. Hee was ſcarcely paſt Coim & the Calderan fields (famous for his fathers victory againſt Hiſmael) but that certain troups of Perſian horſemen were in the taile of his armie, and had taken away ſome of his baggage, and ſlaine diuers of the ſicke and ſtragling ſoldiers, and with their often skirmiſhes did not a little trouble his whole armie. Beſides that, it was noyſed thorow all his campe, That Tamas himſelfe was comming after him with a greater power of horſemen,taken vp in Hiberia, Albania, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backs before they H could get out of Armenia: for which cauſe he appointed the two great Baſſa's of Caire and Syria (for ſo they were called) and Vlemas the Perſian, with 18000 good ſoldiers to follow him in the reareward of his armie, to receiue and repreſſe the ſudden aſſaults of the Perſians, if need ſhould require: and ſo ſtill kept on his march, vntill he was come to Amida, now called Caraemida, an antient citie of Meſopotamia. In the meane time Tamas the Perſian king was returned to Tauris with a mighty armie, in hope there to haue ſuddenly ſurpriſed his enemie, ſurcharhed with the pleaſures of ſo rich a citie: but finding him gone, and beholding the miſerable ſpoyle and deſolation he had made in the citie; mooued with indignation, hee reſolued to purſue him whither ſoeuer he were gone, and was now on his way as far as Coim.

Where vnderſtanding that Solyman was gone ſo farre before, that he was hardly to be ouertaken; I and finding the noble gentlemen in his armie vnwilling in their heauy armour to vndertake ſuch a purſuit, as could not be performed without the wonderfull toyle of themſelues, and moſt aſſured loſſe of their goodly horſes; alledging, that they were prouided to fight a battel, and not to trauel ſo long a journy (all which, Tamas now that his choler was ouer knew to ſtand with good reaſon) he changed his former determination, thinking it beſt there to ſtay and not to follow the purſuit of his enemies any further: vntill that Delimenthes one of his Noblemen (alwayes more forward than the reſt) offered with fiue thouſand choſen horſemen to ouertake ſome part of the Turks armie, and to do on them ſome good ſeruice. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the ſame, promiſing him moſt honorable reward: and ſo in haſte ſent him away. K

Delimenthes with 5000 Perſians purſues the Turks.

He forthwith taking the wel knowne and neereſt way, vſed ſuch expedition, that he was in hope to ouertake the rereward of the Turks armie (marching not far now before him) about the foot of the mountaine Taurus, as in deed it fell out at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous towne in the confines of the Perſian kingdome, where it bordereth vpon Meſopotamia, ſtanding in a pleaſant valley, by which runneth a little riuer falling out of the mountain Antitaurus; and had a caſtle kept with a garriſon of Perſians. In this valley the two Baſſa's of Caire and Syria (conducted by Vlemas) thinking they had now bin paſt all danger of the enemies purſuit, ſtayd with the rereward of his armie to refreſh their wearied ſoldiers, vpon certaine knowledge, that Solyman with the reſt of his armie was alreadie come in ſafetie to Amida in Meſopotamia. And therefore lay as men ſecure, without any ſuſpition of the comming L of the Perſians, whom they had not ſo much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes vſing moſt faithfull and diligent eſpials of that countrey people, by that time he was come within one dayes journey of Bethlis, vnderſtood certainly where the Turks lay, wearie of their long trauell, as men without feare, keeping little or no watch in their campe: Whereupon he determined in the dead time of the night following to aſſaile them in their camp: & by ſecret meſſengers gaue knowledge both of his comming, & of this his purpoſe, to the captaine of the caſtle of Bethlis; requeſting him at an appointed houre vpon ſigne giuen, to be readie to ſallie out with his garriſon vpon that ſide of the Turkes campe which was towards the Caſtle. Which his venturous deſignement was ſo furthered both by the darkeneſſe of the night, and the aboundance of raine which fell at the ſame time, as if it had beene wiſhed M for; that he was got with all his reſolute followers within the Turkes campe, before they were aware of his comming: where the Perſian ſouldiers as wolues amongſt ſheepe, did ſuch ſpeedie execution amongſt the ſleepie Turkes, that the two great Baſſa's and Vlemas had much adoo to get to horſe and ſaue themſelues by flight. And ſuch was the furie of the Perſians, Delimenthes aſſailes the Turks campe by night, and maketh a great ſlaughter.

A ſians,and the greatneſſe of the ſudden feare increaſed by the darkeneſſe of the night, that the Turks not knowing which way to turne themſelues,or what to do, were ſlaine by thouſands, ſome ſleeping, ſome halfe waking, ſome making themſelues readie to fight, and ſome to flie, few of all that great armie eſcaped the ſword of the Perſians. Of the fiue great Sanzackes which were in the armie, three were ſlaine, and one taken. Eight hundred Ianizaries ſeeing themſelues forſaken of their chiefetaines,laid downe their harquebuſies and other weapons, and yeelded themſelues vpon Delimenthes his word. The fierce mountaine people alſo, who in former time had ſuffered great iniuries of the Turks, after the death of Aladeules their king, had now ioyned themſelues to the Perſians, and notably reuenged their wrongs; to whoſe ſhare all the baggage of the Turks campe fell for a prey. It might then well haue bin ſayd of B the Turks,which the Poet ſpeaketh of the night wherein Troy was ſackt:

Quis cladem illius noctis qui funera fando explicet?——

The ſlaughter of that night was ſo great,that it is of the Turks vntill this day accounted amongſt their greateſt loſſes: and the victorie ſo welcome to the Perſians, that in memoriall thereof they kept that day (which was the thirteenth of October) as one of their ſolemne holidayes for many yeares after. Delimenthes returning all bloudie with the ſlaughter of the Turks,& loded with their ſpoiles,was of Tamas ioyfully receiued,and honorably rewarded.

Solyman diſcouraged.

This ouerthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Baſſa's and Vlemat, as men that had C hardly eſcaped ſhipwrecke,ſo daunted his proud conceits,that he reſolued in himſelfe to return home,and no further to proſecute that vnfortunat war; the euill euent whereof,his mother (as he ſaid)had more truly preſaged,than had the cold Prophet Mulcarabe: but ſecretly in minde diſpleaſed with Abraham the great Baſſa, by whoſe perſuaſion hee had taken in hand that dangerous expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iconium by Barbaruſſa and Sinan Baſſa ſyrnamed the Iew,a man for his skill at ſea in reputation next to Barbaruſſa. Theſe two great perſonages lately come from Algiers to Conſtantinople with the remainder of his fleet, met him ſo far by land,to ſhew their ioyfulneſſe for the conqueſt he had made of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria,and to excuſe themſelues for the loſſe of the kingdome of Tunes, which woon by Barbaruſſa in the beginning of the Perſian war,was before the ending thereof againe D wrung out of his hands by Charles the Emperor,and reſtored to Muleaſſes,as ſhall be hereafter declared. They with great humilitie declared vnto him the whole proceſſe of that war, and with what ſucceſſe they had endured the force of Charles the Emperour himſelfe in perſon, ſhewing plainly vnto him, that there wanted neither valour in the ſouldiers, nor direction in them the commanders,but only fortune,which as it mightily raigneth in all mens actions, ſo eſpecially in matters of war. Solyman gratiouſly accepted of their excuſe,and curteouſly took them vp,proſtrate at his feet,commending them for their valor in their euil haps,in a plot ſo well by them laid,more than he did the victory of others,got by good fortune,not grounded vpon any good reaſon: willing them to be of good cheere,ſaying,that he would in ſhort time find occaſion for them to recompence that diſgrace, and again to ſhew their approued valour.
E After long trauell he came to the ſtrait of Boſphorus, where Abraham the Baſſa going before him,had in token of triumph cauſed the ſhore all along the place where he ſhould go aboord the gallie prouided for his tranſportation, to be couered with Perſian ſilke for him to tread vpon: from whence he paſſed with much triumph ouer to his palace to Conſtantinople.

Abraham* The great Baſſa in diſgrace with Solyman.

Enuie,the fatall and cruell companion of Princes immoderat fauours,had with her prying eys quickly diſcouered in court Solymans changed countenance vpon the great Baſſa,& began now to ſhew her gaſtly face. They which before were moſt ready to do him all honor poſſible, yea to haue laid their hands vnder his feet,ſought now by all ſecret means to worke his diſgrace and confuſion. But of all others, the two great ladies, Solymans mother and the faire Roxolana,ceaſed not by dayly complaints to incenſe Solyman againſt him: the mother,for that F he had by his perſuaſion,contrary to her mind and her ſuperſtitious obſeruations, drawn her ſon into the dangers of the Perſian war: and Roxolana, for that he moſt honoured and ſought the preferment of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne by another woman: whereas ſhe aboue all things laboured by all ſubtill means to prefer Baiazet her owne ſonne to the Empire after the death of Solyman his father: which her deſignement ſhe perceiued to be much croſſed by the credit which the Baſſa had with her Solyman,and therefore did what ſhe might,both to bring him out of fauour,and to worke his deſtruction. But that which moſt impared his credit with Solyman, was the common report raiſed of him by his enemies, That he being in heart a Chriſtian, did in all things fauour the Chriſtians, (a thing moſt odious among the Turks) and had for that cauſe craftily perſuaded Solyman to take in hand the vnfortunat Perſian war. And that which more increaſed the ſuſpition, was, That he about that time had cauſed one Marke Nicholas a Venetian merchant (who had not without the ſuſpition of ſome, oftentimes come vnto him with letters and ſecret meſſages whileſt he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night, and murdred at Conſtantinople, and caſt into the ſea, becauſe he ſhould not diſcouer any thing that might be hurtfull vnto him. Abraham thus brought in diſgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkiſh tyrannie) bid to a ſolemne ſupper in the court about the fourteenth of March (after which time he was neuer more ſeene. It is reported, That after ſupper Solyman fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had miſgouerned the State, inuerted his treaſures to his own priuat, and as a traitor, had ſecret intelligence with the Chriſtian Princes his enemies: for proofe whereof, Solyman with ſterne countenance ſhewed him his owne letters, which had by chance beene intercepted; oftentimes asking him in furious manner, If he knew not that hand, if he knew not that ſeale. All which, the Baſſa lying proſtrat at his feet humbly confeſſed, and with many teares craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be mooued: for the ſame night as he was ſlumbring vpon a palat in the court, ouercome with heauineſſe, an Eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for that purpoſe had deliuered vnto him with his owne hand. He was murdered ſleeping, becauſe Solyman had in former time of his fauour ſolemnly ſworne vnto him, That he would neuer kill him whileſt he liued. By which oath, the great Mahometan Prieſt ſayd hee was not ſo bound, but that he might kill him ſleeping, for as much as men by ſleepe depriued of ſence, are for that time not to be accounted as liuing, but as dead, mans life conſiſting altogether (as he ſaid) in liuely actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked vpon the dead bodie, and bitterly curſed the ſame, he cauſed a great weight to be tied vnto it, and ſo caſt it into the ſea. His treaſure and goods, which were almoſt infinite, were the next day all ſeiſed vpon for the Emperor, and a ſmall portion thereof appointed for his poore wife to liue vpon. His death was no ſooner knowne, but that the vulgar people deuiſed of him infamous ſongs, and ſlanderous reports, as of a traitor moſt iuſtly condemned; & in further deſpight, with mire and ſtones defaced the trophies of the Hungarian victorie, which he had in a ſtately manner erected before his ſumptuous houſe in Conſtantinople. This was the wofull end of Abraham the great Baſſa, who whileſt he ſtood in fauour with his Prince, was of all others accounted moſt fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but after falling into diſgrace, became the ſcorne of fortune, and the lamentable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie. Hee was murthered the fifteenth day of March, in the yeare 1536.

Abraham Baſſa murdred in the Court by the cōmandement of Solyman.

The cauſes that mooued Charles the Emperor to inuade Tunes.

How the kingdom of Tunes was by Barbaruſſa (the Turks great Admirall) taken from Muleaſſes, we haue alreadie told: but how the ſame was again taken from him by Charles the Emperor a little before the returne of Solyman out of Perſia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iuſt cauſe feared, that Barbaruſſa, poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Tunes, and ſupported by the power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not content himſelfe with the ſpoile of the coaſts of Spaine, Sardinia, and Italie, as he had in former time, but with all his forces inuade Sicilia, the garnarie and ſtorehouſe of Italie, and from thence attempt to conquer the kingdom of Naples, which it was thought he in his immoderat deſires had longed much after. To repreſſe this his barbarous inſolencie, and to work the ſafetie of the frontiers of the Chriſtian kingdomes (much ſubiect to the rapines of the Turkiſh pyrats) Charles the Emperour reſolued in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant armie to paſſe ouer into Affricke, whileſt Solyman was yet buried in the Perſian wars, and by force of arms to diſpoſſeſſe the tyrant of his new gotten kingdome in Tunes. For the accompliſhment whereof, he cauſed ſoldiers to be leuied in all parts of Spaine, and came downe to Barcelona with eight thouſand footmen and ſeuen hundred horſemen, farre ſooner than was by any man expected: amongſt whom were many of the nobilitie of Spaine, with their followers moſt gallantly appoynted: but eſpecially Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba; whoſe forwardneſſe in that honorable action, with the deſire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garzias, ſlaine before by the Moores at Girapolis, gaue great hope euen then vnto his Countreymen, That he Andrew Auria the Emperours Admirall.

In the meane time Andrew Auria the great Admirall, vnto whom onely for his approued fidelitie and long experience the Emperor had fully communicated what he had with himſelfe before purpoſed, had with wonderfull diligence and celeritie rigged vp a great fleet of ſhips and gallies ſo furniſhed with all manner of warlike prouiſion, as might wel haue ſufficed a great army: whereunto he ioined alſo his own fleet of 17 gallies and three galeaſſes, wherin he had imbarked the flower of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding cheerefulneſſe had voluntarily offered themſelues to follow him their old Generall in that ſacred expedition.
With this great preparation Auria came to the Emperour at Barcelonia. Thither came alſo Lewis the king of Portingals brother (whoſe ſiſter Iſabel, Charles the Emperour had married) B with 25 Carauels, ſhips which the Portingals vſed in their Indian voyages, amongſt whome was alſo one huge Galeon; all ſhips well appointed and fit for ſeruice, wherein were embarked 2000 Portingals, beſide marriners: there alſo arriued ſixtie ſaile of tall ſhips ſent out of Flanders and the Low-countries; wherin were a gteat number of condemned perſons, whoſe liues were ſpared that they might ſerue in the gallies. Vnto this warre Paulus the third of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, ſent ten gallies vnder the conduct of Virginius Vrſinus: the great Maſter of Malta ſent thither his fleet alſo. At the ſame time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthie chiefetaine Alphonſus D'aualus Vaſtius, whom the Emperor had appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the Emperors commandement taken vp fiue thouſand new ſouldiers in Italie, which were led by Hieronimus Tutanilla, Countie C of Sarne, Fredericke, Caracte, and Auguſtine Spinula, all famous captaines. The old Spaniſh garriſons which lay in Lombardie, the Emperor commanded to be ſtraitly looked vnto, that none of them ſhould leaue their places to goe into this new expedition, but to remaine there ſtill vnder their Generall Antonius Leua: which worthie captaine although hee would faine haue had him with him, as of all his great commanders the beſt; yet he thought it good to ſpare him, both for that he was mnch troubled with the gout, and alſo for that it was neceſſarie (as he thought) to leaue ſuch a valiant captaine with his garriſons in the countrey, ſo neere vnto the French and Swiſſers, whom he durſt not ſo well truſt as to diſ-furniſh that countrey either of ſo great a commander, or of the woonted garriſons. At the ſame time Maximilian Eberſtein, an old commander, came to Vaſtius with eight thouſand Germans, ouer the Tridentine D Alpes to Millaine, and ſo to Genoa; amongſt whom were diuers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntarie men ſerued of their owne charges. With theſe Germanes and the fiue thouſand Italians, Vaſtius embarked himſelfe at the port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria: hauing before perſuaded them, with patience to indure the tediouſneſſe of the ſea, and to comfort themſelues with the hope of the victorie in Affrick; where they ſhould fight in the quarrel of God, and for the Emperor, who did neuer forget his religious and valiant ſouldiers. So ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Italie, he came to Naples, where the viceroy and diuers other of the nobilitie had of their owne charges, euery man according to his deuotion or abilitie, built or furniſhed ſome one gallie, ſome moe, for that ſeruice. It was a wonder to ſee with what cheerfulneſſe the gallants and luſtie youths of Naples, and all that part of Italie, came and offered E themſelues vnto Vaſtius; ſo that it ſeemed there was none left behind in Naples: for he had with ſingular courteſie ſo woon the hearts of the old ſouldiers and luſtie youths of that kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a moſt honourable thing to adorne, the one their before deſerued penſions, and the other their firſt entrance into martial affaires, with the participation of ſo notable a victorie. But whileſt euery man was thus buſied in ſetting forward, certaine mutinous ſouldiers (wearie of the ſea, and fearing the dangers of ſo long a voyage) began to caſt many perils, to finde fault with their ſmall wages, and to diſcourage the multitude, perſuading them with ſeditious ſpeeches to forſake their colours, and to run away: for redreſſe whereof, Vaſtius cauſed the authours of that mutinie to be taken and thruſt into ſacks, and in the ſight of the whole fleet to be caſt into the ſea. So Vaſtius departing with his F fleet from Naples, came in few daies to Palermo in Sicilie. The Emperour alſo looſing from Barcelona, came to the Port of Mago in the Iſland of Minorica, and from thence to Carlis in Sardinia, whether Alphonſus Vaſtius was a little before come with all his fleet out of Sicilie. Not long after, the Emperour, now that all his forces were come together, paſſed ouer from Sardinia into Affricke, and with a faire Weſterly winde put into the Port Alphonſus Daualus Vaſtius Generall of the land forces.

of Vtica, which is of the ſeafaring men called Farina. In the entring wherof, the Admirall gallie, wherein the Emperor himſelfe was, by great miſchance ſtrake vpon a ſand, & there ſtucke faſt: which ſo much more troubled the Emperor, for that his father Philip had by like miſhap bin like to haue bin caſt away vpon the coaſt of England, as hee was ſailing out of the Lowcountries into Spaine: howbeit, by the good direction of Auria ſhe was quickly got off the ſand againe, and entred with the reſt, to the great reioycing of the whole fleet. So preſently departing again from Vtica, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt, he doubled the promontorie of Carthage, yet famous for the ruins of that proud citie, and came to anker before a caſtle, which of a well beneath it, is called by the name of Aquaria, or the water caſtle. The Moores, who from the hils of Vtica and their watch towers, had taken view of the Chriſtian fleet and of the courſe it held, aduertiſed Barbaruſſa, That the Chriſtians were comming againſt him with an innumerable fleet: for there was of one ſort and other almoſt 700 ſaile, whereof 82 were great gallies, which gallantly garniſhed with flags and ſtreamers, made a ſhew of moe than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the enemie. But that troubled Barbaruſſa moſt, that he was by meſſenger vpon meſſenger certainly informed, that the moſt mighty Chriſtian Emperour Charles was in perſon himſelfe in the fleet, with ſuch a world of people, that it ſhould ſeeme he had left none in Spaine and Italie that were able to beare armes. Which newes was brought by certain Mahometan ſlaues, who getting looſe in the gallies, had in the night ſwum aſhore, and reported the certaintie of the Emperours comming: for the proud Turke, a great contemner of the Chriſtian forces, neuer thought that the Emperour would haue aduentured his perſon vnto the dangers of the ſea, and chances of warre, eſpecially in an vnknowne barren and ſcortching countrey, but would rather haue attempted to doe ſomething by his Lieutenants, or elſe by Auria his Admirall ſeeke to ſurpriſe ſome baſe places alongſt the ſeacoaſt, but not to come directly for the regall citie of Tunes: in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by Aloyſius Præſenda, a gentleman of Genoa, who taken at ſea, was kept as priſoner at large in Tunes: of whom Barbaruſſa had learned many things concerning the ſtate of Italie, the manner of the Chriſtians, and ſtrength of the Emperour; craftily feeding him with the hope of libertie, if he would truly declare vnto him ſuch things as he deſired to know. Wherfore now in his rage he cauſed him to be brought before him; charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiouſly told him lies for truth, concerning the Emperor, and therefore commanded him to be forthwith executed. When he had thus with the vnworthie death of a guiltleſſe Chriſtian, ſomwhat mittigated the griefe of his light beleefe, he forthwith began to caſt with himſelfe how he might beſt withſtand his puiſſant enemie. And firſt of all calling to counſell his ſea captains, in whom for their approued valor he repoſed moſt confidence, he ſhewed vnto them, that they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending vpon honorable actions, were not to doubt of the victorie, forſomuch as he ſaw as it good as alreadie gained; for the ſame reaſons for which he had before perſuaded himſelfe, that the Emperour (if he had not bin halfe mad) would not haue vndertaken ſo deſperat and doubtfull a warre.

For who is there (ſaid hee) that knoweth this countrey (not to ſpeake of our owne forces) which would not reaſonably thinke our enemies ſhould in ſhort time know the price of their ambitious deſire and raſh attempt? which in a moſt vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, the dayes beeing now at the longeſt, and the Sunne in his greateſt ſtrength, are come to fight in a countrey ſcortched with heat, and altogether without water; where the verie ſand which riſeth with euerie blaſt of wind, flying into their eyes and faces, ſhall no leſſe trouble them than their enemies? Shall we thinke that they, which as I heare for moſt part are freſh-water ſouldiers, and ſurcharged with heauie armor, can eaſily march forward, or retire, or yet keepe their ground, as the diuers occaſions of battell ſhall require: when as the deepe and hollow burning ſand vp to the mid leg, will not ſuffer them to keepe any order of array? How ſhall they bee able by any meanes to abide the force of our Turkiſh footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian horſemen? And if they bee ſo many of them as they ſay there is, where can they get victuall to feed ſuch a multitude, if wee doe but protract the warre? Aſſuredly (moſt valiant and couragious chiefetaines) wee ſhall erect a moſt rare and incomparable trophie in this countrey of Affricke: when as Charles the rich and great Emperour of the Chriſtians ſhall either heere bee ſlaine in battell, or elſe fall into our hands as a moſt rich prey. For mine owne part, I will notably prouide, that you ſhall want neither weapons, victuall, nor aide, during the time of this warre: I will open the

A the old armories, broach my ſtore, and bring forth my treaſures. The Numidian princes now our friends, I will without delay entertaine with great pay, and ſuch Preſents as ſhall be to them moſt welcome. As for the citiſens of Tunes, you know how eaſily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on againſt the enemie for a ſmall pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I moſt earneſtly require of your approued valor, That you moſt valiantly defend the ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta, as the moſt aſſured defence not of this city onely, but of the whole kingdome; and eſpecially of our nauie which there lieth in ſafe harbour: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces firſt aſſaile. Wherefore, as worthie men neuer to be vanquiſhed, keepe that for Solyman and mee: ſo that it being vainly attempted by our enemies, and reſolutely defended by you, the Chriſtian Emperor there failing of his purpoſe, and ſhamefully foiled, ſhall now begin to deſpaire, not of the taking of the citie of Tunes, but of his owne returne B and ſafetie.

When he had thus ſaid, the ſea captains anſwered with one conſent, That they would moſt willingly and cheerfully performe whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him to command: and in confirmation thereof, promiſed him not to do any thing which beſeemed not moſt valiant and reſolute men. Amongſt theſe ſea captains, Sinan of Smirna a Iew, who had loſt his right eie, was both for his age and long experience in militarie affaires, of greateſt account: next vnto him was Haidinus of Cilicia, for his furiouſneſſe in fight ſurnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo, and Salec of Ionia; which two had before in a great battell at ſea, ſlaine Rodericus Portendus great Admirall of Spaine, and taken his ſon Iohn priſoner, and ſeuen great gallies: after theſe, was C Tabacches of Laodicia, and Giaffer a valiant captaine of the Ianizaries: all which were notable pyrats, and then men of great fame. The ſtrong caſtle of Guletta ſtandeth in the bottome of the bay of Carthage, vpon a point of the land, where the ſea by a narrow ſtrait runneth on the Eaſt ſide of the caſtle into the lake of Tunes, which being in a manner round, is about 12 Italian miles ouer. But now that caſtle is parted from the maine on the Weſt ſide alſo, by the ſea that way let in; which chargeable worke was by Barbaruſſa begun, but giuen ouer againe by him, perſuaded by ſome, That the ſea comming in that way, would in ſhort time fil vp the lake with ſand: but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it ſtandeth in the manner of an Iſland, in the mouth of the lake, diuided from the firm land by two narrow ſtrait paſſages, the one on the Eaſt, and the other on the Weſt, yet ſo, that it commandeth both. This D caſtle Barbaruſſa had before ſtrongly fortified both with men and munition, as the key of that kingdome: but now vpon the comming of the Emperour, he put into it his moſt expert and reſolute captaines before named: well foreſeeing, that in the defence thereof reſted the ſafetie of his nauie which then lay within the lake, as in a moſt ſure harbour; and alſo the greateſt hope he had for the holding of the citie of Tunes, whereon depended the whole ſtate of that kingdome. The Emperor lying at anchor with all his fleet neere vnto the ſhore, gaue generall commandement, that his ſouldiers ſhould with as much ſpeed as was poſſible be landed with the long boats: which was ſo orderly done, that the Moores terrified with the hideous crie of the ſouldiers, making toward land, and not able to abide the ſhowers of ſmall ſhot, were eaſily beaten from the ſhore, whither they were come downe in great multitudes, and ſo ſuffe- E red the Chriſtian ſouldiers to land quietly. The firſt that landed were the Spaniſh companies, after them the Italians, and laſt of all the Germans, whom Vaſtius Generall of the army cauſed preſently to encampe themſelues, ſtraitly commanding, that no man ſhould ſtraggle from the camp farther into the land, vntil the horſemen and great artillerie were all landed. The Emperor himſelfe bearing victorie in the cheerfulneſſe of his countenance, landed alſo. In the mean time certaine companies were ſent out by the Generall, to view the places nigh hand, and to ſeeke out the ciſternes and fountaines of freſh waters thereabout, which ſometime ſerued the famous citie of Carthage; with whom the Moores, but eſpecially the Numidian horſemen, a ſwift, ſubtle, and painefull kind of ſouldiers, oftentimes and in many places ſuddenly skirmiſhed: and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the aduantages they could of the F places to them well knowne, with their arrowes and darts furiouſly aſſailed them vnawares, and ouerloaded with armour, ſparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Among whom was Hieronimus Spinnula a Ligurian captaine, who ouerthrowne by a Numidian horſeman, had his head cut off, and carried away by the ſame nimble horſeman, before hee could bee reſcued. The like miſhap befell Fredericus Carectus a noble Gentleman, who going with Vaſtius

to view the places thereabouts, was faſt by his ſide ſuddenly ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. All which nimbleneſſe and fierceneſſe of the enemie, could not for all that ſtay the Emperor: but that he would needs with a ſmall troupe of horſemen, in perſon himſelfe take view of the places thereabouts, euen in the ſight of the Numidian horſemen, which were in euery place to be ſeene pricking vp and downe the countrey in troupes; although he was many times requeſted by his graue counſellors, to leaue that ſeruice for his inferior captains, & not to expoſe himſelf to ſo great danger both of his perſon & of the cōmon ſafety. Vaſtius had now brought on the armie neere vnto the caſtle of Guletta, ſtill caſting vp a rolling trench as he came neerer thereunto, thereby to keep his men out of the danger of the enemies ſhot: which worke was not done only by the pioners and gallie ſlaues, but by ſouldiers of all ſorts, yea many of the captaines themſelues laid their hands to the ſpade and mattocke: for why, the Emperor was there a continuall beholder, and cheerfull commender of euery mans labor and forwardneſſe, and the buſie enemie was euer readie to take the aduantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes ſallying out euen vnto the very trenches of the Chriſtians, there giuing vnto them proud words of defiance. When the armie was to be martialled, and euery commander to be appointed to the place of his charge in this ſiege of Guletta: the countie of Sarne (a man famous both for the honour of his houſe, and for the good ſeruice hee had lately done againſt the Turks at Corone) requeſted of Vaſtius the Generall, to haue the charge of the mount neereſt vnto the caſtle; which as it was a place of moſt danger, ſo was it alſo of greateſt honor. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. Vpon the top of this mount, the countie ſet vp his rich tent in the eie of the enemy, and there lay with the Italian companies ouer whom he commanded. He had not there lien long, but Salec, one of the Turks famous pirats, with certaine companies of the garriſon ſouldiers, ſallied out of the caſtle directly vpon the mount whereon the countie lay; and by making ſhew as if he would deſperatly haue aſſailed the ſame, raiſing a great alarme againſt the Italians: yet ſo as after certaine vollies of ſhot diſcharged on both ſides, he began to retire as if he had beene thereto conſtrained. Which thing the county perceiuing, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproued certaine of the captaines, whom hee perceiued not ſo forward in purſuit of the enemie as he would haue had them: and in his furie ran downe from the mount, the reſt for ſhame following him, and ouertaking the enemies ſlew diuers of them. The craftie pyrat now ſeeing the countie drawne out of his ſtrength into the plaine ground, and perceiuing himſelfe ſtrong enough to encounter him, ſuddenly turning himſelfe about, ſaid vnto his ſouldiers: The aduantage you wiſhed to haue of your enemies is now offred, they are now in your danger; wherefore now ſhew your ſelues valiant men, and ſuffer not one of theſe proud freſh-water ſouldiers to eſcape aliue or vnwounded. Which he had no ſooner ſaid, but they preſently made a ſtand, and ſo hardly charged them from whom they but euen now ſeemed to flie, that the Italians not able longer to indure the fight, betooke themſelues to flight. The countie himſelfe with Belingerus his kinſman, fighting valiantly in the formoſt of his companies, was ſlaine; many others indured the ſame fortune: others flying backe againe to the mount, were ſlaine there by the Turks; who reſolutely entred into the trenches with them ſo far, that they caried away with them the plate and riches of the counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neereſt vnto them, and might eaſily haue reſcued them, that would once ſtir out of their places to helpe them: for it is reported, that they were nothing ſorie for the ouerthrow of the Italians, foraſmuch as the countie had ſo arrogantly craued of the Generall the moſt honourable place, which he ſo euill held. His head & right hand were cut off, and ſent by Salec to Barbaruſſa. This ouerthrow much grieued the Italians, whom Vaſtius comforted with cheerfull ſpeeches, imputing all that loſſe, neither to the valour of the enemie, or cowardiſe of the Italians; but onely to the raſhneſſe of the countie, whome he ſaid worthilie to haue paied the price of his inconſiderat forwardneſſe. But the Spaniards hee ſharpely reproued as mercileſſe men, which vpon ſo light an occaſion had giuen cauſe for the Italians to haue them in diſtruſt. The Turks in the mean time by the often ſhooting off of their great ordnance, ſhewed the ioy they conceiued of this victory.

Salec ſallieth out vpon the countie and the Italians.

The countie ſlaine, and his head and right hand ſent to Barbaruſſa.

The Spaniards reioycing at the ouerthrow of the Italians, are thēſelues foiled by Tabacches.

It oftentimes ſo falleth out, that whileſt men laugh at their neighbors harmes, their own is not far off; and ſo it fell out with the Spaniards: for Tabacches another of the piraticall captains, ſhortly after ſallying ſuddenly out of the caſtle in the dawning of the day, was got vp to

A the top of the trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there ſlew ſome as they were aſleepe, ſome idlie ſitting fearing no harme, others, as they were arming themſelues; and with their ſudden crie, cauſed the reſt which lay neere vnto that place, ſhamefully for feare to flie out of their trenches: where the Turks taking ſuch traſh as they there found, and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, amongſt whom was one Mendoſa a captaine, and carrying away with them the enſigne of Sarmentus which ſtood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victory. The alarme raiſed in the armie was ſuch, as that the Emperor himſelfe came running to the place in his armor, ſeuerely reprouing them of cowardiſe, which had forſaken the place; and grieuouſly offended with them which had kept ſuch negligent watch againſt ſuch an enemie, as was not for wilineſſe, agilitie, and courage, to bee B ſlightly regarded of the beſt and moſt expert ſouldiers. This diſgrace of the Spaniards well comforted the Italians, to ſee the old ſouldiers no leſſe ouertaken in their negligence, than they had been in their vnaduiſed forwardneſſe.

This tumult appeaſed, Vaſtius called into his tent the Colonels and chiefe Captaines of the Spaniards, and ſpake vnto them in this manner:

Friends (ſaid he) elſewhere alwaies valiant, who together with me, haue by your inuincible proweſſe gained vnto our Emperor many moſt glorious victories; you ſeeme vnto me at this time to haue neede to be called vpon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approued valor: for as far as I can ſee, the remembrance of your antient fame, is in you growne altogether cold; your hands are become faint C for feare; and that which I am ſorie and aſhamed to ſay, you are growne I know not how, altogether out of order, and heartleſſe, ſhewing no courage for the ſubduing of theſe naked pyrats. Yeſterday (as many ſay) you ſmiled at the vnskilfull and vnfortunat forwardneſſe of your friends, which they bought deere; but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerat careleſſe negligence: ſo that it concerneth you in honour, to blot out this ſo foule and publicke a diſgrace, by ſome notable and worthie exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I ſtraightly charge and command you, that with all ſpeed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieuement of ſome new honour: ſo that if the proud enemie ſhall againe preſume to come forth and aſſaile your trenches, you ſhall forthwith breake out vpon him, and beat him backe againe euen to the gates of Guletta. Perhaps good fortune will ſo attend your valiant and reſolute purſuit, that you may together with their diſordered men, enter ſome of their rampiers, wherein we ſee their D whole hope conſiſteth: which if it ſhal otherwiſe fall out than is hoped for, yet ſhall you by this your notable deuoire wonderfull content the Emperour your ſoueraigne, and me your Generall, and withall, couer your late diſhonour.

Vaſtius his ſpeech to the Spaniſh captaines.

Wherunto they all anſwered, That they would ſo beare themſelues againſt the enemie, as that hee ſhould not deſire greater courage or contempt of danger in men deſirous of honour and commendation.

It was not long, but that the Turks incouraged with their former ſucceſſe, after their wonted manner ſallied out againe, conducted by Giaffer captaine of the Ianizaries, a man of exceeding courage and ſtrength of bodie: who with the Ianizaries and certaine companies of Mooriſh E archers, about the noone time of the day iſſuing out of the caſtle, aſſailed the vttermoſt trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Chriſtians in their ſtations negligent and vnprepared: wherin he was nothing deceiued; for the Spaniards that burning hoat time of the day, kept ſuch negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers, was got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there diſcharged their ſhot & arrowes vpon the Chriſtians in their trenches, before they were well aware of his comming. But vpon the ſtriking vp of the drum, certaine companies of harquebuſiers brake out vpon them in two places at one inſtant, as Vaſtius had before commanded; whom hee ſeconded with a company of halbardiers, keeping in readines his ſquadrons to reſcue his harquebuſiers, if they ſhould be inforced by the enemie to F retire: & in that order expected the euent of the skirmiſh, which was moſt valiantly maintained on both ſides. For the Ianizaries, although they were inforced to giue ground, yet (as men not vſed to flie, & ſtanding vpon the honor of their order) withſtood the Chriſtians with no leſſe reſolution than they were by them charged; vntill that Giaffer their leader, deſperatly fighting among the formoſt of the Ianizaries, was at once ſhot in with 2 bullets, & ſlain: whoſe dead bodie the Ianizaries laboring to carrie away, indured a moſt cruell fight, many being on both ſides ſlaine vpon his dead carkaſſe : yet at length they were inforced to flie,and ſo fierce- G ly followed by the Spaniards,that they of Guletta, when they had receiued in the formoſt, ſhut out almoſt a fourth part of their owne men,for feare the Chriſtians ſhould together with them haue entred the caſtle. Didacus Abila,one of the Spaniſh enſigne-bearers, aduanced his enſigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers,and was there ſlaine, but his enſigne ſaued by one of the ſouldiers of the ſame band. The Chriſtians receiued more loſſe in their retreat,than they had in all the fight ; for the Turks from their rampiers then diſcharged their ſhot as faſt as they could vpon them,which they could not before doe,without the like danger to their own men mingled amongſt them.This daies worke well abated the pride of the Turks,and gaue good hope to the Chriſtians,that the caſtle would without any great loſſe be gained:for being neere vnto it,they perceiued it not to be ſo ſtrong as they had ſuppoſed. H

The Emperor hauing ſpent a few daies in conſultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the ſiege, reſolued without further delay with all his forces to aſſault the caſtle,perſuaded thereunto by many reaſons : firſt,by the cheerfulnes of his own ſoldiers, and the courage of his enemies ſore danted in the laſt skirmiſh,which he was loth they ſhould againe recouer by the comming of new ſupplies ; beſides that, hee was informed, that diuers companies of the Numidians were comming to Tunes, entertained by Barbaruſſa, whoſe ſtrength was like daily to encreaſe:but that which moued him moſt to haſten the matter,was, for that his men began to grow ſickly in his camp,being all the day time ſcortched as it were with the feruent heat of the Sun;and well neere ſtarued in the night with cold and exceeding dewes wherwith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water, I or freſh victuall by any means to be had in that ſandie and barren ſoile, for the reliefe of the ſicke,other than that was brought out of the fleet ; for all the water thereabout was moſt vnpleaſant and exceeding brackiſh,ſo that both ſicke and whole were glad when they could get a crab to quench their extreame thirſt :although the Emperor did what hee might to remedie theſe extremities, and much reliefe was in good time ſent both from Sicilia and Naples : the bisket alſo in the ſhips,eſpecially in the Spaniſh gallies,was growne hoarie and vnwholeſome. Wherefore he began to place his batterie about the 15 of Iuly, which was defended all alongſt with Gabions,and caske filled with ſand,for that the countrey ſoyle in that place yeelded neither earth nor turfe to do it. Auria appointed to batter the caſtle by ſea, diuided his gallies into three ſquadrons which orderly ſucceeding one another, ſhould by turnes K beat the ſame : his great ſhips rid at anker,and out of their forecaſtles thundered with their great ordnance. And Vaſtius at land had diuided the army into three battels;Spaniards,Italians,and Germans,euery ſtation by themſelues, in ſuch ſort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the aſſault,& of the glorie of the victory. There was neuer ſtrong place in the memorie of man(ſince guns,that fatal engine were firſt inuented for the deſtruction of mankind)aſſailed with greater force, greater preparation,or induſtrie. The great ordnance in maner of a great earthquake,ſo terribly roared & thundred,that the earth ſeemed not only to tremble & quake vnder mens feet,but euen by and by to rent in ſunder & ſwallow them vp:and the ſea which was euen now quiet and calme,began to riſe aloft,and to rage and fome as if it had bin in a great ſtorm : at which time the aire became thicke,and the skie dark- L ned with the ſmoke of the great artillerie:from the breake of the day vntil noon, the roaring cannon and culuering neuer ceaſed : ſo that the Vamures were beaten downe,the caſtle made ſaultable, & the wals ſo ſhaken, that in many places the Turks canoniers, together with their cannons lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceiued, they which were before appointed to giue the firſt aſſault,vpon ſignal giuen by the Emperor, preſently vpon the ceaſing of the great artillerie aſſailed the breach,& others with their ſcaling ladders ſcaled the wals: which was done with ſuch courage & reſolution, that the Turkes when they had done what they poſſibly could for the defence of the place,by caſting down darts, wild fire,& ſuch like things vpon the Chriſtians as they were climbing vp ; at length as men deſpairing longer to hold the place,& ouercome with a greater fortune,turned their backs and fled. Sinan & the reſt M of the captains by a wooden bridge,fled out at the further ſide of the caſtle,into the main,and ſo alongſt the left ſide of the lake by land to Tunes, not looking behind them for haſt: which way moſt part of his men followed him alſo. The reſt were either ſlain or driuen into the lake, where ſeeking to ſaue their liues by ſwimming,they were either ſlain in comming to land,by

A the Spaniſh horſemen, or elſe in their ſwimming ſhot at pleaſure by the harquebuſiers, ſo that all the lake was as it were couered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moores. The Emperor with ſmall ſhot thus gained the caſtle of Guletta, with all the warlike prouiſion therein, and with it all Barbaruſſa his great fleet and ſtrength at ſea, which he for the more ſafetie had before put into the lake: which as it was vnto the Emperour a thing moſt pleaſant, ſo was it vnto Barbaruſſa and his pyrats the greateſt griefe and loſſe poſſible, hauing at once loſt all their power at ſea, which but a little before was no ſmall terror to all the frontiers of the Chriſtian countries and Iſlands in the Mediterranian.

Barbaruſſa rageth.

Barbaruſſa troubled and terrified with ſo great a loſſe, with a ſterne and ſcorneſull countenance receiued the Iew and the reſt of the captains fled from Guletta, reuiling them bitterly B in his rage, and calling them faint hearted cowards, which had in ſo ſhort a time giuen ouer ſo ſtrong a place. Whereunto Sinan anſwered for them all, in this ſort:

The ſhort anſwer of Sinan the Iew vnto Barbaruſſa.

Hairadin (ſaid he) ſo long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knoweſt, and our enemies cannot denie, what well beſeemed vs and thy magnificent fortune. But when we are to withſtand the Diuell and his infernall furies, which came againſt vs with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of extreame terrour and danger; it ought not to ſeeme ſtrange vnto thee, if we ſought to eſcape the vncouth furie of the immortall enemies of mankinde, to do thee ſeruice in thy better fortune, in defence of this thy citie and kingdome. Neither do we account it any diſgrace to haue eſcaped that danger, as men that minde againe to fight: out of which thou, a moſt antient and expert Commander (if I may frankly ſpeake C vnto thee the truth) if thou hadſt been there preſent, wouldſt haue accounted it no diſhonor, but very good diſcretion to haue eſcaped in ſafetie.

Barbaruſſa repreſſing his furie, began in a more temperat manner to requeſt them euery one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to ſtand faſt vnto him in that war againſt their enemies the Chriſtians: telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great ſupplie of the Mooriſh footmen and Numidian horſemen were once come (which were now at hand) the enemy ſhould not long reioyce of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwith conuerted all his ſtudie and endeauour, to prepare ſuch things as were needfull for the war, bringing forth his treaſures, and bountifully beſtowing the ſame amongſt the Moors and Numidians, thereby to D confirme the friendſhip of ſuch as well affected him, and with his new bountie to winne the hearts of ſuch as yet ſtood doubtfull.

Muleaſſes commeth to the emperour.

In the mean time Muleaſſes the exiled king, with a ſmal retinue of his friends and followers came from the fartheſt part of Numidia, into the Emperors campe; the Emperor ſitting in a royall ſeat in the midſt of his pauilion, whereinto Muleaſſes was admitted, with a mytre vpon his head, in a garment of greene and blew changeable ſilke: he was of a tal and manly ſtature, of colour tawnie, but ſo ſquint-eyed, that he ſeemed ſpitefully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: whom after he had kiſſed the Emperors right hand, and had ſet himſelfe downe with his legs gathered cloſe vnder him, vpon a carpet ſpred vpon the bare ground, after the manner of his countrey, he by an interpreter ſpake vnto the Emperor as followeth:

The Oration of Muleaſſes vnto Charles the emperour.

Thou art come in armes into this countrey, and art now almoſt conquerour of the ſame, (thrice mightie Emperour) prouoked thereunto not by any deſert of mine, for that our different religion ſo required; yet as I verily thinke, not without the appointment of the moſt high God, whom both thou and I do with like deuotion worſhip, to take reuenge of the moſt perfidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortall enemie of mankind; whom I foreſee as good as alreadie vanquiſhed, now that Guletta is taken, and his Nauie ſurpriſed. So that I hope he ſhall in ſhort time by thy reuenging hand, at once receiue the iuſt guerdon of all his former villanies: which ſhall be ſo much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicitie and glorious victorie will redound in great part to me, being reſtored by thee into my F fathers kingdome: which I as a poore exiled Prince moſt humbly requeſt of thy juſtice and bountie. For it ſhall be vnto thee a thing moſt honourable and profitable, if thou ſhalt receiue into thy protection me, a king royally diſcended of a moſt antient progenie, ſtrengthned with the great allyance of the Numidians and Moores. Neither doe I refuſe either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my ſelfe vaſſal vnto thee the Chriſtian Emperor. Of which my fidelitie there can be no greater aſſurance, than the thankefull remembrance of ſo great a benefit receiued; which ſhall for euer remaine vnforgotten of me and my poſteritie, euen for that eſpecially, that I deteſt and abhorre the name of an vnthankefull man; and do well by experience finde, how much my ſtate may be confirmed, and the minds of my people to me aſſured, by thy garriſons ſo neere at hand in Sicilia and Sardinia.

The Emperours anſwer to Muleaſſes.

Whereunto the Emperor anſwered, That he was come ouer into Affricke to be reuenged of the iniuries which Barbaruſſa had many times done vpon the frontiers of his dominions, and to root out the pyrats, of all others moſt miſchieuous: which his good purpoſe had by the goodneſſe of Chriſt his Sauiour taken ſo good effect, that he doubted not in ſhort time by the taking of Tunes to obtaine a perfect victorie; which once gained, he would then kindely grant him all things which ſhould ſtand with the conuenience of his affaires, and the vſe of his victorie: ſo that he would not falſifie his faith, which he might iuſtly ſuſpect, if he repoſed not a ſpeciall truſt, that the remembrance of ſuch a benefit would for euer remaine in his heroical mind: & was further aſſured, that the ſame power which ſhould reſtore him his kingdome of curteſie, could alſo take it from him again, if his vnthankfulneſſe ſhould ſo deſerue.

The behauior of Muleaſſes.

Muleaſſes in the preſence of the Emperor vſed ſuch a grauitie and grace in his ſpeech & geſture, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten his former eſtate: but towards the Generall and the other great Captaines he vſed all manner of curteſie, ſo that he rid vp and down with them gallantly mounted, mannaging his horſe, and charging and diſcharging his launce with ſuch agilitie and skil, as ſhewed him to be a verie good horſeman, and of great actiuitie. At other vacant times he would ſubtilly reaſon with learned men, after the manner of Auerrois, of the nature of things, of the motion of heauen, and power of the ſtarres. By the Emperours commandement he had a Tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his dyet. Vaſtius and the reſt of the chiefe Commanders of the armie vſed him with all honour, and at ſuch time as he was deſirous to ſee the campe, curteouſly brought him into all places of it, that he might himſelfe ſee what mounts they had in ſhort time caſt, what aboundance there was of great artillerie, what ſtrong watch and ward was kept, what a number there was of braue and warrelike ſoldiers of diuers nations, differing much one from another in language, countenance, and manner of furniture: and further demanded, Whether that puiſſant armie which the Emperour had brought ouer to his great good, were in his iudgement ſufficient to ſubdue the enemie? Where aboue all things Muleaſſes wondered at the number and order of the great ordnance: and next vnto that, at the wonderfull plentie of things to be bought and ſould in the market place, and at the modeſt quietneſſe of the ſouldiers in buying the ſame.

His opinion and counſell concerning the preſent warre.

Not long after, the expert Captains by diligent enquirie learned of him many things wel ſeruing for their better proceeding in that war, eſpecially of the diſpoſition and ſtrength of them of Tunes, of the ſcituation of the citie, of the nature of the walls, and fortification of the Caſtle, of the Wels and Ciſternes in the ſuburbes, and what ſtrength the Moores and Numidians were of, which Barbaruſſa had entertained. In concluſion, he aſſured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbaruſſa would neuer truſt to the ſtrength of the wals, which would eaſily be ouerthrowne with the great artillerie; but would in a great brauerie with enſignes diſplayed bring all his forces into the field, of purpoſe to terrifie the Chriſtians with the ſight of the multitude of his raſcal ſouldiers, and to breake their array with his Numidian horſemen, who with hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that nation, would not faile to aſſaile them: and yet for all that would neuer bring into the battel his Turkiſh footmen (in whom he repoſed his greateſt confidence, and whom he deſired moſt to ſpare) but would as a craftie and ſubtill Turke, by oppoſing of the Moores, whom he held in ſmal regard, trie by their bloud what might be done without the danger of his own men. But as he told them, nothing could be more ſtrange vnto the Moores his countreymen, or that they were more affraid of, than in a ſet battell to fight with that enemie whoſe ſquadrons comming orderly on in gliſtring armor with long pikes, might ſcorne and eaſily ouerthrow the naked archers of the Moores, and the vnarmed Numidian horſmen: and that our men ſhould find nothing more grieuous or troubleſome, than the ſcortching heat of the Sun, and the thirſt riſing thereof; which might eaſily be remedied by plenty of water, which by ſlaues and ſmal boats might eaſily be brought in casks and bottles from the fleet alongſt the lake, and ſo diſtributed amongſt the armie: although not far from the walls of the citie were certaine old conduit heads which would yeeld them great plentie of water, if the malicious enemie did not to his owne hurt and others, poyſon

A the ſame. Theſe things orderly reported to the Emperour, confirmed the hope he had before conceiued of the deſired victorie: ſo that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecaſting all things, he reſolued forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to beſiege Tunes.

But whileſt he was preparing things neceſſarie, ordering his ſouldiers, and diſcouering the enemies purpoſes, his ſouldiers had dayly diuers skirmiſhes with the Numidians; ſo that once the skirmiſh was like to haue come to a iuſt battel: which began in this ſort; The Moors had planted certain field-pieces amongſt the Oliue gardens, wherewith they ſhot continually into the campe: for remouing whereof, the Emperor leauing the Italians, with certain companies of the old Germane and Spaniſh ſoldiers, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went B forth with his horſemen and the reſt of his armie: ſending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spaniſh horſemen, who for moſt part were but raw ſouldiers, ſuch as were of the Noblemens ordinarie ſeruants and followers, not before acquainted with the warres. Theſe light horſemen with diuers fortune skirmiſhed a while with the enemy; but when they ſaw themſelues to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grieuouſly wounded, they turned their backs, and in the ſight of the Emperour ſhamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to giue at the firſt a fierce and deſperat charge, and vpon the incounter giuen, of purpoſe to retyre, auoiding thereby the ſudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe vpon them with a freſh charge. The Emperour ſeeing the flight of his light horſemen, came on couragiouſly with his men at C arms; by whoſe comming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moores were put to flight, and the field pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the campe, taken. In this skirmiſh the Emperour in perſon, as he ſtood formoſt in his armed troups, gaue the ſigne of battel himſelfe, by crying with a loud voice, Saint Iames, Saint Iames, whom the Spaniards take for their Patron; and ſo charging the enemie, performed the part not only of a couragious Chieftaine, but of a reſolute and valiant ſouldier alſo; reſcuing with his owne hand Andreas Pontius a noble gentleman of Granado, whom vnhorſed and ſore wounded, the enemie was readie preſently to haue ſlaine, had not the Emperor by his comming in ſaued him: deſeruing thereby the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name of Ciuica Corona, gaue as an honour to ſuch as had in battell ſaued a citiſen.

The Spaniſh light horſemen put to flight.

The Emperour reſtoreth the battell, & with his owne hand reſcueth Andreas Pontius of Granado.

D About the ſame time it fortuned, that thirtie thouſand Moores came vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed a little tower ſtanding vpon a hil neere vnto the ruines of old Carthage: wherin the Emperor had placed certaine ſoldiers for the keeping thereof, becauſe it was neere vnto his campe. Before theſe Moores went a Numidian Prieſt, who bellowing out certain ſuperſtitious charmes, caſt diuers ſcrols of paper on each ſide the way, wherein he curſed and banned the Chriſtians: and now they had with fire and ſmoake brought the Chriſtians in that tower to great extremitie, when the Emperour himſelfe comming to their reſcue with certaine companies of horſemen and footmen, ſlew the coniuring Prieſt, with others, and put the reſt to flight. The diſcomfiture of the Spaniſh horſemen cauſed many men to thinke, that if the Emperor ſhould come to a ſet battell with the enemie, he ſhould finde his horſemen too E weake, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cauſe, and diuers others, certain of the Emperors graue counſellors, but none of the beſt ſoldiers, wiſhed him not to proceed further in that dangerous war, but with ſpeed to returne out of Affricke, for as much as he had woon honour enough by the taking of Guletta, and the ſurpriſing of the enemies fleet: whereby he had to his immortall praiſe, and the common good of Chriſtendome, deliuered all the frontiers of the Chriſtian countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and feare of thoſe moſt cruell pyrats: beſides that, the flixe began to rage in his campe, whereof many of his ſoldiers fell ſicke and died daily. Whereas on the contrarie part, the mightie Numidian Princes, ſuch as were Muleaſſes old enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbaruſſa. Theſe vnſeaſonable ſpeeches the EmpeF rour thought good to repreſſe betime; reaſoning againſt the authors thereof with great grauitie, as againſt men who with more feare doubted of the ſucceſſe of things, and the euent of the victorie, than beſeemed them, whom for their conſtant reſolution, and good opinion conceiued of their diſcretion, he had choſen to be of his moſt ſecret counſell.

The Emperour aduiſed by his Counſellours to returne home.

ſhould ſhew themſelues more carefull of his perſon than of his honour : for as much as thoſe things which they now alledged, ſhould haue been ſaid before the war was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended; before he euer paſſed ouer into Affricke. For he might (as he ſaid) haue reſted quietly in Spaine, and haue eaſily neglected and reiected the iniuries done vpon the ſea coaſts, and the complaints of his ſubiects; but he was (as they well knew) for moſt vrgent cauſes come thither : whereas he was reſolued to ſatisfie the expectation of the world with a notable victorie; or if God ſhould otherwiſe appoint, there to end his dayes with honour. Wherefore he willed them to ceaſe further to flatter him that was no way diſmaid, or to poſſeſſe the minds of his valiant ſouldiers with a vaine foreboding feare, and with reſolute mindes, together with him their chiefetaine, againſt the next day to expect what the fortune of the field ſhould appoint for the full accompliſhment of that war. For he was (as he ſaid) ſet downe to giue the enemie battell; or if he refuſed the ſame, to batter the walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would ſtand on his ſide in ſo good and ſo godly a quarrell.

The Emperor marcheth toward Tunes.

The Emperour leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the caſtle of Guletta, commanded the breaches to be repaired, and the great ordnance there taken to be laid vpon carriages, which before after the old rude ſea faſhion lay bound in great vnweldie pieces of timber, with yron rings faſtned thereunto, and could not handſomely be handled or remooued to or fro. After that, when he had cauſed the countrey to be well viewed all about, which betwixt the Oliue groues and the right ſide of the lake giueth a direct paſſage vnto the citie of Tunes; he ſet forward with his armie in ſo good order, that he ſtill marched as readie to fight, for feare of the policies and ſudden aſſaults of the enemie. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the lake; on the right hand the Spaniards neere vnto the Oliue groues, which in the manner of a great wood ran all alongſt the countrie, from the ruines of Carthage, almoſt to the wals of Tunes : in the midſt betwixt both marched the Germans; next vnto them followed the great ordnance; and after it, the carriages of all the armie. In the vauntgard was Vaſtius, whom the Emperour had made Generall of the armie, and eſpecially for that day : in the rereward was the Duke of Alba with certaine troups of choſen horſemen : in the middle of the main battel was the Emperor, and by his ſide Lewis his brother in law the king of Portingals brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salerne, the Spaniards by Alarco an antient captaine, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberſtein. But the Emperor in his armor ceaſed not to ride from ſquadron to ſquadron, with cheerefull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto them the former victories which they had gotten for him : and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a moſt honourable dayes ſeruice, foraſmuch as they were to fight againſt the naked enemies of the Chriſtian religion : wherefore they ſhould with reſolute minds ſet down themſelues to endure the weight of their armor, the painfulneſſe of the march, the heat of the Sun and ſand, and the tediouſneſſe of the thirſt ariſing thereof; vntill they might ioyne battell with their enemies, where they ſhould vndoubtedly by the goodnes of God (in whoſe quarrel they fought) obtaine the victorie : in the meane time they ſhould with patience ouercome all difficulties, comforting themſelues with the vndoubted hope of a moſt rich prey, which they were to expect of the ſpoile of a rich citie. Whereunto euery ſquadron anſwered with a great ſhout, that he ſhould not trouble himſelfe with thoſe matters which hee had before rehearſed, but to aſſure himſelfe, that they his ſouldiers would moſt patiently endure all extremities, and not deceiue the expectation he had conceiued of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him Emperor, not of Affricke but of Aſia alſo.

Now Vaſtius had withdrawn two companies of harquebuſiers out of the Spaniſh ſquadron, to skirmiſh with the Moores who continually followed in the taile of the armie : whome, by thoſe harquebuſiers and certaine troups of horſemen deputed to that purpoſe, the duke of Alba notably repulſed in the rereward.

The ſoldiers for greedines of water diſordered their march.

The armie was now come vnto the Ciſternes of freſh water, which Muleaſſes and others which well knew the country, had before told them of; which as ſoon as the ſoldiers almoſt fainting vnder the weight of their armor, with the ſcortching heat of the Sun, & extremity of thirſt, deſcried afar off; they for deſire they had to quench their thirſt, forthwith forſook their colours, & diſorderly ran as faſt as they could to thoſe ciſternes : Vaſtius the Generall, to the vttermoſt of his power laboring in vaine both by faire means and foule to haue ſtayed them; who ſaw by that diſordrednes of the ſoldiers, a great aduantage offred vnto the enemie, which then

A then was not far off. But when the Generall could neither with words or blows preuaile any thing with them, the Emperour himſelfe was glad to haſte thither, with his preſence and authoritie to haue kept them in order: yet ſuch was the force of their intollerable thirſt, that neither the ſight of the Emperour, nor all that he could do, could remedie the diſorder; ſome fainting in the ſand for lacke of drinke, and ſome other for greedineſſe readie to burſt their bellies at the fountains; ſo that the Emperor was faine with his truncheon to beat them away.
Amongſt the reſt, one Sullius Cicero of Arpinas, a famous captain, died at the ciſterne ſide with drinking too much. This extremitie for want of water ſeemed iuſtly to haue happened vnto them, foraſmuch as Vaſtius the day before had by generall proclamation thorow the campe, commanded that euery ſoldier ſhould carrie with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle: B although he cauſed ſo much water as he conueniently could, to be carried in great caskes for the common reliefe of the armie, whereof the Germanes had the greateſt part; ſome almoſt readie to giue ouer for thirſt, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellows which had it, for two duckets.

A draught of water ſold for two duckets.

This diſorder being with as much ſpeed as was poſſible reformed, and the Armie againe brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the enemie: for Barbaruſſa with a wonderfull multitude of horſemen and footmen, and a number of enſignes (the inſtruments of vaine feare and fooliſh brauerie) gallantly diſplaied after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the citie, and with certaine field pieces (as Muleaſſes had foretold) went about to haue broken the battell of the Chriſtians: which Pieces although they were oftentimes C diſcharged, yet did they little or no harme by reaſon of the vnskilfulneſſe of the Canoniers.
Vaſtius in like manner, and for like purpoſe had commanded the great ordnance to be brought into the front of the battell: but perceiuing what time and toile it required to haue it done (for that it was drawne but by ſtrength of men, and the wheels of the carriages ſunk deep in the deuouring ſand, and the ſhot and pouder which the Mariners and gally ſlaues carried altogether vpon their ſhoulders, came but ſoftly on) he ſuddenly changed his purpoſe, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not beſt to ſtay for the great artillerie in that cheerfulneſſe of his armie when euery man deſired battell, but to commit all to the valour of his reſolute men, and his own good fortune, which euer fauored his noble attempts: leſt whilſt we ſtay (ſaid he) too long vpon our great ordnance (which doth not alwayes ſerue to great purpoſe in ſudden D battels) our enemies gather courage in the time of this our vnneceſſarie delay; and this exceeding cheerfulnes of our ſoldiers (the moſt ſure token of vndoubted victorie) by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the Emperor, deſirous of battell, and filled with good hope, ioyfully anſwered; Vaſtius, if thou ſo think it good (which I alſo like wel of) in Gods name giue the ſignall. That ſhal I by & by do (ſaid he) but firſt it is reaſon that you which ſway and command a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and ſhame, you, laying aſide the imperiall maieſtie of your ſelfe, haue for this day made Generall and commander of ſo mightie an armie: wherefore (ſaid Vaſtius) I wil now vſe my authority, and command you, ſith I may not ſo requeſt you, to depart from this place, and to get you into E the midſt of the battell neere vnto the enſignes, leſt by ſome vnluckie ſhot, the whole eſtate of the armie be brought into extream perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Emperor ſmiling, willed him to feare no ſuch thing; ſaying moreouer, That neuer Emperour was yet ſlain with a gun. For all that, he departed out of the place as he was commanded, & went into the middle of the battell. Whereupon the ſignal of battel was by the ſound of the trumpet, and ſtriking vp of the drum, preſently giuen, and the enemie (with more haſte than the extream heat of the day required) furiouſly charged by the Emperors horſemen, who to auoid the danger of the great artillerie, made all the haſt they could to come to handie blows. In the formoſt of theſe horſmen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a moſt valiant nobleman, who then ſerued the emperor without charge: he being ſomwhat before the reſt, at the firſt onſet flew with his lance a great captain of the Moors, & preſently with his ſword ſo troubled them that were F next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to break into the enemies battel. The harquebuſiers alſo diſcharged ſo faſt vpon the enemie, that 300 of them lay dead vpon the ground before the ioyning of the battell: which the reſt of the footmen ſeeing, forſooke their great ordnance, and fled backe to Barbaruſſa. Who long endured not the force or ſight of the Chriſtians; but grinding his teeth for ſorrow and griefe of mind, turned his horſe, and with his Turks retyred into Tunes. For now that his deſignes had in the beginning taken ſo euill ſucceſſe, he thought it not beſt to aduenture all in one battell; knowing right wel, that the emperours armie could not long endure the inconueniences of the intollerable heat, and want of many things, eſpecially of freſh water: which fed him with hope, that he ſhould out of theſe his enemies diſtreſſes picke ſome fit occaſion of aduantage, if he could but a while defend the citie of Tunes. The Numidians and Moores, who in great troups and companies had alwaies houered about the Emperors armie, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themſelues into the ſuburbes, gardens, and other places neere vnto the citie. G

The Emperor glad of the flight of his enemies, which were thought to haue bin in number 100000, incamped with his armie that night in the ſame place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the walls of Tunes. In the meane time Barbaruſſa, ſurpriſed with an exceeding feare, and diſtracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himſelfe, had in his mind purpoſed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman crueltie; which was, at once to haue killed all the Chriſtian captiues in the caſtle of Tunes: fully reſolued to put the ſame in execution, had not Sinan the Iew diſſuaded him from that moſt execrable fact; proteſting ſuch a practiſe to be vnſeemly for a man of his valor, famous for his many victories, and carrying with him the maieſtie of a king: whereas he would ſhortly after wonderfully repent him for doing ſo ſhamefull a fact: the doing whereof, What was it elſe (as the Iew ſayd) but a manifeſt demonſtration of his extreame feare and deſperation? which two things were moſt dangerous to him, that was to maintaine ſo doubtfull a war, and would much deface the glorie of his former life: wherefore he ſhould do well to beware, that by the fame of ſuch a moſt horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heauie diſpleaſure againſt him: who deuoid of all human crueltie, had vſed both to deteſt and reuenge ſuch outrages. Wherfore he ſhould ſuffer the Chriſtian captiues to liue bound in their fatall chaines, ſo long as it were their fortunes; who being well kept, and vnarmed, might ſhortly after ſerue him to good purpoſe, and could no way without moſt certain danger moue themſelues, if they ſhould vnaduiſedly luſt after their vnluckie libertie: for by them, the expected victorie could neither be giuen to the enemie, nor taken from him, or yet ſo much as hindered. At which ſpeech the tyrant was aſhamed, and ſo ſparing the liues of the poore wretches, went out of the Caſtle, into the greateſt church of Tunes, whither he had cauſed to be aſſembled all the chiefe men of the citie, to tel them what he would haue done for the defence of the citie, and now by perſuaſion to encourage them to fight: from whom, as men by him holden in diſtruſt, he had but a little before the comming of the Chriſtians, taken all manner of armor and weapons. H I K

Barbaruſſa in mind to kil all the Chriſtian captiues, is diſſuaded by Sinan the Iew.

Whileſt Barbaruſſa was thus buſied, the moſt ioyfull and happie day appeared to thoſe miſerable captiues, by fortunes change no leſſe blacke and diſmall to the Turks and Moores. For that hainous purpoſe of the cruell tyrant could not long be couered or kept ſecret: ſo that a conſtant report of a danger ſo imminent, was run thorow the whole caſtle, euen into deep dungeons; by the compaſſion of certaine manumiſed ſlaues, who deteſting the ſauage crueltie of Barbaruſſa their maſter, and touched with deuotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Chriſtian religion; incouraging by ſecret ſpeeches the chiefe of the captiues with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their libertie. Amongſt theſe well minded men was one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbaruſſa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, hauing him alwayes in great eſteem by the name of Memis, and another called Vincentius Caterus of Dalmatia an eunuch. Theſe two aduenturing a moſt memorable and godly attempt, ſet open the priſon doores, and gaue inſtruments vnto the poore priſoners, readie to take the occaſion offered; who boldly ſtarting vp, brake off their chains and gyues, and ſo by the great goodnes and mercie of God, about 6000 poore naked Chriſtians, armed with that came firſt in hand, but eſpecially with ſtones, brake forth ſuddenly vpon the Turks that were in the caſtle. Ramadan a renegate Spaniard captain of the caſtle, ſtirred vp with the vnexpected and terrible noiſe of ſo many priſoners breaking their yrons, with a few ſoldiers whom he had ſuddenly called vnto him, ran to the caſtle gate, where one of the priſoners (a luſtie yong man of Sicilia) had with one of the bars of the gate ſtrucke downe one or two of the Warders, and hauing bolted the gate, was become maſter thereof; him Ramadus ſlew, and opening the gate, made way for himſelfe and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbaruſſa, to carrie him the newes of that his hard miſchance. But the Chriſtians now looſed from their bands, and hauing L M

The Chriſtian captiues breake priſon, & driue the Turkes out of the caſtle of Tunes.

ſuddenly ſlaine diuers of the Turkes, poſſeſſed themſelues of all the caſtle, brake open the armorie, and ſo ſeizing vpon the kings treaſure, armor, & prouiſion, from a hie turret gaue ſignes of victorie to the Chriſtian army by ſmoke & falſe fires made with gunpowder; and laſtly by diſplaying of Sarmentus his enſigne, which (as we haue before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the trenches at the ſiege of Guletta. Theſe ſignes although the Chriſtians in the army could not well perceiue, as being too far off; yet by the fugitiues which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperour and Muleaſſes, they were both perſuaded, that ſome great tumult was riſen amongſt the enemies. Wherefore the Emperor ſent two of his captains with their companies, who going as neere as they could to the citie and the caſtle, ſhould diſcouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbaruſſa almoſt mad for anger, in his furie blaſpheming his vain gods, and bitterly curſing and banning the Iew, for diſſuading him from killing the captiues, came to the caſtle gate, with tears ſtanding in his eys pittifully requeſting the late Chriſtian captiues (which then ſtood vpon the top of the wals & the gate, with weapons in their hands) that they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promiſing them their libertie, with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and preſent fortune, and moued with iuſt hatred, caſt ſtones at him, and with many opprobrious words reiected his requeſt: ſo that he inraged with ſorrow and madneſſe, ſhot at them with his owne hand, and ſeeing all paſt remedie, and the citie not poſſible now to be kept, ſhamefully betooke himſelſe to flight. After him followed the Turkes, in number ſeuen thouſand, with purpoſe to flie to the citie Hippona, now called Bona, famous with the Biſhopricke of that reuerend Father and great Diuine Auguſtine. For there (as in a moſt ſure harbour) had Barbaruſſa left foureteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the citie, to ſerue his turne whatſoeuer miſchance ſhould happen: but the tacklings, ſailes, oares, and ordnance, hee had laid vp in the caſtle faſt by, which was kept with a garriſon of his owne.

Tunes yeelded to the Emperor.

The Emperour vnderſtanding that Barbaruſſa with his Turks was fled, came with all his armie vnto the gates of Tunes, where the magiſtrates of the citie were ready to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, & to deliuer him the keies of the citie; only requeſting of him, that he would keep his ſoldiers incamped without the citie, and not to ſeeke the vtter ſpoile and ruin thereof: promiſing, that the ſouldiers ſhould want nothing that was there to be had. Muleaſſes alſo carefull of the ſafetie thereof, earneſtly intreated the Emperor in the citiſens behalfe. But he, although he was of his own honorable diſpoſition ready enough to haue granted what they requeſted, yet for that he did, not without cauſe, doubt of the Moores fidelitie, and that the paiment of the mony which they of Tunes had by Muleaſſes promiſed for the paiment of the ſoldiers wages, was by them craftily delaied, expecting ſtill the vttermoſt deuoire of Barbaruſſa, he could not by any means be perſuaded to promiſe them any certaintie of their ſafetie: moued alſo ſo to do by the diſcontented ſpeeches of his ſoldiers, who ſpared not to ſay, That they ſhould be hardly and vnkindly dealt withall, if after ſo long trauell and ſo much paines taken both by ſea and land, they ſhould be defrauded of the reward of the victory, ſith nothing but only the hope of the preſent ſpoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miſerable, hauing ſcarce clothes to couer their nakedneſſe, and their bodies ſpent with long labour and thirſt; ſo that the Moores of Tunes, enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and the perpetuall receiuers of moſt horrible pyrats, might worthily reioice of the Chriſtian victorie; & the conquerors themſelues for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miſeries. Whileſt the Emperor ſtood thus in doubt what to reſolue vpon, Vaſtius with a ſmall companie came to the caſtle gate, & was with wonderfull ioy receiued by the Chriſtian captiues. But as he was viewing the wealth & prouiſion laid vp in the caſtle, a Ligurian captiue diſcouered vnto him where certain treaſure lay hid: for Barbaruſſa had there caſt into a well 30000 duckats ſowed vp in bags, which Vaſtius getting eaſily out, obtain'd them of the Emperor of gift, as he whoſe good ſeruice had wel deſerued them. The caſtle thus won by a moſt rare chance, & the captiues taking the ſpoile therof, the ſoldiers could no longer be ſtaied, but that they entred into the city by heaps, running after the ſpoile into euery part therof; the citiſens fearing no ſuch matter, and calling in vain vpon the faith of Muleaſſes: the old ſoldiers at the firſt entrance ſlew many. The Spaniards and the Italians ſought moſt after the ſpoile; but the Germans deſiring more to glut themſelues with the Mahometan bloud, fill'd all places with dead bodies, without regard of ſex or age; ſo that the prophane temples of their vain prophet, ſwam with the bloud of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued vntill ſuch time as the empe- G ror mooued with the pittifull requeſt of Muleaſſes, cauſed proclamation to be made, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death hurt any citiſen, or take any priſoners: yet for all that, it could not otherwiſe be, but that many young men and women were by the mariners (which were come to the ſpoile of the citie) carried away to the fleet.

Muleaſſes for a little mony redeemed diuers which he knew, out of the hands of ſuch as had them priſoners: amongſt others, one of his wiues, whom he ſometime held deareſt, was ranſomed for two duckats. The Emperour entering into the caſtle, commended the captiues, who were the occaſion of that ſpeedie victorie: and giuing to euery one of them money, ſet them at libertie, promiſing vnto them ſhipping and prouiſion to bring them home euery man into his owne country. Vnto the two manumiſed ſeruants of Barbaruſſa, which were the authours H of breaking the priſon, he gaue mony and apparell, & afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbaruſſa his purpoſes, and ſecret diſpoſition. In the ſpoile of the caſtle, Muleaſſes lamented the loſſe of three things eſpecially: firſt, the antient Arabian bookes containing the interpretation of the Mahometane law, and the acts of the kings his predeceſſours, the loſſe whereof, Muleaſſes (in the hearing of P. Iouius, out of whom this hiſtorie is taken) ſaid (as he reporteth) that he would moſt gladly, if it had bin poſſible, haue redeemed with the price of a city: then the precious ointments and perfumes, with the wonderfull ſtore of ambergrize, muske, and ciuet, worth much gold: all which, Barbaruſſa as a rude and rough man had made no reckoning of. And laſt of all, the rare and rich colours for painting, which lying by heapes, were by the ignorant ſouldiers, ſeeking for that might yeeld them preſent money, fooliſhly I neglected & troden vnderfoot, ſeruing no man to good. In this caſtle were found diuers headpieces and other armor of the Chriſtians, namely of the French, who with Lewis their king, had about three hundred yeares before beſieged that Caſtle: which armour had been vntill that time there kept by the Moores in remembrance of that victorie againſt the Chriſtians.

Three things eſpecially lamẽted by Muleaſſes in the ſpoile of the caſtle of Tunes.

Barbaruſſa in the meane time was come to the riuer of Bagrada, which the Moores call Malordech, which he eaſily paſſed ouer, though he was purſued by certain Numidian horſmen, whom Muleaſſes had raiſed of his old friends, and of the followers of his vncle Dorax, & ſent them to purſue the Turks: but Barbaruſſa ſo marched with his harquebuſiers & archers placed in the rereward, that the Numidian horſemen durſt not come neere him, and ſo in ſafety came to Hippona, as he had before purpoſed. Yet in paſſing the riuer Bagrada, he loſt Haydin of Smirna, that famous pirat: who being a fat man, and wearied with the heat of the Sunne K and painefulneſſe of the iourny, dranke ſo much, that he died preſently vpon the banke of the riuer. When Barbaruſſa was come to Hippona, he reſted his men two daies: then calling them together againe, he comforted them with good words, perſuading them, that whatſoeuer miſchance had hapned, they ſhould impute it not to the valor of the enemie, but to the trecherie of the ſlaues: exhorting them, as valiant men patiently to indure that frowne of Fortune, and by ſome notable exploit to win againe her fauor: for hee was againe determined to put to ſea with the fleet he had, and to go preſently from thence to Algiers, where after he had with new ſupplies increaſed his power, and augmented his fleet, and better aduiſed himſelfe, he would take an attempt in hand anſwerable to their deſires, and not vnbeſeeming his owne credit and L eſtimation. It is reported, that neuer vanquiſhed and beaten captaine was with a more cheerful acclamation anſwered by his ſouldiers, than he was at that preſent; they all with one conſent moſt willingly requeſting him to command whatſoeuer pleaſed him, which they would neuer refuſe to vndertake, were it neuer ſo heauie or dangerous, ſo that they might bee brought to ſome notable exploit. Barbaruſſa vſing this exceeding cheerfulneſſe and forwardneſſe of his ſouldiers, did with wonderfull celeritie weigh vp the 14 gallies which he had ſunke in the lake, & forthwith rigged them vp, & furniſhed them for all aſſaies: and vpon the very brinke of the lake caſt vp a mount of earth, whereon he placed certain pieces of artillerie for defence of the harbour, not vainly coniecturing, that the Chriſtian fleet would in ſhort time come thither to impeach his going out: pointing therin as it were at the purpoſe of the Emperor and M Auria his admirall, who were of opinion, that by ſending part of the fleet thither, thoſe gallies might be drown'd in the harbor with the great ordnance, before they could be rigged & made readie. Vnto this piece of ſeruice Auria appointed one Adam, a captain of Genoa, a man of no great skill in matters at ſea, but yet of great wealth and credit, & the Admirals nigh kinſman:

Barbaruſſa flieth to Hippona, and there comforteth his ſouldiers.

Auria ſendeth certaine gallies to intercept Barbaruſſa.

he

A he with certaine galliots and foureteene gallies, ſet forward towards Hippona, promiſing vnto himſelfe a moſt certain and eaſie victorie, hoping to purchaſe vnto himſelfe great honor of the vnprouided enemy : for that he thought to haue taken Barbaruſſa buſie in ſetting forth of his fleet. But after he was paſt Biſerta, & come neere to Hippona, he was certainly aduertiſed, that Barbaruſſa had with incredible celeritie rigged vp his gallies, & fortified the harbor, by planting great ordnance vpon the mount he had there raiſed. With which newes he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpoſe, perſuaded by the other captains of the gallies, in no caſe to aduenture to fight with him, becauſe the Spaniſh, Sicilian, and Neapolitan gallies were but weakly manned, many of the ſouldiers being for greedineſſe of the ſpoile gone aſhore without leaue at Tunes : ſo that he ſhould at great diſaduantage fight with the Turks, being mo in B number and deſperatly bent. Wherefore he vpon good aduiſe preſently changed his former courſe, and returned to the fleet for more aid. Barbaruſſa (as it was afterwards knowne) ſtood a good while in doubt, whether he ſhould in hope of victoie purſue thoſe gallies, foraſmuch as they were in number no more than his owne, or elſe to perſiſt in his former purpoſe of going to Algiers. Vnto which opinion al the vnder captains inclined, being altogether ignorant of the weakneſſe of the Chriſtians : and ſo letting ſlip a faire occaſion, leauing a ſmall garriſon of Turks in the caſtle, he departed from Hippona & ſailed alongſt the coaſt to Algiers. When Adam was returned agnine to the fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Chriſtian princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of ſome who were hardly to be comman-C ded, and by the vnrulineſſe of others who without leaue were gone aſhore, ſo faire an occaſion of the diſired victorie, was neglected. For this thing onely wanted vnto the Emperors rare felicitie in that war : for if thoſe few gallies had been taken from the cruell enemie, or ſunke in the ſea, there had been no means for him to haue eſcaped ; being verily thought, that the Nu-midians in number infinit, and deadly enemies vnto the Turkes, would with often skirmiſhes out of their knowne places of aduantage, haue ſo cut him off in his long and painfull trauell by land, that they would altogether haue made an end both of him and his followers before hee could haue come to Algiers. Auria angrie both with himſelfe and thoſe whom he had put in truſt, and yet not out of hope to ouertake his enemie; with his owne gallies and ſome other of the beſt ſhips went to Hippona : but finding Barbaruſſa gone, he tooke the city and ouerthrew D the wals thereof : but in the caſtle which he by force tooke from the Turks, he placed Al-uarius Gometius with a ſufficient garriſon, and ſo returned vnto the Emperor. This Gometius, although he was a moſt valiant captain, yet became ſo infamous for his auaritious dealing both with the enemie and his friends, that for feare how to anſwer ſuch things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous executioner of himſelfe. The caſtle was afterwards by the commandement of the Emperor, raſed downe to the ground, for that it was not without a maruellous charge to be kept. After that, a counſell was holden concerning Muleaſ-ſes, whom the Emperor placed againe in the kingdome of Tunes, there to raigne as his anceſtors had don before him; paying him yearly by the name of a tribute, two Faulcons, and two Numidian courſers: with condition, that he ſhould for euer honour the Emperour, and be a E friend vnto all Chriſtians, and an vtter enemie vnto the Turks. Beſides that, That he ſhould from time to time defray the charges of a thouſand Spaniards and more, to be left in garriſon in the caſtle of Guletta ; by holding whereof, the Emperour kept as it were the keies of that kingdome at his girdle. The Emperor hauing thus honourably driuen Barbaruſſa & the Turks pyrats out of Tunes, taken from them their gallies, deliuered the Chriſtian countries (all along the ſea coaſt into the Mediterranean) of a great feare, and reſtored Muleaſſes againe to his kingdome, ſailed into Sicilia, where he was in great triumph receiued at Panormus and Meſſana, from whence he paſſed ouer to Rhegium in Italie, and from thence by land to Naples. Thus was the kingdome of Tunes taken by Barbaruſſa and the Turks; and by Charles the Emperour recouered againe out of their hands the ſelfe-ſame time that Solyman was in perſon himſelfe F in wars againſt the Perſian: whom Barbaruſſa accompanied with Sinan the Iew, after this ouer-throw met at Iconium in his returne out of Perſia, well accepting of their excuſe, as is before declared.

Solyman as well of his own ambitious diſpoſition, as following the manner of the Othoman kings, deſirous by all meanes to increaſe the glory of his name, and to inlarge his empire, determined with himſelf to take away from the Portingals all their trafick into the Eaſt Indies.

It grieued him to heare, that the Chriſtian religion ſhould begin to take root amongſt thoſe Pagan kings, which had not long before receiued the Mahometan religion: Beſides that, hee was credibly informed, that the Portingals in theſe late wars he had againſt the Perſians, had aided them with certain harquebuſiers, and alſo had ſent them workemen to ſhew them both the making and vſe of great artillerie. But that which moued him moſt of all, was for that the Portingals by their traffique into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandiſe into the gulfe of Arabia, whereby the riches of the Eaſt were woont to be tranſported vnto Caire, and ſo to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian merchants and others diſperſed into all parts of Europe: but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portingall, and from thence conuaied into all parts of Chriſtendome, to the great hindrance of his tributes and cuſtoms of Ægypt. For theſe cauſes, & at the inſtance of Solyman Baſſa an eunuch, borne in Epirus, and then Gouernour of Ægypt; Solyman cauſed wonderfull preparation to be made, for the building of a great fleet in the red ſea, to goe againſt the Portingals. All the timber whereof was cut downe in the mountaines of Cilicia, and ſhipped in the bay of Attalia in the bottome of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by ſea tranſported to Peluſium, and ſo vp the riuer of Nilus to Caire; where after it was framed and readie to be ſet together, it was with infinit labour, and no leſſe charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hoat and ſandie country, from Caire to Suetia, a port of the Red ſea, called in antient time Arſinoe. From which place eightie miles diſtant from Caire, the antient kings of Ægypt, ſeeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eterniſe the memorie of themſelues, had with incredible charge cut thorow al that main land; ſo that veſſels of good burthen might come vp the ſame from Arſinoe to Caire: which great cut or ditch, Seſoſtris the rich king of Ægypt, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purpoſed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and thereby to haue let the Red ſea into the Mediterranean, for the readier tranſportation of the Indian merchandiſe to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad worke, Seſoſtris preuented by death could not performe: and Ptolomeus otherwiſe perſuaded by skilfull men, in time gaue ouer; for feare leſt by lettting in the great South Sea into the Mediterranean, he ſhould thereby as it were with another generall deluge haue drowned the greateſt part of Græcia, & many other goodly countries in Aſia, and with exceeding charge, in ſtead of honor, haue purchaſed himſelfe eternall infamie. Yet by the ſingular induſtrie of Solyman the Eunuch, who with ſeuere commandement inforced all the people of the countries thereabouts to the furtherance of the building of that fleet; hee had with wonderfull celeritie in ſhort time new built eightie tall ſhips and gallies at Arſinoe, and furniſhed them with men, and all things elſe needfull for ſo long a voyage. At which time, hee vpon a quarrell pickt without cauſe, but not without the good liking of Solyman, moſt iniuriouſly confiſcated the goods of the Venetian merchants at Alexandria and Caire, and thruſt the mariners into his gallies as ſlaues. With which fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Baſſa, accompanied with Aſſan-Beg, commonly called the Moore of Alexandria, a moſt famous pyrat and an excellent ſea-man, ſet forward againſt the Portingals: and ſailing thorow the Red ſea, and ſo Eaſtward by the gulfe of Perſia, came at length as far as the great riuer Indus; where with all his power hee aſſaulted Dium a caſtle of the Portingals, ſcituate vpon the mouth of that great riuer: but in concluſion, after he had many days beſieged the caſtle both by ſea & land, and tried the vttermoſt of his ſtrength, he was ſo repulſed by the Portingals, that he was glad to forſake the ſiege, & leauing his great ordnance behind him for haſt, returned backe againe to Aden, a citie of great trade in Arabia Fœlix: where diſcouraged with the euill ſucceſſe he had againſt the Portingals, becauſe he would be thought to haue done ſomething, he allured the king of that rich citie to come vnto him, vpon his falſe faith before giuen for his ſafe returne: but as ſoone as he had him aboord, he like a periured wretch hanged him vp at the yards arme of his Admirall galley, and ſo ſurpriſing the citie, enriched himſelfe with the ſpoile thereof. The like barbarous crueltie hee vſed at Zibyth, another famous port of Arabia, where the pilgrims of the Eaſt doe commonly land when they after the manner of their ſuperſtition come to viſit the temple of their falſe prophet at Mecha: the king of which place together with al his nobilitie he cruelly murthered, contrary to his faith giuen; and ſo trauelling himſelfe by land to Mecha, as if he had been ſome deuout pilgrim, ſent backe his fleet by the Moore to Suetia, hauing performed againſt the Portingals nothing at all.

The treacherous dealing of Solyman the eunuch Baſſa with the kings of Arabia

A At the ſame time Solyman by the perſuaſion of Lutzis and Aiax (the Baſſaes of greateſt au-thoritie about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his forces from the Perſians, as men agreeing with him in the chiefe points of his Mahometan ſuperſtition, with purpoſe to conuert the ſame vpon Italie: whereunto hee was earneſtly ſolicited by Iohn Forreſt the French kings embaſſador, then lying at Conſtantinople of purpoſe to incite Solyman againſt Charles the Emperour, aſſuring him that hee was not of ſuch power, as at one time to defend Apulia againſt him, and the dukedome of Millaine againſt the French king, who (as he ſaide) was determined that Summer to inuade that part of Italy. And to further the matter, about the ſame time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble gentleman, ſometime commander in Charles the Em-perors army, but then exiled out of Naples, fled vnto Solyman; and forſomuch as he was a man B of fame, and like to doe him great ſeruice in the inuaſion of Apulia, as one which knew the country well and promiſed vnto him good ſucceſſe in that wars, was by Solyman honorably entertained amongſt his Mutfaracas: which is a certaine companie of horſemen for their ap-proued valor, choſen out of all nations, hauing the free exerciſe of their religion whatſoeuer without controulement, and are onely bound to attend vpon the perſon of the great Turke when he goeth to wars. The cauſe of his reuolt was, for that the viceroy of Naples had executed Andrew his brother, one of the knights of the Rhodes. But being now growne into great fauour with Solyman and the Baſſaes, and oftentimes called to counſell in the preparation of that war, caſting off all naturall loue of his countrey, ceaſed not by all means to perſuade Soly- C man to inuade the ſame; aſſuring him, that the people of Apulia and Salerne, oppreſſed with grieuous tribute and exactions by the Emperors officers, would at the firſt reuolt, eſpecially if they ſaw any of the French nation to cleaue vnto. And that which moued him more than all the reſt, the antient Turks told him into what a feare al Italie was ſtrucken, at ſuch time as Ach- metes the Baſſa hauing taken Hydruntum, had vndoudtedly conquered not onely the kingdome of Naples, but the citie of Rome alſo, and all the reſt of Italie, had not the vntimely death of Mahomet his great grandfather interrupted the courſe of that victory. Which perſuaſions wrought ſuch effect in Solyman, that he, once fully reſolued for the inuaſion of Italie, made ſuch expedition both by ſea and land, that hee himſelfe in perſon was come with two hundred thouſand men vnto Aulona, the moſt conuenient port of Macedon for the tranſpor-D ting of his army, before it was thought in Italie that he was ſet forward from Conſtantinople: where he had not long ſtaid, but Lutzis Baſſa his Admirall, accompanied with Barbaruſſa, ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Peloponeſus and Epirus, and ſo paſſing by Corcyra, where Hieronimus Piſaurius, Admirall of the Venetian fleet lay with his gallies (after mutuall ſalutation done after the manner of ſea, by ſhooting off their great peeces in token of friendſhip) put into the hauen of Aulona alſo. Solyman not purpoſing to loſe any time, and hauing Italie now in his ſight, commanded Lutzis & Barbaruſſa to paſſe ouer with the fleet vnto Otranto, and to proue the mindes of the people; that if the firſt enterpriſe fell out well, hee might preſently follow after with al his armie. With them went alſo Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the deſtruction of his countrey, as any of the reſt. Hee knowing that the great Cities of Hydruntum E and Brunduſium were kept with ſtrong Garriſons of Charles the Emperour, leauing Hydruntum on the right hand, directed the Turkes to a towne vpon the ſea coaſt, eight miles off, called Caſtrum, neere vnto which ſtandeth a caſtle vpon a hill then belonging to Mercurinus Catinarius: who beeing a man vnacquainted with warres, and terrified with the ſudden com-ming of the Turkes, and perſuaded by Troilus, yeelded vp his Caſtle, vpon condition, that the Turkes ſhould offer no violence or iniurie vnto him or his, either in body or goods. Vpon which condition the towne of Caſtrum was alſo deliuered vnto them. But the Turks, eſpecially the greedie marriners, beeing got into the caſtle and the towne, mooued neither with the intreatie of Troilus, nor the commandement of Lutzis and Barbaruſſa, rifled the towne and ca-ſtle, and carried away with them Merturinus himſelfe, with all the floure of the people, to F their gallies as priſoners. But Lutzis aſhamed of ſuch faithleſſe dealing, preſently ſet Mer- curinus at libertie againe. At the ſame time alſo, Solyman had by night ſent ouer certaine troupes of light horſemen, in great palendars: which running all alongſt the ſea coaſt from Tarentum to Brunduſium, carried away with them both the people and cattell, and whatſo-euer elſe came in their way by the ſpace of fortie miles. So that all that countrey of Salenti-num, now called Otranto, was filled with feare and danger; and had not there ſtayed, but was like enough to haue ouerwhelmed all Italie, by the comming ouer of Solyman with his G whole armie, had not the raſhneſſe of one Venetian captaine by vnexpected chance turned that tempeſt from the Italians vpon the Venetians themſelues.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant captain of the Venetians, meeting with certaine of the Turks gallies, which would neither vaile their top ſailes, nor in token of reuerence and friendſhip, diſcharge any of their great ordnance, as of dutie they ought to haue done in thoſe ſeas where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud inſolencie, fiercely aſſailed them, and in fight ſunke two of them: wherein Vſtamenes Gouernour of Calipolis, a man of no ſmal reputation among the Turks, was reported to haue periſhed. Which outrage done by Contarenus in a moſt vnfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian eſtate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his owne priuat grudge which he bare againſt the Turks, for that they intercepted a H ſhip of his as ſhe was comming out of the Eaſt countries laden with rich merchandiſe: ſo that it was thought, that he to pleaſe himſelfe in reuenging of his own priuat iniurie, regarded not what in that dangerous time might enſue thereof to the common ſtate.

A little before the comming ouer of the Turks into Italie, Andreas Auria the Emperours Admirall lying at Meſſana in Sicilia, vnderſtanding that Solyman was come with his armie to Aulona, and that his fleet was arriued there alſo, put to ſea, directing his courſe towards the Iſlands of Caphalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (as indeed it fell out) to meet with the taile of the Turks fleet: for there according to his expectation he chanced vpon diuers of the Turks victuallers, whom he eaſily tooke. The marriners he chained in his owne gallies for ſlaues, and I furniſhing his fleet with the victual which was not for him prouided, fired the ſhips. Whileſt Auria was thus beating too and fro in the Ionian ſea, it fortuned that Solyman ſent Iunusbeius his chiefe interpreter, a man whome hee made no ſmall account of, with two gallies on a meſſage to Lutzis his Admirall. This proud Turke comming neere vnto Corcyra, where the Venetian Admirall lay with his fleet, offered ſcornefully to paſſe, without vailing: which his pride tending to the diſgrace of the Venetians, certain of the Venetian captains not enduring, ſet vpon him with ſuch furie, that the Turks were enforced to run both their gallies on ſhore vpon the coaſt of Epirus, neere vnto the mountaines called Acroceraunij, where hauing eſcaped the danger at ſea, they fell almoſt all into the hands of the cruel mountaine people, liuing for the moſt part by theft, and waiting for wracks, as hawks for their prey: by theſe ſhauers K the Turks were ſtript of all they had, and Iunusbeius with much adoe redeeming himſelfe out of their hands, returned to Solyman. Auria ſayling alongſt the ſea coaſt, chanced vpon theſe gallies, and finding them ſore bruſed, ſet fire on them.

Iunusbeius with two gallies, driuen by the Venetians vpon the Acroceraunian rocke.

For theſe vnkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, & grieuouſly complained of them to Solyman: although the Venetian Admirall laboured by all means he could to appeaſe Iunusbeius, and to excuſe the matter, as a thing done by great ouerſight on both ſides. Vpon theſe ſmall occaſions, the Turkes ſought to breake off the league with the Venetians; which fell out ſo much the ſooner, for that about the ſame time Auria ſailing vp & downe the Ionian ſea, and diligently looking into euery harbor to intercept ſuch as ſtragled from the Turkes fleet, hapned by night to light vpon 12 of Solymans great gallies L neere vnto Corcyra, all filled with his Ianizaries and choice horſemen of the court, the beſt ſoldiers of the Turks, who had by land ſent their horſes to the camp by their lackies, & were comming themſelues with the Ianizaries by ſea. Auria falling vpon theſe gallies, had with them a crueil and deadly fight: for they as reſolute men, wiſhing rather to die than to yeeld to their enemies, with inuincible courage maintained a moſt bloudie fight againſt Auria with his 30 gallies excellently appointed, vntill ſuch time as moſt part of them were ſlaine, and the reſt ſore wounded; who ſeeing no remedie, but that they muſt needs come into the hands of their enemies, threw their ſcimitars ouerboord, becauſe thoſe choice weapons ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. In this conflict, Auria loſt alſo many of his beſt ſoldiers: yet hauing got the victory, and poſſeſſed of the gallies, he ankered neere vnto Corcyra, there M to take view of his own harms and the enemies: but whilſt he rid there at anker, he was aduertiſed, that Barbaruſſa was comming againſt him with 80 gallies. Wherfore knowing himſelfe too weake to incounter ſo ſtrong an enemie, he departed thence, and returned againe to Meſſana to repaire his fleet. Solyman thorowly chafed with the loſſe of his gallies and beſt ſouldiers, and with the double iniurie done vnto him by the Venetians, fell into ſuch a rage, that he curſed Auria taketh 12 of the Turks gallies full of Ianizaries and Solymans other beſt ſouldiers.

A curſed Barbaruſſa, as one who in theſe wars had done him no good ſeruice : and thundred out grieuous threats againſt the Venetians ; ſaying, he was vnder the colour of an antient league, by them deceiued and greatly abuſed, and that they were ſecretly confederated with Charles his enemie, and had for that cauſe (as they had always) holpen Auria with intelligence, and all things neceſſarie, receiuing him into their harbors, and by their eſpials giuing him knowledge of the order of his fleet, that ſo he might at his own aduantage ſurpriſe his gallies ; as he had alreadie done. Vnto which fire, Iunusbeius his Interpreter, Barbaruſſa, and Aiax, laid new coles, more and more incenſing the tyrant, who was of himſelfe ſufficiently inflamed ; perſuading him by all means they could, to breake the league with the Venetians. Wherein Iunusbeius ſought to reuenge his own priuat iniuries ; and the other two after their greater profit & cre-B dit, gaping after the ſpoile of the Iſlands neere hand, eſpecially of Corcyra (now caled Corfu) Zazynthus, and Cephalenia, all ſubiect to the Venetian Seigniorie ; finding the wars in Italie more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French King came not then into Italie, as was by them expected : and it was commonly reported, That Petrus Toletanus Viceroy of Naples, hauing put ſtrong garriſons into the townes all alongſt the ſea coaſt, was comming himſelfe with a great armie : beſide that, the horſemen ſent ouer from Aulona, ranging about in the countrey of Salentum for ſpoile, were many times cut off by Scipio Som-meius a noble gentleman there gouernor for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his purpoſe for the inuaſion of Italie, in his mad mood proclaimed war againſt the Venetians : and riſing with his armie from Aulona, and marching alongſt the ſea coaſt vntill hee came ouer C againſt Corcyra, he incamped neere vnto the mountains called Acroceraunij, where the fierce and wilde people inhabiting the high and rough mountaine of Chimera, a part of the Acro-ceraunian mountaines ; by the inſtigation of one Damianus a notable Theefe, and verie perfect in the blinde and difficult paſſages amongſt the Rockes and Woods in thoſe deſolate Mountaines ; conſpired to attempt a moſt ſtrange and deſperate exploit, which was, by night to ſpoile Solyman in his owne pauilion. Theſe beggarly wilde rogues liuing for moſt part by murther & robbery, altogether without law or any manner of religion, in hope of ſo great a prey, and to become famous in killing one of the greateſt Monarks of the world in the midſt of his ſtrength, garded with ſo many thouſands of his ſoldiers ; were not affraid of any danger, how great ſoeuer, hoping in the dead time of the night to ſteale into the campe vndiſcouered, D and there ſo to oppreſſe Solyman ſleeping in his tent. Which (as was by many afterwards ſup-poſed) they were like enough to haue performed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, had it not bin by chance diſcouered: for when they had put all things in readineſſe for that purpoſe, Damianus ringleader of theſe deſperat ſauage people, by ſecret wayes ſtealing down the broken rocks of thoſe huge mountaines, and comming verie neere vnto the campe, to view the ſtan-ding of Solymans pauilion, with the order of the Turks watch, was by the cracking of a bough eſpied by the Ianizaries, where he ſtood in a tree prying all ouer the campe : and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confeſſing what he had intended, was by the commandement of Solyman torne in pieces. Whereupon he forthwith ſent a great part of his armie vp E into the mountains, which hunting after theſe wild people, as if they had bin wild beaſts, ſlew many of them, and by Solymans appointment did what they poſſibly could to haue quite deſtroyed them, as an infamous people, enemie to all men.

Iunusbeius, Barbaruſſa, and Ajax, incenſe Solyman againſt the Venetians.

Solymã conuerteth his Forces from the Italians againſt the Venetians.

Solymã in danger to haue bin ſlain in his tent in the midſt of his armie.

When Solyman had thus fully reuenged himſelfe vpon this barbarous nation, he purpoſed to inuade the Iſland of Corcyra, now called Corfu, part of the Venetian ſeigniorie : ſending before, Barbaruſſa with his great artillerie, whom he had but a little before called out of Italie with his forces. Piſaurius the Venetian Admirall in good time perceiuing the tyrants purpoſe, ſtrengthened the garriſons in both the caſtles of Corfu, with new ſupplies of good ſouldiers ſent out of the gallies : and knowing himſelfe vnable to incounter with the Turks great fleet at ſea, withdrew himſelfe farther off from the Iſland, into the gulfe of the Adriatik, to the intent to ioyne his power with Ioannes Veturius, who kept that ſea with another fleet of the Venetian F gallies, and ſo with ioyned forces to defend the Venetian coaſts againſt the Turkes : whom he thought himſelfe ſtrong enough for with the helpe of Veturius and of Auria, whoſe comming was dayly expected. Solyman ſending a great part of his armie out of the Main, into the Iſland, burnt and deſtroyed the countrey villages, leading away a wonderfull number of poore country people into moſt miſerable captiuitie. Aiax the Baſſa, and Barbaruſſa, in two ſmall pinnaces came as neere vnto the citie of Corfu as they poſſibly could, to ſee which way they might G moſt conueniently lay ſiege vnto it: but perceiuing the great ſtrength thereof, being wonderfully fortified and thorowly manned, they aduertiſed Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Aloyſius Ripa, and Symon Leonius, two Senators of Venice, were then gouernors of Corfu: who not without cauſe ſtanding in doubt of the great ſtrength of the Turks both by ſea and land, cauſed the citie ſuburbs (which were verie great and ſumptuouſly built) to be pluckt downe, for feare that the Turks ſhrouding themſelues in them, ſhould more eaſily beſiege the towne. This was a woful and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the ſame time a man might haue ſeene the magnificent houſes of the Venetian merchants, built in time of long peace, both for profit and for pleaſure in euery place of the Iſland, and ſet on fire by the Turks. But the regard of the publique State in ſo great a danger, made all thoſe goodly things which went ſo H to wracke, to be lightly accounted of in compariſon of their liues and libertie; for as much as thoſe loſt things might with new charge be againe in ſhort time recouered.

The two Venetian gouernours aforeſaid, fearing a long ſiege, and not prouided of victuall to ſuffice ſuch a multitude as were got into the Citie, for any long time; vſed a heauie and ſharpe remedie, by turning a great number of weake people and children vnable for ſeruice, out of the city; of whom many, eſpecially children, died in the town ditches in their mothers armes, vnder the walls of the citie, not daring to go any further for feare of the enemie, who had faſt by, in places conuenient caſt vp great mounts, and planted his ordnance againſt the citie. Only the caſtle called S. Angelo, ſtanding in the middle of the Iſland, about fifteene miles I from the citie of Corfu, being valiantly defended by the Inhabitants againſt the aſſaults of the Turkes, happily ſaued aboue three thouſand poore people which fled thither from the furie of the Turkes, who in all other places of the Iſland had made all deſolate. The Turkes the more to terrifie them of Corfu, taking a hil not far from the city, couered the ſame with their tents, and from the rocke called Maripetrus, ſhot with their great ordnance into the Towne: ſome of them in the meane time ſtanding cloſe in the ruins of the ſuburbs, did with their harquebuſies kill or wound them which appeared vpon the walls. The gallies alſo did oftentimes out of their prows diſcharge their great pieces againſt the citie, to the greater terrour than hurt of the defendants. Solyman perceiuing that he did but loſe his labour in beſieging the citie (as he was told at the firſt by his great captaines, Lutzis, Aiax, and Barbaruſſa) determined K now to raiſe his ſiege, rnd to returne to Conſtantinople, greatly aſhamed that he had no better ſped, neither in Italie, nor at the ſiege of Corfu. But when he was about to haue departed, it was told him how vnfaithfully ſome of his ſouldiers had dealt with them of Caſtrum in Italie, who yeelding themſelues vpon the Turks faith to them giuen for the ſafegard of their libertie and goods, were neuertheleſſe moſt iniuriouſly ſpoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage. Which fact, as tending to the diſhonor of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding, Solyman tooke in ſo euill part, that for amending thereof, he cauſed the authours of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of Caſtrum to be diligently ſought out, and ſent home againe into their countrey; well deſeruing therein the commendation of a moſt iuſt Prince. The Turks left the ſiege of Corfu and departed out of the Iſland about the L twelfth of September, in the yeare 1537; carrying away aboue ſixteen thouſand of the Iſland people into perpetuall captiuitie. So Solyman riſing with his armie, marching thorow Acarnania and Ætolia, returned thorow Macedonia to Conſtantinople: hauing in this his expedition done great harme both in Italie and Corcyra, but yet nothing increaſed his Empire or honour.

Good Iuſtice done by Solymã

The Turkes depart frõ Corfu, and carry away with thẽ aboue 16000 Chriſtians into captiuitie.

Before his departure, calling vnto him LutZis his Admirall, he commanded him alſo to returne with his fleet to Helleſpontus: who paſſing by Zazinthus, and landing ſome of his men in the night, tooke diuers of the country people priſoners. But vnderſtanding that the citie it ſelfe was both ſtrong and well manned, he departed thence to Cythera, where vnfortunately attempting to haue taken the caſtle, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, he made what ſpoyle he M could vpon that Iſland, and with 800 priſoners returned into Ægium to Ægyna, a rich and famous Iſland, and well peopled both with mariners and other inhabitants. Approching the Iſland, he by his meſſengers ſent before vnto the Gouernour of the Citie, attempted firſt by faire means, and afterwards by threats, to haue had the city yeelded vnto him: and not ſo preuailing, but perceiuing them to ſtand vpon their defence, he landed his men, and gaue the ſignall

A nall of battell. Which they of the Iſland refuſed not, but manfully met him, and at the firſt incounter ſlew many of his men. Wherewith the Admirall grieuouſly offended, and ſtill landing freſh men, euen with his multitude oppreſſed them of the Iſland, being but in number few, and wearie of long fight; and ſo inforced them to retyre into the citie.

To be reuenged of this iniurie, the Baſſa cauſed certaine pieces of great ordnance to be landed, and a batterie planted againſt the citie: by force whereof he had in ſhort time in diuers places opened the walls, and then with all his power aſſaulting the breaches, forthwith tooke the citie, which after he had rifled, he burnt it downe to the ground, raſed the walls, and put the men euerie mothers ſon to the ſword. As for the women, he gaue them without reſpect vnto the luſt of his ſoldiers and mariners, whom afterwards together with the boyes and young B children he ſhipped into the countrie neere vnto Athens, to be from thence conueyed vnto Conſtantinople, into moſt miſerable ſeruitude.

Aegina with other Iſlands of the Aegeũ ſpoyled.

Ægina thus vtterly raſed, he with much like force and crueltie raged vpon them of Paros and the other Iſlands thereabouts, killing the old men and ſuch as made reſiſtance, and thruſting the reſt into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the Iſle of Naxos, where all the Iſland people were for feare of his comming fled out of the country into the citie: where landing his men, he made hauocke of whatſoeuer came to his hand. And in the mean time ſent a meſſenger vnto the Duke, to will him to yeeld himſelfe and his citie into the obedience of the Turkiſh Emperour Solyman. Which meſſenger admitted into the citie, and brought before the C Duke, in blunt and plaine termes, without further circumſtance, deliuered his meſſage thus:

If thou wilt without more adoe, yeeld thy ſelfe, thy citie, and territorie, to the Conſtantinopolitan emperour, thou ſhalt deſerue his fauour, and ſo ſaue thy ſelfe with that thou haſt. But if thou, otherwiſe aduiſed, ſhalt now refuſe this grace, thou ſhalt neuer hereafter haue the like offer, but for euer vndoe thy ſelfe, thy wife, and children, thy citiſens, and ſubiects in generall. Here is preſent a moſt mightie fleet, with moſt valiant and victorious ſouldiers, furniſhed with all the habiliments of war requiſit for battel or ſiege. Be warned by them of Ægina, Paros, and other thy neighbour Princes of the Iſlands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not miſaduiſed, and (warned by other mens harmes) wilfully refuſe to remedie thine owne; and when thou mighteſt be ſafe, wilfully caſt away thy ſelfe.

The blũt ſpeech of a Turke ſent by Lutzis Baſſa vtno the Duke of Naxos.

D This ſaid, he was commanded by the duke to ſtand aſide, and a while to expect his anſwer: who with the chiefe of his ſubiects there preſent, but much troubled, and all full of heauines and ſorrow, conſulted what anſwer to make. But after they had according to the weightineſſe of the cauſe, & neceſſitie of time fully debated the matter, it was with general conſent agreed, That foraſmuch as they were not themſelues of power to withſtand ſo furious an enemie, neither to expect for helpe from others, they ſhould therefore yeeld vnto the preſent neceſſitie, which otherwiſe threatned vnto them vtter deſtruction, and reſerue themſelues vnto better times. Whereupon anſwer was giuen vnto the meſſenger by the Duke, That he was readie to yeeld himſelfe vnto Solyman as his vaſſall, and of him as of his Soueraigne to hold his Seignior-E orie for the yerely tribute of 5000 duckets. Of which offer the Baſſa accepted, receiuing in hand one yeares tribute. So was that notable Iſland yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance the 11 of Nouember, the yeare 1537: from whence Lutzis the proud Baſſa, laded with the rich ſpoyle of the countries & Iſlands he had paſſed by, returned to Conſtantinople with his fleet.

Naxos becommeth tributarie vnto the Turks

Not long after, this great Baſſa (then in credit and authoritie next vnto Solyman himſelfe) fell at ods with his wife Solymans ſiſter: for that he, after the vnnaturall manner of thoſe barbarous people, kept in his houſe a moſt delicate youth, in whom he tooke more pleaſure than in his wife. Which ſhe, being a woman of great ſpirit, not able to endure, and knowing her huſband by marrying of her, to haue bin from baſe degree aduanced vnto the higheſt honors the Emperor her brother could heap vpon him; in great rage reproued him with moſt bitter words, F ſaying, That ſhe had married him to be of him beloued, and vſed as his wife, & not contemptuouſly abuſed by his minions. Wherwith the Baſſa moued, gaue her a blow on the eare, and cauſed her as a fooliſh and vnquiet woman to be ſhut vp in her chamber. But ſhe not brooking ſuch abuſe, came weeping to Solyman her brother, and complaining of her huſband, requeſted to be diuorſed from him who made no better reckoning of her. And with her complaint ſo inceuſed Solyman, that he tooke from him his Seale, and thruſt him out of all his honourable promotions; and had vndoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old loue and friendſhip ſtayed his furie: yet hauing vtterly diſgraced him, he baniſhed him the court, into Macedonia, where he ſpent the remainder of his loathed life like as a poore priuat man: of whom Boiſardus thus writeth:

Qua tibi cum molli res eſt pollute Cynedo: Cum cubet in Thalamis regia nympha tuis?
Ex humili fortuna loco te euexit in altum Ex alto maior ſape ruina venit.

On daintie boyes, thou filthie man, why do'ſt thou fix thine eye; Whileſt princely dame of royal bloud doth in thy chamber lie?
From baſe eſtate, to honors height blind Fortune did thee call,
And ſet thee vp with Princes great, to worke thy greater fall.

The Turks ſpoil the Venetians, and the Venetians them likewiſe.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforeſaid, to intangle them at once with warres in diuers places, commanded his lieutenants in euery place bordring vpon any part of the Venetian Seigniorie, to vex and moleſt them with all hoſtilitie, which they did accordingly. In Peloponeſſus, Caſsimes beſieged Mauplium and Epidaurus, two ſtrong cities of the Venetians: Barbaruſſa landing his men in Dalmatia, ſurpriſed the antient citie of Botrotus belonging to the Venetians, carried away the citiſens, and raſed the citie: Obroatium another citie of the Venetians in Dalmatia, called in antient time Argitutum, with the caſtle of Nadin, were taken by Vſtref, Solymans lieutenant in Illyria. The Venetians thus inuaded on euery ſide, requited them againe with the like: Piſaurius and Veturius the Venetian Admirals landing their men, beſieged Scardona a citie of the Turks in the borders of Dalmatia, which they tooke by force, put the Turks to the ſword, and ouerthrew the walls of the citie, becauſe it ſhould be no more a refuge vnto the Turks: they ſent alſo one of their Captaines called Gabriel Ribeus to beſiege Obroatium; who vpon the comming of Amurathes one of Vſtref his Captaines, cowardly fled, and in flight loſt moſt of his men: for which his cowardiſe, Piſaurus cauſed his head to be ſtrucke off aboord the Admirall Galley: And Camillus Vrſinus, appointed by the Venetian State Gouernour of Iadera a ſtrong towne vpon the frontiers of their territorie in Dalmatia, tooke from the Turkes the towne of Oſtrouizza, which hee burnt downe to the ground: hee recouered alſo Obroatium, which was a little before loſt; which by the commandement of the Senat hee vtterly raſed, as a place not well to be kept againſt the Enemie.

The ſame Autumne that Solyman hauing waſted Corcyra, returned to Conſtantinople, and the Venetians held wars with the Turks for the townes and caſtles in Dalmatia; King Ferdinand receiued ſuch an ouerthrow at Exek by the Turkes, as a greater or more ſhamefull vnto the name of the Chriſtians was hardly in that age ſeene; if the loſſe of the choice ſouldiours and captaines of foure great Nations, with the ſhamefull flight of the Generall be well conſidered. After the battell of Mohahz, wherein King Lewis was loſt, the Turks hauing gotten the victorie, kept vnto themſelues that part of Hungarie which is called Poſſega, becauſe thereby they had a fit paſſage from Belgrade further into Hungarie. The two great riuers of Sauus and Dranus running almoſt with equall diſtance from the Weſt, taking with them diuers other ſmaller Riuers, before they fall into the great riuer of Danubius Eaſtward, doe on both ſides incloſe this Countrey of Poſſega, being a rich and plentifull Countrey, and wonderfull well peopled: it bordereth vpon the Prouinces of Croatia and Corbania, which in times paſt were at continuall wars with the Turks garriſons there by in Illyria and alſo in Boſna.

Mahometes gouernour of Belgrade.

At that time one Mahometes a moſt valiant captain of the Turks was gouernor of Belgrade: to whom for his approued valor and wiſedome Solyman had committed the keeping of thoſe frontiers, and the protection of the kingdome of Hungarie in the behalfe of king Iohn. He the yeare before had ſo vſed the matter, that what by force, what by policie, he had taken from the Chriſtians aboue thirtie ſmall Caſtles in the Countrey, (which was ſometime part of the patrimonie of the Deſpot of Raſcia) and had ioyned them to the regiment of Boſna.

A One of theſe caſtles amongſt the reſt called Exek, for the commodious ſcituation thereof he ſtrongly fortified, as that which might giue him paſſage ouer the riuer Dranus into Hungarie: from whence he ſet infinite preys out of King Ferdinands countrey neere vnto him. Yet was there at that time a certaine league betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithſtanding after the old cuſtome of thoſe countries for the exerciſe of the garriſon ſoldiers, did beare with the taking of bootie, and light ſkirmiſhes, without any breach thereof; ſo that it were done without any great power or field pieces: which wrong named peace, Mathias and other kings of Hungary had of long time vſed with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light horſemen no leſſe harme than they receiued. But the Germans now vſing no ſuch light horſmen, but ſeruing vpon great horſes, and charged with heauie armour, receiued great hurt by thoſe B light ſkirmiſhes; the Turks with their light horſes eaſily ſhunning their charge, and againe at their pleaſure charging them afreſh, when they ſaw the heauie German horſes almoſt wearie and ſpent: by which means the German horſemen were oftentimes by the Turks light horſemen ouerthrowne, and ſo either ſlain or taken. King Ferdinand not well brooking theſe continuall iniuries, and grieued in mind at the league which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Perſia; finding the ſame both vnprofitable and hurtfull to himſelfe, determined to take vp armes, with purpoſe that if he could driue the Turks out of the countrey of Poſſega, then forthwith to paſſe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to Buda againſt King Iohn.
It ſtil ſtucke in his minde, how that kingdome was taken from him by Solyman; and that more C was, as it were in diſgrace of him and the Houſe of Auſtria, beſtowed vpon a ſtranger, which had neither right thereto, nor was any way royally diſcended. Yet were there ſome which wiſhed him, not raſhly to enter into armes againſt ſo mightie an enemie, as was not to be vanquiſhed but by the vnited forces of all the Chriſtian Princes of Europe. For they foreſaw, that Solyman ſo prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare againſt the Chriſtians, and for his honour, ſeeke more cruell reuenge: as he had of late done againſt the Venetians, with whom vpon a light occaſion he had broken an antient league, for ſinking one or two of his gallies; for which he would admit no excuſe or ſatisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true; yet all the people of his dominions lay ſo earneſtly vpon him to take that warre in hand, that they ſaid plainly, they would neuer beare armes more againſt the Turks, if he omitted D that occaſion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia, and Noricum, ſubiect to the inuaſion of the Turks, and dayly receiuing great harmes, thought the Turks might eaſily be driuen out of Poſſega, for as much as Mahometes had no great power, nor like to haue any greater, Autumne now almoſt ſpent.

An euill aſſured peace.

K. Ferdinand breaketh his League with the Turks.

So king Ferdinand, with the wonderfull reioycing of his ſubiects, cauſed ſouldiers to be taken vp in all parts of his kingdome, ſending for moſt of his nobilitie and beſt captaines, as to a religious warre: and in a verie ſhort ſpace had raiſed a good armie, yet ſuppoſed of greater ſtrength than number, as conſiſting moſt of ſelect men. The footmen were for moſt part Germans, to whom were ioyned as wings certaine companies of Italians, harquebuſiers, whome Lewis Lodronius, a valiant captaine, and Generall of the footmen, had raiſed in Rhetia and thoſe E parts of Italie which lie neere vnto the Alps. The horſmen were of Bohemia, Sileſia, Morauia, Stiria, Carinthia, and ſome alſo out of Hungarie, all conducted by their ſeuerall captaines: all theſe horſemen were in number 8000, but the footmen were 16000 ſtrong, with great ſtore of artillerie of all ſorts. This armie for the expertneſſe and valour of the ſoldiers, was thought ſufficient to haue met the greateſt armie of the Turks in field, if it had bin conducted by a politique Generall, and (as he had at other times bin) fortunat: which was one Iohn Cazzianer, a Nobleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vienna, King Ferdinand had made Generall of his armie. For Ferdinand by the aduice of his beſt friends neuer vſed to aduenture his perſon vnto the danger of any battel, eſpecially againſt the Turks, by whom many Chriſtian Kings had in former time bin vanquiſhed and ſlain; but F performed all his wars by his lieutenants: which he was thought to do, not ſo much for want of courage, as moued with the fatal miſhap of ſo many Chriſtian Kings. Mahometes gouernor of Belgrade vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, ſent for diuers companies of the garriſon ſouldiers which lay vpon the borders neere hand; he required aid of the gouernours of the Turks prouince thereabouts; and was eſpecially holpen by Vſtref gouernour of Boſna, who of all Solymans lieutenants in Europe, was able to bring into the field moſt good Cazzianer Generall of King Ferdinands armie.

horſe-

horſemen; he ſent him Amurathes a famous captaine, with a great companie of gallant horſemen, vnto whom were ioyned certaine companies of footmen of the wild and mountain people of Dalmatia, entertained for pay: which rough and rude kinde of people were gouerned and kept in order by certaine companies of Ianizaries drawne out of the garriſon towns as far as Belgrade and Samandria: after whom followed many out of Seruia and Raſcia, ſome for pay, ſome for prey. The Turks receiuer liberally paying to ſuch as were willing to ſerue, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from Buda: ſo that the Turkiſh gouernors on euery ſide putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in ſhort time gathered ſuch an armie, as for number and ſtrength was not much inferior to king Ferdinands, and reſolued to expect the commiug of his enemies at Exek. Cazzianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza, a towne vpon the riuer Dranus; hauing before wel and conueniently prouided for the victualling of his armie, if they whom he put in truſt, and had taken the matter vpon them, had with like ſpeed and diligence performed their charge: for they were the chiefe men of all the countrey, who all followed the direction of Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia; who inflamed with zeale aboue meaſure, or elſe for want of iudgement deceiued, had promiſed to ſerue the whole campe with plentie of victuals at a verie low rate. Which thing the countrey people which were to bring in the victuall, ſome by waggon, ſome by boats alongſt the riuers, many difficulties now ariſing, were not able to perform: which was not to be remedied by reaſon of the neereneſſe of the enemie; and alſo for that Mahometes with ſmall gallies in both riuers, and his troups of horſemen pricking vp and down the countrey, did either ſtay the country people from bringing of victuall, or elſe allured them for a greater price to bring it to his owne campe, where they receiued readie mony. Cazzianer ſetting forward from Caprunza, hardly came in ten dayes to the caſtle of Verucza, which is about fortie miles diſtant from Caprunza; being inforced to make ſhort marches, by reaſon of the troubleſome carriage of ſome great pieces of artillerie for batterie. The wiſer ſort began euen then to miſdoubt the want of victuall, both for the reaſons before alledged, and for that ſuch victual as was looked for, came not, although they marched verie ſoftly: ſo that they were then inforced to ſpend ſuch victuall as they had prouided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted war. Wherefore Cazzianer wrot ſharply to the Biſhop and the other which had taken vpon them the charge of prouiding victuall for the armie; commanding them to vſe all poſſible diligence and ſpeed, and not to let the hope of a notable victorie to be loſt through their negligence, for want of victuall, rather than the valour of the enemie. In the meane time Cazzianer thought good there to ſtay, and to expect the comming of the victual, ſending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thouſand Hungarian light horſemen and certaine companies of Italian harquebuſiers, as farre as the caſtle of Zopia, to the intent that he might of ſuch priſoners as he could take, learne ſomthing of the enemies purpoſe. The Turks in the caſtle of Zopia deſcrying the comming of Bachitius, & thinking the whole armie of the Chriſtians had bin at hand, ſet fire on the caſtle, which they thought they could not keepe, and by boats fled down the riuer Dranus. Yet for all their haſt, Bachitius tooke ſome of them in their flight; of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his owne eſpials, how that Mahometes and the Turks lay incamped at Exek, with a full reſolution to giue him battell. Cazzianer ſetting forward again, ſtill keeping alongſt the riuer Dranus, came in eight dayes to the caſtle of Walpo: where by the way he was glad to ſtay ſeuen daies at the riuer Craſſus, which falleth into Dranus, vntil ſuch time as a bridge was made for the tranſporting of his armie, for that the riuer was not to be waded ouer: in which time Cazzianer entred oftentimes into counſell with the other Captaines, what courſe to hold for the better proceeding in that warre. Where diuers men were of diuers opinions: ſome ſaid, It were beſt to leaue Exek, and to beſiege a caſtle of the enemies there by, called Villach: others more warie than the reſt, were of opinion, That it were better there to ſtay vntill the reſt of the aid and victuall, which they dayly expected, were come. But the greater number, which alſo preuailed, vrged the firſt determination, of going directly to the enemie at Exek, for that longer delay would but breed further danger; and thete was in the campe (as they ſaid) both ſtrength and victual ſufficient for the obtaining of the victorie, if they would make an end of their needleſſe conſultations, and not protract the warre vntill Winter were come on: whereby they did nothing elſe, but cauſe the Souldiours to thinke that they were affraid to meet the enemie, and ſecretly

A cretly to ſteale away back again into their countries: wheras if they would like reſolute men march on forward againſt the enemy, who at other times truſting moſt vnto his multitudes, & now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the ſight of the Chriſtian army, bringing with it ſo much artillerie, but would forthwith forſake the place, & neuer ſhew his face: foraſmuch as the Chriſtian men at arms would (as they ſaid) eaſily breake thorow & ouerthrow the naked Turkiſh horſmen, if they durſt abide the field. The yong ſouldiers, who as yet had neuer made proofe of the Turks manner of fight, did with ſuch cheerfulnes like of this reſolution, that they thought two daies ſtaying, a long delay of ſo ready & eaſie a victory. Wherefore it was reſolued vpon, preſently to ſet forward, and therupon the army was muſtred: where, vpon view taken, there was found to be 10000 horſmen (for diuers troups of Germans were come B to the camp, after the time of the firſt ſetting forward of the army:) a more gallant company of horſemen, both for the ſtrength of their horſes, & goodly furniture of the men, had ſeldom bin ſeen in an army ſo ſuddenly raiſed. But the footmen, ſelected out of all the prouinces, was greatly diminiſhed, being now in number ſcarce 8000 ſtrong: for many were ſick in the camp, others weary of the long iourney, lingering behind were ſtolne away: and generally all they which were left, moyled with dirt and myre, by reaſon of the deepnes of the rotten way, wet thorow with rain, and almoſt ſtarued with cold, and therto pincht with hunger, were thought ſcarce able to indure the hardneſſe of the preſent war. After that, commandement was giuen, That euery ſoldier ſhould carry with him three daies victual: & proclamation made, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death take any Turke priſoner, although he yeelded himſelfe, or C charge himſelfe with any ſpoile before the battell were fully ended; foraſmuch as the captains would afterwards diuide the ſpoile of the enemy among the ſoldiers. This proclamation thus made thorow the camp, they ſet forward towards Exek: and the third day they came to a certain vally, about three miles from Exek, where they incamped. The next day a company of Turks ſhewed themſelues, which was by the great ordnance repulſed. The day following, the enemie ſallied out of the towne and skirmiſhed oftentimes with the Chriſtians: in which skirmiſhes many were ſlain on both ſides, but more wounded of the Chriſtians, for that the Turkes had politickly mingled certaine Ianizaries harquebuſiers, and archers, with their horſemen; who, vſed to that manner of fight, ſore gauled the Chriſtian horſemen. For which cauſe the Generall forbad all ſuch light skirmiſhes, as purpoſing to keepe his ſtrength whole D againſt the generall day of battel: commanding his canoniers ſo to place the great ordnance as might moſt annoy the enemy, if he ſhould ſhew himſelfe by troupes within the danger of the ſhot: which was ſo well performed, that the Turks ſallying forth, receiued therby great hurt, the deadly ſhot flying thorow the midſt of their companies. The ſame day Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia came into the camp with his horſemen, and a certain prouiſion of victual, whereby the feare of the want before conceiued, was wel eaſed. Mahometes perceiuing that the Chriſtians were not longer to be drawn to thoſe harmful skirmiſhes, but that he muſt bring his men in danger of the great ſhot; to annoy them by another means, ſent many ſmall boats, manned with harquebuſiers & ſmall pieces of ordnance, into the lake neere vnto the camp, ſo to keepe the Chriſtians from watering there, & with thoſe ſmall pieces ſhot oftentimes into the camp.
E Neere vnto the vally where the Chriſtians lay, was a hill, whereupon ſtood a village, wherin were placed certaine companies of Turks, to skirmiſh as occaſion ſhould ſerue with the Chriſtians; for diſplacing of whom the whole army was put in order of battel, and the great artillerie bent vpon them, that they ſhould not with their light skirmiſhes, after the maner of the Turkiſh fight, trouble the order of the armie. Which thing the Turks perceiuing, & that they were not able to hold the place, ſet fire on the town, & ſo retired to Exek. The Chriſtians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hil, from whence they might ſee Exek ſtand about two miles off in a faire plaine, neere vnto the banke of Dranus: all which low ground betwixt the hil and Exek, was ſo ſubiect to the caſtle, that it was thought a matter too ful of danger, to attempt, that way to batter the caſtle, & expoſe the army to the ineuitable fury of the enemies F ſhot. Wherfore deſcrying a riſing ground on the further ſide of the city equal with the top of the wals, they thought it beſt to remoue their camp thither, & on that ſide to plant their batterie againſt the city. But to come to that place was thought a matter of no ſmal trouble: for they muſt fet a compaſſe three miles on the right hand thorow a forreſt by a foule & troubleſome way, before they could come to the place they deſired: for the army was not ſo great, as
to

to beſiege the citie round; wherein were not (as is reported) aboue ſixteen thouſand men: neither was there ſuch ſtore of victuals in the camp, but that the army was like ſoone to feele the want thereof, without a continuall ſupplie, which would hardly be had, the enemie ſtil beſetting euery paſſage, and with their light horſemen ſcouring about all the countrey, of purpoſe to keep them from victual. For which cauſe, ſome were of opinion, That it were beſt for them there to ſtay where they were, vntill ſuch time as both more aid and better ſtore of victuals were come vnto them: but others of contrary mind, ſaid the enemy was but barely ſtored with victuall himſelfe, and therefore could not long hold out; which they ſaid they vnderſtood by certain Chriſtian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his chiefe ſubſtance into certain boats, to be conueied downe the riuer, as purpoſing to flie, and would not hold out the ſiege aboue three daies: as for the forreſt, they thought it would well enough be paſſed thorow, if they would couragiouſly ſet forward: beſide that, the time of the yeare ſuffered no delay, Winter comming ſo faſt on, that except ſome notable thing were done quickly, they ſhould be inforced by the very time of the yeare to returne with ſhame, without doing any thing. This opinion was beſt liked of, as more honorable and better beſeeming men of valor, than to lie ſtill in one place: whereupon the next day the army remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forreſt. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiuing, preſently ſent forth a thouſand light horſemen, and certaine companies of the Ianizaries, harquebuſiers, to trouble the Chriſtians in their paſſage: who by a neerer and well knowne way ouertaking the armie, ſuddenly charged the rereward, wherin the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians with much adoe endured the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at armes, they notably repulſed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the army with ſmall loſſe paſſed the forreſt, and came to the place they deſired: where, after they had incamped themſelues, and in good order placed all things needfull for the ſiege, they in ſeemely order offered vnto the enemie battell: but he keeping himſelfe within the towne, ſhot at the Chriſtians with his great ordnance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the riſing of a hill, ſhot thorow both the wals of the towne and the bulwarke alſo, to the great terror of the defendants. The Chriſtians in the meane time hauing ſtood almoſt all the day in order of battell in ſight of the enemie, vainely expecting when hee ſhould come forth to giue them battell, returned at night into their camp: for Mahometes vpon great conſideration kept in his ſouldiers, although they were moſt deſirous to fight; vnderſtanding right well of the want of victuall in the Chriſtian camp; and beſide that (as the fugitiues reported) being ſtraitly commanded by letters from Solyman, that he ſhould not vpon pain of a moſt ſhamefull death forſake the place, but to defend it to the laſt. Now the Chriſtians deſirous of battell, being thus delaied and deceiued of their expectation, had in a few daies ſpent the ſmal ſtore of victuall they had, and began to feele a generall want: neither was there any apparant meanes how they ſhould bee relieued, ſo that euery man began to feare ſome generall miſchiefe to inſue. When Balthaſar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, & a captain of great experience, ſitting in counſell with the reſt, entred into this ſpeech.

The Turks skirmiſh with the Chriſtians in paſſing the forreſt.

Mahometes wiſely refuſeth to fight with the Chriſtians, offering him battel Balthazer Pamphilus his counſell for reliefe of the armie.

Captaines (ſaid hee) we doe all that wee doe, vnaduiſedly: For whileſt we conſult at large how wee may ouercome our enemies, the ſtrength of our armie is in the meane time ſo weakened for want of victuall, that the ſouldiers are neither well able to ſtand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands: and generally, euen they which are of greateſt courage begin now to quaile, and deſpairing of battell, ſee that they muſt miſerably and ſhamefully periſh for want. Wherefore in my opinion, wee ought firſt and aboue all things moſt ſpeedily to prouide for this want, which ſo grieuouſly pincheth vs: and preſently to remooue hence vnto the caſtle of Hermande, that with the prouiſion thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refreſh our whole armie; and ſo relieued, to proceed further as occaſion ſhall require.

This caſtle was about ten miles diſtant from Exek; wherinto many of the Turks had conueied their wiues & children, and chiefeſt ſubſtance, being kept with a ſmal garriſon of 20 Turks. Faſt by the caſtle was a prettie little walled towne, without flankers, after the manner of the old fortifying: which towne and caſtle Balthazer ſaid would eaſily be taken. This his counſell was well liked of all men, and he himſelfe ſent with certain companies of ſoldiers to take the towne. Wherin fortune ſo fauored him, that it was at his firſt comming ſurrendred vnto him: but when he had it, he found not therein any ſuch ſtore of corne or victuall as he had hoped Balthazer taketh the towne of Hermande.

A for : yet he tooke there certaine veſſels of wine, to the great reliefe of the weake ſouldiers.
Vpon the newes of the taking of this towne,the campe remoued from Exek about ten a clock in the night,but ſo diſorderly,that the ſouldiers ſcarce knowing their owne enſignes, ſeemed rather to haue fled for feare,than marched for ſpoile : yet the Turks for all that mooued not out of Exek,miſdoubting ſome deceit, & loth to attempt any thing raſhly in the night. When the army was come to the towne, the captains tooke order, that the victuall there found, was equally diuided amongſt the ſouldiers,and the next morning batterie laied againſt the caſtle; which thoſe few Turks valiantly defended halfe a day,and then by compoſition yeelded it.
But when the caſtle was taken,there was found in it but two barrels of meale, and other two of millet. Then might a man haue ſeene the captaines themſelues hanging their heads, as men B ſtrucken with a ſudden feare,who in ſtead of a great prey & victual to haue ſerued many daies, found nothing but a few women and children,and ſcarce ſo much victuall both in the town & caſtle,as would ſerue the army two daies. Yet they diſſembled the matter,& fed the ſoldiers with hope of better ſtore,after the bridge were once repaired, that they might paſſe the riuer of Bodrog,which ran by the town:which bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themſelues) broken,by plucking vp of certain piles, & taking away of the planks; wherfore the carpenters being ſet on worke,and euery man putting too his helping hand,the bridge was with continual labor in 3 daies repaired. The fourth day,the wagons & ſmaller pieces of ordnance paſſed ouer the bridge,& after them ſix of the great pieces for batterie; but the bridge ouercharged with the ſeuenth, which was of a wonderfull weight, & much greater than the reſt, C began to breake; ſo that the captains were inforced to breake that faire piece of ordnance, and ſo by pieces to carry it away,that the enemy ſhould not get ſo great a ſpoile. All things being thus well paſſed ouer, the piles were again cut down, & the plancks ſtrucke off, to the intent the enemie ſhould not that way purſue them: & other way there was none,but to fetch a compaſſe about the great lake which was many miles about. Here the captaines began to conſult, whether it were beſt to break the great pieces of ordnance, that ſo they might more ſpeedily march away,or not. Of which opinion was Cazzianer himſelfe,promiſing of his own charge to new caſt them. As fot the ſcaling ladders,& ſuch other like things prouided for the ſiege, they burnt becauſe they ſhould not come into the enemies hand,or trouble thēſelues in their march. But moſt of the captains were of opinion,that it was not beſt ſo diſhonorably to break D thoſe goodly pieces,the greateſt ornament and defence of their country; but to hold on their march thorow Poſſega,vntill they came to Iuvancha, where they ſhould find great ſtore both of corne and wine:which towne with the caſtle of Gara faſt by it,ſtored with all kind of prouiſion, they ſaid would eaſily be taken before the Turks could poſſibly come ſo far about the lake from Exek:and that it were a great ſhame,ſo to return without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perſuaded, ſet forward,& with great toile (by reaſon of the deepnes of the way and heauines of the great ordnance) came by night to Iuvancha, which was but three miles off: where the Turkes hauing with incredible celeritie paſſed a long iourney, arriued at the ſame time alſo. Neere vnto this caſtle was a little towne, out of which all the Turks were fled : the townſmen being Chriſtians,opened the gates and receiued in the ſouldiers ; who there filled E themſelues aboundantly with wine,& could hardly be driuen out thence by their captains to the camp. The ſame night the Turks burnt the ſame towne,and whatſoeuer the Chriſtians had therin left:and euery man betooke him to his armour in the camp, for the enemie was now at hand:& in the dawning of the day began hotly to skirmiſh in diuers places with the Chriſtians, but eſpecially in that quarter of the camp where the Bohemians lay. Wherwith Petrus Raſchinius Generall of the Bohemians,being grieued,ſet vpon them with a troup of his beſt horſmen, & inforced them to flie : but the Turks after the manner of their fight,quickly returning again,& relieued by the comming in of their fellows,beſet the Bohemians on euery ſide,and ſlew many of them. Raſchinius the Generall fighting moſt valiantly, was there ſlaine with his followers. The Chriſtian captains purpoſing to retire home,placed on each ſide of the armie F foure ranks of wagons for defence on both ſides: in the vauward were placed the weake and ſick men,yet ſo,that in the front of the army were certain companies of luſty tal ſoldiers: but in the rereward was placed the greateſt ſtrength both of horſe & foot. The army thus marching as it were on both ſides intrēched, as it oftimes met with woody hils hindring their way, ſo did the ſame fitly ſerue the Chriſtians, that the Turkes could not wel aſſaile them in their march,

The caſtle of Hermande yeelded vnto the Chriſtians.

Cazzianer to retire with more haſte, would haue broken his great ordnance.

The Turks ſore trouble the Chriſtians in their retire.

A generall feare in the Chriſtians camp march,both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing,ſent before certain companies of Ianizaries and nimble footmen,which knew the country and the paſſages well,with certaine faulcons and other ſmall pieces to take the ſtraits whereby the armie was to paſſe, and ſo to gaul them in their paſſage,& when they could keep the place no longer,to flie back to another,and ſo from place to place:and in the open places he had his troups of light horſemen,which were euer buſie in one place or another of the armie. By which meanes the Chriſtians in their march receiued much harme, which grieued them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be ſeen together,but ſtragling companies,which as they were commanded,ſomtime would come on with a fierce charge,and by and by retire againe, and with their arrows and faulcon ſhot,from places of aduantage aſſaile them. At one of theſe ſtraits ſomewhat bigger than the reſt,Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian captains,in whom the ſouldiers generally repoſed their greateſt truſt, was ſlaine with a faulcon ſhot,with diuers other of the valiant Hungarians ; who ſeeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had ſeen in other places,thought to haue don ſom good ſeruice vpon them:his death brought a general feare vpon the whole army,foraſmuch as both then and at other times,without him they neuer had any good ſucceſſe againſt the Turks. Yet in that skirmiſh, the Hungarians, to reuenge the death of their captaine, did with ſuch force repulſe the enemy, that they cauſed him after he had loſt many of his men , to run away and leaue his ſmall field-pieces behinde him. But ſuch was the weakneſſe or cowardiſe of the Chriſtian footmen,and the agilitie of the Turks,eſpecially the Ianizaries,that they with their ſhot out of the woods, ſtaid the Hungarian horſemen from the purſuit of their fellowes,and recouered their ſmall field-pieces before they could be carried away by the Chriſtian footmen : wherewith they did againe forerun the army, and ſtill trouble it as before. The Chriſtians beſet with theſe dangers, and almoſt ſpent for want of victuall,ſeeing no meanes to relieue their weake bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting ſpirits,did generally feare ſome extreame calamitie to inſue: and ſo much the more,for that it was reported,that Mahometes ſtil expected freſh ſupplies from Belgrade,Samandria,and Nicopolis : and many of the Hungarian light horſemen ſtole away from them,as carefull of their owne ſafetie : neither did they ſee any comfort in the diſmaied captaines,who at other times were woont with cheerefull and couragious wordes to relieue the ſoldiers,if they ſaw them any thing diſcouraged. But when they were come into a faire open field neere vnto a towne called Gara,they were aduertiſed, That the enemy had in the woods before them,whereby they were to paſſe, cut downe great trees croſſe the waies, ſo that neither their great ordnance nor wagons, nor yet their horſemen could poſſibly paſſe that way but that they muſt needs breake their order.

The fearefull reſolution of the Chriſtians to get from the Turks

This once bruted thorow the army,filled them with all heauineſſe and deſperation,and ſo much the more,for that Ladiſlaus Moreus,and others which knew the country well, ſaid there was but two wayes to eſcape , the one thorow the woods about ten miles ſpace to Walpo, which by reaſon of the trees cut downe croſſe the waies by the Turkes was not to be paſſed, but they muſt needs leaue behind them their great ordnance and carriages:the other towards the caſtle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladiſlaus Moreus his countrey, certaine miles diſtant from Gara : by taking of which way,the enemy by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the paſſage,muſt of neceſſitie be inforced to giue ouer his purſuit. Yet for all that,it was in counſell reſolued vpon,to take the way thorow the woods of Walpo,for that there was there victuall enough, and in the caſtle of Walpo was kept mony ſent from king Ferdinand,ſufficient to pay the ſoldiers for all that Winter. And ſo leauing the great ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and whatſoeuer els could not well be carried on horſebacke, to ſet forward with all ſpeed : as for the trees they ſaid, they would be well enough remoued, & the way opened by the pioners and waggoners : wherfore euery captain was commanded to haue his ſouldiers in readines to ſet forward vpon the ſigne giuen, which was by the ſound of a ſhalm or hoboy; which when it ſhould be giuen, was referred to the diſcretion of the Generall. There were many which wonderfully diſliked of this reſolution,and ſaid openly,that the enemy was fewer in number than their horſmen, and pinched almoſt with like want of victuall:beſides, that the Turks durſt neuer in juſt fight incounter with the Chriſtian men at arms, but like theeues aſſaile them vpon a ſudden at ſome aduantage,and by & by be gone again: and that the town of Gara where the enemy lay incamped, was not ſo ſtrong but that it might be won:wherfore all

A all things were to be proued, and ſome great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not only a diſhonor vnto the captains themſelues, who ought always to prefer their honor before their liues, but alſo dangerous to them, which reſpected nothing but life. And if they ſhould ſet forward in the night, many would be loſt in the woods; and valor in the darke could not be knowne from cowardiſe: beſides that, the Turks (as they ſaid) lay ſo nigh, that it was not poſſible to depart without their knowledge, eſpecially if they ſhould burne the pouder, or breake the great ordnance. For which cauſes, they thought it better to fight a battel with them, & not to beleeue the falſe reports of new ſupplies come vnto them, and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were ready to lay down their liues for their religion and glory of the Chriſtian name. After all this, they began B to conſult what was now to bee done with the ſicke and wounded ſouldiers, which were before carried in wagons or among the other baggage of the armie: for it was like, that ſo great a multitude of ſicke and wounded men, vnderſtanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the army, would as miſerable forſaken men, fill the campe with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be alſo increaſed by the weeping and wailing of them which ſhould neuer afterwards ſee their brethren, kinſmen, fellowes, or friends, ſo miſerably and ſhamefully left behind and forſaken: the noiſe wherof, muſt needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a ſmall gun ſhot. Wherefore it was determined, that theſe ſicke and wounded ſouldiers ſhould be carried vpon the wagon and cart horſes; and that ſuch as were not able to ſtay themſelues, ſhould be holden vp by other of more ſtrength riding behind the C vpon the bottocks of the horſe. In fine, to color the matter, they which were ſo deſirous to go, ſaid that this their maner of departure grounded vpon good reaſon, was not to be accounted a ſhameful flight (as ſome would tearm it) but a right honeſt & neceſſary maner of retiring: foraſmuch as the were ſtronger than their enemies in horſmen, & equal alſo (if not ſtronger) in footmen, although they were ſore weakned with ſicknes. Whilſt theſe things were in counſel diuerſly diſcourſed, & the reſolution ſet down as is before ſaid, the matter was brought to this paſſe, that euery captain with troubled iudgement conceiued in himſelfe ſecret cogitations, far from the common good; & without regard of ſhame & diſhonor, bethought himſelf how he might betake himſelfe to flight, the vncertaine hope of deſired life. On the contrarie part, Mahometes vſing moſt certain ſpies, & aduertiſed euery houre of all the diſtreſſes of the Chri-D ſtians, and thereby preſaging his future victorie; did by moſt diligent watch and troupes of horſemen, beſetting the paſſages farre and neere, moſt vigilantly attend euery motion in the Chriſtian camp: of purpoſe, that when the army ſhould riſe and ſet forward, he after his wonted manner might in the ſtraits (fit for his purpoſe) ſet vpon them being diuided and diſperſed one from another, as they muſt needs in thoſe troubleſome paſſages: for he had ſo placed his horſmen & footmen in the knowne tracts of thoſe woods, that he had ſhut vp the Chriſtians as it were in a toile. It was now almoſt midnight, and the army taking no reſt, ſo carefully expected the ſigne of ſetting forward, that euery little delay ſeemed to moſt men both tedious and dangerous: ſo that many great captains vpon a cowardly conceit would ſtay no longer, but haſted to depart, and to go before the reſt, without any leaue of the Generall. The beginning E of this miſchieuous departure, is reported to haue bin begun by the common Hungarian horſmen, which knowing the paſſages & waies thorow the woods, made moſt haſt to Walpo. Ladiſlaus Moreus diſhonourably following their example, went the other way to his caſtle Zenthuerzebeth. After them followed in great haſt the Stirian horſmen, without regard of ſhame, led by Iohn Hunganot their General, who was appointed to haue guarded the rereward. Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia fled in like manner, knowne by his great lanthorne wandring in the wood: yet with leſſe ſhame than the reſt, becauſe he being a clergie man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on armes, or to goe into battell. In the meane time it was fearefully told to Cazzianer, That the Hungarian horſemen were fled, and that Ladiſlaus and Hunganot, with the Stirian troupes were gone alſo; and that all the reſt of the armie not expecting the appointed F ſignall, were in like manner vpon flying: with which report, the cowardly and diſmaid Generall was ſo terrified, that he preſently got to horſe, quite forgetting the ſignall he ſhould haue giuen (for that he thought all the reſt, as he afterwards ſaid, to haue beene gone before) and as hee wes vnarmed, betooke himſelfe to flight, leauing behinde him for haſt his Tent ſtored with plate and other rich furniture. In this tumult of them which ſo diſorderly fled, Lodra- nius that famous captaine was called vp, and told by his ſeruants, that the Generall was fled G and gone: to whom hee anſwered againe, Without doubt it cannot be ſo, that I ſhould bee ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly betraid of him; and ſo as a man megered with long watching & painfull labor, laid himſelfe downe againe to ſleep. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the ſtir that was in the camp, riſe with his Turks to aſſaile his enemies: yet to be better aſſured what the enemie did, he thought it good to ſtay for day light, cauſing his men to ſtand ſtill in order of battell, and with wonderfull ſilence to expect the ſigne of ſetting forward, which was giuen by the ſoft ſound of a horſemans drum paſſing thorow euery companie. For the old captaine acquainted with many battels againſt the Chriſtians, doubting of their feigned flight, would not vnaduiſedly be drawne into battell, but in a place commodious for his ſouldiers; as one before fully ſet downe (after his wonted manner) to performe that ſeruice, not by the hazard H of one ſet battell, but by dallying off the time with often ſkirmiſhes, when he could take the enemie at aduantage. The day appearing, Lodronius again awaking, heard a certaine confuſed noiſe of the Turks, and withall ſaw himſelfe forſaken of the greateſt part of the horſemen: whereupon he complained in vaine, that he was betraid: yet for all that, he was nothing diſcouraged, but cheered vp the footmen, exhorting them to remember their former valor, and to reſolue with themſelues only with courage to ouercome the danger, which hard fortune had at that time brought them into; for that valiant men were rather to thinke of an honourable death, than ſhamefull flight, whereby whether they ſhould eſcape with life or not, was vncertaine. As for himſelfe, who had bin their happie Generall in many battels, hee ſaid he was reſolutely ſet downe by repulſing the enemie to bring them into a place of ſafetie, or elſe valiantly I fighting together with them to end his daies. As Lodronius was yet thus incouraging the footmen, the horſemen of Carinthia, Saxonie, Auſtria, and Bohemia, who mindfull of their dutie, had in vaine expected the appointed ſignall from the Generall, came vnto Lodronius, as vnto the moſt valiant captaine, beſeeching him in ſtead of their trecherous Generall, to take vpon him the place: promiſing to do whatſoeuer he commanded, and to fight as men againſt thoſe Infidels for their religion and king, ſo long as they were able to hold vp their weapons. Lodronius would in no caſe accept of that honor ſo franckly offered, modeſtly proteſting himſelfe vnworthie thereof: yet as a man of courage, and moued with the hard eſtate of ſuch an armie, he with a ſolemne proteſtation promiſed to execute the place in the beſt manner hee could, and ſo did as long as his fortune gaue him leaue. K

Lodronius encourageth the footmen.

It is reported, that as Lodronius was incouraging the footmen, & earneſtly inuaying againſt ſhamefull flight, an old German ſoldier was ſo bold, as bluntly, yet ſharply to ſay vnto him: Worthie Lodronius, thou canſt neuer bee thought to flee ſhamefully, with a horſe of ſuch a price vnder thee. Lodronius perceiuing the old ſouldiers meaning, alighted, and with his ſword hoxed his horſe; ſaying aloud, This day, valiant ſoldiers, ſhall you haue me both your generall and fellow ſoldier, fighting on foot as one of your ſelues: ſee now that you deceiue not my expectation, but let vs either with glorious victorie or honorable death end this war together; yet ſo, as that we die not vnreuenged. All his other horſes he gaue away vnto ſuch ſicke & wounded ſouldiers as he beſt knew; amongſt whom was one Picenard of Cremona, a captaine who was then in an extream fit of an ague, & had hardly eſcaped the hands of the enemie. The firſt L troups of horſemen and bands of footmen, were ſcarcely out of the camp with their enſignes, but the Turks comming on with a hideous cry, aſſailed them on euery ſide, and many ſharpe ſkirmiſhes were giuen vnto the horſmen as they marched, with ſuch euent that the Chriſtians ſomtime valiantly receiuing the enemies charge, and ſomtime charging them again, repulſed the proud enemy ſtill buſie with them. In theſe continual ſkirmiſhes, Antius Macer Fuchſtat, Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, fighting valiantly was ſlaine, being for his braue armor ſuppoſed by the Turks to haue bin the Generall of the field. And by like miſhap foure and twentie horſmen of great name were alſo ſlaine, and their guidon taken; amongſt theſe were three noblemen, Andreas Reſchius, Chriſtophorus Hernaus, and Georgius Himelbergus. In another place was made a moſt cruell ſkirmiſh with the Saxon horſemen, and them of Miſnia, Thuringia M and Franconia, who followed the Saxons enſigne: of theſe, fighting moſt valiantly, was ſlaine aboue 36 worthie captaines, lieutenants, or ancients; and Chuenricus a principall captaine of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in bonds amongſt the Turkes. Amongſt them which were ſlain, Sebaſtianus Metheſcus, and Iacobus Scullemburgh were of greateſt nobilitie.

An old German ſouldier ieſteth at Lodronius.

The horſemen diſcomfited by the Turks.

A litie. In like manner the horſemen of Auſtria couragiouſly reſiſting the enemie for a ſpace, were in the end ouerthrowne: where amongſt them was ſlaine two valiant noblemen, Fettſick and Hoſchirchius, with diuers other men of great place and reputation both in their own countrey and abroad. But the greateſt ſlaughter was made amongſt the Bohemian horſemen, vpon whom (being diſordered by the Ianizaries harquebuſiers) the Turkiſh troups of the old garriſon ſoldiers breaking in with their ſcimiters and heauie yron maces, made a moſt bloudy execution. The battell of footmen being ſore gauled, and almoſt diſordred in their march by certain companies of Ianizaries and archers of the Aſapi (who from a woodie banke of a marriſh diſcharged their ſhot & arrows continually vpon them, yet neuer comming to handy blowes) was on the other ſide ſo hardly charged by Amurathes with his troups of horſemen of Boſna,

The chriſtian footmen ouerthrowne.

B that being not able longer to keep order, it was at laſt by him broken and cut in pieces: where the Turks with their ſwords and hatchets ſlew the poore Chriſtians without mercie. Lodronius himſelfe carried away with the breaking in and force of the horſemen, was driuen into a marriſh: where after that he being ſore wounded, and almoſt faſt in the deepe mud, had done the vttermoſt of that his laſt endeauour, he by the faire entreatie of the Turks, perſuading him rather to yeeld, than there to be ſlain, ſo yeelded himſelfe, that he with three companies which were with him, after they had layd down their weapons, were all ſaued as valiant ſouldiers: for now the mercileſſe Turks imbrued with the Chriſtian bloud, were weary of ſlaughter, and began greedily to ſeeke after the ſpoile, hunting after them (who flying diſperſedly, thought themſelues to haue eſcaped the enemies hands) with ſuch ſucceſſe, that a great num-

C ber of them was taken and led away for ſlaues: few of the footmen eſcaped, and almoſt all the reſt which were not fled before the battell, were to be ſeen dead vpon the ground.

This ſhamefull ouerthrow at Exek was reported to haue exceeded the moſt grieuous ouerthrowes that the Chriſtians had receiued in any former time: for the flower both of horſe and foot there loſt by the raſhneſſe & fault of an vnluckie Generall, rather than by the valor of the enemie, ruthfully periſhed: ſo that many prouinces were filled with heauines and mourning. For it neuer chanced before (as was to be ſeen by the vnfortunat battels of Sigiſmund the Emperor, and king Ladiſlaus) that the Turks got ſuch a victorie without ſome loſſe: ſo that they which fell almoſt vnreuenged at Exek, may ſeem to haue augmented that loſſe by the great infamie thereof. Mahometes hauing thus almoſt without the bloud of his ſouldiers, obtained ſo

D great a victorie, & taking the ſpoile of the Chriſtian camp, pitched his tents in a little medow, being clenſed of the dead bodies, and after he had merrily feaſted with his captains, commanded the chiefe priſoners, the goodly ſpoiles, and faireſt enſignes to be brought vnto him: and openly commending the captaines who had that day done any good ſeruice, commanding diuers bags of mony to be brought vnto him by the receiuers, he with his own hand rewarded the ſoldiers, ſome with gold, ſome with ſiluer, according to their deſerts: And cauſing all the priſoners which were not common ſoldiers to be brought forth, he diligently viewed them, and preſently cauſed euery one of their names, and the office they bare, to be inrolled by his clerks: and vnto ſuch as brought in the heads, eares, or hands of the Chriſtians with rings vpon them, he forthwith cauſed one reward or other to be giuen. Lodronius, when as by reaſon

Lodronius ſlain

E of his deadly wounds he was thought vnable to indure trauel, or to be brought aliue with the other priſoners to Conſtantinople, was ſlain by his keepers, and his head afterwards ſent thither. For, as many noble gentlemen (and amongſt others, Laurentius Streipeng and Dietmarus Loſeſtaine) haue reported, (who ranſomed afterwards, returned home again to their wiues and children) amongſt the priſoners which were together with the faire enſignes and other gallant warlike furniture (eſpecially gilt armor and headpieces) preſented by Mahometes his meſſengers to Solyman, three of the greateſt captaines heads were in a ſiluer baſon there ſeene and known; which were the heads of Paulus Bachitius the valiant Hungarian captain, Antonius Ulacer Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, and Lodronius Generall of the footmen: which after the tyrant had looked a ſquint vpon, as abhorring that loathſome ſight, he with ſterne countenance

Three of the great captains heads preſented to Solyman at Conſtantinople.

F commanded all the priſoners to be ſlaine. But vpon the interceſſion of the Ianizaries (who intreated for them, as valiant men, to whom they had at the time of their taking paſt their faith, and might afterwards do him good ſeruice) he changed his countenance, and ſaued many of them. But Cazzianer flying to his owne caſtle, was of all men accuſed as a wicked forſaker of his owne campe and enſignes, and commonly railed vpon, as the eternall infamie of his countrey, and authour of the publique calamitie: ſo that it was reported, that he durſt neither goe abroad, nor ſhew his face for ſhame. He was ſo generally hated, that infamous libels, made againſt him & the other captains which ſhamefully fled as he did, were commonly ſung in the ſtreets by boyes in all places of Germanie. Wherewith he was ſo much grieued, that hee requeſted of K. Ferdinand, that he might ſafely come to the court, to anſwer whatſoeuer could be laid againſt him: which his requeſt the king eaſily granted, and when he came to the court, receiued him with doubtfull countenance. But when the hearing of his cauſe was by the king ſomewhat longer protracted than he would haue had it, and he in the meane time kept vnder ſafe cuſtodie; impatient of ſuch delay, and halfe doubtfull whether he ſhould be quitted or condemned, thought it better to flie, than to abide the triall. So feigning himſelfe ſicke, and ſcraping vp by little and little with his knife a bricke pauement vnder his bed, and ſo in the night getting out one bricke, firſt and then another, at length brake thorow the vault, & with his ſheets letting himſelfe downe, eſcaped, hauing poſt horſes readie for him without the Caſtle. Not long after, as he was a man of a haſtie and vnconſtant nature, deſpairing of his eſtate, he fled to the Turks; Mahometes gladly receiuing him, and beſide his great entertainment, promiſing him the gouernment of all Croatia in manner of a tributarie king, if he would faithfully ſerue Solyman, and helpe him in the ſubduing of the cities of Auſtria. After he had agreed vpon all the conditions of his reuolt, that he might return to Mahometes with ſome more credit, he began boldly to deale with Nicholaus Sirenus a Nobleman of Croatia, and his deere friend, as he ſuppoſed, to reuolt with him; aſſuring him, that Solyman would deale as kindely with them both, as he had before with king Iohn in the kingdom of Hungarie. Sirenus promiſed him he would, or at leaſt made as if he promiſed to do what he deſired, and ſo agreed as it were vpon the matter, promiſing to goe ouer with him to the Turke with a troupe of his beſt and moſt truſtie horſemen. But Sirenus conſidering with himſelfe the hainouſneſſe and impietie of ſo great an offence, changing his purpoſe, choſe rather to deale treacherouſly with his old friend, fearing no ſuch thing in his houſe, than to offend both againſt God and his Prince. Wherefore after he had well feaſted Cazzianer in his houſe, he as a moſt cruell hoaſt, cauſed him to be ſlaine, and ſent his head to King Ferdinand: in reward whereof he receiued of the Kings gift Cazzianer his caſtle, with all his ſubſtance.

The Emperour, the Venetians, and the Biſhop of Rome, enter into a confederation againſt the Turks.

In the meane time the Venetians, prouoked by the Turks with diuers iniuries both by ſea & land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly beſieging Corcyra, and with moſt barbarous crueltie waſting the Iland, had broken the league, & euen then by his lieutenant Caſsimes Baſſa beſieged Epidaurus and Nauplium, two of their cities in Peloponeſus) reſolued without delay to make warre likewiſe vpon him, who for a ſmall treſpas would admit no excuſe or recompence. Whereunto they were alſo animated both by Charles the Emperor, and Paulus the great Biſhop; who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, thought it more for the ſafetie of their eſtates, by giuing aid to the Venetians, to keepe the Turks buſied further off, than to ſuffer them to acquaint themſelues too much with the ports of Italy and Sicilia. Wherefore all the Winter following they labored by their Embaſſadors, to ſet down what number and what manner of ſhips, what ſouldiers, what money was to be prouided, and how to be according to their eſtates apportioned, for the ſetting forth of a ſtrong fleet againſt the next Summer, to be ſent into Grecia againſt the Turks. At laſt it was agreed amongſt theſe confederat Princes, by their Embaſſadors at Rome, That the Emperour ſhould furniſh and ſet forth 82 gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the Biſhop 36, to make vp the number of two hundred gallies; that the Venetians ſhould lend vnto the Biſhop ſo many gallies readie rigged, as he ſhould deſire, to be furniſhed by him with mariners and ſoldiers; and that the Emperour and the State of Genoa ſhould find ſufficient ſhipping for the tranſportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals alſo of this great fleet to be ſet forth, were at the ſame time appointed: Andreas Auria for the Emperour, Vincentius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimanus Patriarch of Aquilea for the Biſhop; to whom was ioyned Paulus Iuſtinianus one of the chiefe Senatours, a man of great experience in ſea matters. It was alſo agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicilie, ſhould haue the commanding of the land forces, and that whatſoeuer was got from the Turks in that expedition in Grecia, the iſlands, or Dalmatia, ſhould be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had receiued ſo many iniuries from the Turks. The Emperour alſo of his liberalitie promiſed vnto the other Con-federats,

A federats,that they ſhould for reaſonable price haue as much wheat as they would out of Sicilia, without paying any cuſtome.

Solyman vnderſtanding of this confederation and preparation made againſt him by theſe Chriſtian Princes,commanded Barbaruſſa his Admirall to make readie his fleet to goe againſt theſe enemies,and to do all the harme he could vpon the Iſlands ſubiect to the Venetian ſtate.
Which thing Barbaruſſa with great care and diligence in ſhort time performed: and ſo with 130 gallies in moſt warlike manner appointed,with the firſt of the Spring,in the yeare 1538, departed from Helleſpontus directly to Crete; where hauing paſſed the promontorie of Gyamus, which at this day is called Sparta,he vnaduiſedly landed moſt part of his men, to haue ſurpriſed the citie Canea, which was in antient time called Sydonia. But Grittus one of the B Venetian Senatours then kept the Citie with a ſtrong garriſon; who from the walls and bulwarks thereof ſo plagued the Turks with great and ſmall ſhot,and the ſallying out of two companies of Italians,that Barbaruſſa hauing loſt many of his men,was faine to retyre againe to his fleet in ſuch haſt,that he left behind him 1000 of his Turks,which were gone further into the Iſland after bootie,who were afterwards all ſlain by them of Crete. After that, he attempted to haue taken diuers places in the Iſland,and was euery where notably repulſed. With the citie of Candia, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, and was in antient time called Cytheum, he durſt not meddle: but ſailing almoſt round about the Iſland, tooke only Cecilia, a little towne before forſaken of the inhabitants,which he ſet on fire,and ſo departed from Crete:for he was aduertiſed, That Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admirall, who was now come to C Corcyra,would in ſhort time come to relieue them of Crete. Auria, Admiral of the Emperors fleet,paſſing the ſtrait of Meſſana,came to Corcyra alſo, and there ioyned with the Venetians.
The Chriſtian fleet was then ſo great that it was thought the Turks durſt not meet it at ſea,but by all means ſhun to giue battell. For Barbaruſſa then lay with the Turkes fleet in the bay of Ambracia, expecting when the Chriſtians ſhould enter the ſtrait entrance thereof, where he had on both ſides placed diuers pieces of great ordnance,to haue ſunk them in their comming in: for Grimanus the Patriarch,a little before departing from Corcyra, had with the great Biſhops gallies begun to beſiege Preueſa,a towne vpon the promontorie of Actium faſt by that ſtrait; and landing ſome of his ſouldiers, with three great pieces of artillerie ſo battered the caſtle of Preueſa,that he was like enough to haue taken it,had not the Turks from Ætolia come D to relieue it with a ſtrong power both of horſe and foot. Wherefore the Patriarch ſhipping againe his men and ordnance,returned to the fleet at Corcyra, not repenting him of his journey, for that he had well viewed the ſtraits of that Bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anchor within it. Vpon the returne of the Patriarch, and relation made, what he had both done and ſeene, the great commanders of the Chriſtian fleet entred into counſell, what courſe were beſt to take for their better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, Generall of the land forces,was of opinion, That it were beſt to land the ſouldiers and great ordnance, and with all their force to aſſault the caſtle of Preueſa: which once tken, and their ordnance there planted,the enemies fleet might in the Bay be vtterly defeated,for that all paſſage to ſea might eaſily be taken from them, by ſinking of one of the great ſhips in the mouth of the E Strait, and by moaring there of three great Galleons full of Artillerie: ſo that if Barbaruſſa would deſperatly aduenture to come out, he muſt needs be ſunke in the mouth of the Bay.
Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counſell was in words and ſhew glorious, but to put in execution moſt dangerous: for that firſt to land the ſouldiers and great artillerie, hee ſaid was a thing too too full of hazard and perill: for it was to be thought,that the Turkes in Ætolia would as they had before done, come with ſpeed with their horſemen to relieue the beſieged in the caſtle; whoſe force the Chriſtian footmen could hardly abide. Beſides that, if the fleet ſhould by force of weather be conſtrained to leaue that coaſt, (as it wel might, Autumne now comming faſt on) after the ſouldiers were landed, From whence ſhould they then get victuall in the enemies countrey? or what reliefe ſhould they hope for, if they ſhould hap F to be diſtreſſed; being on euery ſide beſet with their enemies, and their friends by tempeſt driuen from them? Wherefore he thought it beſt,if the enemie could not be drawne out of the Bay to battell, to go directly into the Bay of Naupactum,and to take that town which was not greatly fortified,and to ranſacke and ſpoile all the townes, euen to the bottom of the Bay of Corinth. Which the Grecians in the Fleet,ſaid might eaſily be done: by taking of which courſe it might ſo fall out, that Barbaruſſa mooued with the danger of his friends, would for ſhame come out and ioyne with them in battell. This counſell of Auria was beſt liked both of Capellius and the Patriarch, being far more deſirous to fight with their enemies at ſea, than at land.

Auria braueth Barbaruſſa lying in the Bay of Ambracia.

Barbaruſſa reproued of cowardiſe by one of the Turkes Eunuchs.

Auria hauing put in order his fleet, came to Preueſa, and ſo to the ſtrait of the bay of Ambracia, where he ſo placed the whole fleet, which was in number 250 ſaile, that it might eaſily of the enemie be numbred. Which ſight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbaruſſa; who although he was of a couragious diſpoſition, and ſuch a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martial diſcipline of the Chriſtians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the ſight of ſo great a fleet ſo well appointed; for a greater had not of long time bin ſeen in the Ionian ſea. So that an Eunuch of Solymans court, ſent by him as Barbaruſſa his companion, ſeeing him to delay the time as a man halfe diſcouraged, did with moſt vnciuil and proud words take him vp, becauſe he would not forthwith go out of the bay and fight with the Chriſtians which lay at the mouth thereof daring of them: wherein he was not (as he ſaid) to regard his owne ſafetie (who as a coward could not endure the ſight of the enemie) but the honour of Solyman his Soueraigne, who would not take it well, to haue the glorie of his name ſtained with ſo ſhamefull a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he profeſſed himſelfe to be, he ought neuer to diſpaire of victorie: and if it ſhould ſo fall out, that fortune ſhould frown vpon them, and not anſwer to their deſires, yet ſhould not Solyman therefore want captaines and ſouldiers better than they, if they were ouercome; and the woods of Pontus would afford him timber enough to build twice ſo great and ſtrong a fleet. And for a concluſion, the inſolent Eunuch willed Barbaruſſa to beware, that whileſt he feared a moſt honorable death (which was vncertain, though the battell were loſt) he drew not vpon himſelfe the certaine danger of a moſt ſhamefull death by the diſpleaſure of Solyman.

Barbaruſſa his anſwere to Salec concerning the Eunuchs ſpeech.

Barbaruſſa putteth out of the bay of Ambracia, and followeth Auria.

At which ſpeech Barbaruſſa turning himſelf about to Salec, one of the arch pyrats, a famous ſea man, ſaid vnto him, We muſt for ought that I can ſee, moſt valiant and faithfull captaine, aduenture this battell, although it be at too much diſaduantage; leſt haply we periſh by the complaints of this barking demie man. And ſo preſently commanded all his fleet to weigh anchor, at the ſame time that Auria had hoiſed ſaile, and was on his way toward the bay of Naupactus, thinking that the enemie durſt not for feare haue come out of the bay of Ambracia. Auria keeping on his courſe, was come to Leucade, when the enemies fleet was deſcried out of the top of Bondelmerius galleon, to be come out of the Bay, & to make towards them, keeping cloſe by the ſhore: which manner of courſe the craftie Turke, miſdoubting his owne ſtrength, held of purpoſe, that if he ſhould chance to be ouermatched by the Chriſtians, he might turne the prow of his gallies vpon them, and running the poups aground, ſo to land his men and great ordnance, and from land as hee might to defend his fleet: accounting it a leſſe loſſe (if the worſt ſhould chance) to loſe the gallies, than the men.

The order of the Turks fleet.

Auria ſomewhat troubled with this ſudden comming out of the enemie, as with a thing which he then leaſt expected, yet notably ſtaid himſelfe, and commanded all the fleet to prepare themſelues to battel, and to follow his Admirall gally. Now all the Turks fleet was come into the open ſea in ſuch order, that Barbaruſſa himſelfe was in the middle battell; where his Admirall gallie was to be ſeene with many purple flagges and ſtreamers flying gallantly in the winde: on his right hand was Tabaches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, euerie one of them hauing almoſt like number of gallies, which were in all 150. Vnto the middle battell were ioyned two wings, in ſuch order, that which way ſoeuer the Admirall turned, they turning alſo, ſtill repreſented the forme of a flying Eagle: ſo that (as Auria himſelfe afterwards confeſſed) a more firme or orderly fleet could not haue bin brought out by any expert captain. Before the fleet, came about 20 nimble gallies conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Chriſtians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requeſting him, That he with his gallies might giue the firſt charge vpon the enemy: to whom Auria gaue great thanks, and praiſing his forwardnes, requeſted him to follow him, to whom he would in good time giue a ſigne what he would haue done. The formoſt of the Turks light gallies was now come to the great galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the formoſt of the Chriſtian fleet, whereunto were ſent alſo certaine gallies from Salec, to helpe to aſſaile that tall ſhip; which ſhooting a far off, did no harme, neither

A Bondelmerius them; who would not ſuffer one piece to be diſcharged; for he being an expert ſea man, and loth to ſhoot in vain, expected that they ſhould come neerer vnto him, and then vpon the ſudden to diſcharge all his great ordnance vpon them. Neither was he deceiued in that his expectation, for the Turks comming neere vnto him, were ſo ouerwhelmed with the great and ſmall ſhot out of the galleon, that they were glad to ſtay their courſe, and retyre. In the meane time Auria called backe again the ſhips which were gon before, and cauſed his galleon to be towed out; and by boats of purpoſe ſent out, charged the captains of the gallies to make themſelues readie to fight, vpon ſignal giuen by the ſound of the trumpet, and diſplaying of the Admirals enſigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight, with his gallies without his ſhips. Which thing the craftie enemie well perceiued, and therefore ſought by all meanes to ioyne B battel with the gallies, before the comming in of the tall ſhips, which were as caſtles in reſpect of the gallies: for it was then ſuch a calme, that the ſhips were not able to keepe way with the gallies, and the ſmooth water ſeemed to offer a fit opportunity for battell; which ſo wel pleaſed the Patriarch, that many heard him crying aloud to Auria to giue the ſignal, and marueiled much why he deferred to giue battell. For he fetching a great compaſſe, and houering about his ſhips, with his gallies kept ſuch a courſe, that many thought he would vpon a ſudden haue done ſome ſtrange & vnexpected exploit vpon the enemie: but Auria held that ſtrange courſe of purpoſe to haue drawn the enemies gallies within the danger of his great ſhips, who thundring amongſt them with their great ordnance, might haue eaſily ſore beaten and diſordered them, and opened a way vnto his gallies to haue gotten a moſt certain victorie. But the craftie C old Turke doubting by the ſtrangenes of Auria's courſe, to be circumuented with ſome fineneſſe, changed his courſe, and lay ſtill with his own ſquadron of gallies, warily expecting to what purpoſe that ſtrange courſe of the enemie tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before Sun-ſet, begun in diuers places to encounter with the Chriſtians: ſome were in vaine ſtill aſſailing Bondelmerius his great galleon; others with their great ordnance had ſo ſore beaten two tall ſhips (wherein Buccanigra and Mungaia, two Spaniſh captains, were imbarked with their companies) that they were giuen for loſt, many of the ſoldiers and mariners being ſlain. Two other ſhips loded with victual, the one of Venice, the other of Dalmatia, were burnt by the Turks, & ſome few of the men ſaued by their ſhip boats, & by ſwimming to the ſhips neereſt vnto them. In the ſhutting in of the euening Salec tooke two gallies D ſtragling behind the reſt of the fleet, whereof Mocenicus a Venetian, and Bibiena a Florentine, were captains. After theſe gallies, was taken alſo the ſhip of Aloyſius Figuera a Spaniard, although his ſoldiers had for a time fought moſt valiantly. In this ſhip, with Figuera the father, was taken his ſon, a yong gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature; who afterwards preſented to Solyman, turned Turke: and growing in credit in Solymans chamber, after 3 yeres miſerable impriſonment, obtained his poore fathers libertie, and ſent him well rewarded home againe into Spain. Whilſt both the fleets were thus expecting how they might to their moſt aduantage ioyne battell, ſuddenly aroſe a great tempeſt of thunder, lightning, and rain, with a freſh gale of Eaſterly wind: whereupon the Chriſtians ſeeing the Turks hoiſing vp their ſmall ſails, without delay hoiſed vp both ſmall and great to cleere themſelues of the E enemie, and with that faire wind returned again to Corcyra, ſo diſordredly and in ſuch haſt, ſparing neither ſaile nor oare, that it ſeemed rather a ſhamefull flight, than an orderly retreat. So that Auria, a man of ſo great fame at ſea, as that he was called a ſecond Neptune, was that day accounted no captain. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa with the ſame wind purſued the Chriſtians a while, and being not able longer to ſee what courſe they held, by reaſon of the darkneſſe of the night, to haue ſtaid his courſe: for the Admirals had cauſed their lights which they vſed to carrie in the poups of their gallies, to be put out. Whereat Barbaruſſa heartily laughing, ſaid oftentimes in the Spaniſh tongue; Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the darke to hide his flight: noting in him ſuch a feare, as that he without regard of honour, ſought onely how by flight to eſcape. When they were come to Corcyra, they were all generally of F opinion, That by the benefit of that ſudden ſtorme they had auoided a great danger. The Imperials, eſpecially the Genowaies, to excuſe Auria, imputed the cauſe of ſo ſhamefull a flight vnto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receiue any Spaniſh ſouldiers into their gallies, the better to haue withſtood the enemy; and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from ioyning battell; and the rather, becauſe that vpon the comming forth of the Turks fleet, they had hoiſed vp their ſailes tied vp to the yards with ſmall lines, which they might at their pleaſure eaſily cut, and ſet ſaile to flie which way they would. Shortly after came Barbaruſſa with all his fleet to the Iſland of Paxus, about foure leagues from Corcyra Eaſtward, brauing the Chriſtians as if he would haue fought with them, if they durſt come out. Whereat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to euery one of the three great commanders, requeſting them for the honor of the Chriſtians, to repreſſe that proud Turkes inſolencie. At laſt the matter was brought to that paſſe, that the Venetians hauing taken in certain companies of Spaniards, the fleet ſhould be diuided into foure ſquadrons, and ſo to giue battel. But this conſultation was ſo long protracted, that Barbaruſſa fearing the tempeſtuous Autumne weather, hoiſed ſaile, and about the ſeuenth of October returned again into the bay of Ambracia. After the departing of Barbaruſſa, the Generals of the Chriſtian fleet directed their courſe into the Bay called Sinus Rizonicus, to beſiege Caſtronovum, or New-caſtle, a ſtrong town of the Turks ſtanding in that bay, and bordering vpon the Venetian Senators. The Inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Chriſtian religion, and ſome Turkes, liuing moſt part by merchandiſe. Vnto this towne the Chriſtians laid ſiege, and in ſhort time woon it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderfull number of captiues of all ſorts. Three dayes after the taking of the towne, the caſtle was alſo yeelded by the Turkes garriſon; couenanting in vain to depart with life and libertie.

Barbaruſſa braueth the Chriſtians.

Caſtronovum taken by the Chriſtians.

This towne taken by common force, ought of right by the couenants of the league to haue bin deliuered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga reſerued for the Emperor, and Franciſcus Sarmentus with foure thouſand Spaniards all old ſoldiers, left there in garriſon: Capellius the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing ſo much grieued the Senat, (who euer had the ambitious Spaniard in ſuſpect, and now aſſured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of Catarum) that repenting themſelues of the league with the Emperour, they decreed to ſue to Solyman for peace: which they afterwards eaſily obtained, for a ſhort ſpace, by Laurentius Grittus their dukes ſon, and by the helpe of Antonius Rincus the French kings Embaſſador; who then lying at Conſtantinople, in good time told the great Baſſa's, that the league the Venetians had made with the Emperour, was made without the conſent of the greateſt part of the Senat, and that war taken in hand againſt moſt of their wils.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Barbaruſſa put to ſea againe to haue relieued Caſtronovum: but being at ſea, many of his gallies were by the violence of a ſudden tempeſt driuen vpon the Acroceraunian rocks, and there caſt away. It is reported that he loſt there 20000 men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almoſt all alongſt the coaſt of Dalmatia. This ſhipwrack being certainly knowne; Capellius would haue perſuaded Auria to haue preſently purſued Barbaruſſa ſo diſtreſſed: which motion Gonzaga wel liked, as a man deſirous by ſome notable exploit to recompence the diſgrace before receiued at Leucade. But Auria for diuers cauſes not liking of the matter, was ſo ſet down vpon his return to Italie, that he preſently hoiſed ſaile, leauing the Venetian Admirall in ſuch a rage, that he deteſted himſelfe, for ſubmitting himſelfe to another mans power; and wiſhed the captaines there preſent, neuer to ſubiect themſelues to the command of a ſtranger, foraſmuch as that Genoway, either vpon cowardiſe or malicious mind, as an old enemie to the Venetian State, would not proſecute ſo manifeſt a victorie, but put vp ſo ſhamefull a diſgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made ſmall reckoning, referring all that he both ſaid and did, ſo far vnto the Emperours commodity, that Valerius Vrſinus a noble gentleman then ſeruing in the Venetian pay, merrily ſaid, That Auria had done nothing but wiſely & politickly, in ſetting the Venetians together by the ears with the Turks, & opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not: ſo as the emperor himſelf could not haue better wiſhed, and that without the loſſe of one gallie. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, would ſort to the great good of the Emperor, when as the Venetians worne out and ſpent with thoſe long and chargeable wars againſt ſo mightie an enemy, ſhould be ſtripped of their lands and territories either by force, or ſome hard compoſition wrung from them by neceſſitie.

Auria neglecting to purſue Barbaruſſa, returnes into Italie, to the griefe of the Venetian Admirall.

Caſtronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garriſon of foure thouſand Spaniards there placed, as is aforeſaid, and the Chriſtian fleet diſſolued, Solyman tooke the matter ſo grieuouſly, that hee determined to beſiege it againe both by ſea and land: and in his furie, cauſed

A Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian cities in the country of Peloponeſus, to bee ſtraitly beſieged. Yet tooke he ſingular pleaſure, that Barbaruſſa his Admirall, in all reſpects worſe furniſhed, had driuen out of the ſea the great fleet of the Chriſtians, which hee before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeare 1539, Barbaruſſa by his commandement repaired againe his fleet, & notably furniſhed it with all maner of warlike prouiſion; manning his gallies for the moſt part with Ianizaries and other ſuch ſelect ſoldiers. With this fleet Barbaruſſa (Sommer now wel come on) departed out of the Heleſpontus, and came to the bay Riſonicus; at which time alſo Vlames the Perſian then Gouernor of Boſna, ſhewed himſelfe with his forces vpon the mountains, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbaruſſa before he entred the ſtraits of the bay, ſent before B him Dragut and Corſetus, two notable pirats, with thirty galliots, who landing their men neere vnto Caſtronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being ſlaine and taken priſoners. After that came Barbaruſſa with 90 gallies, and 3 tal ſhips which carried the artillerie for batterie and other neceſſarie prouiſion for the campe; where he ſpent three daies landing his great ordnance & caſting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night by reaſon of the continuall ſhot out of the towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three days ſpace ſlaine aboue 1000 Turks: amongſt whom was Agis Hariadenus, who had made himſelfe as it were a king at Taiorea, a citie neere Tripolis in Africa; whoſe death much grieued Barbaruſſa, as one of his moſt antient and beſt friends. At length Barbaruſſa hauing caſt vp his tren- C ches, landed foure and fiftie great pieces of artillerie for batterie; whereof he gaue a fourth part to Vlames to batter the towne on the North ſide, whileſt he in the meane time, in three diuers places battered the Eaſt ſide, and Salec from ſea with ten gallies, did morning and euening batter another part of the wall. Whileſt Sarmentus was thus in ſo many places aſſailed, and did what was poſſible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had diſplaied their enſignes, they from thence with their ſhot ſore troubled the Spaniards. At the ſame time alſo, Vlames had made a breach, and was ready on the other ſide of the citie to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus ſeeing no means longer to defend the city, commanded the hurt ſoldiers to get them into the caſtle below, & the reſt with him to take the market place, there to die together like men: where the Turkes ſtraight way D breaking in on euery ſide vpon them, made a moſt cruell and bloudie fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with ſhot, and the multitude of their enemies, were ſlaine almoſt euerie man. Sarmentus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and wearied with long fight, ſeeing Sancius Fria a captain ready to flie, ſharply reproued him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarrie by it, vntill they were both together ſlaine. Many valiant captaines were there loſt, whoſe names for breuitie I omit. Aloyſius Arius, and certaine other captaines who together with the wounded ſouldiers were got into the caſtle, ſeeing no means to defend the place, yeelded themſelues: whom Barbaruſſa according to his promiſe, tooke to mercie in ſparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuitie to Conſtantinople. The dead bodie of Sarmentus could not be knowne amongſt ſo many heaps of the dead, although Barbaruſſa had E cauſed moſt diligent ſearch to be made for it, and offered great ſums of money and libertie alſo, to whoſoeuer could recouer it; being deſirous to haue ſent his head for a Preſent to Solyman. Barbaruſſa proud of this victorie, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a citie of the Venetians in the bottome of the ſame bay: and thereupon writ threatning letters to Ioannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senatours then Gouernour of the citie, preſently to deliuer the citie; which he would (as he ſaid) otherwiſe aſſault by force. Whereunto Bembus anſwered againe by letters, that in ſo doing he ſhould violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he ſhould find him readie by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbaruſſa diſpleaſed ſent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay; who diſcharging certaine great pieces at the citie, made ſhew as if they had come to beſiege it. At whom Bembus as a man of good courage cauſed as many mo like pieces to be diſcharged, and ſhewed his men vpon the wals: Which thing Barbaruſſa perceiuing ſtaid his courſe, and calling backe his gallies, returned to Caſtronovum, from whence (better appeaſed with Preſents afterwards ſent from Bembus) he departed out of that bay.

pacified, and ſuch friendſhip (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) now growne betwixt theſe two great princes, that moſt men thought that all other quarrels laid aſide, they would now at length with vnited forces goe againſt the great and dangerous enemie of Chriſtendome: which opinion not altogether of the wiſer ſort beleeued, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinarie and rare courteſies then paſſing betwixt them, which concerne not this hiſtorie; as alſo, in that two of their moſt famous captains, Alphonſus Vaſtius, and Hanebald, were as it were with one conſent by them both ſent embaſſadors to Venice to haue drawn the Venetians into the confederation of that war againſt the Turke. Which two renowned captains comming to Venice, moſt gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence receiued, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in euery place to behold them ſo noble captains ſent from ſuch mightie princes; but eſpecially Vaſtius, whoſe fame hauing many times before filled their eares, made them now the more deſirous to ſatisfie their eies alſo with the beholding of his tall and comely perſon. Which two famous captaines admitted into the Senate, for that purpoſe fully aſſembled, and audience giuen: Vaſtius ariſing from the dukes ſide, in theſe or like words deliuered their embaſſage.

Vaſtius his Oration to the Venetian Senat.

It is come to paſſe (as I ſuppoſe) by the great prouidence of Almightie God, and of all the Diuine powers (moſt noble Duke and honourable Senatours) that two of the moſt mightie Kings of Europe, who of late had of long time made mortall warres one vpon another, touched with the Zeale of religion, are become great friends: vndoubtedly to that purpoſe onely, that hauing made a firme peace, they may bring ſuch a generall quietneſſe to the long troubled and afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, as beſt beſeemeth their greatneſſe; and taking in hand a ſacred war, to reuenge ſo many calamities receiued from the Infidel. That this might be made knowne vnto you (moſt noble Venetians) theſe mightie Monarchs haue ſent vs hither in good time to kindle in you the like Zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you haue alwaies for the honour of your State bin inflamed: for you of all others, which are of ſuch power and valour at ſea, they wiſh for, as their fellows and confederats in this ſacred war and hoped victorie; and thinke you worthie, which ſhould enioy the eſpeciall fruit of al that labour. Foraſmuch as the Chriſtian forces once renewed, and ſo great and ſtrong a fleet once aſſembled, euery man ſeeth that the Turks muſt needs be too weake: although they brag, that they carried away the victorie of late at Actium, when as they then eſcaped the victorious hands of our men, not by their owne valour, but by the vnexpected hap of a ſudden ſtorm. For all the powers of heauen and earth, and of the ſea alſo, will be propitious vnto vs, vniting ſo great forces, in regard of our ſacred religion; and will ſo take away the hearts of the Infidels, that they ſhal learne to be ouercome. As for our land forces, wee are to hope nothing but well, foraſmuch as vnto thoſe which the Emperour of late brought into the field at Vienna, and cauſed the Turkiſh Emperour to flie, ſhall be ioyned not onely all the horſemen and infanterie of Fraunce (a wonderfull ſtrength) but Sigiſmund alſo King of Polonia will without delay bring foorth his armies, wherewith he hath beene vſed in the quarrell of the Chriſtian Religion happily to fight againſt the Infidels: ſo that it is not to be doubted of a moſt certaine and aſſured victorie. Wherefore the victorious Emperor and moſt Chriſtian king Francis moſt inſtantly requeſt you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceiued for the general good of the Chriſtian name, and religiouſly to embrace the hope of a moſt true and glorious victorie: and further exhort you, by a wholſome decree to auert your religious and couragious hearts from the friendſhip of the Infidels: for it may worthily ſeeme vnto your moſt honourable minds, a moſt foule and ſhamefull thing, to haue renewed your league, and to haue preferred an infamous and vncertaine peace, before a moſt religious and iuſt warre. Neither doth it beſeeme this moſt wealthie State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of warre, be they neuer ſo great: for if wee ſhall once ouercome, which is incident to this preſent and long wiſhed occaſion, wee ſhall by the profit of one victorie, either by ſea or land, to your incomparable praiſe recompence all the loſſes by vs in former times receiued.

The anſwere of the duke to Vaſtius.

Whereunto the duke in the name of the whole State anſwered, That there neuer happened any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honorable, for the manner of the embaſſage, or for the publick ſecurity of their ſtate, more to be deſired than the hope of ſuch a peace: after that two moſt mightie kings by two ſuch famous captains their embaſſadors, did certifie them of their attonement & aſſured peace, moſt glorious to themſelues, to their eternal praiſe, whole-

A wholeſome alſo to the Venetian State, beſet with ſo many dangers, and wonderfully to bee wiſhed for of all the other princes of Chriſtendome, if they would ſincerely and religiouſly with their forces by common conſent vnited, reſolue vpon that ſacred war: for then would not the Venetians bee wanting to themſelues or the Chriſtian common-weale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a diſhonourable peace, but with armes and victory. Wherefore it was to be requeſted of Almightie God by prayer, That thoſe puiſſant Kings would with religious & happie euent ſpeedily & ſeriouſly fulfil all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall diſcourſes and embracings in ſhew promiſed vnto the world.

In few daies after, certain of the ſelect Senators ſitting in counſell, after the manner of that State, called the embaſſadors vnto them, and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the B articles & capitulations wherein that league and confederation was to be concluded? and by the way, Whether they thought the Emperour in regard of that peace would giue vnto the French kings ſon the Dukedom of Millain, as was reported? Whereunto Hanebold the French embaſſador anſwering nothing, Vaſtius ſaid, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great princes had agreed of betwixt themſelues, and that the Emperour had deſired the peace, as one willing to help the afflicted & declining ſtate of the Chriſtian common-weale: which thing any man might ſee could not be effected, or brought to paſſe, but that the Emperor muſt in many things yeeld to the requeſts of the French king, and redeeme his good will: for the noble mind (ſaid he) worthie Senators, can eaſily make light of the greateſt loſſe of his owne C things, when it foreſeeth a large way opened therby to eternall fame and glory. Theſe words were very glorious & gracious to the hearers: but they, as men of great experience, could not let it ſinke in their minds, that the Emperour whom they had often deeply ſounded, would euer part with the Dukedome of Millan, which onely thing the French king required, and had for the recouering therof vnfortunatly ſtriuen almoſt 20 years, to the trouble & diſquiet of a great part of the world. The nobilitie and authoritie of this embaſſage more moued the Senat than did the other former embaſſadors, Didaco Mendoza, a Spaniard, and Gulielmus Pellicerius, a Frenchman, then both preſent; yet was it much ſuſpected by the Venetians, becauſe it contained no certaine reſolution, but only the bare hope of a future peace; ſo that it was by many men ſuppoſed to be but a matter deuiſed to deceiue others, and to ſerue the Emperors D turne to his great profit. Yet all the cunning ſeemed to reſt in this point, That the Venetians led on with the hope of this league, ſhould neglect the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almoſt expired. Vpon which vncertainty of other mens reſolutions, the graue Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vpon this queſtion of this new league and confederation to be made with theſe Chriſtian princes againſt the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully diuided: ſome fauoring the Emperours requeſt, inueighed againſt the renewing of that ſhameful league with the Infidels, which they ſaid was nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray vnto them the other parts of Chriſtendom, & eſpecially Italie, deſtitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; & with many reaſons vrged the honourable confederation with theſe Chriſtian E princes: others of a deeper reach, conſidering what infinit harmes they had from time to time receiued by falling out with the Turks, & ſuſpecting alſo the Emperors drift, and ioining thereunto the conſideration of the great dearth then raigning in the citie, which was not to be relieued but out of Macedonia & Grecia, the Turks countries; the emperor hauing at that time as it were of purpoſe impoſed ſo great a cuſtome vpon all corne to be tranſported out of Sicilie, that the very cuſtome came to as much as both the price of the corne & the fraight together: al which miſchiefs they ſaid were to be preuented by renuing the league with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senat too & fro, either part hauing great fautours: ſo that the Senatours ſpent almoſt whole Winter nights in the court in diſcourſing and conſulting what were beſt to be don: but whatſoeuer was there ſaid or decreed, was forthwith F by one of the factions or other made known, not only to the embaſſadors preſent in the city, but by letters alſo diſcouered into prouinces far off: a thing neuer before in that ſtate known, which had euer vſed as it were with a religious ſilence to keepe ſecret whatſoeuer was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foſcarus, an old Senator & a man of great wiſedom, perceiuing, ſaid openly, That the ſtate was betraied by the multitude and corruption of voices, and muſt needs ſhortly periſh, if it were not ſpeedily committed to the graue & faithfull iudgement of

The Venetian Senators diuerſly affected towards the confederation with the Emperour and the French king againſt Solyman.

Foſcarus a graue Senatour.

ſome

Foſcarus diſgraced by the multitude.

ſome few: for there was almoſt two hundred of them which gaue voices, reducing the multitude to the number of fiftie, who for their experience and loue toward their countrey, were holden for men of greateſt grauitie and ſecrecie: ſo was the madneſſe of many ſtaied by the diſcretion of a few. But Foſcarus ſhortly after fell into ſuch hatred of the multitude, grieuing to be as light headed men without diſcretion, ſo excluded out of the counſell, that he was by the voices of the multitude firſt thruſt out of the counſell himſelfe, and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the citie: being indeed one of the graueſt Senatours, and a man of deepeſt iudgement. Which diſgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreſeene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterouſly reuealed the ſecrets of the State.

The Venetians ſent Aloyſius Badoerius their Embaſſadour to Solyman, to conclude a peace.

But this long conſultation concerning the confederation, came to this end, That the Senators doubting the vnion of thoſe two great princes, and yet willing to expect the euent, decreed forthwith to ſend three embaſſadours; whereof two ſhould be ſent to the Emperour and the French king to diſcouer their deſignes, and the third, which was Aloyſius Badoerius, a wiſe and well ſpoken man, was with all ſpeed diſpatched away to Solyman, to preuent the fame of the diſtruſt to be conceiued of the agreement of theſe great Chriſtian princes, and if he could by any meanes, to ſpare for no coſt, to ſaue vnto the Venetians their cities of Nauplium and Epidaurus, which Solyman required of them before hee would graunt them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and craftie tyrant, then to yeeld vnto neceſſitie, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions: which courſe the Decem-viri thought to be moſt expedient for the State: yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gaue him ſecret inſtructions and warrant, fearing forſooth the force and tumult of the headſtrong multitude, who if they had knowne any ſuch thing, would vndoubtedly thereupon haue taken occaſion to haue croſſed and ouerthrown that moſt wholeſome decree: for there was no doubt, that if they had delaied the matter, and ſought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weakneſſe and neceſſitie haue increaſed his inſatiable deſire, and not granted them peace, being brought low and forſaken, except they would deliuer vnto him the Iſlands of Cephalenia, Zacinthus, & Corcyra, a matter no leſſe grieuous than the deſtruction of the very city of Venice it ſelfe. So that the great embaſſadors Vaſtius and Hanebald, who came of purpoſe to haue hindred the league with the Turk, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreſeeing the danger of their ſtate, ſhould as they did, make haſt to conclude the ſame: for it falleth out in mens purpoſes & actions, That a good and happie ſucceſſe otherwiſe well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was ſent by the French King but for faſhion ſake, and ſecretly vnderhand by Pellicerius the old embaſſadour, perſuaded the Venetians to haſten the concluſion of peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embaſſador was carefully ſoliciting the matter at Conſtantinople, & being loth to yeeld the ſtrong cities which Solyman required, offering vnto him in ſtead of them a great ſum of mony: Solyman took him vp with threatning words as a ſhameleſſe diſſembler, earneſtly proteſting, That he would neuer grant him peace, without the yeelding of thoſe cities, rehearſing vnto him the moſt ſecreteſt points of his embaſſage, and how that he was authoriſed from the Decem-viri to yeeld them vnto him: which thing the embaſſadour little thought Solyman had knowne. Wherefore Badoerius ſo ſhamefully reproued, & ſtanding in doubt of his life, ſeeing the greateſt ſecrets of his embaſſage reuealed to Solyman and his Baſſaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding vnto him Nauplium and Epidaurus, two cities in Peloponeſus, and with them Nadinum and Labrania, two caſtles of Dalmatia, to the great griefe of the whole Senate: for granting whereof the common people ignorant of the ſecret decree of the Decem-viri, and ſuppoſing that Badoerius had giuen away that which he had no authoritie to giue, were ſo inraged againſt him at his returne, that there was much adoe to ſaue the guiltleſſe man from exile, and his goods from confiſcation, although the traitors were then knowne which had diſcouered the ſecrets of the ſtate vnto the Turkes. Theſe were Mapheus Leonius a Senatour, and Conſtantinus Cobatius, Secretarie to the colledge of the Decem-viri, and Franciſcus Valerius, one of the Senatours baſe ſonnes, the traiterous diſperſer of the Turks money for the corruption of others: who with other his complices were for the ſame fact hanged in the market place, when as Leonius and Cobatius were a little before fled into France.

The moſt ſecret decree of the Venetian Senat made knowne to Solyman.

1540

A peace concluded betwixt the Venetians and Solyman.

The traitours which reuealed the ſecrets of the Venetian ſtate to Solyman executed.

A About the ſame time, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepuſius king of Hungarie, Solymans tributarie, after whoſe death enſued great wars in Hungarie, and the lamentable ſubuerſion of that flouriſhing kingdome: for the better conceiuing whereof, it ſhal not be amiſſe with as much breuitie as the plainneſſe of the hiſtorie will permit, to open the cauſes and grounds of the endleſſe calamities which afterwards enſued, and neuer tooke end, vntill that warlike kingdome was to the great weakning of Chriſtendome vtterly ſubuerted.

King Ferdinand and this tributarie king Iohn, had with like deſire of peace and quietneſſe, made betweene them a league, profitable to them both as their eſtates then ſtood, rather than honorable: yet moſt welcome to the Hungarians, who diuided into factions, and hauing followed ſome the one king and ſome the other, enioyed neuertheleſſe their lands and goods by B the benefit of this peace, the townes and caſtles being ſtill kept by them in whoſe poſſeſſion they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was comprized, That Ferdinand ſhould from thenceforth call Iohn by the name of a king, whereas before he had both in his common talke and letters called him by the name of the Vayuod only: It was alſo expreſly ſet downe in the ſame articles of peace, and ſubſcribed by the hands of diuers of the nobility of Hungary, That if king Iohn ſhould die, king Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the whole kingdome of Hungarie: Which condition was ſuppreſſed and kept very ſecret for feare of Solyman, who accounted of that kingdom as of his owne, gotten by law of armes, and beſtowed vpon king Iohn as vpon his vaſſaile: neither was it to haue bin thought, C that if he ſhould haue knowne thereof (being of a hauty mind by nature, and not able to indure any iniurie) he would haue ſuffered that kingdome, got and defended with ſo great danger and coſt, to be by the Will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemie.

The ſecret confederation betwixt king Ferdinand & king Iohn reuealed.

This matter of ſo great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronimus Laſcus embaſſador for king Ferdinand to Conſtantinople, reuealed vnto Solyman and the Baſſaes, to bring King Iohn into hatred. So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwiſe greatly to haue bin commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and deſire of reuenge: when after the death of Aloyſius Grittus, he fell from the friendſhip of king Iohn, being (as is before declared) by him committed to priſon, and hardly afterwards inlarged, at the requeſt of king Sigiſmund. Whervpon Solyman being exceedingly angry with king Iohn, called him vnthankfull churle, and turning himſelfe about to Lutzis Baſſa his brother in law, ſaid, How vnworthily doe D theſe two Chriſtian kings weare their crownes vpon their faithleſſe heads, who as ſhamefull deceiuers are not afraid, either for worldly ſhame or feare of God, for their profit to falſifie their faith? But king Iohn vnderſtanding therof, & wonderfully fearing his own eſtate, did by good friends and rich Preſents, pacifie Solyman againe, laying all the blame vpon king Ferdinand, as better able to beare it. Nor long after, king Iohn hauing ſet his kingdome in good order, and ſtrongly fortified the citie of Buda, being now far ſtricken in yeares, at the earneſt requeſt of moſt of the nobilitie of Hungarie, & other his beſt friends, married Iſabella the daughter of Sigiſmund king of Polonia, a gracious ladie and of great ſpirit: which king Sigiſmund, had long before married Barbara king Iohns ſiſter, after whoſe death he maried the lady Bona Sfortia, the daugh- E ter of Ioannes Galeacius duke of Millain, by whom he had this ladie Iſabella whom king Iohn now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of, hauing many times by way of talke before condemned the ſingle life of the king: but king Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreſeeing, that the Hungarians (if the king ſhould chance to haue a ſon) would forthwith looke vpon him as their naturall king, and reiect himſelfe as but a ſtranger.

King Iohn in his old yeares marrieth Iſabella king Sigiſmunds daughter.

The Queene with child.

This yong queene in ſhort time (as he had feared) conceiued with child, and was now very big when king Iohn was inforced to make an expedition in perſon himſelfe againſt Maylat (famous for the death of Aloyſius Grittus) and Balas both Gouernors of Tranſyluania: whereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayuod or Gouernor, ſought to make himſelfe king. But Solyman deteſting the impudent arrogancie of the faithleſſe man, and hating him for the F death of Grittus, and the Turks ſlaine with him, aduertiſed king Iohn of all the matter, wiſhing him to be more circumſpect, whom hee truſted with the gouernment of ſo great and rich a countrey. So Maylat ſhamefully reiected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdome, fearing alſo to be thruſt quite out of his gouernment by king Iohn, thought it beſt for his owne ſafetie to raiſe vp all the prouince into rebellion, and to take part with king Ferdinand: which thing Ferdinand by his diuers agents ſecretly furthered to the vttermoſt. For theſe two Kings, although though they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and ſhew made ſemblance of friendſhip, yet in heart they enuied and hated each other, as if they ſhould preſently haue waged war. At that ſame time king Iohn exacted of his ſubiects, and eſpecially of them of Tranſiluania, a great ſum of money, to pay the Turks his tribute, then two yeares behind: Which thing ſerued Maylat and his complices, as a fit occaſion to raiſe the people into rebellion, perſuading them, that there was no reaſon to pay vnto the Turke ſuch a tribute, as would ſerue wel to wage ten years honorable war againſt him: ſo that by that, and ſuch like perſuaſion, all the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifeſt rebellion. To appeaſe theſe dangerous troubles thus ariſing, king Iohn ſent certaine of his chiefe nobilitie and beſt captaines with a great power into Tranſyluania, following after himſelfe in his chariot, not yet well recouered of his late ſickneſſe. Theſe noblemen entering in two places into Tranſyluania, and ſcouting vp and downe the countrey, had in ſhort time ſo vſed the matter, that what by force, what by policie, the tumult was well pacified, and diuers of the chiefe offenders worthily executed. Maylat the ambitious author of this ſedition, not able to hold the field againſt the king, and ſeeing himſelfe beſet on euery ſide with his enemies, retired himſelfe with all his wealth into a towne called Fogaras, a place of great ſtrength, which the kings power ſhortly after hardly beſieged: the king himſelfe then lying at Sibynium, the chiefe citie of Tranſyluania, about a mile diſtant from Fogaras, ſicke of an ague, wherinto he was againe fallen through too much care and pains taken in trauelling in that hoat time of the yeare, the daies being then at the longeſt. Whileſt he thus lay ſicke at Sibynium, and his army faſt by at the ſiege of Fogaras, newes was brought vnto him from the court, That the Queene his wife was deliuered of a faire yong ſon: which was no ſooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as men ouerioyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, diſcharging their pieces in triumph, with all other ſignes of ioy and mirth they could poſſibly deuiſe: the noble men came from the camp to reioice with the king, and all the armie was filled with gladneſſe. And for the greater ſolemnitie of this ſo common a ioy, a royall feaſt was prepared, which the noble men would needs haue the king to honour with his preſence, though he were thereto vnwilling, being as yet but a little recouered: howbeit yeelding to their importunitie, he ſuffered himſelfe to be ouerruled and brought to the feaſt by them, which was vnto him the merrieſt and the laſt that euer he made: for willing to ſhew his inward ioy, and to content his nobilitie there preſent, he forgot himſelfe, and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weak bodie: whereby the feauer which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in ſuch ſort, as that he well perceiued he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw faſt on, he made his Will, appointing his yong ſon to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George, Biſhop of Veradium, and Peter Vicche a noble gentleman and his neere kinſman, vntill he came to age: requeſting the reſt of the noblemen to prefer his ſon in the ſucceſſion of the kingdom, before a ſtranger; telling them, That Solyman would vndoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his ſonne, if they would in time ſend embaſſadors vnto him with preſents, and promiſe for his ſonne, that he ſhould raigne as his tributarie as he had done before: and ſo preſently after died.

Queene Iſabella deliuered of a ſonne.

The death of king Iohn.

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings iuſt, of no fierce and rough diſpoſition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a moſt ciuill behauiour, garniſhed with good letters, and thorowly ſchooled in the diuers chances of both fortunes, not meaſuring his actions by the ſtrength of his power, but by the exact rule of deſcretion; for in time of buſineſſe no man was more circumſpect or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any man more courteous or pleaſant. He vſed oftentimes to ſay, That the fauor and loue of valiant men gotten by bountie and courteſie, was the beſt treaſures of a prince; for that courteous and thankfull men, did oftentimes in ſome one worthie piece of ſeruice, plentifully repay whatſoeuer had been beſtowed vpon them: as for ſuch as were vnthankfull, they did to their ſhame beare the teſtimonie of another mans vertue.

The honourable ſaying of king Iohn.

The kings death was kept ſecret vntill ſuch time as the noble men had agreed with Maylat that he ſhould take an oath of his faithfull allegeance to the king, and his ſon his lawfull heire, and ſo ſtill to inioy his former place & gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted. Then calling together the counſel, it was decreed to ſend the ſame embaſſage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet liuing. So were preſently diſpatched away two moſt honourable Embaſſadours ſent out of Hungarie to Solyman.

A ble Embaſſadours, Ioannes Exechius Biſhop of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and Stephanus Verbetius the Chancelor, a man of great yeres, carrying with them ten boles of pure gold curiouſly wrote, 600 of ſiluer, gilt and ingrauen, fortie pieces of purple ſilke and cloath of gold for Turkes gowns, and 50 li. of coyned gold to be paid in the name of two yeres tribute. Which Embaſſadors paſſing directly from Sybinium ouer Danubius into Seruia, and ſo trauelling thorow Thracia, came to Conſtantinople. In the mean time, the dead body of the king was with much heauineſſe carried from Sybinium to Alba Regalis, moſt part of the armie following it, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. After this, the young child was chriſtened and called Stephen, and there preſently crowned with the antient Crowne of King Stephen, who firſt erected that kingdome, & without which the Hungarians neuer accounted their kings lawfully crowned.
B Yet the royal dignitie was by the common conſent of the nobilitie giuen vnto the queen, with condition, that in all publique writings, the names of the ſonne and of the mother ſhould be ioyned, and the kings mony coyned with the ſame inſcription: but the chiefeſt authoritie reſted in George the Biſhop; for he was Treaſurer, and had at his command the caſtles & ſtrong Holds: yet were the ſoldiers with their enſignes and furniture, at the deuotion of Valentinus Thuracus: In the middle betweene theſe two was placed Peter Vicche the kings kinſeman, and by the old king appointed for one of the Tutors of his young ſonne, ſuſpected of neither part, honoured with the name of high Conſtable. But becauſe the name of this George the Biſhop was moſt famous in this wofull war which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labor to ſpeake ſomething of his nature and diſpoſition, that it may be knowne to all poſteritie, by C what policie this war was managed, and how this flouriſhing kingdome by the madnes of the Hungarians came into the hands of the Turks.

A young childe crowned King of Hungarie.

George biſhop of Veradium, one of the kings Tutors, a notable man.

This George was born in Croatia, and brought vp from his youth in the houſe of king Iohn, where vertue and induſtrie neuer wanted reliefe; when as hee vnaduiſedly before had entred into the orders of a monaſticall life, and wearie too late of the ſtraitneſſe thereof, had forſaken his profeſſion. Wherfore being of a very pleaſing nature, and ſtil following K. Iohn driuen out of his kingdome, and long liuing in exile, he woon ſuch credit and commendation for his fidelitie, integritie, and readie counſel in the kings moſt doubtfull and dangerous affairs, that after Sibacchus that worthie Biſhop was by the treacherie of Aloyſius Grittius ſlain at Baxouia, he obtained the great Biſhopricke of Veradium. After that, when he had ſtrengthned his credit D with great wealth, he always as a faithfull counſellor ſwayd and happily ruled both the court and kingdome, to the profit of the king. But he was of ſuch a diuers and pliant nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a moſt readie and excellent man, he ſeemed to be made of contrarie qualities, and borne to do any thing: for in ſaying of his princely ſeruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Chriſtian religion, he ſhewed, or at leaſtwiſe counterfeited ſuch a contrition in his deuout countenance & ſpeech, that a man would not haue thought it could poſſibly be the ſame man, who in the moſt weightie affairs both of war and peace, did moſt ſtoutly ſhew the wonderfull force of a moſt pregnant and couragious wit: for he vſed to keepe whole companies of moſt excellent and readie horſmen, & would ofttimes come forth into the battel armed: he would with often banquets & rewards win the hearts of the ſoldiers, E and after the manner of great chieftains, maintain the honor and credit of his name, both with puniſhment and reward, as occaſion required. Beſides that, no man looked into the wealth of the kingdome more diligently than he, no man did to more profit let to farme the cuſtomes, old mines, feedings, and ſalt pits; no man could deuiſe finer means to raiſe mony, of all others the readieſt way to credit: inſomuch that K. Iohn would confeſſe himſelfe to rain by the eſpeciall induſtrie of that one man: And K. Ferdinand would many times ſay, That he enuied at K. Iohn for nothing he had, but for one hooded fellow, which was better for the defence of a kingdome than 1000 with helmets on their heads. Wherefore this Biſhop hauing taken vpon him the tuition of the yong king, was ſtill buſied in all the weightie cauſes of the kingdome, both ciuil and martiall: he labored with great care, that the Hungarians ſhould agree together F in loue and vnity; and did what he might, prouidently to foreſee, that no tumult or rebellion ſhould any where ariſe, wherby the beginning of the kingdom, yet but weake, might any way be troubled. But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king Iohn, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer again the kingdome of Hungarie, which he had ſo long deſired. Wherunto he was alſo the more prickt forward by the perſuaſion of Alexius Torſo, Ferentius Gharus, Petrus

The fugitiue Hungarians perſuade king Ferdinand to inuade Hungarie.

Bachis, Balthazar Pamphilus, Francus Capolnates, Ianus Caſtellamphus, and Caſparus Seredus, all noblemen or gentlemen of great account in Hungarie, who in the former troubles followed the part of King Ferdinand againſt King Iohn, liued now in exile; theſe all with one conſent told King Ferdinand, That now or neuer was the time when they might be againe reſtored vnto their countrey with honour, and that the war might that Autumne be diſpatched, if he would make haſt, for as much as Winter comming faſt on, would ſtay the comming of the Turkes, and ſuch noblemen of Hungarie as tooke part with the Queene, did not verie well agree together, being vnwilling to be commanded by George the Apoſtata Monke, who (as they ſayd) with great cunning and diſſimulation ſeducing the Queene, and poſſeſſing the Treaſure, enioyed all alone the power of a king: and that they, which for taking part with the right, had long liued as baniſhed men, might now ſafely returne into their countrey, and be honourably preferred by the Queene; the Biſhop (which all commanded) aſſuring them thereof, if they would returne vnto the young Kings Court, vnto their friends and antient Houſes. But they had (as they ſaid) before giuen their faith vnto him, as to a vertuous & faithfull Prince, whom they had preferred before one that was an Hungarian borne: wherefore he ſhould doe both vnaduiſedly and vnkindely, if letting ſlip the occaſion preſented, he ſhould deferre to make warre. For, what could be more diſhonorable to him ſo great a King, and alſo Emperor elect, than by ſhamefull delay to forſake them, being noble and valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then readie with ſtrong troups of horſmen to do him the beſt ſeruice they could. G H I

The German captaines in like manner perſuaded him to take the matter in hand: who as martiall men, expecting ſome one preferment, ſome another, in the armie, were deſirous of honour, pay, and prey, the chiefe comforts of their trauell and perill.

Laſchus diſſuadeth K. Ferdinand from ſeeking for the Kingdome of Hungarie by force, perſuading him rather to requeſt it of curteſie, of Solyman.

But Laſchus the Polonian (who in matters concerning peace and warre ſaw more than all they; as he that knew the diſpoſitions of many Princes, and had ſeene the manners and faſhions of diuers Nations, hauing trauelled thorow a great part of the world, and oftentimes beene Embaſſadour in the Courts of the greateſt Princes) was of a contrarie opinion, and told King Ferdinand plainley, That the Kingdome of Hungarie was to be obtained rather by policie than by force, by crauing it at Solymans hand, to hold it of him by tribute, as king Iohn had done. K

For (ſaid he) that may by petition and faire entreatance be eaſily obtained of that heroicall Prince (who in his vaine humor oftentimes fondly ſeeketh after honour) which will neuer be got from him by force of armes. I thorowly know (ſaid he) Solymans haughtie minde, and the proud diſpoſition of his Baſſa's: he contemneth wealth, and is cloyed with ſo many kingdomes: but they, vpon their inſatiable couetouſneſſe and exceeding pride, deſire nothing, nor perſuade him to nothing more than war. Wherefore it is good to beware, that with the noyſe of this ſudden war you ſtir not vp the Turkes, which lie readie as it were expecting ſuch an occaſion, which cannot be withſtood but by the united forces of the Chriſtian Princes; which might by their generall conſent be done, but that their eyes blinded with fatall darkneſſe cannot ſee it, and the vnity of the Chriſtians now deſperat, ſeemeth by God reſerued to ſome better time: ſeeing that of late the Chriſtian Kings are fallen off, and cannot agree vpon the long expected peace. Is not (ſaid he) the French King deceiued of his hope; and as he would haue it thought, greatly diſhonored with this late vnkindeneſſe? which renewing his old wound, will reuiue in him an endleſſe hatred. Away with all diſſimulations, enemie to graue counſels, and let plaine truth, although vnpleaſant vnto Princes eares, preuent flatterie. Vndoubtedly he being a Prince of no baſe courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with men thorowly grieued) will in his anger, as an enemie poure forth his gold, whereof he hath great ſtore, to croſſe the Emperours deſignes, to trouble the aſſemblies of the States of Germanie, to withdraw the mindes of the Princes, and with bountie to gaine them to himſelfe: who enuying mightily at the Imperiall dignitie, woont to be indifferently giuen to them that beſt deſerued the ſame, to be as it were inueſted in the Houſe of Auſtria, which in this perpetuall ſucceſſion of ſo many Emperours, hath as it were got a right by long cuſtome. Wherefore they will ſecretly conſpire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, will either giue no helpe at all, or elſe too late; at ſuch time as the Turks garriſons ſhall come flying to the ſuccor of the yong king. Neither is there any cauſe why any man ſhould thinke that the gouernors of the Turks countries neere at hand, will for the approch of Winter be ſlacke in this cauſe: for they vndoubtedly, making an honeſt & honorable ſhew, wil take vpon them to defend the fatherleſſe child and L M widow;

A widow; of purpoſe to make an entrance to the ſecret deſire they haue to gaine the kingdom to themſelues: for if you ſhall once ioyne with them in battell, if the beſt happen, and fortune fauour our firſt attempts, truly you ſhall haue war without end, with ſuch an enemie, which will bring with him wealth that will neuer be ſpent, power not to be ouercome, and couragious ſoldiers ſworne to our deſtruction: So will it come to paſſe, and I pray God I be a falſe Prophet, that in ſeeking for the kingdome of Hungarie by warre, you ſhall at length be glad to fight for Auſtria it ſelfe, and your owne kingdome alſo.

This ſpeech ſo moued king Ferdinand, that although he purpoſed to go on with the warre, yet he thought it good by an honorable embaſſage to proue Solymans mind and purpoſe alſo: which to do, no man was thought fitter than Laſchus himſelfe, authour of that counſell, being B vnto him verie well knowne, and familiarly acquainted with all the great Baſſa's of the court. Which ſeruice Laſchus refuſed not, but being furniſhed with all things needfull for ſuch an embaſſage, departed from Vienna towards Conſtantinople.

Laſchus ſent embaſſador from K. Ferdinand to Solyman.

Yet for all that, King Ferdinand perſiſting in his former purpoſe, made withall preparation for wars, truſting vpon the aid of the Emperor his brother, and the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cauſe honeſt enough for them to reuolt, if it ſo ſtood with their preſent profit. But before he would enter into open wars, he ſent Nicholas Countie of Salma to the queen, to ſhew her the inſtruments of the laſt league betwixt the king her late husband and him, & to exhort her to yeeld vp the kingdom, which by the late league was another mans C right; and not by delaying of the matter, to hurt both her ſelfe and her ſon: for K. Ferdinand offered to giue vnto the childe the prouince of Sepuſia, as was before agreed betwixt the two kings expreſly in the league; and to the queen a greater reuenue, and whatſoeuer elſe ſhe had in dowrie. But if ſhe would forget that lawfull league, he threatned, that neither the Emperor Charles his brother, nor he, wanted force wherewith to recouer by ſtrong hand the kingdom, annexed to the houſe of Auſtria both by antient right & the new conſent of moſt of the Hungarian nobilitie. The countie of Salma being receiued at Buda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the preſence of the queen: for George the Biſhop, and Vicche, miſtruſting her womanlike courage, ſaid, ſhe was not to be ſpoken withall, by reaſon ſhe was ſo full of heauineſſe and ſorrow; and that they were of authoritie, as the kings tutors, & readie to giue him both audience D and anſwer. Which opinion of her weakneſſe and want of iudgement, the queen, being a woman of an heroicall and royall ſpirit, tooke as tending ſo much to her diſgrace, that ſhe ſaid ſhe would kill her ſelfe, if the embaſſadors were not permitted to come into her chamber (which was a darke roome hanged with black, as the manner is:) and ſhe ſitting vpon a low pallet negligently attyred, as one that had no care of her ſelfe, wan and pale coloured, but as then ſhedding no teares, yet with voice and countenance ſo heauie, as might ſhew her teares to be rather dried vp with long mourning, than that her ſorrow was any thing abated: for the deſire of bearing rule had now ſo poſſeſſed her minde, that ſhe contemned all the dangers of imminent war, and for defence of her ſoueraigntie reſolued with her ſelfe to call in the Turks. After the countie admitted to her preſence, had with due reuerence and great proteſtation deliuered his E meſſage, ſhe demurely anſwered, That ſuch was the fortune of her ſex and yeares, that being bereft of the king her husband, and perplexed with the dayly griefs both of bodie and minde, ſhe could neither take nor giue counſell, but purpoſed in ſo weightie a cauſe to vſe the aduice of Sigiſmund her father, whoſe integritie and iuſtice was ſuch, as king Ferdinand need no other iudge or arbitrator to end that controuerſie. Wherefore ſhe requeſted a conuenient time and ſpace wherein ſhe might aske counſell of her father; to whoſe iuſt iudgement ſhee ſaid ſhee would ſtand, as ſhe thought the nobilitie of Hungarie would alſo. Which ſmall time of delay if it ſhould be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make war vpon her, ſhe ſaid, that the Emperor and king Ferdinand his brother ſhould ſurely win no great honour, if they ſhould ſo cruelly oppugne her a widow conſumed with teares, and a young child yet crying in his cra- F dle. The Countie ſo ſent away, when hee was returned to king Ferdinand, told him, That the queen was altogether in the power of the Biſhop, and could neither ſay nor doe any thing, but what ſhe had before receiued from him: for he onely (as he ſaid) commanded all; as for the reſt of the nobilitie, they ſhared amongſt them the honors and preferments of the realme, and as men deſirous of credit and gaine, had rather bee the gouernours of the young Prince, than the ſeruants and miniſters of a great and mightie forreine king: all which, he ſaid he had both heard and ſeen. Wherefore all the hope was in war, wherein ſuch ſpeed was to be vſed, as that the Queen with her ſonne vnprouided, and expecting the euent of their embaſſage from Conſtantinople, might be driuen out of Buda before they could take vp arms, or well aduiſe themſelues what to do: and that the Queene ſought delay but to make her ſelfe the ſtronger, and in the meane time to call in the Turke, and ſo to make a more dangerous war. Wherefore if euer he purpoſed to raigne in Hungarie, he ſhould forthwith caſt off all other cogitations, and make readie his forces with all ſpeed poſſible.

King Ferdinand inuadeth Hungarie.

Hereupon K. Ferdinand furniſhed with mony from Charles the Emperor, without delay raiſed a great armie, which he ſent downe the riuer Danubius to Strigoninm, which city had all the raign of king Iohn, continued faithfull to king Ferdinand. The Generall of his armie was Leonardus Velſius a nobleman of Rhetia: who for many cauſes, thought it expedient firſt to open the way to Buda, for almoſt in the middle of the way ſtood Vicegrade, with a goodly Caſtle vpon the top of an hill by the riuer; which towne (but not the caſtle) Velſius after nine dayes ſiege tooke, with the loſſe of about 200 of his men, all the garriſon ſouldiers therein being either ſlain or taken priſoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their captaine. From Vicegrade he paſſed ouer the riuer Danubius to Peſth, which he took, being forſaken of the enemie. Whith like ſucceſſe he tooke the citie of Vacia without loſſe: and remouing thence, and croſſing again the riuer with his fleet, came and incamped before Buda, ſo to terrifie the citiſens, and to diſcouer as far as he could the purpoſe of the queen. Where Perenus, Stephanus Raſcaius, and Franciſcus Francepanes biſhop of Agria, all men of great nobilitie amongſt the Hungarians, reuolted from the queene to king Ferdinand: the Biſhop was reputed for a man of great integritie, and vpon meere conſcience to haue gon ouer to Ferdinand; yet was he by letters from George the kings tutor, challenged to haue reuolted, in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a cardinall. Velſius lay with his armie at the hot baths, about a mile and a halfe from the citie, as if he would rather beſiege it than aſſault it. The Germans lying there, did fetch in bootie round about the country; which was taken in euill part by the Hungarians on their ſide, who ſeeing their own cattell or their friends driuen away, the villages burnt, and the poore husbandmen bound & taken priſoners, fel together by the ears oftentimes with the Germans. On the other ſide they of Buda ſending out their troups of horſmen, skirmiſht with the Germans if they did but ſtir out of the campe, and well defended the villages from the iniurie of the enemie: for Valentinus Thurracens Generall of the queens power, had taken into the citie a wonderful number of light horſemen. Whileſt the armie lay thus incamped, it fortuned that Balthazar Pamphilus a noble Hungarian, ſtraying out of the campe euen vnto the gates of Buda, deſired the warders at the gate to giue him leaue to talke with Valentinus their Generall, for that he deſired to ſee his old friend, and to conferre with him of certaine matters concerning the good of the common ſtate. Which thing being granted by the Generall, he was immediatly receiued into the citie with his troupe of horſemen. Shortly after returning again into the campe, he reported how he had beene entertained by his old acquaintance in the citie: where viewing the garriſon, the great artillerie, and fortification of the citie, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more ſeaſonable time of the yeare. Which thing ſo mooued Velſius, by nature ſuſpitious, and doubtfull of the fidelitie of a ſtranger, that he commanded him in anger to void the campe, becauſe he had without his leaue gone into the city, and vpon his own priuat inſolencie had conference with the enemie, and by amplifying their ſtrength, to haue diſcouraged the armie, by putting them out of hope of victorie. Wherefore Velſius neuer attempting to aſſault the citie, returned again to Vicegrade to beſiege the higher caſtle (wherein the antient crowne of king Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which caſtle he alſo took, with ſomething leſſe loſſe than he had done the lower towne. Not long after, he marched with his armie to Alba Regalis, the citie where the Hungarian Kings were vſually crowned and buried; which by the meanes of Perenus was deliuered vnto him, and a garriſon put into it for king Ferdinand. Theſe things thus done, Velſius retyred again to Strigonium; which hee did the rather, becauſe the Germanes and Hungarians, two rough Nations, could by no meanes agree together, in ſo much as that Velſius the Generall in parting them was wounded in the thigh, and Perenus hurt with a ſtone: beſides that, Winter was now come farre on, and the Souldiours cried out for pay. For which cauſes, Velſius (being alſo ſicke of the Stone) billeted his Souldiours for that Winter

A about the countrey. Yet before that, he new fortified Peſth, and left therein a garriſon; becauſe it was reported, that the Turkes vpon their frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of Buda.

At ſuch time as king Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuaſion of Hungarie, the queene by the counſell of the biſhop had in good time craued aid of the Turks lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon Hungarie, eſpecially of Vſtref gouernor of Boſna (a verie aged man, and of great honor, who had married one of the daughters of Baiazet the old Emperour) as alſo of Mahometes gouernour of Belgrade, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of Dalmatia; from whom ſhe receiued one anſwer, That they might in no caſe without expreſſe commandement from Solyman depart from the places committed to their charge.
B Beſides that, Mahometes was by rewards ouercome by Laſcus, as he paſſed by Belgrade to Conſtantinople, not to ſtir or aid the Queene. Wherefore ſhe, reiected by theſe great captains, certified Solyman by her Embaſſadours, what danger her ſelfe, her ſonne, and the kingdome was in, crauing his ſpeedie aid. Laſchus was not yet come to Conſtantinople, being falne ſicke by the way, but had ſent before, Ptolomeus his Phyſitian to the great Baſſa's, and eſpecially to Lut-zis his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had beſtowed great gifts, and was in hope by him to haue obtained what he deſired: but all in vain; for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his owne right, and that he had before giuen vnto king Iohn; thought alſo that it would redound both to his great profit and glorie, if he ſhould as it were vpon charity take C vpon him the protection of the widow and fatherleſſe childe, in their ſo great diſtreſſe & danger. Wherfore calling vnto him the Embaſſadors, the three great Baſſa's ſtanding by, he ſaid, That he had of his meere bountie before giuen the kingdome of Hungarie vnto King Iohn, to diſcend to his poſteritie, ſo long as they ſhould retaine the kinde remembrance of ſo great a benefit; wherefore to declare his conſtancie, inſeperable from his bountie, he ſaid he would take ſuch a courſe in the matter, as that the Germans his enemies ſhould not long reioyce of the wars they had begun. And in token of friendſhip, and that he had taken vpon him the protection of the yong King, he cauſed to be deliuered vnto the Embaſſadours a royall robe of purple and gold, a buckler with the boſſe moſt curiouſly wrought, a horſemans Mace with a handle of gold, and a ſcimiter with the ſcabberd richly ſet with ſtones; and afterwards wrot D effectuall to Vſtref and Mahometes his lieutenants, That they ſhould without delay aid the queen, and not to make excuſe becauſe it was Winter; threatning them, that if ſhee tooke any harme through their default and negligence, it ſhould coſt them their heads. The queens embaſſadors glad of their good diſpatch, were ſcarce departed from the Turks court, when Laſ-cus came to Conſtantinople; and vnderſtanding by his phyſition the ſucceſſe of the Hungarian Embaſſadors, proceeded for all that in his buſineſſe, and deliuered his meſſage, and vpon reaſonable conditions requeſted the kingdome for King Ferdinand. But when he in ſpeaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperour, as if he would with all the power of Germanie aid his brother; Solyman was ſo mooued therewith, that hee was preſently taken away and committed to priſon: the great Baſſa's, but eſpecially Ruſtan, Solymans ſon in law, a E proud and furious young man, chiding him and ſhaking him vp as worthie of death, for offending with his liberall ſpeech the maieſtie of ſo curteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the king of kings; requiring friendſhip, when in the mean time his maſter moſt impudently made wars in Hungarie.

The Queen craueth aid of Solyman against Ferdinand.

Solyman promiſeth to protect the Queene and her ſon, againſt Ferdinand, and ſends preſents to the yong king.

Laſchus K. Ferdinand his Embaſſador impriſoned by Solyman.

Vſtref and Mahometes the Baſſa's aforeſaid, hauing receiued ſuch ſtrait commandment from Solyman, aſſembled their diſperſed ſouldiers, and by ſhipping brought them down the riuers Sauus and Dranus, into Danubius: for it is a hard matter to performe any great thing by wars in Hungarie without the helpe of a great fleet, for conueying of the great ordnance, victuall, and other ſuch neceſſaries of the armie, from one ſide of the great riuers to the other, as occaſion requireth: but as then being the midſt of Winter, and the North wind blowing hard, F Danubius was ſo frozen on both ſides, that the middle of the riuer was ſcarce open: ſo that the Turks not able to paſſe for the extremitie of the weather, not daring to return for the ſtrait command of Solyman, were inforced in their tents there to abide the hardneſſe of Winter, to ſhew their readineſſe. It is almoſt incredible to be ſpoken, with what patience and reſolution the ſouldiers endured all the extremities of the time, in ſo bare a place, their horſes, which of all other things they hold moſt deere, ſtaruing for cold and want of meat.

The Queen ioyneth her Forces with the Turks, and burneth Vacia.

Peſth in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

The Spring at length comming on, right welcome both to the Turks and the Queen; Mahometes with his Turks and wilde Illyrians, and Vſtref with his ſouldiers of Boſna, entred into Hungarie, with whom Valentinus Generall of the Queenes forces, ioyned alſo, with an army of Hungarians brought from Buda. And the Queene to further the matter, ſent Preſents to the Turks Generals, victualled the campe, and furniſhed them with great ordnance for the beſieging of ſuch cities as were holden by King Ferdinand her enemie. They paſſing ouer Danubius, tooke the citie of Vacia (being but badly defended for king Ferdinand) and putting many to the ſword, after the manner of their barbarous crueltie, burnt the citie. From thence they remoued to Peſth, which was ſo valiantly defended by Barcocius and Fotiſcus, the one a Hungarian captain, the other a German, that the Turks diſpairing of the winning of the citie, and not well relieued with victuall by the Queene then, fearing future want, paſſed again ouer Danubius, and faithfully reſtoring the great ordnance without any more doing, returned again into their owne countries: but in their retyring, the Hungarians by the leading of Ferentius Gnarius, ſlew many of them, amongſt whom was one Achomates one of their beſt and valianteſt captains.

King Ferdnand ſendeth the Lo. William Rogendorffe with an armie into Hungarie.

Buda beſieged.

King Ferdinand aduertiſed of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdome: perſuading the Emperor his brother, not to giue ouer the war ſo fortunatly begun, eſpecially now that the Turks hauing forſaken the queen, were departed & gon. Wherefore the new forces lately before raiſed in Auſtria, Bohemia, Sileſia, and Morauia, for the new ſupply of Velſius his army, were preſently ſent into Hungary, vnder the leading of the Lord William Rogendorff ſteward of the kings houſe, who was then gon as far as Poſſonium to haue relieued them of Peſth; vnto whom, as a more antient and honorable Generall, Velſius gaue place. He, furniſhed with theſe new ſupplies, three moneths victuals, and great Artillerie from Vienna, ioining with the old army, marched directly to Buda, & beſieged it. Ouer againſt the ſtately caſtle of Buda, wherein the queene lay, was a great hill called S. Gerrards mount, ſo high, that the middle thereof was equall with the higheſt place of the caſtle, and from the top thereof they might looke into the ſtreets of the citie, betwixt which hill and the caſtle was a great valley and a deepe ditch. Vpon this hill, Rogendorff to beat the caſtle, and to terrifie the queen, planted his batterie, and ſo ſhooke a new built tower thereof, that it was thought that it would haue ſuddenly fallen; which if it had, yet was it ſuppoſed a dangerous matter to haue aſſaulted it, becauſe it was walled about with a treble wall. But the ſumptuous turrets and the princely galleries of the kings palace in the caſtle, which euery man ſaw Rogendorff might haue beaten down with his great ordnance, he ſpared: but whether of himſelf, or elſe commanded by the king (as loath to deſtroy ſo goodly buildings, as could not without great charges be in long time again repaired) was vncertain. Wherfore by diuers heraulds ſent vnto the queen, he wiſhed her to breake in ſunder thoſe gyues & fetters wherin the Biſhop vnder colour of protection, had faſt bound her ſon and her, and to accept of K. Ferdinands offer, who was ready to beſtow vpon her a goodly ſeigniory, wherein ſhe might moſt honorably liue in quiet, & bring vp her ſon in ſafetie. Which thing if ſhe, as a ſimple woman, and ignorant of her owne danger, ſhould refuſe, and obſtinatly contemne the perill wherein ſhe ſtood, he would forthwith in moſt terrible manner beat downe the palace about her eares. Whereunto the Biſhop in the Queens behalfe anſwered, That ſhe was not ſuch a foole to exchange the kingdom of Hungary for the principalitie of Sepuſia: and that ſhee thought Rogendorff a verie doting and mad old man, who being once before well beaten in thoſe ditches, came now againe like a foole to receiue his vtter deſtruction in full guerdon of his raſh follie: wherefore he ſhould ceaſe to terrifie valiant men, fighting with diſcretion for their naturall king and country, againſt his drunken companie, for that they were nothing troubled with the noiſe of his great ſhot: but yet he ſaid, that he would aboue all the reſt, by way of priuat courteſie, gently requeſt Rogendorff to diſcharge his pieces with a little leſſe noiſe, becauſe he had a ſow at home great with pigges, which terrified with the thundring of his guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the griefe of his gueſts. For the biſhop was of a ſharpe & taunting ſpirit, and ſuch a contemner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the kings orchards burning certain houſes, he in deriſion cauſed two hogs to be hanged vpon the ſame gallows with them. Not long after, Rogendorff remoued his campe from S. Gerrards mount, to a more conuenient place for the battering of the citie, called the Iewes Graues, neere vnto the gate called the Iewes gate.

Rogendorffe threatens the Queene.

The Biſhop his ſcornful anſwer to Rogendorff.

A Which thing the Biſhop ſeeing, after his quipping manner requeſted of Rogendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongully called him a doting old man; for that in remoouing his camp into a more commodious place, he ſeemed to be a proper wiſe man and of good diſcretion, now that he had pitched his tents in a moſt fit place amongſt the dead, both for himſelfe being an old man and almoſt worne with vaine labour, and for his armie there condemned to die with him. Rogendorff thus encamped, begun in two places to batter the wals: Perenus and the Hungarians with the Bohemians neere vnto the gate called Sabatina in one place, and he himſelfe with the Germans betwixt the Iewes gate and the caſtle in another: which was don with ſuch violence, that a great part of the wall was beaten downe, and another part thereof ouercharged with earth, which the defendants had caſt vp on the inner ſide for the ſtrength-B ning thereof, was at the ſame time borne quite out and ſo fell downe, to the wonderfull diſmaying of all that were in the citie. Which faire opportunitie to haue taken the citie, Rogendorff let ſlip, either not well aware thereof by reaſon of the great ſmoke of the artillerie on both ſides, and the duſt ariſing with the fall of the wall which couered all; or els according to his naturall diſpoſition, doing all things leaſurely and ſuſpitiouſly; ſo that a little delay bereft him of the preſent apprehenſion of ſo ſudden a reſolution: and the Germans, vſed more to ſtanding battels than to aſſault, were not to be ſo eaſily brought on to aſſault the breach vpon the ſudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The wal was opened in that place almoſt two hundred paces in length, yet ſtanding almoſt the height of a man, which might eaſily haue beene ſcaled with ſhort ladders; but night was comming now faſt on, wherein the Germans C would not willingly attempt any dangerous matter: ſo that the aſſault was deferred vntil the next morning. Whereas they of Buda in the meane time taking the aduantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence & labor in that night raiſed vp a new rampier in ſtead of the wall that was fallen, euery man without exception putting his hand to the worke. In the morning the Germans comming to the breach, gaue ſuch a fierce aſſault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fotiſcus deſperatly entred into a ſhattered houſe, which ioyned vnto the wall, and certaine other companies, one ſouldier helping vp another, had almoſt recouered the top of the rampier, and were there readie to haue ſet vp their enſignes: when they of Buda with wonderfull conſtancie and reſolution withſtood the aſſailants, George the Biſhop encouraging them, and fighting amongſt them, who hauing laid aſide his hood, was now to be ſeen with his D helmet on his head, running too & fro as need required all alongſt the rampier. At length the Germans ſeeing themſelues to ſtriue in vaine againſt reſolute men, were inforced to retire. In this aſſault Rogendorff loſt aboue 800 men. Perenus was alſo in like maner, but with leſſe loſſe, repulſed at the other breach he had made at the gate Sabatina. After that, Rogendorff attempted by vndermining to haue taken the city, but was by countermines diſappointed of his purpoſe. Yet for all this, they in the citie began to feele the want of many things, ſo that it ſeemed they were not able to indure any longer ſiege; the common people pinched with hunger, crying openly out in mutinous ſort, that it was time to yeeld and make an end of thoſe common miſeries: but ſuch was the authoritie of the Biſhop, with his prouident foreſight of all vrgent euents, that once ſhewing himſelfe in the market place as if he would haue preached, he E could turne the peeuiſh minded people which way he pleaſed.

A great breach in the wals of Buda.

The Germans aſſaulting the breach, are with loſſe repulſed.

After all this, it miſſed but a little, but that this citie which could not by enemies force be woon, had by ſhamefull treaſon bin loſt: there was at that time in Buda one Bornemiſſa a lawyer, who had in former time been Maior of the citie: this Bornemiſſa exceedingly hated the Biſhop for taking part with a banckerout Iew againſt him, and being full of malice, and deſirous of reuenge, promiſed to Reualius (Martial in the enemies camp) to deliuer to him blinde poſtern in S. Maries churchyard, wherby he might enter the citie: which gate ſerued the citiſens in time of peace to go thorow to the riuer. Rogendorff the General made acquainted with the matter, ſo liked thereof, that he in himſelfe thought it not good, in a matter of ſo great importance, to vſe at al the ſeruice of the Hungarians: Quite contrarie to that Bornemiſſa had re-F queſted of Reualius, who deſirous to haue the matter brought to paſſe without the ſlaughter of ſo many guiltleſſe people as was by him to be betraied, would haue had it altogether performed by the Hungarians, who he was in good hope would ſhew mercie vnto their countrymen and kinſmen, and vſe their victorie with more moderation than the Germanes, who prouoked with many deſpights, and comming in by night, were like enough to make great effuſion of bloud. But Rogendorff after the manner of his nation, to be counted politicke, vſing to keepe promiſe with no man, and hoping by excluding the Hungarians, to haue all the glory of the conceiued victorie wholly to himſelfe; made as if he would haue vſed only the Hungarians, and glozed with Reualius, whoſe ſon for the more aſſurance he tooke as pledge: For againſt the appointed houre, which was about midnight, hauing before giuen ſtraight charge that no man ſhould ſtir in the camp, he ſent foure ſelect companies of Germans with great ſilence vnto the poſterne; at which time his ſon Condi ſtood with a ſtrong troupe of horſemen, readie to haue entred, at ſuch time as the Germans (receiued into the city) ſhould breake open the great gate, as was before agreed. Neither did Bornemiſſa faile to performe what he had as a traitor promiſed: but opening the poſterne we ſpake of, had with great ſilence receiued in moſt part of thoſe German companies. But when he ſtil asked ſoftly of them as they came in, for Reualius, and heard them anſwere nothing but in the German language; although hee was otherwiſe a man of a bold ſpirit, yet then ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare (as it oftentimes chanceth in ſuch actions to men deceiued of their expectation) he ſtood as a man amaſed that knew not what to do, and forgot to conduct the Germans: who altogether vnacquainted with the citie, knew not which way firſt to go; & ſtealing on ſoftly in the darke, went on with no great courage, for feare of treaſon, ſtill asking of them that followed, for him that ſhould direct them. The Germans could not goe ſo cloſely, but that they were by the clattering of their armor and the light of their matches, deſcried by the watch; who asking for the word, and they not giuing it, preſently raiſed an alarme; but now all too late, the citie being as good as halfe taken, had the Germans well conducted, reſolutely gone on with the matter ſo well begun; but they ignorant of the way, & now deſcried & chaſed with their own feare, ran back againe to the poſtern, in ſuch haſt, that one of them miſerably wrong another, in ſtriuing who ſhould get out firſt: and their paſſage out much letted by the pikes and weapons which they which fled firſt had caſt croſſe the way to run the lighter into the campe. The firſt that ſet vpon the Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the court of guard in the market place; & hearing the alarme, came thither with a ſtrong companie both of horſemen and footmen. Many of the moſt valianteſt Germans, who comming in firſt, were in flight become laſt, were ſlaine or taken, and amongſt them many of Bornemiſſa his familiars and friends (as for himſelfe, he was got out among the formoſt) from whom the Biſhop by exquiſit torture wrong out the whole plot of the treaſon, and afterwards cauſed them to be ſeuerally executed to the terror of others. Reualius in the mean time complaining in the camp, That he was deceiued by the Generall: and Bornemiſſa wofully lamenting, That hauing worthily got the name of an infamous traitor, he had therby loſt all his ſubſtance and vndone his friends and kindred. The Generall Rogendorff (condemned euen of the common ſoldiers, for his fooliſh arrogancie and pride) was hardly ſpoken of thorow all the camp, as he that by two much inſolencie had ouerthrowne the faireſt occaſion of a moſt goodly victorie: wherefore from that time he attempted no great matter, but ſet himſelfe downe by long ſiege to tame his enemies, and ſo to win the citie.

Solyman at one time maintaineth wars in diuers places of the world far diſtant.

Solyman vnderſtanding of the Queenes diſtres in Hungarie, and with what deſire Ferdinand (ſupported by the Emperor his brother) thirſted after that kingdom; conſulted with his Baſſaes, of the purpoſes and power of his enemies, both there and elſewhere: and politickly reſolued at one time, with his diuided forces, to withſtand their attempts in diuers places, and thoſe far diſtant one from another; whereby the greatneſſe of his power is well to be perceiued. Firſt, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an eunuch to Babylon, to defend the countrey of Meſopotamia, and the frontiers of his Empire alongſt the Riuer Tygris, againſt Tamas the Perſian King. Mahometes another of his great Baſſaes, hee ſent into Hungarie to relieue the beſieged Queene: and after him, Vſtref Baſſa, which was the fourth of his chiefe Baſſaes, with another armie to ſtay at Belgrade, in readineſſe to aid the other Baſſa ſent before him, as occaſion ſhould require, if hee ſhould find his enemies too ſtrong. Vnto Barbaruſſa hee committed his nauie, for the defence of Græcia and Epirus againſt Auria, who but a little before aided by the gallies of Sicilia and Naples, had driuen the Turkes and Moores (which tooke part with the Turks) out of Clupea, Neapolis, Adrumentum, Ruſpina, Tapſus, and all alongſt that coaſt of Affricke which the Moores call Mahomedia, except the Citie of Leptis, and cauſed thoſe Cities to ſubmit themſelues to the gouernement of Muleaſſes King of Tunes.

A Theſe cities are at this day called Calabia, Suſa, Mahometa, Monaſterim, Sfaxia, and Afrida. And becauſe Solyman vnderſtood, that Maylat the Vayuod of Tranſiluania took part with king Ferdinand, he ſent againſt him Achomates Gouernour of Nicopolis; and commanded Peter of Moldauia, Prince of Valachia, to aid him: who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with 30000 horſemen. He himſelfe alſo doubting the purpoſes of the Chriſtian princes, and eſpecially of Charles the Emperour, more than hee had need, came to Hadrianople, and in the countries thereabouts raiſed a third armie, to aid the two Baſſaes ſent before into Hungarie; keeping with him his ſonne in law Ruſtan, whom he had made one of the foure great Baſſaes of his Counſell, hauing thruſt out Luſtibeius, whom the Turks call Lutzis, his brother in law, and exiled him into Macedonia for euill entreating and ſtriking his wife, which was Solymans B ſiſter, as is before ſaid, but was at this time done.

Mahometes the Baſſa deſirous to doe his great Maſter the beſt ſeruice he could, entred into Hungarie with his armie about the middle of Iune in the yeare 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes Gouernor of Belgrade, who gaue the ſhamefull ouerthrow vnto the Chriſtians at Exek; ioyning alſo with him the power of Boſna, now commanded by Vlamas the Perſian, for that Vſtref the old Baſſa was lately dead. The captaines of the Chriſtian armie hearing of the comming of the Turks, entred into counſell, Whether they ſhould continue the ſiege, or els go and meet them by the way and giue them battel. But the period of the Hungarian kingdome drawing faſt on, and the ineuitable Deſtinie thereof ſo requiring; the opinion of Rogendorff preuailed againſt the reſt for the continuing of the ſiege, hee ſeeming more wil- C ling to die than to croſſe ouer the riuer to Peſth, or to retire to Vicegrade or Strigonium, as diuers would haue perſuaded him: wherſore he remoued from the place where he lay before, and encamped his army on the further ſide of the city, at the foot of S. Gerrards mount, where the hill lying between Buda and the campe, and departing from the riuer, leaueth a faire plain toward the Eaſt; of purpoſe that the Turks (which he knew would not go farre from the riuer and their fleet) ſhould be enforced dangerouſly to paſſe by the mouth of his great ordnance, which he had aptly placed vpon the front of his trenches: for ſuch was the nature of the place, that the campe lay defended on the right hand with the ſteepe hill, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the citie with a ſtrong bulwarke. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little riſing ground, he placed the leſſer campe, wherein were the Hungarians which fauoured king D Ferdinand, and then followed his enſignes. He made alſo a bridge from his campe into a little Iſland which lay in the riuer, and with a fort wel planted with ordnance commanded both the riuer and the plaine, ſo to beat the enemies fleet comming vp the riuer, and themſelues alſo as they ſhould march alongſt the plaine. He was about alſo to haue made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the riuer, from his campe to Peſth, and in this order to expect the comming of new ſupplies from king Ferdinand, and to repell the enemie who was comming, and with long ſiege to wearie them in Buda: for there was ſuch ſtore both of victuall & all other warlike prouiſion in Peſth, as would well haue ſufficed his armie vntill Winter had bin ſpent.

Mahometes Baſſa commeth with the Turks army to relieue Buda.

The order of king Ferdinands armie.

As ſoon as the Turks were come nigh the city, Valentinus as an embaſſador from the queene, met them with two thouſand horſe, and fully inſtructed both the Mahomets, what the Chri- E ſtians did; what ſtrength they were of, and how they might moſt conueniently encampe their army. Wherfore the Baſſa marching on boldly forward, came within halfe a mile of the Chriſtian campe, where he quickly intrenched himſelfe round with a ſtrong trench, filling a great part of the plaine with his tents. But the other Mahometes, Gouernor of Belgrade, a moſt politicke captaine, tooke the higher ground towards the riſing of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hungarians than of the Germans. Vnto theſe two armies thus encamped, belonged alſo two fleets, the Chriſtian fleet conſiſted of foure and twenty galleots, about fourſcore ſmall pinnaces, and little leſſe than 100 ſhips of burden and other great boats: whereas the Turkes fleet was not thought to be paſt halfe ſo great. Neere vnto the little Iſland, ioyned as we haue before ſaid by a bridge to the Chriſtian campe, beneath in the riuer had the Turks taken ano- F ther Iſland called Cepellia, ouer againſt their owne campe; where caſting vp a great bulwark in the vppermoſt end thereof, and planting it with great ordnance, they from thence ſhot at the fort which the Chriſtians held in the little Iſland, and at their veſſels paſſing too and fro in the riuer, as the Chriſtians did at them likewiſe. This Iſland of Cepellia lyeth ſomewhat more than 40 miles in length in the riuer Danubius, full of country villages, ſo commodiou-ſly, that if Rogendorff had at the firſt taken it and fortified it, before the comming of the Turks, as the Hungarians perſuaded him to haue done, the Turks could by no means haue incamped in the plaine, but muſt needs haue forſaken their fleet, fetching a great compaſſe about more toward the Weſt, further off from the riuer: which would haue turned to the Turks great diſaduantage. But no man is ſo wiſe as to foreſee all things, when as the very euill ſucceſſe, be the plot neuer ſo well laied, ſhall of it ſelfe, beſide the loſſe, leaue vnto the vnfortunate man the note of the want of provident foreſight and diſcretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to diuide his forces, vntill he had ſome new ſupplie from K. Ferdinand. Whileſt the armies lay thus neere one to the other, there were ſome light skirmiſhes made euery day, either by the horſemen or the footmen, & ſometime one braue man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his armor or ſome other ſigne of his worth, to be like to himſelf: which was ſo pleaſant a ſight to behold, that both the armies vpon a military courteſie, as if it had bin ſo agreed, would many times for certain houres forbeare to ſhoot any ſhot, of purpoſe to ſee thoſe gallants, with the proweſſe to proue their valor and manhood one vpon another with their ſpeares and ſwords only. In which light skirmiſhes the German horſmen were often times put to the worſt, who mounted vpon great heauie horſes, fitter for a ſet battell, could neither ſo readily charge the enemie, nor purſue him in his flight, as could the Turks with their nimble & ready light horſes, ſo well acquainted with that manner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about eaſily fruſtrat the firſt charge of the heauy horſmen, & by & by come vpon them again with a freſh charge, & ſo often retire & come on again, vntil they had either wearied or ouerthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that maner of fight as well as they, and alſo better armed, did eaſily incounter the Turks, and foile them, although they were in number moe.

Skirmiſhes betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

Rayſchachius for ſorrow of his ſonne ſlaine by the Turks, ſuddenly dieth.

There was amongſt the Germane captaines a noble man called Eckius Rayſchachius, whoſe ſonne (a valiant yong gentleman) being got out of the armie without his fathers knowledge, bare himſelfe ſo gallantly in fight againſt the enemy in the ſight of his father & of the army, that he was highly commended of all men, and eſpecially of his father, who knew him not at all: yet before he could cleare himſelfe, hee was compaſſed in of the enemie, and valiantly fighting, ſlain. Rayſchachius exceedingly moued with the death of ſo braue a man, ignorant how neere it touched himſelfe, turning about to the other captains ſaid, This worthie gentleman, what ſoeuer he be, is worthie of eternall commendation, and to be moſt honorably buried by the whole army. As the reſt of the captains were with like compaſſion approuing his ſpeech, the dead bodie of the vnfortunate ſon reſcued, was preſented to the moſt miſerable father, which cauſed al them that were there preſent to ſhed tears; but ſuch a ſudden & inward griefe ſurpriſed the aged father, and ſtruck ſo to his heart, that after he had ſtood a while ſpeechleſſe, with his eies ſet in his head, he ſuddenly fel down dead. From that time the general commanded, That no man ſhould vpon pain of death go out of the army to skirmiſh with the enemy without leaue: wherein he was ſo ſeuere, that he hanged vp one or two that preſumed to tranſgreſſe his commandement: which thing much diſcouraged his own men, & ſo incouraged the enemy, that they would ſometime braue the Chriſtians vpon the top of their own trenches.

Many daies had now paſſed ſince the comming of the Baſſa, the Turks and they of Buda dayly increaſing both in ſtrength and courage: when on the other ſide, faint courage, weake ſtrength, troubled counſell, vncertaine reſolution, the ominous ſignes of an vndoubted ouerthrow, were eaſie to be ſeen, & hope it ſelfe, the ſtay of all humane actions, eſpecially of martiall affaires, almoſt loſt: the onely things that held their fainting hearts, was the often letters of king Ferdinand, and the firm opinion they had conceiued, That Charles the Emperor would not in ſo great a danger faile to aid his brother, both with men and mony: and laſt of all, the firme reſolution of a Generall, which far paſſed all reaſon, the ſooner to draw him to his end. The armies lying in this order, the Turks from the higher ground, and out of Geppellia, perceiuing the Germans in the litle Iland as careleſſe men to keepe but negligent watch, agreed amongſt themſelues at one inſtant out of both their camps, to aſſaile diuers of their forts: and ſo in the breake of the day landed with their fleet ſo cloſely and ſuddenly to the Iland, that they had ſlaine almoſt 600. of the Germans, before they were throwly awake or could well arm themſelues: wherewith the reſt were put in ſuch a feare, that they fled to the camp in ſuch haſt, that many of them fel beſide the bridge and were drowned in the riuer. As the camp was wonderfully troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries

The Turks ſuddenly aſſaile the Chriſtians in the Iſland.

A raiſing the alarme in diuers places at once : yet for all that, certain German companies in one of the forts neereſt vnto the riuer, and the ſouldiers in the fleet, well declared their preſent reſolution and valiant courage, in recouering againe of the Iſland. For Herbeſtulſius the campmaſter, perſuading them not to ſuffer the Chriſtian enſignes and great ordnance to bee ſo ſhamefully carried away of the Turks; and Marius the Admiral at the ſame time landing di-uers companies in the Iſland with his pinnaces and great boats: they ſo couragiouſly charged the Turks, then buſied in the ſpoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great ordnance, that they draue them againe to their boats, leauing vnto them as victors, both the Iſland and the ordnance, hauing before their departure, receiued no leſſe loſſe themſelues than had the Germans before.

B It was reported, that the Turks fleet might that day haue been quite ouerthrowne, if the Chriſtians vſing the victory, and holpen with the courſe of that ſwift riuer, had couragiouſly purſued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is done are eaſily ſeene, which in the very heat and hurle of the danger cannot be foreſeene; foraſmuch as ſudden accidents attended with great perill, do oftentimes dazle the minds of right wiſe & valiant captaines : yet foure of the Turks pinnaces were ſuncke, and three taken, and many of the Turks ſlaine or drowned in the riuer. Shortly after, the Turks more and more incouraged with the multitude of themſelues, and the fearefulneſſe they perceiued in their enemies, did at ſundry times ſo inſolently trouble and aſſaile the camp of the Chriſtians on euery ſide, that they left them almoſt no time of reſt, one company ſtill ſucceeding another; ſo that they were almoſt C in deſpaire, to be able long to defend their campe, the enemie ſtill growing both in ſtrength and courage. For the Baſſa that lay at Belgrade, ſtill taking vnto him the ſicke and wounded ſouldiers, ſent continually freſh men in their ſtead : and Valentinus taking vnto him a compa-nie of the Turks Ianizaries harquebuſiers, had driuen Perenus with the Hungarian horſmen out of the vpper camp. So that they in the neither camp were now hardly beſet with their enemies on euery ſide : yet were they wel holpen by the great artillerie from Peſth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horſemen in aſſailing the campe on that ſide.

Valentinus Generall for the Queene in Buda, certifieth Perenus of the comming of Solyman.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angry with the Hungarian baniſhed men, but with the Germans, did by the way of priuat courteſie and friendſhip, by a faithfull ſouldier wiſh Perenus ſpeedily to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and of the Hungarians with him ; for D that there was a great beaſt comming, which would at one morſell deuoure them all. For So-lyman aduertiſed of the doings of the Emperor and king Ferdinand, thinking that they would haue come down to Buda with a puiſſant army, was reſolued to be preſent himſelfe at ſo notable a battell, and was therefore comming thither with his army in all haſt. Wherefore Perenus thus forewarned, ſaid plainly to Regendorff & the other captains, That except they would pre-ſently riſe with the army & depart, he would now whiles he had yet time, make ſhift for him-ſelfe and his countrymen. Their opinions diuerſly deliuered, at laſt they all agreed, that it was beſt the next night to paſſe ouer the riuer to Peſth : only the Generall vpon a fatall obſtinacie ſaid, He would not without king Ferdinands commandement depart from Buda: and therfore ſent countie Salma with a ſwift pinnace vp the riuer to Vienna to know his pleaſure therin. In E the meane time vrged with feare, Perenus fretting at their long ſtay, it was reſolued vpon, that they ſhould the next night after the Moon was down, paſſe ouer the riuer in foure conuoies to Peſth. In the firſt, were to paſſe ouer the Hungarians, with their great ordnance. In the ſecond, the Germane and Bohemian horſemen ; and in the other two, the footmen, and the baggage of the armie. For it was not ſo eaſie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at firſt ſuppoſed : for after they had begun it, and almoſt plancked it, there riſe ſuch a wind and tempeſt, & the violent riuer became ſo rough, that the timber wherwith the bridge was faſtened together was broken, the ioynts vnloſed, & many of the boats wherof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken were carried away by the force of the ſtream. The firſt and ſecond conuoy fortune ſo fauored, that they well paſſed ouer: for although they of Buda and F the Turks, ſeeing in the day time from their high places the fleet drawing together into one place might haue ſome ſuſpition of the matter, ſome gheſſing one thing & ſome another; yet could they foreſee nothing of the ſudden departure of the enemy: but that multitude of ſhips and boats now paſſing too and fro, could not long deceiue the attentiue and vigilant enemy; and ſo much the leſſe, for that two fugitiue Hungarians euen then diſcouered to the Biſhop,

the flight of the Germans, who preſently certified the Baſſa, and the other, Mahometes thereof: which without further delay came almoſt with all their power to aſſault the Chriſtians in their camp: the great ordnance was brought forth, and after the Ianizaries & other footmen, followed the horſemen, diſmounted from their horſes to do the better ſeruice; who all with a horrible crie aſſailed the trenches. Then began the Germans to quaile, their flight being now diſcouered; yet did they with the Bohemians for a while notably reſiſt the enemie. All the campe was filled with tumult and confuſion, and eſpecially at the riuer ſide, euery man in that great feare ſtriuing to get aboord, without regard of order or ſhame: for the dead time of the night then couered with darke and thicke clouds, made all things more terrible, euen vnto them which were of beſt courage: the authority of Rogendorff the Generall (in the darkneſſe of the night, and ſo great clamor both of his owne people and of the enemie, and the thundring of the ordnance) was as nothing: he (beſides that he was then ſick in mind) lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderfull and fatall chance: for as he was writing letters to the king, a faulcon ſhot out of the enemies campe falling in his tent, and ſtriking in ſunder a cheſt which ſtood there, wounded him grieuouſly in the left ſhoulder with a ſplinter of the ſame. The other captaines of the footmen, enuying that the horſemen were ſo well eſcaped, ſtood as men more carefull of themſelues than of the common danger, faintly reſiſting the enemy. The vppermoſt tents, wherein Perenus lay, were firſt taken by Mahometes of Belgrade, and Valentinus, & the German footmen chaſed al ouer S. Gerrards mount. They of Buda alſo ſallied out, and entred the camp on that ſide which was next vnto the citie, & with wild fire burnt the tents a little before forſaken by the Germans. And the Biſhop at the ſame time cauſed a great ſtack of ſtraw ſtanding by the kings ſtables neere vnto the riuers ſide, to be ſet on fire; which gaue ſuch a light, that a man might haue ſeen all ouer Danubius vnto the wals of Peſth, as if it had bin light day: wherby the great confuſion of the Chriſtian army by land, as well as the ſhamefull flight by water, was of the Turks plainly diſcouered. Then was the great artillerie from euery place diſcharged vpon the flying fleet, as wel from Buda as the Turks camp. And to increaſe the feare, Caſon the Turks Admirall rowing with his light boats againſt the ſtream, ſet vpon the ſhips croſſing the riuer to Peſth, where he tooke certain boats loded with ſouldiers, and with his great ordnance ſuncke diuers others: ſo that the riuer was filled with dead bodies and the miſerable company of ſoldiers and mariners, laboring to ſaue their liues by ſwimming: for at ſuch time as the Ianizaries hauing ſlaine the firſt companies, were broken into the lower camp, and the reſt of the Germans flying ouer the bridge into the little Iſland, were there ſlain without mercie, by the Turks purſuing them, many of them leapt into the riuer and there periſhed. Three hundred ſaile of one ſort of ſhips and other, were ſo confuſed and mingled together, that Danubius ſeemed that night to haue bin couered ouer, as if it had bin with a great bridge. But the Chriſtian fleet ſeeing all loſt, cleered themſelues ſo ſoone as they could of the Turks, and ſo beating them backe with their great ordnance out of the poups of their ſhips, got vp the riuer to Comora. The reſt of the land forces endured the ſame fortune in the campe, of whom the Bohemians died moſt honorably, ſlaine by the enemy in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda, were ſaued or ſlaine, as was their fortune to fall into the power of a merciful or mercileſſe man. But the Sun riſing, plainly diſcouered the ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, and the victorie of the Turks, not ſo well before knowne. There was about 3000 men of one ſort and other, who in warlike manner had taken a little hill by Saint Gerrards Church, and there ſtood vpon their guard, vntill ſuch time as more than two thouſand of them were ſlaine; the reſt caſting away their weapons yeelded in hope of life, and were reſerued for a ſpectacle more grieuous than death it ſelfe.

At the ſame time Caſon with his victorious fleet comming to the ſhore of Peſth, brought ſuch a feare vpon them that were eſcaped thither, and might eaſily haue defended the walls, (only with the crie of his ſoldiers & the thundring of the artillerie) that the horſmen for haſt to get out, were like to ouerrun one another. The Germans had at that time ſo much forgot their wonted valour, & ſo trembled at the name of the Turks, that as ſoone as they ſaw their white caps in their ſhips, they ran away as men diſmaied, vnarmed, leauing behind them their plate, their carriages, & whatſoeuer good thing they had els. Yet ſome of the Hungarian horſmen more deſirous of the ſpoile than afraid of death, ſtaid behind rifling the merchants ſhops, for Peſth was become a very rich mart towne for al kind of merchandiſe, marchants reſorting

A thither from all other places of the troubled countrey, as to a ſtrong and commodious citie, and of more ſafety than the reſt. But Caſon now entring without reſiſtance, ſlew ſome of thoſe greedie Hungarians, and ran thorow the towne with ſuch barbarous crueltie and thirſt of the Chriſtian bloud, that he ſpared neither man, woman, nor child, except ſome few, which either for their beautie or ſtrength of bodie were reſerued for the Turks beaſtly luſt, or ſlauiſh labor: ſo that in this war it is reported, more than 20000 Chriſtians were one way and other by diuers chances ſlaine. There was taken at Peſth, in the campe and in the Iſland, 36 great pieces for batterie, of wonderfull beautie; and of leſſer field pieces 150. As for ſhot, powder, armor, weapons, and victuall prouided for Winter, ſuch ſtore was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greateſt part of their victorie. Rogendorff the vnfortunat Generall, at ſuch time as the B Turks hauing woon the trenches, were fighting in the midſt of his camp, deſiring rather to be ſlaine in his tent, than to liue after ſo great an ouerthrow, was againſt his will by ſtrong hand carried aboord a little pinnace by his phyſitian and chamberlaine, which would not leaue him as he lay, and was ſo conueyed vp the riuer to the Iſland of Comora; where he ſhortly after, partly for the painfulneſſe of his wound, but more for griefe of minde, died in a little countrey village called Samarium, leauing vnto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accurſed obſtinacie and pride. Solyman ſtill doubting the comming of Charles the Emperour and king Ferdinand to Buda, was comming with his armie from Hadrianople in ſuch haſt, that he cauſed the Ianizaries, his beſt footmen, contrarie to their manner, to march as faſt as his horſemen: but vnderſtanding by the way, of the late victorie obtained by his captaines, he C tooke more leiſure, and came with a great power to Buda in Auguſt, and there incamped on the other ſide of the citie, to auoid the noiſome ſauour of the dead bodies, which lay yet vnburied. Where calling vnto him the other armie, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but eſpecially the two Mahometes. And vnderſtanding that the victorie was eſpecially gotten by the meanes of Mahometes gouernour of Belgrade, he made him Generall of all his Europeian horſemen, one of the moſt honourable preferments of the Turkiſh Empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deſerued, and withall augmented their pay.

Solyman commeth to Buda.

After that, he cauſed the priſoners, in uumber about eight hundred, to be brought out: who bound in long ropes, were in deriſion led all alongſt the armie, ranged in order of battell, and D afterward by his commandement ſlain by his yong ſoldiers: ſaying with ſeuere countenance, that they were worthie of ſuch death, which by Embaſſadours diſſemblingly entreating of peace, had in the meane time craftily waged war. Amongſt theſe priſoners was one ſouldier of Bauaria of an exceeding high ſtature; him in deſpight of the German nation he deliuered to a little dwarfe (whom his ſonnes made great account of) to be ſlaine, whoſe head was ſcarce ſo high as the knees of the tall captiue; with that cruell ſpight to aggrauate the indignitie of his death: when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apiſh dwarfe with his little ſcimiter, as if it had bin in diſport, fell downe, and was with many feeble blowes hardly at laſt ſlaine by that wretch, ſtill heartened on by others, to ſatisfie the eyes of the Princes, beholding it as their ſport.

Turkiſh crueltie.

E This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman ſent his Embaſſadors with preſents to the yong king, which were three beautifull horſes, with their bridles of gold, and their trappings richly ſet with pretious ſtones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold; & vnto the chief of the nobilitie he ſent rich gowns and chains of gold. The embaſſadors which brought theſe preſents, in curteous manner requeſted of the queene, to ſend the yong king her ſon, attended with his nobilitie, into the campe, and without all feare, to hope that all ſhould goe well both with her and her ſon: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortune only, but in vertue and vpright dealing alſo, was of ſuch an heroical diſpoſition, that he would not onely defend the childe, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthie his protection & fauor, victorie confirming the ſame, but would alſo augment his eſtate, with the F largeſt bounds of his antient kingdome. Wherefore he was deſirous to ſee the yong king, and to behold in him the repreſentation of his father, and with his own hand to deliuer him to be imbraced of his ſons; that of his protection renewed, ſo happily begun, might be grounded a firme & perpetuall friendſhip with the Othoman kings: and that he would alwayes account of her as of his daughter. But the cauſe why he came not to ſee her, which he did in curteſie defire, was for that by antient cuſtom the Othoman kings were forbidden that point of courteſie, to viſit other mens wiues in their houſes. Beſides that, Solyman (they ſaid) was not ſo forgetful of his modeſtie and honour, as to receiue into his pauilion the daughter of a King his friend and allie, and ſhe the late wife of a King his friend and tributarie, and the faire young mother of a ſonne, growing in the hope of like regall dignitie, for feare he ſhould draw into any ſuſpition the inuiolate name of her chaſtitie, which in Queenes was to be guarded with an eſpeciall and wonderfull care. Whereunto the Queene (a manifeſt feare confounding the tender ſences in her motherly affection) anſwered verie doubtfully: but the Biſhop perſuading her, and inſtantly requeſting her, not to giue the Turks occaſion to ſuſpect, that ſhe had them in diſtruſt, by her little and vnprofitable delay; ſent her young ſonne in princely ſwathing cloaths, in a rich chariot, with his nurſe and certain great ladies vnto the campe, attended vpon with almoſt all the Nobilitie to whom Solyman had ſent Preſents. In his comming to the campe, he was for honours ſake met vpon the way by certaine gallant troupes of the Turkes braue horſemen: and all the way as he paſſed in the campe, orderly ſtood the Ianizaries of Solymans guard. As ſoone as he was brought into the campe, Solyman curteouſly looked vpon him, and familiarly talked with the nurſe, and commanded his ſonnes there preſent to take him in their armes, and to kiſſe him, in certaine token of the loue they would beare him, whom they were in time to haue their friend and tributarie, when he was growne to mans eſtate: theſe were Selymus and Baiazet, begotten of his faire concubine Roxalana; bearing the names, the one of his grandfather, the other of his great grandfather. As for Muſtapha his eldeſt ſonne by his Circaſſian wife, he then liued in Magneſia a great way off; who though he was a prince of ſo great hope, as neuer any of the Turkiſh kings had a ſonne of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloued of the men of warre; yet was he not ſo well liked of his father, brought out of fauour with him by Roxalana, as if he had traiterouſly gone about to take the Empire from him, yet liuing, as did Selymus his grandfather from Baiazet: for which cauſe Solyman ſecretly purpoſed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his ſucceſſour, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

The queene ſendeth the young king her ſon to Solyman in the campe, attended with the Nobility.

Solyman curteouſly receiueth the young king.

But Solyman at ſuch time as the Noblemen of Hungarie were dining merrily with the Baſſa's, had commanded certaine companies (to whom he had before giuen inſtructions what he would haue done) vnder the colour of ſeeing the citie, to take one of the gates called Sabatina, and the chiefe ſtreets: which was done ſo quietly and cunningly, that a warie watchman ſtanding there, and beholding the manner of the Turks comming and going too and fro, could hardly haue perceiued how the gate was taken, vntill it was too late. For many of the Turkes walking faire and ſoftly by great companies into the citie, as if it had beene but for pleaſure, to haue ſeen it; and other ſome to colour the matter, walking likewiſe backe againe, as if they had ſufficiently viewed the citie; by that meanes they without any tumult or ſtirre quickely tooke the appointed gate, with the market place and chiefe ſtreets of the citie. Which ſo finely done, the captaine of the Ianizaries cauſed proclamation to be made in all parts of the city, That the citiſens ſhould without feare keepe themſelues within their houſes, and forthwith, as they would haue their liues, libertie, and goods ſaued, to deliuer all their weapons: which they ſeeing no remedie, did: and hauing deliuered their armes, and taken the Turks faith for their ſecuritie, they receiued them into their houſes as their vnwelcome gueſts. But ſuch was the quietnes and modeſtie of the Turks, by reaſon of the ſeueritie of their martiall diſcipline, that no citiſen which tooke them into their houſes, was by them wronged by word or deed. Solyman vnderſtanding that the citie was thus quietly and without reſiſtance taken, ſent the childe backe againe vnto the Queene, although it was now almoſt night; but the chiefe noblemen he retained ſtill with him: theſe were George the Biſhop and Treaſurer, Petrus Viccheus the young Kings nigh kinſman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Turaccus Generall of the queens forces, Stephanus Verbetius Chancellor, and Bacianus Vrbanus Gouernour of the citie of Buda. This ſudden and vnexpected change exceedingly troubled all their mindes, and ſo much the more, for that the great Baſſa's with changed countenance began to picke quarrels with them, and as it were ſtraightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The Queene ſeeing the citie ſo craftily ſurpriſed, and the nobilitie iniuriouſly detained in the campe, troubled with feare and griefe, by humble letters requeſted Solyman uot to forget the faith he had long before giuen vnto her, and euen of late confirmed Solyman craftily taketh the citie of Buda.

Solyman detaineth the Noblemen of Hungarie in his campe.

A by his Embaſſadors; but mindfull both thereof, and of his woonted clemencie, to ſend backe vnto her the Noblemen, who for their fidelitie and valiant ſeruice had well deſerued both of him and her: this ſhe did by Ruſtemes Baſſa, whom ſhe had loded with gifts, and amongſt other things of great price, had ſent him a faire coronet of her owne, and a goodly jewell ſet with rich ſtone, to ſend vnto his wife (Solymans daughter) for a Preſent.

After that, Solyman conſulted with his Baſſa's foure dayes, what order to take concerning the kingdome of Hungarie: in diſcourſe whereof his great Baſſa's were of diuers opinions. Mahometes aduiſed him to carrie away with him to Conſtantinople, both the young childe and all the Nobilitie, ahd to leaue ſuch a gouernour in Buda, as by his wiſe and moderate gouernment, rather than by rigour, might put the people out of feare of ſeruitude and bondage, B by defending them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay vpon them the yoke of the Turkiſh gouernment. But Ruſtemes Baſſa (before corrupted, and a man in greater fauour than the reſt, becauſe he was Solymans ſonne in law, and therefore further from all ſuſpition of flatterie; ſtood altogether vpon tearmes of honour; ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable vnto ſo gaeat and mightie a Monarch, who neuer had at any time with any ſpot or ſtaine blemiſhed the glorie of his name, than after victorie, againſt all right and reaſon to breake his faith at once with a weake woman and ſillie infant, whom he had before taken vpon him to protect and defend. On the other ſide, Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade (an old mortall enemie of the Chriſtians, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the ſtate of Hungarie, and for his great experience and approued valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman C into counſell among the great Baſſa's) diſliked of both the former opinions, as too full of lenitie: and beeing asked his owne, deliuered it in this miſchieuous manner as followeth:

The great Baſſa's of diuers opinions for the diſpoſing of the Kingdome of Hungarie.

I know (ſaid he) moſt mightie Solyman, that he which in conſultation of matters of ſo great conſequence is to deliuer his opinion laſt, ſhall if he diſcent from the reſt, be ſubiect to enuie and reprehenſion. And therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrarie opinion to them that haue before ſpoken, my ſpeech muſt alſo be vnto your eares both vnpleaſant and tedious. But I refuſe not to be counted by my ſelfe, yea and preſumptuous, if you will ſo haue it, rather than a ſmoother vp of other mens ſayings, as one of no iudgment; whileſt I recount theſe things, which as the preſent caſe ſtandeth, may D wonderfully profit your deſignes and the Imperiall ſtate: for of right I may deſire you to yeeld a little to my yeares, and (if I may by your good fauour ſo ſay) to that I haue alreadie done: when as I, now growne an old man in wars againſt theſe Hungarians, haue by experience learned thoſe things of the ſtate and ſtrength of this Kingdome, and the diſpoſition of the people, which being here laid downe, may much auaile for your better determination of this ſo weighty a cauſe as admitteth no repentance if you ſhal now be ouerſeene therein. You haue now within the ſpace of theſe twentie yeares come in warres your ſelfe in perſon fiue times into this countrie, when I as no obſcure captaine or ſouldier, was in all thoſe warres and battels euer preſent, of purpoſe, as I ſuppoſe, to reuenge your iniuries, to inlarge your empire, and in briefe to aſſure you of a good peace, which could neuer be but by force of armes and victorie. And therefore you valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of moſt outragious theeues and E robbers, and in former time famous for the vnfortunat attempts of your anceſtors: when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their pleaſure, whileſt your father was then occupied in the Perſian warre, ſpoyled the borders of Seruia and Illyria. The ſame Hungarians about fiue yeares after, for that they had in cruell manner ſlaine your Embaſſadours, you ouerthrew in battell, and ſlew their King: and poſſeſſed of Buda, to manifeſt and make knowne by a notable demonſtration, the magnificence of your heroicall minde, euen vnto the remoteſt enemies of our name, did chooſe out of the reliques of that vanquiſhed Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the regall Crowne, although not borne of Royall bloud, or vnto you knowne for any other deſert, than that he was a little before both your publique and priuat enemie; and comming againſt you with a ſtrong power out of Tranſyluania, he had in the meane time loſt his brother, a better man than himſelfe, ſlaine with our ſword. After that, roſe F vp the Auſtrian King, a new enemie, to expulſe this Hungarian, raigning by your courteſie, and ſo you tooke in hand the third warre againſt the Germanes, which you ſo effectually proſecuted, that hauing forthwith reſtored the King, you carried the terrour of your ſelfe not onely to the walls of Vienna, but into the verie heart of Germanie. But two yeares yet ſcarcely paſt, the ſame King (neuer long contented with peace or warres) ſupported by the power of his brother Charles, and in vaine beſieging Buda-

The oration of Mahometes of Belgrade, to Solyman, concerning the diſpoſing of the kingdome of Hungarie.

defended by your garriſons, ſtirred you vp againe to reuenge the iniurie, ſlaughter, and ſpoyle by his ſoldiers done: for that you thought it to ſtand with your honour, to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare bountie made a King; and then deſired aboue all things, to fight a noble battell with the two brethren for the Empire of the Weſt. But they at ſuch time as you with fire and ſword ran thorow their antient kingdomes, endured not the noiſe of your comming. After that, enſued a peace betweene the Hungarians and the Germane, your Maieſtie permitting and approouing it, at ſuch time as you made haſte to go againſt the Perſians: but the German king ſo broke that peace, that had not I in good time reuenged his treacherie, by the ouerthrow of a great armie of his at Exek, you muſt of neceſſitie haue been ſent for from Babylon your ſelfe, as but now you were glad to come in haſte, by long and painfull iournies from Conſtantinople, to aid vs in time, and as I verily hope, to make an end for all; that all things ſet in firme order in Hungarie, the inconueniences of ſo many labours and ſo great charge, fiue times vndertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end: except (as I ſee ſome wiſh) you be in minde neuer to giue ouer the protection of the childe and widow, a matter full of infinite labour and perill, not to be counteruailed with that glorious ſhew of honour, which by theſe (in my opinion) too too wiſe men is pretended to your haughtie minde, euer deſirous of honour and fame. But I as a blunt man vnderſtand not this high point of wiſedome, abounding with glorie, which in the verie courſe thereof cutteth in ſunder the ſinewes of victorie, and is neuer by politique Generals admitted into their campes. In which doing, as I wiſh you more fortunate than your anceſtors, who haue vnited eighteene kingdomes to this your Empire, ſo would I not haue you more wiſe than they: for what can be a more vnwiſe part, than alwayes to play the vnwiſe man? that is to ſay, alwayes to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in mean time oftentimes to indanger his owne eſtate, his health, his wealth, his honor. You haue ſatisfied, and that (in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charity, fidelity, and if it muſt needs be ſo, of honor and glory alſo; if it be to be gotten rather by courteſie, clemency and lenity, than by the inuincible ſtrength of wiſe policie, and the conſtant reſolution of a martiall mind: for by thoſe inſtruments, and none other, hath worthie vertues alwaies promoted and ſupported the Othoman kings. Wherfore let thoſe vain ſhews (as ſeemeth vnto me) of counterfeit honor delight the minds of idle and ſloathfull kings: aſſuredly they neuer pleaſed your armed anceſtors, but after the enemie was quite ouerthrown, the triumph made, and the trophies of victorie erected. But let this be as beſt pleaſeth your high wiſdom and iudgement, whereunto the greateſt wits gaue place. Truely I (if I well foreſee the chances of war, and the aſſured euents of things) will not follow that manner of counſell which the pleaſure of my mind perſuadeth me vnto, when as neceſſitie, which ruleth all things, preſently forceth me and ſheweth me a far better courſe. The Hungarians aboue all other things notably warne vs not to truſt them, who infamous for their vnconſtancie after reuolt and trecherie, are ſtill at variance amongſt themſelues; and their baniſhed men are continually ſetting on the Germans to inuade the countrie, and the weake power of the Queene and the child is not ſuch as may withſtand ſo neere and ſo mightie an enemy: ſo that another mans kingdome muſt of neceſſitie be defended by our helpe, which may not be leſſe than a ſtrong armie, without our great perill. To be briefe, euery yeare to take in hand ſo long an expedition of ſo great labour and trauell, with an armie furniſhed with horſemen, footmen, artillerie, and a fleet of ſhips for defence of another man, as commonly we doe, ſeemeth to me meere madneſſe: neither doe I thinke it to ſtand with the maieſtie of the Othoman Emperours, thus to be moued euery yeare at the requeſt of a puling woman, crying for help: except you thinke it more profitable and honourably to maintaine a defenſiue than an inuaſiue warre: Wherefore (in my opinion) it is beſt to turne this kingdome (ſo often conquered and defended by Law of Armes) after the manner of your anceſtors, into the forme of a prouince: the Queene I would haue ſent to her father, and the boy her ſonne brought vp in your court at Conſtantinople, and there inſtructed in our religion: the nobilitie of the countrey I wiſh to be ſlaine, and their caſtles raſed, and the notable families which bare the braueſt minds, to be caried away out of al parts of the country into Aſia: as for the baſe multitude, I would haue kept vnder with good garriſons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities. By this onely means (might Solyman) ſhal both the Hungarians perceiue themſelues conquered, and the Germans glad to forbeare comming into Hungarie, vnleſſe they will raſhly and vnfortunatly hazard both Styria and Auſtria.

Miſchieuous counſell.

Solyman entreth Buda, the 30 of Auguſt 1541, & there firſt ſacrificeth after the Mahometan manner.

But Solyman thinking it good to do ſacrifice before he would reſolutely determine of ſo great a matter, entred into Buda with his two ſonnes, Selymus and Baiazet, the thirtieth of Auguſt in the yeare 1541: and there in the Cathedrall church dedicated to the Virgin Marie (being before by his prieſts purified after the manner of their ſuperſtition) ſacrificed the firſt

A Mahometan ſacrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counſellors, prouided out of them all both for his owne ſecuritie and honour, and publiſhed a decree, the fatall doome of that flouriſhing kingdome, where vnder it yet groaneth at this day; that Buda ſhould from that day be kept with a garriſon of Turks, and the kingdome conuerted into a Prouince of the Turkiſh Empire; and the queene with her yong ſon ſhould preſently depart the City, and liue in Lippa, in a fertile and quiet Countrey beyond the riuer of Tibiſcus, which ſomething to comfort her, was neere vnto the borders of her father Sigiſmund his Kingdome, to be ſafely conducted thither with all her wealth and jewels by his Ianizaries.
Wherefore the Queene and her Son, according to this Decree, with teares and mourning, deteſting in her heart the Tyrants perfideous dealing (which neceſſitie inforced B her then to diſſemble) departed from Buda, conſtrained by the Turks to leaue behinde her all the ordnance in the caſtle and City, with all other the warlike prouiſion and ſtore of victuall.
The Noblemen went with her alſo, who although they went ſorrowfull for this woful and vnexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their liberty and ſafetie, whereof they had for the ſpace of three dayes diſpaired. Only Valentinus was kept in ſafe cuſtody in the campe, becauſe he was a martiall man of greateſt power amongſt the Hungarians;

The Queene departeth out of Buda with her Sonne.

Whileſt theſe things were doing at Buda, king Ferdinand expecting the euent of this war at Vienna, & hearing of the ſhameful of loſſe his Army, & that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to Comara, and that Solyman (fame increaſing the euill newes) was comming towards Vienna; ſent Leonardus Velſius (who neuer liked of the ſiege of Buda) to Comara, to ſtay the further flight of the ſouldiers, and to gather together ſo wel as he could the diſperſed reliques of the ſcattered armie, and to comfort againe the diſcouraged men with the hope of new ſupplies and of pay. And ſomewhat to ſtay Solyman, who as it was thought would ſuddenly come D to Vienna, he ſent Countie Salma and Sigiſmund Lithestaine, a noble and graue counſellour, his embaſſadours, with Preſents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The Preſents was a hie ſtanding cup of gold after the German faſhion, curiouſly ſet with ſtones: and a wonderfull globe of ſiluer of moſt rare & curious deuiſe, daily expreſſing the hourely paſſing of the time, the motion of the planets, the change and full of the Moone, the motion of the ſuperiour orbes, euer moouing by certaine wheeles and weights curiouſly conueyed within the ſame, and exactly keeping due time and motion; liuely expreſſing the wonderfull motions & conuerſions of the cœleſtiall frame. A moſt curious and ſtrange piece of worke, deuiſed and perfected by the moſt cunning Aſtronomers for Maximilian the Emperor, whoſe noble mind neuer ſpared for any coſt to obtaine things of rare & ſtrange deuiſe. The embaſſadours paſſing E downe the riuer of Danubius, were at their landing firſt receiued by Caſon the Admirall of Solymans fleet, and by him brought into a rich tent, the ground vnder their feet being all couered with rich carpets: to whom Ruſtan Baſſa ſent ſuch good cheere as the campe affoorded, but eſpecially moſt excellent wine, no leſſe forbidden the Turks by their law, than deſired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Baſſaes feaſted the embaſſadors, Solyman himſelfe dyning not far off in his pauillion: at which feaſt the Baſſaes for the more courteſie dined with the embaſſadors, not ſitting with their legs gathered vnder them flat vpon the ground, as their maner was, but ſitting in chaires at a high table, after the maner of the Chriſtians: onely Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, for his age and valour an extraordinarie gheſt, ſat downe vpon a cuſſion beneath the Baſſaes. Their cheere was onely Rice and Mutton, and that ſo plainly F and ſparingly dreſſed, as if they had therby noted our gourmandiſe and exceſſe; who meaſure not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedie appetite deſireth, as if therein conſiſted the greateſt nobility: and the drinke for the great Baſſaes themſelues, right eaſie to be had, was faire water out of the riuer Danubius. After dinner the embaſſadors were brought in vnto Solyman, each of them led betwixt two Baſſaes holding them faſt by the armes as it had been for honours ſake, and ſo brought to kiſſe his hand. For the Turks ſuffer G no ſtranger otherwiſe to come vnto the preſence of their ſuſpicious Emperour, but firſt they ſearch him that he haue no weapon about him, and ſo claſping him by the armes vnder the colour of doing him honour, diſſemblingly bereaue him of the vſe of his hands, leſt he ſhould offer him any violence: yet hath he alwaies as he ſitteth in his Throne, lying at hand ready by him, a targuet, a ſcimitar, an yron maſe, with bow and arrowes. The great Globe was alſo brought in by twelue of the Embaſſadors ſeruants, which with the ſtrangeneſſe therof filled the minde of Solyman, and the eyes of his Baſſa's with admiration: for Solyman was of ſo ſharpe a wit, that he was not learned only in ſuch bookes as contained the lawes and rites of the Mahometane ſuperſtition, but had alſo curiouſly ſtudied Aſtronomie, and eſpecially Coſmographie, in which profitable and pleaſant ſtudie he much recreated himſelfe as his leiſure H ſerued. The Embaſſadors deſired that he would giue the kingdome of Hungary to King Ferdinand, almoſt vpon the ſame conditions that Laſcus had before required it for him at Conſtantinople, paying him ſuch yearely tribute as King Iohn had vſually paid, and promiſing farther to draw Charles the Emperor his brother into the ſame league: ſo that Solyman deliuered of all feare that way, might at his pleaſure turne his forces vpon the Perſian, which it was thought he moſt deſired. Beſides that, they ſaid he ſhould deale neither honourably nor indifferently, if he ſhould prefer the young childe before King Ferdinand, who beſide his antient right vnto that Kingdome, (which they were not now to vrge, as oppreſſed by his happie victories, but might in time be reuiued) had alſo a late intereſt by a league betwixt him and king Iohn, wherein he had expreſly covenanted by the ſolemne conſent of the greateſt part of his I Nobility, that King Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the Kingdome. Whereby they excuſed him of the late war, as juſtly taken in hand againſt the Queene and her Son vſurping vpon his right; which King Iohn knowing to be good, and mooued with conſcience, had by his ſolemne act acknowledged, though to the great offence and preiudice of Solyman his ſetter vp and defender, as alſo to the touching of himſelfe in honour, to have ſo vnthankfully and fraudulently dealt with his Patron, to whom he was by the oath of obedience bound. Wherefore they requeſted, that ſith he being a Prince of all others moſt mighty and magnificent, ſtanding vpon his vpright dealing both in peace and war, had ſo lightly regarded the ſlie dealing of ſo vngrateful a man; he would rather accept of King Ferdinand ſo many waies injured, as his friend and tributary, than to haue him his perpetuall enemy. Concluding, That no- K thing could be vnto him, for the good report of his juſtice more commendable, or for the aſſurance of a perpetuall peace more profitable, or to the immortall praiſe of his bounty more honorable, than to call a King of a moſt antient diſcent, famous for his vertue and fidelity, choſen for a King by the Bohemians, deſired for a King by the Hungarians, Emperour elect of the Romane Empire by the Germanes, and the naturall brother of the great Emperour, his tributary King of Hungary. Solyman with cheerefull countenance accepting and commending of the Preſents, anſwered them two dayes after by Ruſtan the Baſſa his ſon in law, that this was his reſolute condition of peace and friendſhip; If king Ferdinand would forthwith reſtore all the cities, townes, and caſtles, which were before belonging to King Lewis, and for ever L after abſtaine from Hungary: and wheras he had beene ſo often prouoked by him to war, and had therein beſtowed ſo great charges, and taken ſo much trauell, he could for that be content with an eaſie paine (which ſhould be for his great honour) to impoſe an eaſie tribute vpon Auſtria: vpon which conditions he was content to enter into league with them; but if ſo be that thoſe conditions ſeemed vnto them too heavie, and that they would rather make choice of war than peace, he would bring to paſſe by continuall war, that ſuch things as they had taken from the kingdome of Hungary, ſhould be requited with the deſtruction of Auſtria. But the Embaſſadors, although they were much mooued at the proud demand of tribute for Auſtria, as that wherein the two brethren of mighty power, Charles the Emperour and King Ferdinand were diſdainfully abuſed; to keepe the beſt courſe of their negotiation, and to win ſome time in ſo hard eſtate of things; required a truce vntill ſuch time as King Ferdinand and M the Emperor his brother might be made acquainted with the matter. Which their requeſt The Turke (perceiuiug their drift and purpoſe) would in no caſe grant, for Winter was now faſt comming on. It was lawfull for the Embaſſadours all the time they were in the Turkes Campe, to view euery part thereof, Ruſtan Baſſa conducting them from place to place:

where

A whereaboue all things, they moſt wondred at the perpetuall and dumbe ſilence of ſo great a multitude, the ſoldiers being ſo ready and attentiue, that they were no otherwiſe commanded but by the becking of the hand, or a nod of their commanders: they maruelled alſo at the exquiſit order and ſweetneſſe of the Turks campe, finding therein nothing diſordered or noyſome; ſo that it ſeemed not the campe of ſuch a rude and barbarous nation, but rather of them which were the authours of martiall diſcipline. The embaſſadors being rewarded and ſo ſent away, Solyman commanded the old Gouernor of Belgrade to ſpoile the borders of Auſtria all alongſt Danubius: Caſon alſo Generall of the voluntarie horſemen, he ſent into Morauia for like purpoſe; who neither of them did any great harme, by reaſon of the ſudden riſing of the great riuers, with the abundance of rain then falling in Autumne. After that, Solyman appointed B one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken priſoner in his youth by the Turks, had from that time followed the Mahometan ſuperſtition) Gouernor of Buda: who by the vpright adminiſtration of juſtice, and courteous vſing of the people, with Verbetius the old chancellor, ſhould doe what was poſſible to put the people in hope of long peace & tranquilitie. Which things done, after he had ſtaid about 20 daies at Buda, he determined to return again into Thracia, becauſe the rain of Autumne & the cold of Winter was now come in: and was alſo in doubt to be ſhut in with the riſing of the great riuers, wherewith the countrey of Hungarie is in euery place ſo watered, & on euery ſide ſo compaſſed, that it is a hard matter to paſſe. By the way he ſet Laſcus, K. Ferdinands embaſſador, again at liberty, whom he had left in priſon at Belgrade: but he long inioyed not that benefit: for ſhortly after returning into Polonia, he died of the flix; C which cauſed many to ſuppoſe, that he was poiſoned by the Turks. A man for his vertue and learning, famous, worthie of a longer life, whoſe death the King himſelfe much lamented.

Solyman returneth towards Conſtantinople.

Laſcus ſet at liberty by Solyman ſhortly after dieth.

As Solyman was returning into Thracia, and was come to the riuer Dranus, it was told him, That Stephen Maylat, Vayuod of Tranſyluania, who tooke king Ferdinand his part, a profeſſed enemy of the Turks, was taken, by the cunning of Peter of Moldauia, and Prince of Valachia; and that all the countrey of Tranſyluania was well pacified, and yeelded to his obedience. Of which newes Solyman was paſſing glad, for he exceedingly hated Maylat, a martiall man of a froward nature, deſirous of rule, and readie vpon any occaſion to reuolt; foraſmuch as he remembred Grittus his Legat, and the Turks by him ſlaine; and knew alſo, that the Tranſyluanians, an inuincible people, borne to trouble, and more delighting in vncertaine war than aſſured D peace, was by him ſtirred vp; whom he wiſhed rather by gentleneſſe to appeaſe, than by force of armes and ſtrong hand to ſubdue. But becauſe we haue oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whoſe taking Solyman ſo much reioyced, it ſhall not be amiſſe in few words to declare in what fineneſſe he fell into the hands of this trecherous and bloudie man, Peter of Moldauia.

This Moldauian by the commandement of Solyman (as is afore ſaid) had ioyned his forces with Achomates, Gouernor of Nicopolis, againſt Maylat; which being vnited, were in number 50000 horſemen beſide footmen, which after the manner of thoſe countries, were not many, euery man almoſt in the countrey, be he neuer ſo poore, keeping a horſe to ſerue vpon. Maylat beſet with the multitude of his enemies, and finding himſelfe too weake to incounter them, E deſpairing alſo of aid from king Ferdinand, whom he knew to be buſied in a greater war, forſooke the field, and fled again into the ſtrong town of Fogaras, as he had done the yere before, when he was ouercharged by king Iohns power: for there as in a moſt ſtrong place both by nature and fortification, he had laid vp his greateſt ſubſtance & prouiſion for the wars, but eſpecially the rich ſpoile he had long before taken from Grittus. Achomates comming thither with his power, and perceiuing the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time, thought it beſt, to aſſay if he could ouercome him by craft and deceit. Wherefore he ſent a meſſenger vnto Maylat, to perſuade him to yeeld himſelfe vnto Solyman, and to make choice rather to be called of him his friend, than to be iudged his enemie; of whom he might well hope of all goodneſſe, which had giuen whole kingdomes vnto his F enemies: promiſing, that he would vſe the vttermoſt of his credit, which was not ſmall, and labour for him as his friend, that he might feele the fruit of his clemencie and bountie, and ſtill enioy the gouernement of Tranſyluania, paying him ſome ſmall yearely tribute, as hee had before requeſted: foraſmuch as hee could take no courſe better, being beſet with ſo many enemies, than to make his peace vpon reaſonable conditions, and that with as much ſpeed as were poſſible: in which doing, beſides that he ſhould well prouide for his owne ſafetie, hee ſhould alſo ſaue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he ſaid) with his victorious armie; who would with aſſured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the ſiege, if he ſhould vpon a ſtubborne and obſtinate mind then refuſe to obey his command. Whereunto Maylat, who foreſaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an vncertaine warre, anſwered, That he could be content to conclude a peace, ſo that it were not vpon any bad conditions; and would not greatly refuſe Solymans command, which was wont to be both reaſonable and juſt: wherefore vpon ſufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in preſence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demanded to haue Achomates his ſon, a valiant yong gentleman, deliuered in hoſtage. Which thing Achomates denied, for that hee had (as he ſaid) before giuen him to Solyman, as the manner was; and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promiſed for him, that was but one, to giue foure of his beſt captains. Which offer Maylat (miſdoubting no deceit) accepted, & with a great and gallant retinue attended vpon, came into the enemies camp, where he was courteouſly & honourably receiued. But the parly, as it could not be conueniently begun immediatly after the firſt ſalutation, ſo could it by no means be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next day: to the intent, that the trecherous Moldauian might take his well acquainted and wel knowne gueſt, whom he had againſt that time inuited to a ſolemn banquet. By that means, the next day about the midſt of dinner, fortune ſo fauoured the intended trecherie, Maylat (who was of ſo proud and cholericke a nature, that he could not wel brooke the leaſt indignitie) was by occaſion of ſome inſolent ſpeech, of purpoſe miniſtred by the Moldauian gheſts, put into ſuch a fret, that laying his hand vpon his ſword, he in a rage flung from the table: at which time all the other gheſts ſtarting vp alſo laid hands vpon him and tooke him, fuming, & in vaine crying out, that he was ſhamefully betraid. His followers were all forthwith ſtript of al their brauerie by the needie Moldauians, and their horſes and armor taken from them. Whileſt Maylat was yet furiouſly exclaiming of this treaſon, in came Achomates, who to ſeeme guiltleſſe of the matter, with deep diſſimulation ſharply reproued the falſe Moldauian, that he had in doing ſo foule a fact ſhamefully violated the lawes of hoſpitality, reuerenced of all nations, falſified the faith which he had giuen him for his ſafety, & betraid the liues of ſuch notable captains as lay in hoſtage for him. Wherunto the Moldauian (as if it had bin in contempt) ſcornfully anſwered, that he had vpon good cauſe taken Maylat priſoner, & ſo would in ſafety keep him for Solyman, vnto whom it onely belonged to iudge, whether he had iuſtly or vniuſtly kept him.

Maylat commeth into the Turks campe.

Maylat trecherouſly taken priſoner by the Moldauian.

Not long after, the ſtrong towne of Fogaris was deliuered, with the hoſtages, but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is vncertaine. So Valentinus Turaceus, and Maylat, two of the greateſt noblemen of Hungarie, ſufficient of themſelues to haue reſtored the Hungarian kingdome (firſt rent in ſunder with ciuill diſcord, and afterward with the inuaſion of the Turks) fell into the hands of the enemy, not vanquiſhed in battell, but deceiued by treaſon. The towne being thus ſurrendred, almoſt all the countrey of Tranſyluania, was by Solymans conſent deliuered to the young king, vnto whom all the people moſt willingly ſubmitted themſelues, and tooke the oath of obedience, remembring that his father had almoſt for thirtie yeares ſpace with great iuſtice and quietneſſe gouerned that prouince; and with many preſents honoured the young King lying in Lippa, with the Queene his mother, and his two tutors, the Biſhop, and Vicche.

Tranſyluania giuen by Solyman to the young King.

At the ſame time, Charles the Emperor at the importunat ſuit of his ſubiects of Spaine, had prepared a great force both by ſea and land for the conquering of Algiers: from whence the Turkiſh pyrats did ſo infeſt all that coaſt of the countrey, from Gades to the mountains Pyrenei, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandiſe being ſet apart) were glad to keepe a continuall watch and ward all alongſt that coaſt for defence of the countrey. Wherefore although hee well knew of the comming of the Turkes to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Lantgraue and others ſpoken of, for leauing his brother ſo hardly beſtead, to go againſt a ſort of pirats in Affricke, yet perſiſting in his former determination, he departed out of Germanie into Italie, where by the way he met Octauius Farneſius his ſon in law, Alphonſus Vaſtius his lieutenant, by the Venetian embaſſadours, neere to Verona, and ſo brought to Millaine, where he was with to haue ſeene ſo great an Emperor in his royall robes, gliſtering with gold and precious ſtone, and the imperiall crowne vpon his head. His heauie countenance anſwerable alſo to his attire was much noted, as preſaging the woſull ouerthrow which was the day before receiued at Buda, but not yet knowne in Italie. From Millaine he departed to Genoa, where he was aduertiſed by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the ouerthrow of the Germans, of the victorie of the Turks, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Vaſtius and Auria, his two chiefe commanders, the one at land, the other at ſea, would haue perſuaded him B to haue deferred his intended expedition for Africa vntill the next Spring: and with ſuch power as he had alreadie raiſed in Italie, and brought with him out of Germanie, to ſtay ſtill in Italie, ſo to make ſhew vnto the Turks as if he would haue returned and holpen his brother: and in the meane time to aſſure himſelfe of his ſtate in Italie againſt the French, who (as it was thought) would be readie to take all occaſion of aduantage, if any miſhap ſhould befall him, either by the force of the enemie, or violence of tempeſt. But he conſtant in his former reſolution, anſwered them as they ſat in counſell, that they had perſuaded him for great reaſons to ſtay in Italie; but that he was for far greater to paſſe into Africke: for if he ſhould then ſtay in Italie, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turks fled out of Germanie: which diſgrace could no otherwiſe be preuented, but by the preſent proſecuting of his former determination C for Algiers, and ſatisfying the expectation of his ſubiects of Spaine, and ſo by ſea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not ſo well fauored them at land, in hope that Algiers might bee woon before the ſeas ſhould grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempeſts: which if it ſhould fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he ſaid, greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, that the diſſembling friendſhip betwixt the French king and him, would not long indure: and the rather, for that there was a new grudge riſen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinuo, who for certaine years had lien embaſſador for the French king at Conſtantinople, to Solyman, and was a few months before ſent backe again by him into France to the king: but returning backe againe with new inſtructions from his Maſter, for the confirmation of a further league betwixt the Turkiſh D Sultan and him, hee was by certaine Spaniards of the Emperors old ſoldiers, who had knowledge of his comming, belaied vpon the riuer Padus as he was going downe to Venice, ſo to haue paſſed into Epirus, and ſlaine, together with Cæſar Fregoſius: or as the common report went, firſt taken and tortured, to get from him the ſecrets of his negotiation, and afterwards ſlaine. Which report ſo much touched Vaſtius in credit, that in purgation of himſelfe, he offered the combat to any man of like qualitie to himſelfe, that durſt charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthily taken away, for vndertaking ſo odious a charge, as to ſtirre vp the Turks againſt the Chriſtians, and to ſhew vnto them ſuch opportunities as might beſt ſerue their purpoſe, by diſcouering vnto them the Emperors deſignes, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale. But were it well, or were it euill; E as Paulus the third of that name then Biſhop of Rome, meeting the Emperour at Luca as hee came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, ſure it ſerued as no ſmall occaſion to ſet thoſe two great Princes again at ods; whereby the wiſhed vnitie of the Chriſtian ſtate was ſore ſhaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The Emperor at his comming to Luca, was honorably receiued by the Cardinals and Biſhops, and lodged in the court; the great Biſhop was before placed in the Biſhops pallace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talke with him, and the Biſhop to him once. But the Biſhop hauing nothing at all preuailed with the Emperor and the French embaſſador, for the appeaſing of the troubles euen then like to ariſe betwixt him and the French king; did what hee might to perſuade him to employ ſuch forces as hee was about to paſſe ouer with into Africke, againſt the Turks in defence of his brother Ferdinand, F and of the countrey of Auſtria, if Solyman ſhould happily purſue his late obtained victorie at Buda. But he ſtill reſolute in that fatall determination of inuading of Africke, reiected that the Biſhops requeſt alſo. So the great Biſhop hauing moued much, and preuailed little, in the greateſt matters which moſt concerned the common good, taking his leaue of the Emperour, returned by eaſie iournies to Rome.

The Emperour and the Biſhop of Rome meet at Luca.

The Emperour in the mean time with certain bands of Italians, vnder the leading of Camillus Columna and Auguſtinus Spinula, and ſix thouſand Germans, came from Luca to the port Lune and there imbarking his ſouldiers in certain marchants ſhips prouided for the purpoſe, and fiue & thirtie gallies, departed thence, commanding the maſters of the ſhips to direct their courſe to the Iſlands of Baleares: but after they had put to ſea, they were by force of tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, brought within ſight of Corſica: where after they had been toſſed too and fro two daies in the rough ſeas, and put out of their courſe, the wind ſomething falling, they put into the hauen of Syracuſa, now called Bonifacium. The diſperſed fleet once come together into the port of Syracuſa, and the rage of the ſea well appeaſed, hee put to ſea againe for the Iſlands Beleares, now called Maiorca and Minorca: where in his courſe he met with a tempeſt from the Weſt, more terrible and dreadfull than the firſt: wherin diuers of the gallies hauing loſt their maſts and ſailes, were glad with extreame labour and perill in ſtriuing againſt the wrought ſea to get into, a harbour of the leſſer Iſland, taking name of Barchinus Mago the famous Carthaginenſian, whoſe name it retaineth vntil this day. From hence the Emperor with all his fleet paſſed ouer to the greater Iſland, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonſaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian gallies and ſhips of Italie, in number a hundred and fifty ſaile, wherin he had brought ſuch ſtore of bisket and victual, as might haue ſufficed for a long war. Mendoza was alſo expected to haue come thither with his fleete from Spaine; but he by reaſon of contrarie winds being not able to hold that courſe, altered his purpoſe according to the tempeſt, and ſo happily cut ouer directly to Algiers. So the Emperour nothing miſdoubting the carefull diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed already changed, and the wind now ſeruing faire, by the perſuaſion of Auria his Admirall hoiſed ſaile, and in two daies came before Algiers, and there in goodly order came to anker before the citie in the ſight of the enemy. Whileſt the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had beene abroad at ſea ſeeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongſt them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viſcontes Cicada ſtemmed with his gallie and ſunke him, the other with wonderfull celeritie got into the hauen. In the mean time Mendoza with his gallies had paſſed the promontorie of Apollo now called the cape of Caſſineus, and in token of honour ſaluting the Emperour after the manner at ſea, with all his great ordnance, gaue him knowledge that the Spaniſh fleet was not far behind. In this fleet was aboue a hundred tal ſhips of Biſcay and the low countries, and of other ſmaller veſſels a far greater number. In theſe ſhips, beſides the footmen, was embarked a great number of braue horſemen out of all parts of Spaine: for many noble Gentlemen had voluntarily of their owne charge gallantly furniſhed themſelues with braue armour and couragious horſes, to ſerue their Prince and countrey againſt the Infidels. Ouer theſe choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba, for his approued valor then accounted a famous captaine. Theſe ſhips going altogether with ſailes, were not yet able to double the cape as did Mendoza with his gallies, for now it was a dead calme: howbeit the billow of the ſea went yet high, by reaſon of the rage of the late tempeſt, & did ſo beat againſt the plain ſhore, that it was not poſſible to land the ſouldiers, but that they muſt needs be waſhed vp to the middle; which thing the Emperor thought it not good to put them vnto, and ſo to oppoſe them ſea ſick and thorow wet againſt the ſudden & deſperat aſſaults of their fierce enemies. He alſo ſtaied for the comming of the Spaniſh ſhips for two cauſes: firſt, that hee might with his vnited power more ſtrongly aſſault the citie, and terrifie the enemie: then, to communicat the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whoſe requeſt and forwardneſſe & greateſt charge he had vndertaken that war. Which fatal delay of two days, although it was grounded vpon good reaſon, did not only diſturbe an aſſured victorie, but to the notable hurt of the whole armie, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward inſued.

lawfull for the Turks to depart whether they would, & for the naturall Moores to abide ſtil, with their goods and religion wholly reſerued vnto them vntouched,as in former time: and for himſelfe,he ſhould receiue of the Emperor great rewards both in time of peace & wars,ſo that he would remember himſelfe,that he was borne in Sardinia,& was once a Chriſtian;and accept of the faireſt occaſion which could poſſibly be offered for him to returne againe to the worſhipping of the true God,and to inioy the fauor and bountie of the moſt mightie Emperor, and withall to reuenge himſelfe of the cruell tyrant Barbaruſſa,for the vnnaturall villany B done vnto his perſon. But if he would needs dally on the time,& make proofe of the ſtrength of ſo great preparation,he ſhould vndoubtedly,with the reſt of his followers,receiue the ſame reward of his obſtinacie, which they had to the example of others,receiued at Tunes. Wherunto the vngracious eunuch anſwered, That he thought him altogether mad, that would follow his enemies counſel,& with a grinning countenance askt him, Vpon what hope the Emperour truſted to be able to win the citie? the meſſenger pointing with his finger directly to the fleet told him, That which you ſee, with his great artillerie, and valour of his ſouldiers, both horſe and foot: whereat the eunuch ſcornfully laughing,replied, And we with like force and valor will defend this city,& make this place,alreadie famous for your ouerthrows here twice,now the third time,of all others moſt famous by the Emperors diſcomfiture. It is reported, C That there was in Algiers an old witch,famous for her predictions,who had(as it was ſaid)foretold the ſhipwracks & miſery of Didaco Verra and Hugo Moncada to them of Algiers; & alſo prefixed a time when as the Chriſtian emperor aduenturing to beſiege that city,ſhould there receiue great loſſe both by ſea & land. The fame of which blind prophecie ſeruing fitly to confirm the hope of good ſucceſſe in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Aſſan ſo feed and augmented(although he himſelfe being a craftie wiſe fellow, beleeued no ſuch vanitie)that he did therewith not onely encourage his owne ſouldiors,but alſo ſtrucke a terrour into the minds of the weaker ſort of his enemies, ſeeing themſelues caſt vpon ſo dangerous a coaſt vpon the approch of Winter. There was in garriſon in the citie but 800 Turks,& moſt of them D horſmen,but ſuch,as whoſe valor & reſolution far exceeded their number. For Aſſan had loſt many of his beſt men,ſome in fight againſt Mendoza;& otherſome at ſea,ſlain or taken by Auria in Corſica;& in other places by the Rhodian,Neapolitan,& Sicillian gallies;but many mo were by his leaue gon to aid the Moors againſt the Portingals:the other multitude did ſcarce make vp the number of 5000; which were partly naturall Moores born in that country, and partly ſuch as were born in Granado;to whom were ioined many fugitiues out of the Iſlands of Maiorca & Minorca,who in former time hauing entred into rebellion,& fearing condigne puniſhment,were fled to Algiers,and there reuolted to the Mahometan ſuperſtition. But the captains of the wild Numidians made vp a great number both of horſe and foot,which lying ſtragling without the citie in the open fields,ſhould night & day vex and moleſt the Chriſtians.
E This brutiſh people, naturally enemies vnto the Chriſtians,had Aſſan with rewards and hope of a rich ſpoile,allured out of the countries thereabout to aid him:neither was it lawful for any man to carrie his wife or children out of the city, into places of more ſafety farther off, or to ſhew any ſmall token of feare,pain of death being by the imperious eunuch propoſed to whoſoeuer ſhould but look heauily for feare of danger,or ſpeake a word fauouring of cowardiſe.
The Emperour by Auria making choice of a moſt conuenient place for landing his men, layd his gallies ſo cloſe vnto his tall ſhips,that his armed ſouldiers might with eaſe come out of the high built ſhips into them,& ſo out of them into the long boats,to be forthwith ſet on ſhore. And ſuch was the ſpeedie diligence of them that had the charge of that matter,and the plentie of boats ſtil readie to receiue the ſoldiers as faſt as they could come out of the gallies, F that the footmen were in a very ſhort time all landed. The emperor hauing a little reſted and refreſhed his ſoldiers,diuided his armie into three equal battailes,which was in number about twentie thouſand footmen,beſides horſmen,&others,who of their owne voluntarie wil then followed the emperors fortune. Vnto euery battaile he appointed 3 field peeces,to terrifie the Numidian horſemen,which were ſtil pricking vp & downe about them, readie to charge in a ſtrong and conuenient place, neere vnto the citie, betweene two deepe ditches, which the water falling from the mountaines had naturally worne ſo deep, that neither horſeman nor the top whereof it ſeemed the citie might with great ordnance well be battered.

The Spaniards put the Numidians to flight, and gaine the hils.

The diſcription of the Numidian footmen and horſenen.

A maruellous tempeſt.

The citie of Algiers, ſometime the royall ſeat of the great King Iuba, called of the Romans Iulia Cæſarea, is in forme of a triangle, ſcituat faſt by the ſea towards the North, hauing a hauen, but neither great, neither ſafe from the North wind. The houſes farther off from the ſea, ſtand in ſeemly order vpon the riſing of a ſteep hill, as it were vpon degrees; in ſuch ſort, that the windows of one row ſtil ouerlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the ſea, moſt beautifull to behold. The Emperour hauing diuided his campe into three parts, euery nation by H themſelues, lying on the Eaſt ſide of the towne, was in great hope to win it; and the rather, for that whilſt he aſſaulted it on that ſide, his ſhips and gallies from the North ſide, might in time of the aſſault with their great ordnance beat the enemy all alongſt the wall: which ſtill riſing higher and higher according to the riſing of the ſteep hill, could not conueniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we ſee it may in plaine ground. Neereſt vnto the riſing of the hils, lay the Spaniards: in the midſt, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the plaine neereſt to the ſea, the Italians. In the mean time whilſt the great ordnance was landing, & the horſes vnſhipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcry ſhew'd themſelues vpon the tops of the mountains aboue the Spaniards, and from thence eaſily gauled them with their darts and ſhot: for I they nimbly running too & fro in the known paths of the rough mountains, would ſuddenly and fiercely aſſaile them, but after the manner of their nation skirmiſhing a far off, rather than neere at hand. In which maner of light skirmiſhes, all the day was ſpent vntil night, with ſmall danger but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, theſe wild people, one companie ſtill ſucceeding another in the place they had before taken, neuer left ſhooting; for whereſoeuer they ſaw any fire in the Spaniſh camp, thither came arrows, darts, and ſtones flying as thicke as haile: for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their fires, and with ſilence to expect the day, that they might come neerer vnto them. Wherefore as ſoone as the Sun was vp, the Spaniards by the perſuaſion of Aluares Sandes, maſter of the camp, valiantly climing vp the high mountaines, repulſed and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke K the top of the hils, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore ſheepheards cottages. But the ſame day ſuch a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compaſſed in round, and glad to fight on euery ſide in a ring. Yet this fiercenes of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly repreſſed, whoſe pikemen gliſtering in their bright armour, made ſmall account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly ſtepping forwards with their pikes, & the harquebuſiers cloſe by their ſides, eaſily repulſed their naked enemies. The Numidian footmen are for moſt part youths halfe naked, with long haire not vnlike the Iriſh, vſing no other weapons but darts: they fight mingled with their horſemen, truſting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe and agilitie of bodie. Their horſmen vſe long ſpeares, armed at both ends, which they with a maruellous L dexteritie vſe, to the indangering of their enemy purſuing them: they vſe alſo long and light targuets made of leather, wherwith they ſo cunningly defend themſelues & their horſes, both in their charge & retrait, that for a ſmall trifle, in reſpect of the danger, they will giue a man leaue to caſt ſeuen darts at one of them, which they wil all moſt ſurely auoid, either with the ſpeare, or receiue them without harm in their targuet. In the mean time, whilſt this wild people thus skirmiſhed al the day, at night a ſuddē miſchance ouerthrew al the emperors hope: for as he ſtood beholding the vnſhipping of his great ordnance, his horſes, victual, & other neceſſaries of the army, a ſtorm of wind & rain began about ſix a clock in the afternoon, holding on all the night without intermiſſion, with ſuch rage, as if heauen & earth ſhould haue gon together: wherwith the whole army at land was wonderfully troubled, & a great part of the fleet M at ſea by force of tempeſt driuen aground periſhed. That night 3 companies of the Italians, by the appointment of their generall, lay without the trenches againſt the ſudden aſſault of ſo vncertain an enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement rain and extreame cold, were ſo ouercome with the extremity of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds: for they could neither

A neither conueniently ſtand nor lie downe, all the ground being ſo myrie, that at euery ſtep they ſunke vp to the calfe of the legge. Vpon theſe ſtaruen companies, the Turkiſh horſemen and Moores footmen, who diligently obſerued the watch of the Chriſtians, perceiuing their diſtres ſuddenly ſallied out in the dawning of the day; and ſo fiercely charged them, their match and pouder being now ſo wet that they could not vſe their pieces, that they all fled except a few pikemen, who made a ſtand, and were all quickly ſlaine by the Turks: who ſo deſperatly purſued the reſt in chaſe, that they followed them ouer the trench into the camp. This alarme being heard, Camillus Columna the Italian Generall came preſently thither, being ſent by the Emperor, who with certaine companies iſſued out ouer the bridge againſt the enemie: who now in ſhew diſcouraged with the comming out of this new ſupplie, did indeed, or at leaſtwiſe B made as if they did diſorderly retire for feare. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicilia, a man of greateſt account in the army next vnto the Emperour, comming in alſo, and angry with them which had before fled; perſuading them as valiant men, to recompence their ſhamefull flight with a freſh charge, by driuing the enemie home to his owne doore: which thing Columna ſaid could not be done without great perill: but Gonzaga being a man of a noble courage, deſired to haue the diſgrace which the Italians had receiued, ſalued ſome way, although it were with neuer ſo great danger; thinking alſo that it might happily fal out, that the enemy being put to flight, and haſtily purſued, they might together with them enter the city, without danger of the artillerie. So without farther delay, the reſt of the Italian companies were led forth of their trenches with great cheerfulnes by Auguſtine Spinnla, who ſo valiantly C charged the enemies, that they put them to flight, and purſued them ſo hard, that they came with them to the very gates of the city: where many ſhut out for feare of letting in the Italians together with them, ſcaped by known waies, ſome to another gate, & ſome into the mountains.
But then theſe barbarous people, with darts and ſhot from the wals, began to ouerwhelm the Italians which were vnaduiſedly come within their danger, & with terrible outcries to terrifie them; & they which before were fled without the wals, returned again to fight. They alſo which had ſhut the gate, ſallied out again, & hardly charged the Italians, who already galled with ſhot from the wals, & rent in ſunder with the great ordnance, fled moſt diſorderly; for why, they were but raw ſoldiers taken vp in haſt, little or nothing acquainted with the wars.
D At which time Aſſan alſo ſallying out, who was eaſily knowne by his countenance & rich attire, purſued the chaſe with his troups of Turks & Moores footmen. Only certain knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, & retired orderly: and Spinula with ſome other gentlemen making a ſtand at a little woodden bridge, ſomewhat ſtaid the enemy & ſaued the liues of many.
So the Italians which firſt charged moſt valiantly, being in the flight become hindermoſt, the enemie ſtriking them downe as they fled, couered the fields with their dead bodies by the ſpace of halfe a mile, eſpecially they which fled towards the ſea: for there they were circumuented & ſlain by the mercileſſe Numidians, who beholding the ſhipwreck, were come down to the ſea ſide for prey. But the formoſt companies of the Italians which firſt fled into the campe, fled in ſo much haſt & ſo great feare, that none of the leaders in ſo great and ſudden a E perplexity, remembred either the common ſafety, or performed the dutie of an aduiſed captaine; ſo that all ſeemed at once loſt both by ſea and land. Only the Emperor, armed with an inuincible courage againſt all the chances of fortune, & not to be diſmaid with any miſhap, was both vnto himſelfe & others that day the greateſt captaine; for when all was almoſt loſt, he in good time ſtaied the matter by comming on with the ſquadron of Germans, whereof he ſent before three enſigns to ſtay the flight, & with them as a ſure & freſh ſupply to guard his camp beyond the bridge which was ouer the ditch, ſeruing his armie for a trench as we haue before ſaid. But ſuch a feare had poſſeſſed the minds of the flying Italians, and ſuch was the fierce purſuit of the enemy, that thoſe Germans (not before wont to turne their backs) as if they had bin afraid of the Turkes white caps, or not able to abide their ſight, or to hold vp weapon againſt F them; by and by turned their backs, and ſhamefully fled for companie with the Italians. Then the Emperor galloping forth with his horſe, and his ſword in his hand drawn, reprouing them of cowardiſe that fled, ſet forward with the German ſquadron, and with a ſtout & manly courage ſpake to them theſe few words in their owne language: When will you (fellow ſouldiers) ſhew your faces to your proud enemies, if now when you ſhould fight for the honor of the Chriſtian name, for the glory of the German nation, for the ſafegard of your owne liues, in the preſence of your Emperor, you feare a few diſordred and naked Barbarians? Immediatly when he had thus ſaid, the Germanes touched with ſhame, and diſdaining that it ſhould be thought they needed any exhortation to performe the parts of valiant ſouldiers, iſſued out againſt the enemy: who moued with their comming, and ſeeing the Italian battell againe reſtored by the valor and trauell of certain valiant and expert captains, ſtood ſtill a while and began to retyre; whether it were becauſe they feared the great Artillery and aſſault of the Germanes, or that they thought they had done enough for that ſally: when as for the full accompliſhment of the victory they ſaw the Chriſtian fleet ouercome with a moſt horrible tempeſt, miſerably to periſh before their faces; & many of their men, eſpecially the Moores, haſted to the ſea ſide in hope of a more certaine prey, wheras was no enemy to be feared. For the bluſtring windes blowing from diuers quarters, as if they had conſpired to raiſe a moſt horrible tempeſt, had made ſuch a wrought ſea, & the hugie billows went ſo high, that the ſhips by the violence of the weather, and rage of the ſea, put from their anchors, fel foule one of another, & were ſo loſt; or els driuen vpon the main, were there beaten in pieces in the ſight of the army: ſo that all the ſea coaſt Weſtward from Algiers to Cercello, lay full of dead men & horſes, and the ribs of broken ſhips. The Numidians beholding this miſerable wrecke, came down by great companies frō the mountaines, & without mercy ſlew all that came aliue to land. In the ſpace of a few hours was loſt about 140 ſhips, and all the ſmal boats & caruels, which were in number many. Some of the gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noone, by the painfull labour of the mariners, and skilfulnes of the maſters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the tempeſt, & fearing to be eaten vp with the ſea, with ſailes and oares ran a ground: but the ſoldiers and mariners ſwimming to land in hope to ſaue their liues, & thinking that the greateſt danger had bin now paſt, were by the Numidian horſmen which ran vp and downe the ſea ſide, ſlaine. There might a man haue ſeene free-men of all ſorts, with teares commending their liues and liberty to their own gally-ſlaues, that by the ſpeech & intreaty of them, which by the ſudden change of fortune had but euen now ſhaken off their yrons, & with merry hearts ſwam out to their liberty, they might be ſaued from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a moſt grieuous and wofull ſight for diuers hard extremities, when as euery man according to the diſpoſition of his mind and skill in ſwimming, ſtanding doubtfull in moſt aſſured death, which to receiue or refuſe, was by fatall deſtiny drawne to his end, and either drowned in the ſea, or thruſt thorow with the enemies lance: yet moſt made choice to abide the danger of the ſea, & to expect the euent of the tempeſt, rather than to haſten their end by the enemies mercileſſe hand. By that means it came to paſſe, that that barbarous cruelty of the enemy (as a thing moſt feared of the mariners & ſoldiers) ſaued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearefull mariners and paſſengers ſhould otherwiſe haue bin run on ground. But after that, a notable gally wherein Iannettin Auria went, was ſeene to come neere vnto the ſhore, and to be driuen vpon the ſands by force of weather and the beating of other gallies. The Emperor not enduring to ſee ſo valiant a yong gentleman, captaine of many gallies, ſlaine without helpe by the Moores in the ſight of Auria his vnkle; ſent by and by one of his captaines called Antonius of Aragon, with three bands of Italians to the ſea ſide: by whoſe comming the Moores were put to flight, and he with the reſt in the gally ſaued; but ſo, that the ſauing of him was the loſſe of diuers other gallies. For many deliuered of the feare of the Numidians, and truſting to the reſcue of the ſoldiers came downe to the ſea ſide, deſiring to ſaue themſelues from the rage of the ſea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not ſome bold captains (grieued to ſee ſo great a loſſe) ran vp and downe the banks with their drawne ſwords in their hands, and by threatening death vnto the gally-ſlaues and mariners ſtaied their rowing, moſt part of the gallies had by the example of the others periſhed. Auria, not ſo angry at himſelfe as at the Emperor (who, contrarie to the obſeruation of skilfull ſeamen, could not be diſſuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in ſo ſuſpitious a time of the yere) with an inuincible courage ſtriue againſt the violence of the tempeſt, and rage of the ſea: inſomuch, that being requeſted by ſome of his friends to ſaue himſelfe, whatſoeuer became of the gallie; he was ſo angry thereat, that he commanded them to be beſtowed vnder hatches. Foure Gallies alſo of Virginius Vrſinus Earle of Anguillaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the feare of death. Certaine gallies alſo of Sicilia, Naples, and Spaine, happily endured all the rage of the tempeſt: yet was there fifteene great gallies caſt away; with

A hard choice.

Many gallies loſt by ſauing of one man.

A the loſſe wherof,beſides the loſſe of ſo many ſhips,the tempeſt ſtill enduring,ſo great ſorrow and deſperation in the wofull expectation of the wrecke of all,poſſeſſed the whole army,that not only the yong ſoldiers regarding only their owne liues,but euen the moſt valiant captains carefull of the common eſtate, were vtterly diſcouraged: for neuer was army in any memorie ouerwhelmed with a greater condourſe of calamities, when as all their victuals being loſt in three daies, nothing was left to relieue them withall, and they wanted tents wherin to ſhroud and reſt the ſoldiers ſpent with labor,hunger,cold,and wounds,in ſuch perpetuall raine and ſo dirty a country. In which ſo great miſeries a wonderfull care heauier than the former fear exceedingly troubled the minds of all men,to think vpon that horrid wreck,when as hauing loſt ſo many ſhips,and they poore men landed in Affrick,were in doubt how euer to returne againe B into their natiue countries. Yet the notable courage of the Emperor ſtil kept the diſtreſſed men in hope,which neuer altogether forſaketh wretched men in the midſt of their calamities : for he with a couragious heart and cheerfull countenance performed all the parts of a prouident and curteous Generall.For when he had againe made ſure his campe againſt the aſſaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied captaines, eſpecially the duke of Alba (wonderfully wearied in the late skirmiſh, and dung wet) to ſpare themſelues and take their reſt : he comforted the wounded men,& cauſed thē to be caried & cheriſhed in the tents which by chance yet ſtood(for the tempeſtuous wind had almoſt ouerthrowne them all)and ſo not ſparing himſelfe for any pains,being in his armor & thorow wet,won the hearts of all his ſoldiers the more. In C this conflict he loſt about 3000 men,amongſt whom was fiue of his forward captains,& three Knights of the Rhodes:but many moe were hurt. The greateſt loſſe was thought to be in loſſe of the ſhips and of the mariners, which was alſo increaſed by the loſſe of a wonderfull deale of great ordnance,reckoned ſo much the greater,for that it would come into the hands of the Moores,to the common harme of the Chriſtians,ſo ſoone as the ſea would giue them leaue to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foreſee a tempeſt, a wonderfull obſeruer of the ſea,of the heauens,& of the clouds)miſtruſting that place,departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called Metafuſium, becauſe it was a place of ſafer riding for his gallies, and better for the taking in of the ſoldiers: aduiſing the Emperor to march thither by land. Which his counſell the Emperor liking well of,to relieue the hunger of his ſoldiers,commanded firſt D all the draught horſes which were firſt vnſhipped for the drawing of the great ordnance, and after them the horſes for ſeruice,to be killed,and diuided for meat among the ſoldiers. As for wood to make fire of,they had plentie of the planks and ribs of the broken ſhips, fortune as it were with that one poore benefit recompenſing ſo many calamities. The next day the emperor departed from Algiers,with his army diuided into three battels,the ſicke & wounded men being receiued into the middle: and when he had marched ſeuen miles (the enemies horſmen ſtil houering about him) he came to a heady brooke which the Moores call Alcaraz : which was growne ſo high with the abundant raine and the checke of the winde and of the ſea, that being but a ſhallow thing before, it was not now to be paſſed ouer by a good horſeman. Wherefore the Emperour of neceſſity there incamped,in ſuch ſort,that lying with his armie in forme of a E triangle,two ſides of his army was defended with the ſea and the brooke,and the other with a ſtrong guard of armed men, for he thought it not good to depart from the ſea, a ſure defence for his army on the left hand,to ſeeke a foord farther of. Many aduenturing to ſwim ouer,were by the violence of the ſtreame carried away and drowned. Wherefore the Emperour cauſed a bridge to be made ouer it,of the maſts & ſaile yards of the brokē ſhips,which were by chance there taken vp, and ſo paſſed ouer the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brooke,found a foord whereby they paſſed ouer. After which time the Turks purſued them no further,being called backe again by Aſſan their gouernor: as for the Moores and Numidians which ſtill followed at hand alwaies ready to skirmiſh, they were eaſily repulſed by the harquebuſiers and field pieces appointed to euery nation: but vpon ſuch ſicke & wounded F men as were not able to keepe way with the army, they exerciſed all manner of cruelty : for there was none which in that ſmall hope,poſſeſſed with feare of their own ſafetie,was greatly moued with the compaſſion of their fellows miſerie. The next day paſſing ouer another little riuer,which the ſouldiers waded ouer vp to the breſts, they came in three daies march to the rode where the fleet lay,and incamped in the ruines of the old city Tipaſa neere vnto the ſea ſide,which ſerued them in ſtead of a fortreſſe againſt the Barbarians. The ſea was now calme, the wind laied, and the weather ſo faire that all men thought the ſoldiers might now well be G imbarked and tranſported into Europe: wherefore the Emperor to the great joy of the whole army commanded euery man to make himſelf ready to go abord, in ſuch ſort, that firſt the Italians, next the Germans, and laſt of all the Spaniards ſhould be imbarked: but ſo many ſhips and gallies, as is before ſaid, being loſt by ſhipwrecke, it was thought that thoſe which were left were not able to receiue the whole army, although it was crowded together as cloſe as were poſſible. Wherefore the Emperor commanded the maſters and owners of the ſhips to caſt all the horſes ouerbord into the ſea, reputing it an vnmerciful part, to prefer the ſafegard of thoſe horſes (although they were of great worth) before the life of the baſeſt common ſouldier or horſeboy in his campe. Which thing much grieued the mindes of the noblemen and owners of thoſe goodly beaſts, not only for that they were (not without extreme neceſſity) for the preſent H depriued of ſuch an ineſtimable treaſure, but ſhould for euer, as they ſaid, loſe the moſt notable race of horſes in Spain: there with griefe & vain compaſſion, was to be ſeen goodly horſes of ſeruice, bearing vp their proud heads, ſwimming all about the ſea vnto the ſhips neereſt vnto them for ſafegard, as if it had bin to the ſhore, & in the end wearied with long ſwimming to be there drowned. But ſcarce half the ſoldiers were yet imbarked, when the Eaſt & North-Eaſt wind, & ſtraitwaies after diuers contrary winds almoſt as great as the firſt, roſe: wherupon the ſhips which had already taken in the ſoldiers, not expecting any command, for feare of being driuen vpon the rocks, directed their courſe according as the wind carried them, with full ſailes alongſt the coaſt: They were quickly out of ſight and diſperſed with the tempeſt, ſome into one country, ſome into another, carrying the fame of that ſhipwrecke, and the report that I all was loſt, into the Iſlands of the Mediterranean and ports of Italy. The force of this tempeſt was ſo great, and the billow went ſo high, that ſome of the ſhips were in the ſight of their fellowes ſwallowed vp of the ſea. But amongſt the reſt two Spaniſh ſhips full of ſoldiers were by wonderfull miſhap by contrary winds driuen againe to Algiers, and there ſet faſt vpon that fatall ſhore, where the Numidian horſemen with a multitude of Moores following them, came running down to the ſea ſide to kill them as they ſhould come to ſhore: for the barbarous people thirſting after Chriſtian bloud, would not receiue them to mercy, although they were readie to yeeld themſelues, and couenanted nothing but the ſafegard of their liues. At which their cruelty the Spaniards diſdaining, with their weapons in their hands got to ſhore, & ſtanding cloſe together as deſperat men, withſtood them who had with their multitude quickely K compaſſed them in round: yet in deſpight of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanity or law of armes) could do, they made way thorow the midſt of them, from the place where they were caſt on ſhore, vnto the very gates of the city. But ſeeing the Turkes ſally out, they called vnto them, offring to yeeld themſelues priſoners to Aſſan without further reſiſtance, if they would aſſure them their liues, which they were in good hope of, for that he was born of Chriſtian parents in Sardinia, and was attended vpon with many renegate Spaniards. So Aſſan comming forth of the city, gaue them his faith for their ſafety, & beating away the Moores & Numidians, curteouſly ſaued them all, wiſely making great account of ſo great a gain as would redound vnto him by ſo many priſoners, ioined with no ſmall commendation of his clemency in ſauing them. Of the Germanes the third part neuer returned home, but L were either loſt with ſhipwrecke, or els dead of the ſicknes enſuing ſo great miſeries. The emperor perſuaded (or rather ouerruled) by Auria, to auoid the violence of the tempeſt, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Affricke Eaſtward to Buzia, the caſtle wherof was kept with a ſmall garriſon of Spaniards: where the Emperor landing, found ſome freſh victual, though not much, yet ſuch as did both him & the other noblemen no ſmall pleaſure. Whilſt the Emperor lay at Buzia expecting fairer weather, a great ſhip of Genoa laded with victuall chanced to come into the bay, to the great reioicing of the hungry ſoldiers: but ſuch was the violence of the tempeſt, that her ankers came home, and ſhe driuen vpon the flats was caſt away; yet ſo, as that part of the victuall driuen to ſhore, and halfe ſpoiled with the ſalt water, well relieued the increaſing want. In the meane time the Emperor when he had long looked for the aſſuaging of the tem- M peſt, & was now out of hope of any new ſupply of victuall, ſent away Gonzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian gallies: for the winde before at North was now come to Northweſt, and put them in hope to aduenture again to ſea, rather than to ſtay there longer. So although with a troubleſome yet a proſperous courſe, they came in ſhort time to the port of Vtica, now cal-

A led Farinas: where Muleaſſes King of Tunes bountifully relieued Gonzaga and his fleet with all kinde of victuall and other neceſſaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in ſafetie at Drepanum in Sicilia. The bluſtring winds were now at length weary of blowing, and the raging ſea became calme, ſo that the skilfull ſea-men for feare of new dangers, and wearie of thoſe that were paſt, thought it beſt to aduenture againe to ſea. Almoſt euery houre they were reaſoning in councell, What courſe they were for moſt ſafetie beſt to take: when ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt to beare for Sardinia or Corſica: and otherſome would haue had them to haue kept alongſt the coaſt of Affrica, and ſo directly for Sicilia. But the wind comming faire at Eaſt, the Emperor directed his courſe to the Iſlands Baleares, and from thence at length arriued at the port of new Carthage in Spaine, greatly commended euen of B his enemies, for the wonderfull courage and conſtancie in paſſing thorow ſo many extremities, in ſuch ſort as if he had triumphed ouer the malice of fortune.

About this time the diſſembled friendſhip betwixt Charles the Emperour and Francis the French King brake out into open hatred. The king firſt thinking himſelfe deluded by the Emperor, who had long time fed him with the vaine hope of the reſtitution of the duchy of Millan, when as he meant nothing leſſe; and of late abuſed by the death of Rinco his Embaſſador, ſlaine by the Spaniards in paſſing down the riuer Padus, as is before declared. In reuenge whereof he raiſed a great power in France, and at ſuch time as moſt men thought he would haue inuaded Italy, ſent Charles his ſon with the one part of his forces into the Low-countries, which were then gouerned by Mary Queene of Hungary the Emperors ſiſter; and Henry his other ſon C with the other part of his forces to inuade Spaine; both young Princes of great hope. And not ſo contented, but deſirous by all meanes to trouble and moleſt the Emperour, as he did in the Low-countries by ſetting on the Duke of Cleue: ſo by Antonius Polinus his Embaſſador, a man of great diſcretion, he earneſtly ſolicited Solyman the Great Turke, with whome he was then in league, to ſpoile the borders of Spaine with his gallies, at the ſame time that Henry his ſon was beſieging Perpenna in Spain. For which practiſe he was of moſt men diſcommended, as too much fauouring his owne griefe; and eſpecially by ſuch as affected the Emperor. But how this matter (which drew vpon the French King no ſmall enuie) was carried in the Turks court, ſhall not (as I hope) be vnto this Hiſtorie impertinent to declare.

The French King the more to trouble the Emperor, ſoliciteth Solyman to inuade his countries.

After the death of Rinco ſlain by the Spaniards, Francis the French king ſent Antonius Polinus D a man of great dexterity, his Embaſſador to Solyman: who paſſing by many by-waies to Venice, and ſo ouer the gulfe to Sibinicum, croſſing ouer Illyria, met with Solyman in Miſia, as he was comming from Buda; and there firſt offered vnto him the Preſent ſent from the king his maſter (for with emptie hands no man might preſume to come to thoſe barbarous kings of the Eaſt) which Preſent was a cupboord of plate curiouſly wrought, in weight 600 pounds: and 500 rich garments of all ſorts of ſilke & skarlet to be beſtowed vpon the Baſſa's & other great courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French Kings letters, and heard what he had further to ſay, ſeemed to be greatly moued with the deaah of Rinco, & promiſed Polinus not to be wanting vnto the French king, by ſea or land to giue him aid in his iuſt wars againſt Charles his enemie, for breaking of the league: but foraſmuch as nothing could be well determined of ſuch E matters in his journy of ſo great haſt, he told him, that as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſhould then haue anſwer by his Baſſa's of all his demands. The Embaſſador aboue all things deſired that he would ſend Hariadenus Barbaruſſa with his fleet againſt the next Summer into Prouince, there to be receiued into the French harbors, & to be imploied againſt the Emperor as occaſion ſhould require: & further, That he would requeſt the Venetians, with whom he was able to do much, to joyn in league with the king his maſter againſt Charles the emperor, whoſe power began now to be dreadful to their eſtate. Polinus was not ſlack in his buſines, but all the way as he went ſought to win the fauor of the Baſſa's, ſtill giuing them one Preſent or other, & filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to Conſtantinople, in the later end of December, Solyman promiſing what he had before ſaid, aduiſed F Polinus to returne to France with his letters, and to bring him certain word back again from the king, of the determinat time & full reſolution of taking thoſe wars in hand: & that he would in the mean time ſend Iunusbeius his embaſſador to Venice, who had bin there diuers times before, & would prouide to haue ſuch a fleet in readines as he deſired. Polinus exceeding glad of that anſwer, with great ſpeed returned backe again to the King, bringing with him as Preſents

Solymans Embaſſadour commeth to Venice

Polinus cōming to Conſtantinople, findeth not the Turk ſo readie to ſend his fleet to aid the French king, as he had hoped.

from Solyman two goodly Turkiſh horſes and a ſword richly ſet with ſtones of great G price. The French king hauing by his embaſſador receiued Solymans letters & preſents, & three days together diſcourſed with him at large of the maner of his proceeding in the Turks court, in ſhort time after ſent him backe againe to Solyman with full inſtructions both of the time and places, & other circumſtances of the intended war. Polinus comming to Venice, found not Innubeius there, as he had well hoped: yet to loſe no time in expecting his comming, hee with Pellicerius Embaſſador lieger for the French king, and other of the French faction, labored the Senators in the behalfe of the king. For it was thought likely enough, that the Venetians ſtill meaſuring all their counſels by their profit, would eaſily conſent to that league, eſpecially being requeſted therunto by Solyman, and put in hope to haue the port towne Maranus deliuered vnto them in reward therof; which otherwiſe the French, in whoſe poſſeſſion it was, threatened H to deliuer to the Turks, and to make them their euill neighbors, rather than to haue it taken from them by the Germans. Wherefore Polinus hauing audience giuen him in the Senat, notably pleaded the French kings cauſe, grieuouſly lamented the death of the Embaſſador ſlain by the Spaniards, and bitterly enueied againſt the ambition of the Emperor, who as he ſaid aſpired to the whole monarchy of Italy, not by true vertue and valor, but by meere craft & deceit, incroching ſtill vpon the liberties of the free States, and by little & little impoſing vpon them the yoke of bondage: In confirmation wherof he produced many examples, to them well known, requeſting them as antient friends and confederats of the French, to ioine their Forces with the Kings; in which doing, they ſhould aſſure themſelues of ſuch reward of the vndoubted victory, as they could not deſire greater. Wheras if they ſhould refuſe ſo to do, and would I rather ſit ſtil & look on as neuters, they ſhould vndoubtedly, fortune hauing decided the quarrell, grieuouſly offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquiſhed, hatred; and of the conqueror, iniurie. Beſides that, in taking vp of armes they ſhould highly gratifie Solyman, who prouoked with late iniuries, had determined with a puiſſant army to inuade Hungary, and at the ſame time to ſend Barbaruſſa with a great fleet againſt the Spaniards their common enemies: for the imparting of which his deſignes he would ſhortly ſend vnto them Innubeius his Embaſſadour: As for the euent of the war they needed not to doubt, when as they of themſelues were ſtrong enough quickely to thruſt the Emperor out of the duchy of Millan, being generally hated of the people, feeding his ſoldiers with the ſpoile of the country, and on euerie ſide beſet both by ſea and land by two of the greateſt Monarchs of the world. Whereunto K the Senat delaying the time for certain daies, that Innubeius might in the mean time come thither, grauely anſwered, That the amitie they held with king Francis, ought to be vnto them an ornament, but no burthen: the like alſo they held with the Emperor, whom they would in no caſe ſeeme to caſt off, although they had bin by him ouerraught: Wherefore the Senators and all the citiſens in generall were of opinion, to preſerue their peace, as they which in the hard times of warre had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recouered with long peace: But if they did once ſee the enſignes diſplaied, and the wars begun, they would then take further aduice, Whether it were good for them to thruſt themſelues into thoſe warres or not, when as they were in league and friendſhip with three of the greateſt princes of the world. L In the meane time Innubeius arriued at Venice, and was there honorably receiued. He requeſted, That the league before made at Conſtantinople by Badoerius their Embaſſador, might by the authority of the Senat be confirmed: and ſo commended the French kings cauſe to the Senat, that he requeſted no more, but that vnto that amity which they already held with the French, they would ioine further curteſies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vndertaken to aid him againſt Charles king of Spain: but as to join in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requeſted nothing. Which was quite beſide the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of al, had thought eaſily to haue perſuaded the Senat to haue granted what they requeſted, and therfore thought the Turk (who had ſo coldly ſpoken in the cauſe) to be ſome way corrupted. But as it M afterward appeared, there was ſuch equitie & modeſtie in Solymans letters (who was otherwiſe of a proud and inſolent nature) that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which ſhould not ſtand with the good of their eſtate. Wherefore Polinus hauing in vaine ſtaied certaine dayes at Venice, was in one of their publique gallies tranſported to Raguſium, and from thence trauelled by land to Conſtantinople, where he found all things more difficult

A than euer he dreamed of. For the great Baſſaes ſaid, There could no fleet be ſet out that yeare, by reaſon that he was come too late to ſue for ſuch a matter, the Spring of the yeare being now paſt, of all other times moſt fit for to take in hand ſo long a voyage, So that Polinus was aboue meaſure vexed with care and griefe, that he had ſo euill ſped, and was come ſo out of ſeaſon both to Venice & Conſtantinople. Dixius alſo, one of the maſters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to Conſtantinople, to carrie newes into France of the comming of the Turks fleet: who told Polinus, That the kings ſons were with ſtrong power far entred into the Low-countries, and had already inuaded Spaine, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turks gallies. Wherefore Polinus (as it eaſily chanceth to men deceiued by truſt repoſed in any other mens promiſes, and bewailing the euill ſucceſſe of their vaine trauel) wonderfully tormented B himſelfe, curſed the froward and vnconſtant manners of the Baſſaes, called vpon the faith of Solyman; and beſought the great Baſſaes one by one, that they would not contrarie to their promiſe forſake the King, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turks fleet, had now inuaded both the Low-countries & the kingdome of Spaine: foraſmuch as by that delay, which was vnto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he ſaid) betraied the maieſtie of his King, and a moſt aſſured victorie now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obteſtations, he was ſo importunat and tedious, that he became vnto thoſe proud Baſſaes rather loathſome than gracious; inſomuch that to end his ſute, they thought it beſt ſharply to take him vp, & for that time to ſhake him off. And therefore ſending for him and the other French gentlemen which followed him, to the court, the great Baſſaes then ſitting in counſell, & Barbaruſſa C with them for the honour of his place; as ſoone as they were come into the counſell chamber, Solyman Baſſa the Eunuch, turning himſelfe about, ſpake vnto them in this ſort.

The ſharpe oration of Solyman the eunuch Baſſa to Polinus the French embaſſadour.

Frenchmen (ſaid he) this place for diſpatch of moſt waightie affaires, appointed by the graue iudgement of our moſt mightie Emperour to vs his faithfull ſeruants, doth (as it beſt beſeemeth) receiue vs daily comming vnto it, void of loue and hatred: and withall doth notably put vs in remembrance, to ſpeake our minds freely. Neither would I, that this frankneſſe of ſpeech (the meſſenger of truth, and therefore the faithfull keeper of friendſhip) ſhould be vnto your eares vnpleaſing or troubleſome: for ſithence your king hath been called the friend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now either forget the duties of loue, or loath your friendſhip: ſeeing that our Emperour doth maruellouſly affect D you, and is not a little deſirous to ſtrengthen you with his power, and by ouercomming your enemies to increaſe your power and honour. But in your demaunds is no equitie, no modeſtie, ſo that we tearme you vnmodedeſt and importunat: and others which fauour you not ſo well, call you plainely by your right names, vnreaſonable and ſhameleſſe men; who as too too forgetfull of your duties, doe moſt fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendſhip. For leagues are confirmed by like profit, by making euen the charge and mutuall dangers: but if neglecting your friends kindneſſe and courteſie, you will make no requitall, they will quickely grow wearie of you. So happeneth it vnto you Frenchmen, who euer forgetfull and negligent in our dangers, but in your owne alwayes mindfull and diligent, haue ſhewed your ſelues friends vnto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters, and embaſſages. Tell mee I pray you where euer you ſhewed any ſigne or token of your good will or E aid? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the leaſt wiſe haue but beene kept in ſuſpence of ſome doubtfull feare, when as Charles with all the power of the Weſt came into Hungarie? And Corone and Patras were in the meane time ſhaken in Grace with the enemies fleet; and laſt of all Tunes taken with ſo great a fleet? But all this we pardon you: yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not ſo much as once grieue at our ſo great iniuries, as you ought to haue done; but ſent your gratulatorie Embaſſadours vnto the bloudie common enemie; who had but euen then ſlaine ſo many of our people. At length our Emperour came to Aulona to your great profit, about to paſſe ouer into Italie: but neither then in the arriuall of our fleet appeared the good wills of the Apulians towards you, which were of you ſo vainely promiſed, neither did you ſo much as once mooue to inuade the vpper part of Italie; ſo neither ſeruing our turne, nor well fitting your owne, you haue alwaies loſt the occaſion of the good ſucceſſe of your affaires. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards, needed wee your counſell or united forces: for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces and our faith: as for the reſt, warre, the notable reuenger of our wrongs, moſt happily brought to paſſe, at ſuch time as you of your owne voluntarie made peace with the common enemie, to inuade vs; and did as vnkindly as impudently as it were blow wind in his ſailes. But we, without your helpe, haue notably re- preſſed ſo great aſſaults of our enemies : when as this ſame Hariaden Barbaruſſa put to flight their G fleet at Ambracia, and happily ſlew the Spaniſh pirats of Caſtrum, and hauing again recouered our own cities, tooke alſo from them ſome of theirs : wherefore we are bound vnto you for no deſert, but we had rather forget theſe vnkindneſſes, than to faile you whom we haue once receiued into our friendſhip. For wee performe our fidelitie in deeds : but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occaſion ; which will not raſhly commit his actions to the hazard of Fortune. You are come later than you ſhould haue done for the ſetting forth of our fleet : for Sommer now well ſpent, followeth the peſtilent time of Autumne, ſo that mariners cannot in conuenient time bee taken vp, or ſafely thruſt into the gallies : for in long ſayling, who would not thinke, but that ſuch a companie of ſailers vſually ſicke at the change of an vnacquainted ayre, would be in danger of their liues ? Who would not feare ſhip-wracke in their returne, when as this ſame Hariaden ſo great a Maſter at ſea, driuen vpon the Acroce- H raunian rockes in the moneth of Auguſt, loſt ſo many gallies ? A fleet would be rigged in Winter, fur-niſhed and ſet forward in the Spring ; in Sommer is ſafe ſailing and making warre. Which that it may be ſo done, we will for the common wealths ſake perſuade the Emperour : for the nauie once loſt, cannot vpon the ſudden be againe reſtored for much gold, whereof the Othoman Emperour wanteth no ſtore, heaped vp by many ages. If thou be wiſe take theſe things in good part as friendly ſpoken : but whether the Em-perour will pardon thy boldneſſe or not, let himſelfe conſider ; truly we haue ſatisfied both him and our ſelues in ſpeaking to thee ſo plainly.

Polinus by the meanes of the Capiaga, is brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe.

Solymans anſwer to Polinus

These things ſeuerely ſpoken by the Eunuch Baſſa, did ſo much the more trouble Polinus, for that they ſeemed to haue bin ſent from the mouth of Solyman himſelfe, who was thought I to haue heard all that was ſaid. For behind the Baſſaes as they ſat in Counſell, was a window with a braſen grate, and a curten drawne before it, that the Emperour when he pleaſed, might vnperceiued heare the complaints and ſutes of all nations, and note the manners of his great counſellors ; whoſe care for the adminiſtration of juſtice was ſo much the greater, for feare of his preſence. Yet did not Polinius for his repulſe, deteſting the double dealing of the Baſſaes, ſo giue ouer his ſute ; but winning by gifts the fauour of the Capiaga or chiefe porter, a man euer of great authoritie in the Turks court, laboured by him to be brought to the ſpeech of So- lyman himſelfe : who faithfully performed what he had vndertaken. So the French Embaſſa-dour brought by him into the ſecreteſt place of the court, which few Chriſtians had euer bin, and ſo vnto the preſence of Solyman, recounted vnto him how all matters had before paſſed, K and moſt earneſtly beſought him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before promiſed, who at that preſent was inuading his enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteouſly and expreſſely anſwered, That the opportunitie of ſending out of his fleet was paſt ; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late comming, & the time of the yeare halfe ſpent : but promiſed the next Spring without doubt to ſend vnto the king his friend and brother, twiſe ſo great a fleet as he had deſired againſt Charles their enemy.
With which anſwer, the embaſſadour diſpatched away Dixius into France, vpon whoſe arri-uall, king Francis called backe againe Henrie his eldeſt ſonne with his army, from the ſiege of Perpenna in Spaine.

The Princes of Germanie ioyne their forces with king Ferdinand againſt the Turke in Hungarie.

The Princes and States of Germanie, at the requeſt of king Ferdinand and the nobilitie of L Hungarie, about this time decreed with one conſent, to take vp arms againſt the Turks, for the recouering againe of Buda, and other the loſt parts of Hungary. For beſides the diſhonor done to their nation at Exek vnder the leading of Cazzianer, and againe at Buda vnder the leading of the Lo. Rogendorff ; they wel ſaw, that if they did not ſpeedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turkes forces, they ſhould in ſhort time be enforced to fight for their religion, children, wiues, and liues, againſt the ſame mighty enemy, at their own doores. For preuenting whereof, the Princes and free cities of Germanie, ſet out 30000 footmen, and 7000 horſemen : amongſt whom was Mauritius, afterwards duke of Saxonie, then a young gentleman about twentie yeares old. But the Generall of theſe German forces, was Ioa- chimus Marqueſſe of Brandenburg, a man more for the honour of his houſe than the valour of M himſelfe preferred to that place : yet ſo, that vnto him was ioyned eight others, men of great yeares and experience, by whoſe counſell he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, king Ferdinands power met them : where, beſide ſuch as were taken vp in Auſtria, Hu- ganot Gouernour of Stiria came in with ten thouſand horſemen. Vnto theſe then noble men of

Hun-

A Hungary, Gaſper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, & Petrus Perenus, a man of the greateſt authority, power, and experience, amongſt the Hungarians, ioyned themſelues, with fifteene thouſand horſemen, whither alſo Paulus the third of that name then Biſhop of Rome, ſent three thouſand choſen footmen out of Italie, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellius, a moſt famous captain. The Marqueſſe with this great armie marched from Vienna alongſt the riuer Danubius, but ſo ſoftly, that the Hungarian and Italian captaines ſaid plainely, That the beſt part of the Sommer and fitteſt time for wars, was paſſed ouer in loitering & dallying out the time to no purpoſe: eſpecially Iacobus Medices, who had long before perſuaded the king, to be ready to ſet forward his forces with the firſt of the Spring, before the Turks could either augment their garriſons, or put in any new forces; for that by ſuch reſolute and ſpeedie inuaſion, it was B like enough he might recouer both Peſth and Buda. Which politique and wholeſome counſell ſo well giuen, king Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his court (liking nothing but what proceeded of themſelues) reiected, expecting the full aſſembly of all his forces, before the ſetting forth of his armie? At length the Marqueſſe was by ſoft marches come to Strigonium (king Ferdinand himſelfe ſtaying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to loſe Buda, was either in perſon himſelfe comming into Hungarie, or elſe ſending downe the Generall of his European horſemen, who might neuer ſet foot forward to war, without 60000 horſemen. Which newes ſo troubled the Germans, that they made no great haſt forward, doubting how they ſhould returne againe if they chanced not to get the victorie: beſide that, it was thought that the Marqueſſe neuer purpoſed to fight C a battell, or indanger himſelfe or his armie for the kingdome of Hungarie, but onely to defend the bounds of Auſtria, and by ſhewing the ſtrength of Germanie, to terrifie if hee could the Turks, if they not contented with Hungarie, ſhould alſo prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certaine eſpialls from Samandria, knowne that all that report of the comming of the Turks great army was but vaine, and that there was ſcarce a thouſand Ianizaries and twice ſo many horſemen come to Buda, and that the Turks fleet was both for number and ſtrength far inferiour to the Kings, they ſet forward again with more cheerefulneſſe, much incouraged by the forwardneſſe of the Hungarians, eſpecially of Perenus, aſſuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and ſpend no more time in vaine, they ſhould not finde at Buda any ſuch number of Turks as was worth the name of an armie: for that Solyman vſing but euery ſecond D yeare to make war, did that yeare take his reſt, and was not like to vndertake any great expedition.
For theſe reaſons all men being readie cheerefully to ſet forward, the Marqueſſe appointed to paſſe ouer Danubius: which this Perenus, Huganot, and Medices, all expert captains liked not of, wiſhing him rather to hold on his way directly ſtill on that ſide the riuer to Buda, the chiefe citie of the kingdome. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his counſellors, firſt to beſiege Peſth, which might be done with leſſe labour and danger, and there hauing made proofe of the enemies ſtrength and purpoſe, to come to the ſiege of Buda: for then would the ſouldiers with much more courage and cheerefulneſſe endure the ſiege of Buda, if they had by good fortune firſt beaten them out of Peſth: Which counſell was both beſt liked and followed, and the armie by two bridges with great and painefull labour made ouer Danubius E (which was in that place diuided into two parts) tranſported. At the ſame time Medices an Italian captaine, Admirall of the kings fleet, came downe the riuer, and in deſpight of the Turkes tooke the Iſland of Saint Margaret, lying in the riuer a little aboue Buda, and by force repulſed the Turks fleet vnto the ſuburbs of the citie. The Marqueſſe to auoid the danger of the great ſhot from Buda, after he was paſſed the riuer, fetcht a great compaſſe about, and ſo came to the North ſide of Peſth; for on the South it was defended with the riuer Dunubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the Eaſt and Weſt the great ordnance on the one ſide from the Caſtle of Buda, and on the other from mount Saint Gerrard, did ſo ſcoure all alongſt the wals that no man could without moſt manifeſt danger there abide. For Buda ſtanding vpon the hill, and diuided from Peſth onely with the riuer, ſo ouerlooketh and commandeth all the F plaine countrey about Peſth, that without perill no man can ſtirre on any ſide of the citie, but Northward towards Agria, couered by the Citie from the ſhot out of Buda. As the Marqueſſe was comming thither, hee was told by certaine fugitiues, That Balis Gouernour of Buda (who in that place ſucceeded Solyman the Hungarian renegate, lately before dead of the Plague) had in garriſon in Buda two thouſand horſemen; and that Vlames the Perſian Gouuernor of Boſna, was come vnto him with three thouſand moe: whereunto Amurathes had alſo G ioyned another thouſand which he brought out of Dalmatia: and that Segemenes was come thither alſo with 1000 Ianizaries from Conſtantinople: as for the reſt of the footmen, that they were but wild countrey people, fitter for labor than for ſeruice in wars. They told him alſo, that the enemies fleet conſiſted of 60 ſmall pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other great boats: and that Solyman had commanded his captains in any caſe to defend Buda and Peſth, to the laſt man, without regard of any other place. And had propoſed vnto the valiant, great rewards; and to the cowardly, extreame puniſhment: charging them further, that if need were, they ſhould in time ſend for Achomates the Generall of his Europeian horſemen, to Sophia, to aid them. The Turks vpon the approch of the Chriſtians, iſſued out at one of the gates of the citie, and skirmiſhed with the Hungarians: but after they had ſufficiently proued one anothers H ſtrength, and ſome few were on both ſides ſlaine, they retired into the citie, and the Hungarians to the campe. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the campe neere the city with fiue companies, to chuſe a place for planting the batterie; the Turkes at one inſtant ſallying out at two gates of the city, gaue him a hot skirmiſh, where at the firſt, the fight was begun with like courage and force: but the Turks ſtill ſending forth new ſupplies both of horſe and foot, firſt the Chriſtian footmen, and after that the horſemen, not able longer to indure the force of the Ianizaries, were conſtrained diſorderly to retire, hauing loſt in that retrait foure of their captains and two enſignes; and had not Vitellius with one companie of horſemen ſerred together, valiantly repulſed the inſolent Ianizaries, the loſſe had bin much greater. Vitellius exceedingly I grieued with this loſſe, and perceiuing the manner of the enemies fight, encouraged his ſouldiers, purpoſing if he could to be fully reuenged: and aboue all others, requeſted Perenus to be readie to join with him as occaſion ſhould require. Vitellius lay incamped in the kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally diſtant both from the great camp & from the city; out of theſe orchards he went with 12 companies vnder their enſignes, commanding the reſt to ſtand ſtill within the wals, in readineſſe at all aſſaies: and ſo fetching a great compaſſe about, marched alongſt the riuer ſide towards the city: neither did the proud enemie (brag of the former daies victorie) make any delay, but brauely ſallied out at the Eaſt ſide of the city, & couragiouſly charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harme, & ſeeing his enemies come on as he deſired, couered his ſhot with his pikes, & ſtanding cloſe, receiued the enemies K charge; his ſhot ſtill playing vnder the pikes, oftentimes vpon their knees: many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whileſt they deſperately fought to haue broken the order of the Chriſtians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks horſemen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, & diuers others beholding the fight were come ouer the riuer from Buda, to be partakers of the victory, had filled the hithermoſt banke, Vitellius in good time, of purpoſe by little & litle retired, as if he had bin ouercharged: then began the enemy to giue a great ſhout, and more fiercely to aſſaile the Chriſtians: their horſmen alſo clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perenus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawne a great way from the gates, he ſuddenly with his light horſemen clapt in betwixt the city & the Turks at their backs, after whom followed alſo Mauritius (afterwards L duke of Saxonie) with a ſtrong troup of German horſmen, of purpoſe to haue ſhut them in for retiring backe again into the city. But then the Turks perceiuing the danger, & finding themſelues ſhut in, ſtood as men more than halfe diſmaied, bethinking themſelues which way to take, & ſo began to retire. When Vitellius comming on couragiouſly with his pikemen and his harquebuſiers diuided into two wings, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian & German horſmen breaking in amongſt them on the other ſide, made great ſlaughter of them, & ſtrucke ſuch a feare amongſt the flying Turks, that many of them in running to the gate, thruſt one another thorow with their pikes: diuers other were alſo by the horſemen driuen into the riuer and there drowned. That day Segemenes loſt aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and foure hundred others. The chiefeſt commendation for this piece of ſeruice was giuen to Vitellius, who had ſo well and ſo quickly reuenged himſelfe of the Turkes: and next him to Perenus, M who as a skilfull captaine had ſo well awaited the time to entrap the enemie: Neither is Mauritius the young Saxon Prince vnworthie his due praiſe, who valiantly charging the Turks, and hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, was in danger to haue beene there loſt himſelfe, had not Nicholas Ribiſche one of his followers, couered him with his owne bodie, vntill

A ſuch time as that he was reſcued by others, Ribiſche himſelfe preſently dying of his wounds.
This little victorie ſo encouraged the Germans, that the Marqueſſe commanded the great ordinance to be preſently brought forth, & the batterie planted, which was at the firſt placed ſo far off, that it did little harme, although the wall were both old and thin, not aboue fiue foot thicke: and the ordnance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either ſhot ſhort, or quite ouer the citie into Buda: which fault once perceiued, the batterie was remoued neerer, and a faire breach ſoone made in the wal, with the continuall beating of 40 great pieces of artillerie.
Vitellius was the firſt that offered to aſſault the breach, ſo that the Germans would preſently ſecond him, which thing they all by holding vp of their hands promiſed couragiouſly, but cowardly about by and by to breake that promiſe: for oftentimes it chanceth, That they B which before the danger are readieſt to promiſe their helpe, are in the very danger it ſelfe of all others moſt ſlacke. The Hungarians alſo for their parts promiſed not to be behind. The ſilence of the enemie at the breach and in the citie, was wonderfull, ſo that many thought hee had bin fled backe ouer the riuer to Buda: for Segemenes captaine of the Ianizaries, an old beaten ſouldier, ordered all things with as little ſtir as was poſſible: he had receiued new ſupplies from Vlamas, and had caſt a deepe countermure within the wall againſt the breach, & on the inner ſide of the ſame had made a ſtrong barricado, with gabions and wine veſſels filled with ſand and earth: behind which ſtood the Ianizaries, & next vnto them the Turkiſh archers, and laſt of all the horſemen who had left their horſes to ſerue on foot. The ſignall for the aſſault once giuen, foure Italian captaines ran deſperatly with their companies by the ruines of the C wall to the breach: but whileſt they there ſet vp their enſignes, and wondring at the enemies fortification, were ready betwixt hope and feare to leape downe, they were ſuddenly ouerwhelmed with a ſhoure of arrowes and bullets. Yet Vitellius ſtill incouraging them, brought them ſtill on, who did what they might to haue entred: but the Germane footmen with their Generall ſtood ſtill vnder the wals, looking on, as men nothing moued either with the hope of victorie or danger of their friends: and the Hungarians not ſo much as once looking vpon the enemy retired: two of the Italian captains, Rufus & Fiolla were there ſlain, and Carolus, Vitellius his nephew, ſhot in the ſhoulder. The Turks with ſhot and ſtones ſtill repulſed & beat downe the Italians, whereof the Germans alſo ſtanding ſtill, felt part, & were more gauled than a man would haue thought men could haue bin, that did nothing: for there they ſtill ſtood for D ſhame, leſt if they ſhould haue alſo firſt retired, they ſhould haue incurred a ſecond infamy as bad as the firſt: which thing Vitellius perceiuing, would in no caſe depart from the breach, but wiſhed rather to loſe his men by whole companies, than to leaue the leaſt colour of excuſe to the Germans, or that they ſhould ſay they ſtaied longeſt, of whom he with greater anger than griefe complained, that he was forſaken & cowardly betraid. In time of this aſſault one of the Turks was heard to ſpeake aloud in the Italian tongue, Why do not you valiant Italians ſpare your ſelues, and giue place to thoſe laſie Germans. We all wiſh to ſpare you, and to beat the drunkenneſſe out of their moſt cowardly heads, that they ſhould no more herafter prouoke vs. At length the Germans weary of their hot ſtanding & nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired: but ſo diſorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies ſhot, that if the E Turks had at the ſame time ſallied out at all the gates, it was thought that the whole camp had bin greatly indangered. In this attempt rather than aſſault, ſeuen hundred Chriſtians were ſlain outright, and many moe hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

The contumelious ſpeech of a Turke againſt the Germans.

The Germans & the Italians retire with loſſe

All this while the Marqueſſe and Hugonot the great commaunders of the army, kept themſelues ſo far from gunſhot, that they were no where to be ſeene, vntill that Torniellus and Fotiſcu, two valiant captains, finding them out, wiſhed them for ſhame to ſhew themſelues for the comforting of the army. A little before night they conſulted with the other captains, whither they ſhould forſake the ſiege, or continue it ſtill: wherof moſt of the Germans beſt liked to be gone, as the ſafeſt way: though Vitellius and ſome others ſpake earneſtly to the contrary. At which time a ſpie comming in, brought news that Achomates, Solymans lieutenant of the European F horſmen, had paſſed ouer the riuer Sauus at Belgrade, & was cõming to Dranus: whoſe comming either cunningly fained, or vainly beleeued, cauſed the Germanes to make a ſhort concluſiou, & to reſoule flatly to return to Vienna, fearing that if they ſhould longer continue the ſiege, they ſhould be ſtayed againſt their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old Germane ſouldiers to hang their heads for ſhame, & the Hungarians to curſe both the

A notable ſkirmiſh betwixt the Turks and the Hungarians

The Chriſtian army broken vp at Vienna.

Germanes and the hard fortune of their nation, vainely wiſhing for a Generall in courage anſwerable to the ſtrength of that great armie. Segemenes perceiuing how much the Chriſtian armie was diſcouraged by the laſt dayes euill ſucceſſe, early in the morning couragiouſly ſent out all the horſemen, and after them certaine companies of footmen, to relieue them in their retire; who in many places skirmiſhed with the Hungarians, being nothing inferiour vnto them either in courage or skill: and the matter was brought to that paſſe, as if it had beene ſo agreed vpon, that many of the moſt notable and expert ſouldiers on either ſide encountered together hand to hand in the ſight of the Italians and Germanes, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, & the Turks with the Hungarians, with ſuch fidelitie, that they regarded no other enemie but him whom euery one had ſingled out for himſelfe, as if it had been in a triumph for exerciſe hand to hand. It hapned, that a notable captaine of the Turks, deſired to ſee Vitellius, who being ſhewed vnto him (for he was eaſie to be knowne by his armor) the Turke ran vnto him to embrace him for his honor, and ſo departed. About fiue hundred horſemen ſo incountered one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were ſlaine or hurt. The night following the batterie was remoued, & the army marched towards the riuer to the fleet. The Turks perceiuing the Chriſtians to be departed, ſallied out of the citie on all hands, & with a great crie vpbraiding them of cowardiſe, hardly purſued the rereward of the army. Vlamas was come ouer himſelfe from Buda, and ſo eagerly followed the army, that it could hardly haue eſcaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a ſtand, and requeſted the Hungarian and German horſemen to turne backe vpon the enemie: which they at his requeſt did, and not onely repulſed the enemie, but alſo put him to flight, and in the chaſe ſlew many. After which time the army paſſed on quietly; yet 700 Germans which were ſicke and ſtragled behind the army, were by the Turks horſemen miſerably ſlaine in the ſight of their fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, firſt at Exek, then at Buda, & now at Peſth, returned full of heauineſſe & griefe, as they which were now to forget the ſubduing of Hungarie, and to become carefull of Germanie it ſelfe. The army comming to Vienna, was there broken vp, and the Italians ſent home into their countrey, who for moſt part died by the way, of infection taken in the campe in ſtrange aire, and a moſt quæſie time of the yeare.

Perenus the noble Hungarian apprehended vpon ſuſpition of treaſon.

The vncourteſie of Liſcanus the Spaniard in the apprehenſion of Perenus

But to couer the ſhame of this vnfortunat expedition, and to turne mens talke another way by ſome notable accident: Petrus Perenus the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the purpoſe to fill mens mouthes. He, belayed with the enuie of the court, was for ſuſpition of aſpiring to the kingdome of Hungarie, by the commandement of king Ferdinand apprehended by Liſcanus, a Spaniſh captaine, in the caſtle of Strigonium, as a traitor, and preſently deliuered to Medices the Admirall, to be conueied vp the riuer to Vienna. Liſcanus at the time of his apprehenſion moſt couetouſly and vncourteouſly tooke from him his chaine, and a rich cloke lined with Sables: which indignitie done to ſo noble a gentleman, ſo much offended the minds of the reſt of the Hungarians, that aboue 12000 of them thereupon preſently returned home to their owne dwellings, curſing the Germans to the diuell. This Perenus was one of the greateſt Peeres of Hungarie, but of a moſt hautie & magnificent mind, ſo that he would ſometime haue almoſt 100 goodly ſpare horſes fit for ſeruice led before him without their riders; and would ſometime ſpeake too liberally againſt the bareneſſe of king Ferdinands court, who polled by his courtiers, hardly maintained his ſtate: which his ſurpaſſing magnificence & princely port was cauſe enough for the other great courtiers to enuie at his eſtate, and to ſeeke his ouerthrow; who as men ouercharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they neuer bore the leaſt part, and alwaies gaining by the deprauing of other mens perfection, conſpired together his ouerthrow, and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would ſay, That he ſauoured of a crown. This notable man, as he had many worthy vertues, ſo was he not without cauſe noted of ambition and vnconſtancie: for after that king Lewis was loſt, he diſdaining the preferment of Iohn the Vayuod to the kingdome of Hungarie, tooke part with King Ferdinand againſt him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himſelfe: but after he ſaw king Iohn againe reſtored, and his ſtate ſtrongly ſupported by Solyman, & that all things ſtood doubtfull and tickle with Ferdinand, he with like leuitie ſought meanes by Abraham the great Baſſa to be reconciled to king Iohn; which was hardly obtained of him by the interceſſion of Solyman himſelfe (as is before declared) to whom he gaue his ſonne as pledge of his fidelitie. After which time he liued in great honour and loyaltie all the raigne of king Iohn:

Matters ſurmiſed againſt Perenus.

but after he was dead, and ſaw George the Biſhop the Kings tutor doing what he liſt, to raigne like a King, he diſdained his gouernment, and ſolicited by King Ferdinand, reuolted again vnto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuie of the court, malice found out matter enough to worke his confuſion. Firſt it was giuen out, That his ſonne who had many yeares beene detained in Solymans Court as a pledge of his fathers faith, was euen then vnder the colour of a feigned eſcape come into Tranſyluania; when as he had ſecretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauored of the people, ſhould by promiſing them all poſſible freedome, allure them to the Turkiſh ſubiection: in reward of which good ſeruice he ſhould be made gouernour of the Kingdome of Hungary, and put in hope alſo to be made the tributarie King thereof, if it ſhould fortune the young King to die. Beſides that, it was accounted a thing verie ſuſpicious, that he had the Winter before vſed great kindeneſſe and friendſhip toward the Turkiſh Captaines, by ſending them great Preſents, and receiuing the like againe. And laſt of all, his letters directed to certaine Hungarian Captaines were produced, wherein he ſeemed to promiſe them as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his preſent eſtate. All which things King Ferdinand (of his owne diſpoſition not eaſily to be perſuaded to conceiue euill of the Germanes his countrey-men, were it neuer ſo apparent or true, but of ſtrangers any thing) quickely beleeued, and therefore cauſed him (as is before ſaid) to be apprehended. But Perenus as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to Vienna, when he was come neere vnto the gate of the city, and heard that Philippus Torniellus with certaine other braue Captaines of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admirall; he requeſted that the cloſe Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might haue leaue to ſpeake to thoſe noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was eaſily granted, for that the nobilitie and approoued valour of the man ſeemed vnto them which had the charge of him, vnworthie of ſuch reſtraint of libertie or impriſonment, yea or of the leaſt ſuſpicion thereof. So he turning himſelfe towards them, ſpake vnto them in this ſort:

The lamentable ſpeech of Perenus to Torniellus and the other Captaines, concerning his apprehenſion.

Wretched I, noble Gentlemen (ſaid he) whom deſpightfull enuie hath circumuented guiltleſſe: but much more miſerable King Ferdinand, whom domeſticall theeues bereaue of ſubſtance, of friends, and honour all at once. For ſo it commeth to paſſe, that by this inconſiderat wrong done vnto me, he ſhall vtterly loſe the loue and fidelitie of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for euer not without cauſe diſpaire for the obtaining of the Kingdome of Hungarie, ſithence that it is not lawfull for mee (inferiour to none of my Nation in birth, and hauing for my good and faithfull ſeruice wel deſerued reward of a iuſt King) ſo much as to reioice for the deliuerance of my ſonne from the captiuitie of the Turks, but that by my ſiniſter fortune, dreadfull death in ſtead of incomparable ioy muſt be preſented to mine eyes. For will theſe malicious Picke-thanks, guiltie of their owne cowardiſe, the wicked contriuers and witneſſes of my wrongfull accuſation, ſpare me being laid faſt and in durance, which neuer ſpared the Kings honor? For euery man of what nobility ſoeuer, be he neuer ſo guiltleſſe, when he is once in hold, muſt be content to endure, not what he hath deſerued, but what his hard fortune aſſigneth. Yet my vpright minde and cleere conſcience, which thing only God the moſt iuſt Iudge leaueth as a comfort to men in miſerie wrongfully accuſed, deliuereth me of this care: and ſo will the Marquiſſe our Generall, to whom I before vpon a miſtruſt foretold, that ſuch a danger would ſhortly befall me, and that I had rather be ſlaine guiltleſſe, than to withdraw my ſelfe from triall: which thing I told him at ſuch time as I was ſo guarded with mine owne ſtrength, that I feared no mans force. I beſeech you do me this honorable fauor, as to requeſt King Ferdinand in my behalfe quickely and honorably to proceed to the triall of my cauſe, and according to his owne princely diſpoſition, and the will of others, to diſcerne betwixt his faithfull friends and feigned flatterers. Truly we are then but vnfortunate Captaines, if for a little euill ſucceſſe we ſhall be ſo challenged as men that had ouerthrowne their fortunes. Cazzianer peraduenture receiued the iuſt puniſhment he had deſerued, for the ſhamefull forſaking and loſing of the Armie at Exek, when as he poſſeſſed with vnſeemely feare, forgat the dutie of a Generall, more affraid of death than diſhonour: for when he had voluntarily committed himſelfe into ſafe cuſtodie, he was ſo generally condemned of cowardiſe, that diſpairing to defend his cauſe, he brake priſon, and as wickedly as vnfortunately reuolted to the Turkes. But neither was I of late the Generall, neither were we vanquiſhed, although we preuailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repreſſed the inſolencie of the purſuing enemy. As for the Kingdome of Hungary, I might then well haue affected the ſame, and eaſily haue deſerued it at Solymans hands, when as Perenus his requeſt of the Admirall and the reſt of the Captaines.

King Ferdinand after the death of king Iohn was making his preparation for that war: at which time my friends and followers at my deuotion, with the loue of the Hungarians towards me, ſeeming of no ſmall importance for the obtaining of the victorie, might haue miniſtred no vnreaſonable or vnſeaſonable hope to haue drawne a man into courſes not altogether beſeeming a Chriſtian. Wherefore I haue, and will ſo long as I liue fight againſt the Turks, if King Ferdinand ſhall ſhew himſelfe an indifferent Iudge in this accuſation, falſly ſurmiſed againſt me by the malice of mine enemies. G Perenus, Valentinus, & Maylat, three of the greateſt nobility in Hungary, kept in perpetuall priſon.

When he had made an end of ſpeaking, the Admirall courteouſly perſuaded him to haue good hope in the clemency of the moſt iuſt King; and ſhortly after performed his requeſt: for he and Torniellus taking the King as he was hunting, entreated him to deale fauorably with Perenus. For all that, Perenus could not obtaine that his cauſe might be openly heard, but was H committed to ſafe keeping, there to remaine in perpetuall priſon: but whether it was for the miſpriſion of new treaſon, or for reuenge of his old vnconſtancie, is vncertaine. Thus three the only great Princes left of the Hungarian bloud, equally worthie of the Kingdome, Valentine, Maylat, and Perenus, ſnarled almoſt in like ſnares of enuie, cut off all hope of raiſing a King to their ſeditious and therefore miſerable countrymen: when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vnconſtancie in perpetuall priſon, and the other two faſt in chaines neere vnto the Euxine ſea, expected death the end of their miſeries. This end had the wars taken in hand againſt the Turks by the generall conſent of the Germanes in the yeare 1542; which many thought might worthily be compared with the greateſt loſſes of thoſe times: when as King Ferdinand hauing in vaine ſpent a great maſſe of treaſure (the fitteſt ſtay for the imminent war) and loſt the opinion before conceiued of the ſtrength of Germany; had now as a weake Prince, and ſubiect to iniurie, prouoked him againſt the Turks, bold enough otherwiſe, but as then inſolent for their late victories.

1543 Polinus the French Kings Embaſſadour ſtill following the Turkes Court, ceaſed not by all meanes to ſolicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the King his Maſter in the inuaſion of the Dominions of Charles the Emperour, in Italie, Sicilie, and Spaine. In which ſute he was ſo croſſed by Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa, then Viſier, that he was almoſt in diſpaire of ſpeed: for the Malicious Eunuch being himſelfe a great ſea-man, and enuying the honour of Barbaruſſa (who was to be employed in that ſeruice) ſought by keeping him out of all honourable actions, to diminiſh his former glory, and concerning the preſent, proteſted openly as he ſat in Councell, That he ſaw no other cauſe why the Turkiſh Emperour ſhould to his great charge and the common danger, ſend out ſuch a Fleet, but to ſerue Barbaruſſa his owne turne. But Solyman hauing diligently heard, and deepely conſidered of that the Baſſa's had ſaid, reiected their opinions who would not he ſhould haue giuen the French King any aid, and honourably decreed according to his promiſe, whatſoeuer ſhould enſue thereof, to ſend his Fleet vnto the King by Barbaruſſa. Two dayes after, the French Embaſſadour before in deſpaire, but now reuiued with that Decree, was ſolemnly feaſted by Ruſtan Baſſa (Solymans ſonne in law) and by Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa: for ſo it was their great Maſters pleaſure, both of them ioying of him for the friendſhip confirmed betwixt the two Princes by ſending this Fleet. After I which, diuers gifts were beſtowed vpon the Embaſſador and his chiefe followers; and at ſuch time as he was to take his leaue, Solyman gaue him great charge of his Nauie, that it might be ſafely kept, and ſo after the ſeruice done, againe returned: and withall deliuered him letters vnto King Francis; wherein after the glorious rehearſall of his proud titles, he writ vnto him as followeth.

Solyman granteth to ſend his fleet by Barbaruſſa to aid the French king againſt the Emperour.

Solymans letters to the French king.

We haue vpon a brotherly bountie granted vnto Polinus your Embaſſadour, ſuch and ſo great a fleet as you haue deſired, throughly furniſhed for all affaires: whoſe direction we haue commanded Hariadene our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment to proceed againſt the Enemie. But you ſhall do well and friendly, the warres once happily ended, to ſend backe againe my fleet to Conſtantinople. All things ſhall vndoubtedly fall out according to your owne deſire and minde, if you ſhall carefully take heed that Charles the Spaniſh king your perpetuall enemy do not againe deceiue you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then ſhall you bring him to a moſt indifferent peace, when you haue brought vpon his Countries all the calamities of Warre.

A Polinus taking his leaue of Solyman then lying at Hadrianople, returned to Conſtantinople, where he found Barbaruſſa with an hundred and ten gallies and fortie gallions, readie to put to ſea, which hee had with incredible celeritie rigged vp and furniſhed. And ſo ſetting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill in the yeare 1543, and paſſing the ſtraits of Heleſpontus, he arriued firſt at Cariſtius in Euboea; and from thence to Malea, where he was by contrarie winds caſt into the bay of Lacedemon, and there ſtaied nine daies before he could double the cape of Metapanium, called in antient time Tenarus. After that he came to Methon, and from thence croſſing the Ionian, came to the ſtrait of Meſſana: where the Turkiſh pirats being come with their galliots within the ſight of Rhegium, began to land their men. They of Rhegium ſeeing ſo great a fleet, and the Turks alreadie landing, fled out of the Citie for feare; but B the Caſtle was ſtill kept by Didacus Gaietanus a Spaniard, who refuſed to haue any parle with Polinus the French Embaſſador, and with ſhot out of the Caſtle ſlew certaine of the Turkes: wherewith the reſt being inraged, brake into the citie, and finding it deſolate, ſet it on fire, ſore againſt the will of Polinus and Barbaruſſa, who ſought to haue found out the authors thereof, and to haue puniſhed them accordingly.

After that, certaine pieces of great Ordnance were landed and planted againſt the Caſtle, which with a few ſhot ſo terrified the Captaine, alreadie troubled with the crying out of his wife, that he without any more ado yeelded himſelfe and the Caſtle with all therein, into the hands of the Enemie: vnto whom with his wife and children, Barbaruſſa at the requeſt of the C French Embaſſador granted both life and libertie: the reſt he ſhut vp in a Church, and gaue the ſpoile of the Caſtle to his ſouldiers. There was in the garriſon of the Caſtle about ſeuentie Spaniards, but many mo Citiſens, which were all carried away priſoners. One of the Captaines daughters, a young gentlewoman of exceeding beautie, had with her good grace ſo warmed the withered affection of the old Pirat Barbaruſſa, that he (now fitter for the graue than for marriage) became amorous of her perſon: ſo that taking her from her father, and entring her into the Mahometan Superſtition, he made of her as of his wife: inſomuch that certaine moneths after he welcommed and bountifully entertained the Captaine as his father in law, comming to ſee his daughter at the Port called Portus Herculis in Tuſcanie, where the Turks fleet then lay. Barbaruſſa ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Italy, came to Oſtia, in the mouth D of the riuer Tibur, and brought ſuch a feare vpon the citie of Rome, that the Citiſens were readie generally to haue forſaken the city; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the cardinall, then the great Biſhop Paulus his Legat in the Citie, in part ſtaied the ſudden tumult. The Biſhop himſelfe was then at Buxetum, a towne betwixt Cremona and Placentia, trauelling (in ſhew) with the Emperor, to haue made a peace betwixt him and the French King, but labouring in ſecret to haue bought of him the Dukedome of Millan, for Octauius his kinſeman the Emperors ſonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the Cardinall at Rome, and ſent by the Gouernor to Tarracina, were to this effect:

Barbaruſſa amorous of the Captaine of Rhegium his daughter.

E This Fleet which is by Solyman ſent for the defence of France by Barbaruſſa his Admirall, is by his appointment at my command: ſo that it is not to hurt any but our enemies. Wherefore make it knowne to the Romans and others dwelling alongſt the coaſt of the Popes territorie, That they feare of vs no hoſtility; for the Turks will neuer violat the faith of their Emperor ſolemnly giuen vnto me: and you know most aſſuredly, that the French King deſireth nothing more, than that the eſtate of Rome might not only be kept in ſafetie, but alſo flouriſh moſt glorìouſly, and be therefore preſerued from all iniury. Farewell.

The French embaſſadors letters to comfort Rodolph the Cardinall the Popes Legat in Rome.

In like manner he alſo comforted vp them of Neptunianum and Oſtia, ſo that they brought vnto the Turks all manner of victuall, and ſometimes for foure ſheepe or a couple of oxen redeemed a good priſoner taken in ſome place of the kingdome of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not ſo much credit the Embaſſadors promiſe in the behalfe of the Turkes good F dealing, but that many of the weaker ſort fled out of the citie into the countrey by night, although the chiefe Magiſtrates did what they might to haue ſtaied them. When Barbaruſſa had thus lien three dayes in the mouth of the riuer Tibur, and there watered, he paſſed alongſt the coaſt of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harme; and ſo ſailed directly to Marſeilles. Where leauing him with his fleet for a while, expecting the French Kings further pleaſure, we will againe returne vnto Solyman, who at the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſpoiling the frontiers of the Emperours Dominions in Italie, came with a great armie into Hungary, for the G more aſſured poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, whereafter he ſaw King Ferdinand ſo much longed.

And becauſe he would make all ſure before him, he ſent Amurathes Gouernour of Dalmatia, and Vlamas the Perſian Gouernor to Boſna, to beſiege Walpo, a ſtrong towne ſcituate vpon the riuer Dranus, not far from Exek, famous for the ouerthrow of the Chriſtian Armie vnder Cazzianer: after whom followed alſo Achomates the great commander of his Europeian horſmen.
This towne (part of Perenus his poſſeſſions) was againſt all theſe forces kept and worthily defended by Perenus his wife (her husband then lying in priſon at Vienna) and her friends by the ſpace of three moneths; but was at laſt by the treacherous ſoldiers deliuered to the enemy, together with their Generall; whom when they could by no meanes perſuade to conſent to the yeelding vp thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the laſt, they H tooke him perforce, and ſo deliuered him with the Towne to the Turks: who receiued him with all courteſie, and vſed him honourably: but thoſe traiterous ſouldiers, whether it were in deteſtation of their treacherie, or for the ſpoile of them, were all put to the ſword; the iuſt reward of their treaſon. The reſt of the Citiſens were taken by the Turks to mercie, and well vſed. The Biſhop and chiefe men of Quinque Eccleſiæ (a famous Citie not far off on the other ſide of Dranus) hearing of the loſſe of Walpo, and terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turks armie, fled for feare, leauing none but the meaner ſort of the people in the City, who willingly yeelded the ſame vnto the Turks. The next towne of any ſtrength was Socloſia, belonging alſo to Perenus; which for a while held out againſt the Turks, for that diuers Gentlemen of the countrey which were fled into the Citie, encouraged the Citiſens to ſtand vpon I their defence. But after much harme done on both ſides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the caſtle, in hope to haue ſo ſaued their liues and libertie by yeelding: but Amurathes was ſo offended with them, that he would come to no reaſonable compoſition, or promiſe them any thing more, than that they ſhould at their pleaſure come forth: and ſo as they came out at the gate, ſlew them euery mothers ſonne, thereby to terrifie others from making like reſiſtance.

Solyman commeth with his army to Strigonium.

Solyman vnderſtanding of all theſe things, gaue thoſe towns which were taken to Amurathes the Generall: and hauing put all things in readineſſe, departed from Buda with all his armie to beſiege Strigonium; which was then kept by Liſcanus and Salamanca, two proud couetous Spaniards, K with a garriſon of 1300 ſoldiers, whereof ſome few were Spaniards and Italians, & the reſt Germanes, Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium got himſelfe out of the city betimes, diſpairing of all mercy if he ſhould haue fallen into the power of Solyman, by whoſe intermiſſion he had bin once before reconciled to King Iohn, and had again reuolted from him to King Ferdinand.
The caſtle of Strigonium was ſcituat vpon a high hill ouerlooking Danubius running vnderneath it, the walls were built euen without any flankers, after the old manner of building before the inuention of guns: for which cauſe Vitellius and Torniellus two expert captaines (the yeare before ſent from the king to view the place, and the manner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the city could hardly be defended, if it were beſieged by any ſtrong Enemy; being ſubiect alſo vnto a hill not far from the gates of the city. Againſt which incoueniences the old garriſon ſoldiers which wintred in Strigonium, caſt vp new bulwarks and fortifications, L and after the manner of windie headed men, making great boaſt before the danger, what they would do, ſeemed to wiſh for the comming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemie had with his tents couered the fields and mountaines round about the city, and withall brought a gallant fleet vp the riuer, all thoſe brags were laid in the duſt, & euery man began to grow doubtfull of his owne ſafety: for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withſtand the infinite number of ſuch enemies, as oftentimes vſed moſt deſperatly to expoſe their liues to all maner of dangers. This their feare was alſo increaſed by the comming of certain meſſengers from Solyman, who vnderſtanding of what nations the gariſon conſiſted, ſent vnto the city three of his owne gard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegat Chriſtians, that euery one of them might without an Interpreter ſpeake M vnto their countrymen in their own language. Theſe men admitted into the city, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the name of Solyman, to ſuch as would in time yeeld: denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which ſhould endure the ſummons of the cannon. Whereunto it was anſwered by the Captaines, That thoſe faithfull and valiant ſouldiers

The ſtout anſwere of the Captaines.

The terrible battery of the Turks at Strigonium.

The Turkes repulſed thrice at the aſſault of the breach.

A Chriſtian fugitiue diſcouereth the ſtrẽgth and ſtate of the citie vnto the Turkes.

A diers, who had repoſed their laſt hopes in their armes, were neither to be woon by gifts, nor terrified with threats. With which anſwere the meſſenger returned, and the ſame day the Turks great ordnance was planted vpon the hill before the gate of the city, and the weakeſt parts of the walls round about the citie, ſo well pickt out by the Turkes to be aſſaulted, as that they could not more skilfully or commodiouſly haue bin choſen out of them which had within moſt diligently viewed euery thing: ſo that it is to be thought that the Chriſtians wanted not only fortune againſt the Turks, but alſo faith amongſt themſelues. Salamanca diſtruſting the fortifications of the ſuburbs, retired into the city, contrary to that he had before vainly boaſted. Achomates Generall of the Europeian horſemen, laid ſiege to that part of the wall which was next to the Biſhops gardens: Vlamas the Perſian beſieged the tower neere vnto B the gate towards Buda: The Aſapi or common ſoldiers were by their captains brought on to dig trenches, and caſt vp mounts, as was thought moſt conuenient. It is incredible to be ſpoken, with what furie the great ordnance was diſcharged without ceaſing; inſomuch that the tower with a great part of the wall neere vnto it, ſhaken with continuall battery, fell downe with ſuch violence, as if all had been ſhaken with a moſt terrible earthquake: neither was any man able to ſtand vpon the walls, but that the Ianizaries with their harquebuſiers out of their trenches, and from their mounts, would moſt certainly fetch him off: and many which ſtood within farther off, were with the Turks arrowes falling from high as if it had been out of the aire, grieuouſly wounded. But that which moſt troubled the defendants, and did them greateſt harme, was the ſtones, which beaten inſunder with the great ſhot, and not to be auoided, C did with their pieces kill or maime the ſoldiers neere hand. With which dangers they were enforced to forſake the vttermoſt wall, and to caſt vp new fortifications within, that they might with leſſe danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to aſſaile the breach: thrice they deſperatly attempted to haue entred, and were alwaies with loſſe repulſed. In which aſſaults, amongſt others, Bulbaces Sanzacke of Selymbria, a man of great account among the Turks, was loſt. Whileſt the defendants were thus buſied, many of the ſoldiers and mariners which came vp the riuer with all things neceſſary for the army, from Buda, went on ſhore, and lay in the ſuburbs of the city in ſuch ſecurity, as if there had beene no enemy nigh: which thing they in the city perceiuing, ſuddenly ſallied out vpon them fearing no ſuch matter, D and ſlew many of them before they could arme themſelues, & draue the reſt to their fleet: ſo that betwixt fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them ſlaine. Zimat a Perſian, Admirall of the Fleet, in reſcuing of them which to ſaue their liues fled vnto the riuer, was ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, and the Turks hauing in many places ſore ſhaken the wall, did with greater force daily aſſaile the Citie, and the defendants with their continuall loſſe, and out of all hope of reliefe, were more and more diſcouraged, an old Calabrian enginer which had long time ſerued king Ferdinand, fled out of the city to the Turks; who being curteouſly entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Baſſa's of many things concerning the ſtrength and ſtate of the city, ſatisfied them in all that they deſired, and further, directed them in planting their batteries in places moſt conuenient E for the ſpeedy taking of the towne. In the mean time whileſt the Turks were with reſtleſſe labor battering the walls, and working in their mines, it fortuned that a gilt brazen Croſſe which ſtood vpon the top of the ſteeple of the Cathedrall Church, was by the continuall ſhooting of the Turks thereat, at length beaten downe: at the ſight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the ſuperſtitious manner of that nation taking the chance as a token of good lucke, cried out preſently, Strigonium is won.

Liſcanus and Salamanca fearfully conſulting of the euent of the ſiege, and ſecretly conferring together, reſolued to ſaue themſelues, and to giue vp the towne. Liſcanus was no great ſoldier, and yet by continuall ſpoile growne exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but folly to buy the name of a reſolute captain at too deare a price, with the loſſe of his life and wealth. F The like feeling was alſo in Salamanca, who preferred the ſafety of himſelf & of that which he had gotten in long ſeruice, before al credit & honor were it neuer ſo great. This their purpoſe was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was noiſed abroad amongſt the common ſoldiers, of whom almoſt the third part was now either ſlain, or with wounds or ſicknes grown weake: yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were ſtill ſtrong enough to defend the towne. But the vnder Captaines and Ancients vſing to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yeeld vnto Salamanca goeth out of Strigonium, to parly with the Turks about the yeelding vp of the ſame.

Strigonium yeelded to the Turks by Liſcanus the Spaniard.

Solyman vpon reaſonable conditions, rather than to expoſe themſelues to moſt certaine death, which ſhould nothing better King Ferdinands cauſe. Not long after, an Antient was by night let downe ouer the wall, and hauing by an Interpreter receiued the Turks faith, called forth Salamanca, that he might vpon better conditions go thorow with them for the yeelding vp of the towne. Who without further delay comming out, went to Achomates; before he went, commanding them which defended the water tower next to the riuer ſide, a place of great danger, for ſafegard of their liues to get them into the city: who terrified with that news, and haſtily retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the ſiege therof, perceiued; who ſuddenly breaking in, ſlew ſuch as were not yet gone, and poſſeſſed the caſtle. But Salamanca being brought before the great Baſſa's, when he had ſtood vpon many nice termes, & required many things to haue bin granted him, obtained no more, but that they ſhould without delay yeeld vp the city, and put themſelues wholly to the mercie of Solyman. So the Spaniard being there ſtaid, himſelfe writ to Liſcanus, how he had ſped; willing him forthwith, if he loued his own ſafety, to yeeld the city, without ſtanding vpon further termes. Liſcanus vpon receit of theſe letters comming forth to the ſoldiers, declared vnto them the neceſſity of yeelding vp of the town, and what hope there was to eſcape with life and liberty. But whileſt the ſouldiers filled with indignation, ſtood as men in doubt what to do, Halis commander of the Ianizaries came vnto the gate, and with cheerful rather than ſterne countenance required to haue it opened vnto him, according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the campe: which was forthwith opened by Liſcanus, and the keies deliuered vnto him. The Ianizaries entring peaceably into the city, poſſeſſed themſelues of the walls & fortreſſes round about, commanding the Chriſtian ſoldiers to giue place, out of whom they choſe all the beardles youths, & commanded the reſt to caſt downe their harquebuſies & other weapons in a place appointed, which they all for feare did, expecting nothing but ſome cruel execution to be done vpon them by the barbarous enemy. Which their feare was the more increaſed by a ſtrange accident then vnluckily chancing: for whileſt the ſoldiers did as they were commanded, with their harquebuſies caſt their flaskes full of pouder alſo, one of them ſuddenly tooke fire of a match which was by chance caſt in amongſt them with fire in it, which firing the reſt, blew about all that heape of weapons among the Turks, which ſo filled them with anger & feare of ſome ſudden trechery, that they fell vpon the Chriſtians and ſlew diuers of them: vntill ſuch time as Halis (perſuaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Ianizaries to ſtay their fury. This tumult appeaſed, Halis cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch Chriſtian ſouldiers as would ſerue Solyman in his wars, ſhould haue ſuch place in his army as their quality required, with bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Chriſtian ſoldiers were found only ſeuentie, which carefull of their liues, accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would vpon ſuch as refuſed, exerciſe their wonted cruelty. Halis entertaining them curteouſly, ſent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, down the riuer to Buda: the other ſouldiers he tooke into his protection, and vſed their labor to helpe the Turks to make cleane the caſtle.

Liſcanus the couetous Spaniard merrily ſtript of all his wealth by Halis captaine of the Ianizaries.

But Liſcanus, who to ſaue his gold had made ſhipwracke of his honor & reputation, was glad to giue vnto Halis the faire chaine of gold which he had moſt couetouſly & inſolently before taken from Perenius, when as Halis (who would otherwiſe haue taken it from him by force) by way of militarie curteſie now craued it of him, as a ſtrange kind of ornament amongſt the Turks: with which gift he was in hope to haue ſaued the reſt of his coine. But fortune fauored not ſo much the couetous coward: for when he was about to depart away with his horſes of ſeruice, which he kept very good, & had cunningly ſtuffed the ſaddles ful of gold, thinking ſo ſlily to haue conueied it, the Turke laughing at him, tooke from him his horſes furniſhed as they were, ſaying, that he which was to go by water needed no horſes. So was the couetous wretch at once quit of the great wealth which he had in long time euill got. The captains with the reſt of the ſoldiers diſpoiled of their armes, were conueied ouer the riuer of Danubius, & ſo trauelled on foot to Poſonium, where the County Salme by the commandement of the king apprehended Liſcanus, Salamanca, and ſome other of the captains for ſuſpition of treaſon, & committed them to ſafe cuſtodie, there to anſwer for their cowardly yeelding vp of the city.

Solyman entreth into Strigonium, and there ſetteth vp the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

Solyman entred into Strigonium the tenth of Auguſt in the yeare 1543, and there conuerting Chriſtian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan ſuperſtition, firſt ſacrificed for his victorie (as he had before done in Buda), and after with all ſpeed ſo ſtrongly fortified the citie,

A as if hee would thereby for euer haue taken from the Chriſtians all hope of recouering the ſame againe, deriding the ſlouthfull negligence of the Germans, who poſſeſſed of it foureteen yeares, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman leauing Oſſainus a valiant captaine Gouernor of Strigonium, and ſending his Tartarian horſemen to ſpoile the countrey on the left hand, as far as Alba Regalis, went himſelfe to beſiege the caſtle of Tatta, called in antient time Theodota. The garriſon ſouldiers terrified with the loſſe of Strigonium, and the ſight of the Turks army, vpon the firſt ſummons yeelded the caſtle without reſiſtance, and were ſo ſuffered quietly to depart. That caſtle after the manner of the Turkiſh diſcipline, (who with few and thoſe very ſtrong holds keepe their prouinces in ſubiection) was by Solymans commandement preſently raſed downe to the ground. Torniellus Generall of the Italians B cauſed Hanniball, captaine of the caſtle, to haue his head ſtrucke off for his cowardly yeelding vp of the piece he had taken charge of: thereby to admoniſh others, which had the charge of ſtrong places, not to refuſe an honorable death in defence of their countrey, for feare of an ignominious death attending their cowardiſe.

A cowardly captaine worthily rewarded.

Tatta thus laid in the duſt, Solyman marched with his army towards Alba, ſurnamed Regalis, for that the kings of Hungarie by an antient cuſtome vſed there to be crowned, and alſo buried.
Buda, Strigonium, and Alba Regalis, three principall cities of the kingdome of Hungarie ſtand in maner of a triangle, almoſt equally diſtant one from another, about a hundred miles in compaſſe. Buda and Strigonium are ſcituate vpon the riuer of Danubius: but Alba ſtandeth more into the land, ſtrongly ſeated in the middeſt of a great lake, but not ſo wholeſomely, C eſpecially in the Summer time, the Winter waters then decreaſing, and groſſe vapours ariſing with the heat of the Sunne. From the citie thorow the mariſh or lake, vnto the firme land, lie three broad and high cauſeys (in manner of the ſtrakes of a cart wheele) well built with faire houſes and gardens on either ſide, and a broad way in the middle, whereby men paſſe in & out of the citie. At the end of euery cauſey toward the land were caſt vp ſtrong bulwarkes, which the citiſens vſed not to watch but in dangerous times of war: ſo that by theſe bulwarkes, the houſes of the ſuburbes ſtanding vpon theſe cauſies, were ſafe from the danger of the enemie, the lake filling vp all the ſpaces betwixt the cauſies: which, what for the depth, what for mud, flags, and bulruſhes, growing in it, was not by horſe or man to be paſſed thorow. And the citie it ſelfe ſtanding in the midſt of the lake, compaſſed round about with a ſtrong wall, and a deepe D ditch alwaies full of water, was hardly to be beſieged: for which cauſes a great number of the countrie people vpon the comming of Solyman, fled into it with their cattell, as vnto a moſt ſure hold. In the citie lay in garriſon two companies of Germans, and 200 horſemen, vnto whom were ioyned 500 Hungarian horſemen, ſuch as in time of peace liued by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Vſarous: vnto theſe, the Italian countie Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as far as Iauarinum, or Rab, ſent foure captaines with their companies, ſuch as were moſt forward in that ſeruice: after whom followed Barsotius, captaine of the Kings guard, with a companie of horſemen, appointed by the king for Generall. Who was no ſooner come into the citie, but newes was brought of Solymans approch. Whereupon he in haſt called together the other captaines, with Bicraus then maior of the citie, and other the chiefe citiſens E to conſult with them, What was beſt to be done for the defence of the citie, but eſpecially, Whether the ſuburbs of the citie, ſtanding vpon thoſe three broad cauſies, were to be deſtroied or not: that ſo the citie ſtanding in the middeſt of the great mariſh, might both with leſſe labour and danger be defended. This queſtion was ſeriouſly debated, and great reaſons alledged: at laſt the citiſens cried out with one voice againſt the matter, and ſaid, That they would neuer ſuffer thoſe goodly ſuburbes, wherein were ſo many churches and faire buildings as might compare with the citie it ſelfe, to be ſo ſhamefully deſtroyed, to the vtter vndoing of ſo many rich citiſens: for what could be (ſaid they) more diſhonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enemy, to ſhew ſuch a token of extreame feare; and with F their owne hands to burne and deſtroy thoſe ſtately buildings, which might by ſtrong hand be well inough defended againſt the enemie, if they did not play the ſhamefull cowards. Of which opinion with the citiſens was alſo Octauianus Scrofachia an Italian captain, alledging that both the citie and the ſuburbes might both with like danger be defended: foraſmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the mariſh, and if the worſt ſhould happen, the defendants might yet ſafely enough retire into the citie. At laſt ſtanding vp as one thruſt forward ward, both with the publicke hard fortune and his owne, said, Valiant gentlemen, what ſhew will G you giue of your valor, or what honor ſhall you haue of your ſeruice? If you ſhall defend ſo famous a citie, by deforming of it your ſelues, and cutting off the ſuburbs, as it were the arms thereof, before the danger, vpon too haſtie deſperation? Verily you ſhall doe nothing, either in the ſeruice of the king, or the honour of your ſelues, except this citie (if God ſo pleaſe) be of you whole and ſound valiantly defended. Vpon this ſpeech they all ariſe, the wiſer ſort and of greateſt experience giuing place to the importunity of the ignorant & ſimple. Barcotius himſelfe full of care, and ouercome with the vaine opinion of the greater part, yeelded alſo vnto that fatal reſolution of ſauing the ſuburbs. For it often falleth out, that they, who wiſely weighing dangers in the ballance of reaſon, and doe therefore fearefully reſolue of the euent of things, and doe thereupon oftentimes giue more hard and reſolute iudgement of H things than men of greater courage; yeeld neuertheleſſe to be partakers of other mens follies, yea euen to moſt aſſured death, rather than by maintaining their fearefull opinion, to be deemed cowards. So fell it out with Barcotius the Generall who ſetting a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him, went out to the ſoldiers, declaring vnto them the reaſons why the ſuburbs were to be defended: exhorting them with like valour on their parts to anſwer that honourable reſolution, promiſing to prouide whatſoeuer ſhould be neceſſary for the obtaining of the victory, aſſuring them of great rewards and preferment, which ſhould by their good ſeruice deſerue the ſame. Hereupon the ſuburbs were by the common labour of the ſouldiers and the citiſens quickly fortified, the great ordnance in places conuenient orderly planted, and watch and ward kept by the captains and their companies by their turns day and night. But the Turks drawing I neere to the citie, bent their forces only againſt the ſuburbs of the gate leading towards Buda: for that they perceiued the mariſh was in that place drier than the other, and the ſandie ground more vnfit for the making of bulwarks & other fortifications for the ſafety of the defendants, than in the other places where the ground yeelded better turfe. Barcotius perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, drew all the Italians and Germanes from the other gates into the ſuburbs of the gate of Buda, leauing the country people which were fled into the citie, & the citiſens, in their places. At the firſt comming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German horſmen, with the Italian footmen, ſallied out of the ſuburbs, and after certain light skirmiſhes retired. Which maner of fight was continued by the ſpace of three daies without any great harme done on either ſide: for the captains had warily commanded, That the ſouldiers ſhould not aduenture out too K far. But after that Solyman himſelfe was come, and had with the multitude of his tents beſet the citie far and neere, to the terror of the beholders; the Chriſtians ſhut vp all the gates, and sallied out no more. Which thing cauſed the wild Hungarian Vſarous (vſed to open skirmiſhes) to prouide for themſelues in time, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be coupt vp (as they termed) within the wals of the citie: ſo for faſhion ſake, asking leaue to be gone (who were not againſt their wils to be ſtaied) they by night departed, beeing not to be entreated by the Generall or citiſens to ſtay, and by knowne waies eſcaped thorow the woods from the enemy. In the mean time the Turkes were come with their winding trenches within ſhot, and with their arrowes and ſmall ſhot ſo ſcoured the top of the bulwarke, that no man could there poſſibly appeare but hee was ſtraight wounded: and ſuch was the fury of the great artillerie, that it had in L ſhort time battered in ſunder the plankes and timber which kept in the ſandie mould, whereof the fortreſſe was made, more for ſhew than for ſtrength; in ſuch ſort, that the great ſhot flying quite thorow all, ſlew and wounded many that were a far off: in which diſtreſſe of the defendants, the Turks Aſapi with ſmall danger filled vp the ditches of the bulwarke, and diuers places of the mariſh with earth and wood, which they brought continually from a wood thereby with ſix hundred waggons, ſo that in the ſpace of twelue daies they had made a firme way for them to paſſe ouer vpon, both to the bulwarke and the ſuburbs; a worke before thought impoſſible to haue beene performed. The ditches thus filled vp, the Turkes valiantly came on, ſeeking by plaine force to enter the bulwarke. Firſt came on the Aſapi, whom as men of leaſt worth the Turks captains vſe to thruſt to the firſt danger: after whom followed the horſmen, now on foot, with ſwords and targuets, or elſe their horſemens ſtaues, couering the Ianizaries, M who vpon their knees with their harquebuſiers ſore galled the defendants. This hot fight endured aboue three houres with equall hope and courage: but the Turkes ſtill relieued with freſh ſouldiers, repulſed the Chriſtians, and gained the vttermoſt bulwarke: neuertheleſſe the Italian fort was that day valiantly defended, the very women and religious helping to defend it:

A notable act of an Hungarian woman.

A it: in which aſſault a tall Hungarian woman, whoſe courage far exceeded the weakneſſe of her ſex, thruſting in amongſt the ſouldiers vpon the top of the fort, with a great ſythe in her hand at one blow ſtrucke off two of the Turks heads, as they were climing vp the rampier. This aſſault was giuen the nine and twentieth of Auguſt, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade, and alſo ſlaine king Lewis at the battell of Mohachz; and were therefore after their ſuperſtitious manner in obſeruation of their fortunate and vnfortunate daies, in good hope to haue then taken the citie: wherein they were much deceiued, being not able at that time further to enter, but enforced againe to retire. Wherewith Solyman offended, ſent for Abraham, Achomates, and Halis (the chiefe captains in that aſſault) into his tent, and reproued them ſharply, for that the bulwarke being ſo valiantly and fortunatly woon, they had not with more cou-B rage proſecuted the victorie, but cowardly (as he thought) giuen it ouer, being in a manner alreadie woon: and therefore with ſterne countenance commanded them to prepare all things readie within three daies for a freſh aſſault, and neuer to return vnto him, except they did win the citie. Whereunto the captaines anſwered no more (for were they neuer ſo guiltleſſe, they might not before him ſtand to excuſe themſelues) but that they would in ſhort time accompliſh his deſire. Wherefore hauing made all readie, and encouraged the ſouldiers to this laſt aſſault, they terribly aſſailed the rampiers, and brought a great feare vpon the defendants: for taking the benefit of a thick miſt (as it oftentimes chanceth in marriſh grounds) they were with great ſilence (contrarie to their manner) got vp to the top of the rampiers, and come to handie blowes, before they were well diſcouered. The fight was for the time fierce and terrible: but C the Ianizaries preuailing, at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians alſo, ſo that now well was he that could run faſteſt towards the citie. But that their haſtie flight little auailed, when as they were to paſſe out by a little narrow gate in maner of a wicket: & they in the citie, without regard of them that fled, had plucked vp the draw bridge ouer the ditch.
For naturally it commeth oftentimes to paſſe, that the feare of the preſent danger, without bluſhing excuſeth our foule dealing. So the barbarous and fierce enemy purſuing the flying Chriſtians at the heeles all the length of thoſe ſuburbs with moſt cruell execution, many notable men, ſome fighting, ſome flying, were there ſlaine: amongſt whom was Octauianus Seroſactius, author of the euil counſel wherof inſued that calamitie. Barcotius the Generall flying on horſbacke to the little gate, which was not to be paſſed thorow, and crying in vaine to them that D fled, to haue the great gate opened, was by the comming of the Ianizaries ſlaine: whoſe head and right hand full of rich rings, was by the barbarous enemy carried about in deriſion vpon a launce. The reſt of the flying multitude finding the little gate ſhut vp with the bodies of the dead, & the bridge maliciouſly drawne vp, deſperatly threw themſelues into the deepe ditch, where ſome of them labouring to ſwim out, were caught by the legs and armes by other that could not ſwim, and both together drowned. Some hardly crauling ouer, were ſhot in the head or backe with the Turks arrowes: otherſome ſticking faſt in the mud, were as if it had been in ſport ſhot to death by the Turks: ſome few there was which got ouer, and were ſaued.

The miſerable ſlaughter of the flying Chriſtians

There was yet left in the citie the Generall of the German horſemen, and Vſcaſades of Cremona, an Italian captaine: theſe two gathering the remainder of the ſouldiers which were left, E placed them vpon the wals: but the citiſens were ſtrucke with ſuch a feare, that they could not tell which way to turne themſelues. For now Birrous the maior, with the aldermen and other chiefe citiſens, ſeeing the ſlaughter of the Italians and Germanes, were ſo ouercome with deſpaire, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to bee repoſed in making of any farther reſiſtance, but only in the mercie of Solyman. Wherfore Birrous ſpake vnto the Turks from the wall, That he might ſafely ſend embaſſadors to Solyman, to intreat with him vpon reaſona-ble conditions, for the yeelding vp of the citie: which thing Achomates eaſily granted. With theſe embaſſadours for the citiſens, went alſo the Generals of the German horſmen, & Carolus Rufus an Italian captaine (who of all others had borne himſelfe moſt valiantly in all the aſſaults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the ſafety & liberty of the ſoldiers.
F The embaſſadors being brought before the great Baſſaes, requeſted, That yeelding the citie, the citiſens might inioy their liues & liberty: wherunto they were ſo anſwered, as that it ſeemed they ſhould not all be pardoned, yet was the generall feare wel dimiſhed, for that the puniſhment reſpected but ſome few. Rufus was courteouſly entertained; & eaſily obtained, that the Italians might in ſafety depart with bag & bagagge to Vienna: the like grace alſo had the Embaſſadours ſent to Solyman to entreat vpon conditions for the yeelding of the citie.

Generall of the Germans for his ſouldiers. Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa, offered vnto Rufus honorable entertainment, if he would haue ſerued Solyman: which when he refuſed as bound to king Ferdinand by oath, in honour of his valour he gaue him a rich cloake wrought with flowers of gold. The embaſſadours returning into the citie, and telling how they had ſped, deliuered the citizens of a great feare. Shortly after the citie being yeelded, Achomates by open proclamation in the market place, commanded the Italians and Germans to make themſelues readie againſt the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian went with them: he alſo ſtraitly charged the citiſens to keepe their houſes, vntill the ſtrange ſouldiers were departed. At the time appointed, the Italians and Germans ſet forward, conducted by Homares with a companie of the Turks horſemen, who faithfully defended them againſt the Tartars, running vp and downe the countrey after ſpoile: neither was any thing taken from them but their dags, which the German horſemen after a new faſhon carried at their ſaddle bowes; theſe the Turks greatly deſired, delighted with the noueltie of the inuention, to ſee them ſhot off with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their trauell ſet vpon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hot skirmiſhes, and had hardly eſcaped vnſpoiled, had they not beene reſcued by the kings ſouldiers lying in garriſon in the Caſtles as they paſſed alongſt the countrey. The few which remained, after many troubles came at laſt to Vienna, more like ghoſts than men.

Solyman entreth into Alba Regalis.

Solyman causeth the chiefe citiſens of Alba Regalis to be ſlain

Solyman entering quietly into the citie, firſt viſited the Sepulchers of the Hungarian kings, and gaue out proclamation, That the Hungarians ſhould feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliuer them from the bondage of the Germans, and ſo to reſtore againe that entire kingdome vnto Stephen the right heire of King Iohn. But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citiſens into a field not far off, wherein the bodies of condemned men were woont to be buried, as if he would haue there taken an oath of them for their fidelitie: whether, after they were all aſſembled in the beſt manner they could, as to ſome ſolemne feaſt, the cruell tyrant (without regard of his faith or promiſe) cauſed them all to be ſlaine. Howbeit ſome report, that he cauſed them onely to be put to death which bare office in the citie, at ſuch time as they reuolted from the obedience of the Queene and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German ſouldiers; and that he ſent the reſt into exile to Buda and Belgrade. So Solyman leauing Balibeius Gouernour of Alba Regalis; and Mahometes ſometime Gouernour of Belgrade, his Lieutenant Generall for the whole gouernement of that kingdome, returned againe toward Conſtantinople (Winter now beginning to approch) after he had that Sommer woon Strigonium and Alba Regalis, two of the chiefeſt cities of Hungarie. All this while king Ferdinand had raiſed no power worth the ſpeaking of, to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie; onely at Vienna lay ſeuen thouſand Germans and foure thouſand Italians, at ſuch time as Solyman departed from Alba Regalis, which were ſhortly after diſcharged.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of Alba Regalis, he ſent his Tartarian horſemen which ſerued him to ſmall purpoſe in the ſiege, to ſpoile the country round about: theſe ſauage people doing much harme, were in diuers places circumuented by the Hungarians, & about three thouſand of them ſlaine: one of them being taken priſoner, had found in his knapſacke halfe a childe, of about two yeres old, the loathſome remainder of his barbarous feeding.

Barbaruſſa all this while lying with his fleet (as we haue before ſaid) at Marſeilles, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his diſhonour vndertaken ſo long a voyage by ſea, to pleaſure him which was not able (as he ſaid) to direct his own deſignes to any certain reſolution, but ſhamefully ſuffered the beſt time of the yeare for ſeruice, negligently to paſſe away without any thing doing, the blame whereof would (as he ſaid) be imputed to him at Conſtantinople: and that Solyman, who deſired to aid the king his friend and confederat, and by all means to annoy his enemies, would take in euill part to haue it reported, that hee had with ſo great charge ſet out ſo great a fleet, and ſo far off, to helpe his friend hardly beſet with his enemies, & to haue done nothing: beſides that, he tooke on like a Turke, that he who in time of ſeruice neuer vſed negligently to let ſlip the leaſt opportunitie, ſhould now blemiſh his former credit & eſtimation, by lying ſtill all that Sommer in the harbour of Marſeilles, where his ſouldiers grew lazie with doing nothing. Wherefore Polinus going to the king, told him of the proud Turkes great diſcontentment for lacke of employment: and returning to Barbaruſſa, brought order from

A the king,that he ſhould lay ſiege to Nice a citie of Prouince, then holden by the duke of Sa-uoy. This city ſtanding vpon the ſea,was by one of the French kings for a great ſum of mony pawned vnto the duke : which mony, king Francis had many tim.s offered to haue repaied, but could neuer get the citie out of the dukes hands. Vnto which ſeruice, the French king ſent alſo his fleet of two and twentie gallies and eighteen ſhips,wherein were imbarked eight thouſand footmen,and victuall for many daies. This fleet departing from Marceilles,keeping cloſe by the ſhore, came to the port called Monoc ; whither two daies after came Barbaruſſa alſo with an hundred and fiftie gallies. From thence Polinus by commandement from the king writ vnto the State of Genoa, That they ſhould not feare of that great fleet any hoſtilitie, which was not to hurt any but them of Nice,and not them neither if they would yeeld them-B ſelues. For more aſſurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks diuers Genoa captiues, which had long time bin chained in their gallies, and courteouſly ſet them at libertie, & ſent them home without ranſome. After that,he friendly exhorted the citiſens of Nice,to yeeld themſelues againe vnto their antient and lawfull Prince, renowned for his bountie and power ; rather than to aduenture their State to all extremities for that poore and diſtreſſed Duke, who betweene the Emperour and the French king,diſpoiled of the greateſt part of his dominions, ſaw no other end of his miſeries, but to leaue that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or to the other,that ſhould firſt lay hand thereon. Whereunto the magiſtrats of the town anſwered, That they knew no other Prince or ſoueraigne, but Charles their duke : wherefore he ſhould deſiſt farther to ſolicite them by letters or meſſengers, whom they would make no C other account of but as of their enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their forces,laid ſiege to the towne in three places. The citiſens had but a little before newly fortified their wals,by the direction of Paulus Simeon,captaine of the caſtle,and one of the knights of the Rhodes,a man of great experience, who long before taken at ſea by pyrats,had ſome-time ſerued Barbaruſſa,and therefore perſuaded the citiſens as reſolute men to withſtand the Turks. Which,that they ſhould more conſtantly performe,he tooke their wiues and children and weaker ſort of the people into the caſtle ; and from thence furniſhed the citiſens with all things neceſſarie for their defence. The citie was at once in diuers places battered by the Turkes & French,both by ſea and land:ſo that at laſt the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks,and made ſo faire a breach,that with their enſignes diſplaid,they attemp-D ted to haue entred : whoſe forwardnes Leo Strozza (then ſeruing the French king with a band of Italians) imitating,ſought to haue entred alſo: but the citiſens ſtanding valiantly vpon their defence,manfully repulſed both the Turks and Italians, and cauſed them with loſſe to retire.
In this aſſault were ſlaine about 100 Turks ; and of Strozza his ſouldiers 22. Preſently after, Barbaruſſa with all his force began a freſh batterie,in ſuch terrible maner,that the citiſens ſee-ing their wals in diuers places opened, and the few ſouldiers they had,ſore wounded, and no hope to be in conuenient time relieued, began to parley with the French Generall from the wall, concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; vpon condition, that they might in all reſpects liue vnder the French king as they had done vnder the duke : for performance whereof, the Generall gaue them his faith. But Polinus fearing leſt the Turks ſhould violate this compoſition, E and for griefe of the loſſe of their fellowes, or for hope of the ſpoile brake into the citie,entreated Barbaruſſa to recall his ſouldiers, and to cauſe them to goe aboord his gallies. For which cauſe not long after,the Ianizaries,as men deceiued of their hoped prey,were about to haue ſlaine both Polinus and Strozza,as they came from talking with Barbaruſſa.

Nice in Prouince beſieged by the French and the Turks.

The citiſens craue parley, & after yeeld the citie.

The city thus yeelded, they began to conſult for the taking of the caſtle: the performance whereof conſiſted firſt in the aſſailing of the caſtle it ſelfe, & then in defending of the city from the ſudden ſallies of them in the caſtle ; & likewiſe in defending of them which beſieged the caſtle,ſo that no enemy ſhould come to raiſe the ſiege: of which two things, Barbaruſſa put the French to choice which they would take, ſhewing himſelfe ready either to beſiege the caſtle, or to keepe the field. The French ſtanding in doubt of which to make choice, the proud old F Turk ſcorning their ſlow reſolution, & them alſo, as men vnfit for the ready accompliſhment of any martiall exploit, cauſed 7 pieces of batterie, whereof 2 were of wonderful greatnes, to be placed in a trice in a place moſt conuenient, & the ſame quickly intrenched and fortified, to the great admiratiō of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten down the battlements of the wals, & centinel houſes, ſo that no man was able to ſhew himſelf vpon the wals.

The caſtle beſieged.

The Frenchmen likewiſe on the other ſide did with their great ordnance continually batter the caſtle: but with long ſhooting they came to ſuch want of ſhot and pouder, that Polinus was glad to requeſt, that he might either borrow or buy ſome of Barbaruſſa: whereat the Turke fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they ſhould in their owne countrey ſtand in need of his prouiſion, who at Marceilles had better fraughted their ſhips with wine, than with neceſſaries for the wars. For the rough and ſeuere old Turke could not forbeare to taunt them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promiſed at Conſtantinople, and that in ſuch a rage, that he would threaten to lay hands vpon Polinus, who had brought him from Conſtantinople thither, whereas he muſt either loſe his honour, or hauing ſpent his ſhot & pouder, expoſe himſelfe and his fleet to all dangers. Wherfore being exceeding angry with the French, he ſuddenly called a Counſell of his captaines, and other chiefe officers, giuing it out, That he would preſently returne toward Conſtantinople, ſeeing that among theſe cowardly and vnskilfull men (as it pleaſed him to terme them) he found nothing ready or according to promiſe. Yet for all that, when he had chafed his fill, by the faire intreatance and large promiſes of the French Generall & Polinus together, the wayward old man was perſuaded to change his minde, and to continue the ſiege. But he was yet ſcarcely well pacified, and his mind ſet againe vpon the ſiege, but letters were intercepted from the great captaine Alphonſus Vaſtius, to Paulus captaine of the caſtle, wherein he requeſted him to hold out a while againſt the enemy, till that he, who had alreadie ſent before his light horſmen, might come alſo himſelfe with his men at arms, who were vpon the way alongſt the Alps by the ſea ſide, and would in two daies with the ſlaughter of the Turks put him and his caſtle out of all feare and danger. Which thing once bruted in the camp, ſuch a great and ſudden feare came vpon the Turkes and Frenchmen (the night following the more to terrifie them prouing by chance very rainy and tempeſtuous) that they all forſooke their trenches and great ordnance, and laying down their weapons, by narrow pathes climing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came downe headlong to the ſea ſide to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no enemie to be ſeene, they were aſhamed of that they had done, and came againe to the ſiege. Not long after, when as the caſtle in all mens iudgement was hardly to be battered, and ſtanding vpon a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtfull ſucceſſe to be vndermined, it was generally thought good to raiſe the ſiege. The Turks vpon their departure brake into the citie, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire.

Barbaruſſa in his rage threatneth to lay hands on Polinus, and to return forthwith to Conſtantinople.

The Turks and French giue ouer the caſtle of Nice, and ſet fire on the city.

Barbaruſſa retiring with his fleet to Antipolis, came to anker at the Iſland Lerina, called of the mariners Margarita, at which time Vaſtius and the duke of Sauoy, with Auria his fleet arriued at Villa Franca: in the entrance of which hauen, the gallie wherein Vaſtius went, was like to haue bin loſt. Foure other gallies by force of ſudden tempeſt were driuen vpon the rockes, and ſo ſuddenly beaten in pieces with the ſurge of the ſea, that the gallie ſlaues had not leiſure to ſtrike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordnance loſt. Polinus vnderſtanding this diſtreſſe of the enemie, ſent one Petrus Angelus to Barbaruſſa, to ſhew him the occaſion offered, and to perſuade him with al ſpeed to haſt thither with his fleet, as to a moſt aſſured victorie. Barbaruſſa ſeemed to like well of the motion, and promiſed to goe, yet he moued not, letted as it was thought with the contrary wind, which then blew hard at Eaſt, & with the roughneſſe of the ſea. But the wind being fallen, and the ſea become calme, and he contrary to his wonted manner making no haſt, ſet ſlowly forward, & being a little on his way, came againe to anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other captaines firſt maruelling, and afterward laughing thereat, ſcoffingly ſaid, That Barbaruſſa did but reaſon to deale kindely with Auria, as his brother and friend of his owne profeſſion, for that he had ſome yeares before receiued the like friendſhip at his hands, in letting him eſcape at Hippona, which he now honeſtly paied him againe. Whereunto Barbaruſſa both then and afterwards at Conſtantinople anſwered no otherwiſe, but, that he being an old commander, and halfe blind, ſaw more in the matter than all thoſe greene captaines with their ſharpe ſight. Not long after, hee returned againe to Marceilles, and put into the hauen of Tolon, called in antient time Taurenta. Vaſtius and the Duke comming to Nice, commended the Captaine of the Caſtle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turkes fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Chriſtians. Barbaruſſa lying with his fleet at Tolon, and by the Kings officers entertained with all poſſible courteſie, deliuered fiue and twentie gallies to Salec the famous pyrat, and Barbaruſſa derided by the Turks captains.

His anſwer to their taunts.

A Aſſanes his nigh kinſman; who paſſing the bay of Narbona, rifled certain towns in Spain ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, and about the promontory of Venus (called of the mariners Creum) tooke great prize; and in the hauen of Palamos tooke one merchant ſhip and a galley: with which prey they paſſed ouer to Algiers as they were commanded, there to winter, and with the firſt of the Spring to returne again to Barbaruſſa in Prouince. That Winter Barbaruſſa repairing his fleet, was furniſhed with many neceſſaries by the Genowaies, and eſpecially by Auria himſelfe, who vnder the colour of redeeming of priſoners, willingly furniſhed the Turke with ſuch things as he wanted: for although he profeſſed himſelfe one of the Emperors captaines, yet would he not ſhew an enemies minde, by the vnſeaſonable deniall of a little ſea furniture, leaſt in ſo doing he ſhould haue hurt his natiue countrey of Genoa, which he ſaw then ſubiect B to the iniurie of ſo great a fleet ſo nigh at hand. But leaue we now Barbaruſſa to winter in Prouince, and with the courſe of time turne a little out of the way, to ſee in Muleaſſes King of Tunes, the ſmall aſſurance the greateſt haue in higheſt place of worldly honour.

This Mahometan King, once before thruſt out of his kingdome by Barbaruſſa, and reſtored againe by Charles the Emperor (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great fleet, and imagining nothing leſſe than that he ſhould come to the aid of the moſt Chriſtian king, doubted (not without cauſe) leſt it was prepared againſt himſelf. Beſides that, diuers great cities of his kingdome, namely Conſtantina, Mahemedia, and Mahometa (called in antient time Cyrtha) Leptis, & Adrumentum, were then holden by the Turks Barbaruſſa's fauorits. Wherefore fearing the worſt, about the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Italie, C he paſſed ouer into Sicilie to haue met the Emperor at Genoa, and to haue obtained of him greater aid againſt the Turks. At his departure out of Affricke, he committed the tuition of his kingdome to ſuch valiant men as he ſuppoſed would haue bin vnto him moſt faithfull: Firſt, he he appointed Mahometes (then Maniphæt) to gouerne the city, and Corſus (otherwiſe called Fares) his old ſeruant to keepe the caſtle; leauing Mahometes his brother, and Fares his ſonne, with Touarres a Spaniard (captaine of the caſtle of Guletta) as pledges, the one of his brothers, the other of his fathers faith: but vnto Amida his ſonne he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kingdome againſt the Turks and Numidians. As he was paſſing out of Sicilia to haue met the Emperour at Genoa, he was by contrary windes driuen firſt to Caieta, and afterward to Naples, where he was by the Viceroy honorably entertained, D & a houſe appointed for him richly furniſhed: the Neopolitans wondering at the ſtrange attire of the people, with the manner of their feeding, and curious plentie of all manner of ſweet perfumes; for into euery diſh they put in odors of exceeding price, ſo that it was well known, that a peacocke and to pheaſants dreſſed after the maner of the kings kitchen, coſt aboue an hundred duckats: ſo that not only the dining chamber, when they were carued vp, but all the houſe was ſo filled with the ſtrange and fragrant ſmell, that all they that dwelt neere thereabouts were partakers of that vnuſuall and delicate perfume. From Naples he was about to haue trauelled by land vnto the Emperor, being then in conference with the Pope at Buxetum (fearing to aduenture the ſea, poſſeſſed by the enemies fleet) had not the Emperor by his letters willed him to ſtay ſtill where he was. But whileſt he made his abode at Naples, and carefully attended E what courſe Barbaruſſa would take, (who furniſhed with ſo great a fleet, was departed from Nice diſappointed of his purpoſe) he was by certaine meſſengers aduertiſed out of Affrica, That Amida his ſonne was riſen vp againſt him, and poſſeſſing himſelfe of the kingdome, had ſlaine his captaines, polluted his wiues, and taken the caſtle of Tunes. With which newes he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to paſſe ouer into Affricke, & though late, yet as he might to remedie his domeſticall troubles, in hope to oppreſſe that rebellion in the beginning, and his ſonne alſo, before he could gather any ſtrength to reſt vpon. Wherfore he with all the haſte he could opened his coffers and entertained ſoldiers, the Viceroy giuing leaue to all ſuch baniſhed men as would, to come and giue their names to paſſe ouer as ſouldiers into Affricke: vpon report whereof, ſuch a number of malefactors and condemned per- F ſons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a ſufficient army might haue beene made of ſuch kinde of men; euery one of them chuſing rather to enter into pay, and blot out the infamie of baniſhment, and proue the fortune of wars, than to liue wandring vp & down the woods and in danger euery houre to be hanged. Of theſe infamous men, one Ioannes Baptiſta Lofredius (a man well borne, but of a fierce and couetous diſpoſition) vndertooke the leading: he couenanting with Muleaſſes to haue three moneths pay before hand, leuied 1800 men; which G he preſently ſhipped, and keeping the greateſt part of their pay to himſelfe, paſſed ouer with the King into Affricke, and landed at Guletta. But how Amida roſe vp againſt his father, and what was the end of that bloudie rebellion, ſhall not be amiſſe briefly to rehearſe. There were certaine Noblemen of great authoritie about Amida when Muleaſſes departed, which at their pleaſure ruled the young Prince, who eaſily hearkened vnto their counſell, and followed the ſame: the chiefe of theſe was one Mahometes ſonne of Bohamer, who in the raigne of Mahometes, Muleaſſes his father, was Maniphæt, whom Muleaſſes (poſſeſſed of the kingdome) put ſhamefully to death by cutting off his priuities, becauſe he had by haſtie marriage deceiued him of Rhahamana a maiden of incomparable beautie, the daughter of Abderomen Captaine of the Caſtle, whom he moſt paſſionatly loued: for which cruell fact, Mahometes his ſonne had H long time conceiued a deadly hatred againſt Muleaſſes, which he had many yeares diſſembled, that he might as occaſion ſerued be the more cruelly reuenged. Next vnto him was another Mahometes ſurnamed Adulzes, whom Muleaſſes was wont commonly to call his worſt ſeruant.

Theſe two with a few others conſpiring together, gaue it out, that Muleaſſes was dead at Naples, and before his death had moſt irreligiouſly (as they accounted it) reuolted to the Chriſtian religion. With which report they perceiuing Amida mooued, came vnto him and perſuaded him quickely to enter into his fathers ſeat, leſt Mahometes his yonger brother (then lying in hoſtage with the Chriſtians at Guletta) ſhould by the fauour and helpe of Touarres, whoſe garriſon was euer readie, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteene yeres old, I reſembling his grandfather in name, fauor, and diſpoſition, and therefore of the citiſens of Tunes beſt beloued. Wherefore Amida came in poſt haſt out of the campe to Tunes, to lay firſt hand vpon his fathers kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, receiued him with doubtfull countenance: and as many ſtood maruelling that hee was ſo raſhly come into the city without his fathers commandement, Mahometes (appointed by Muleaſſes to gouerne the city) came out and ſharpely reproued him as guiltie of high treaſon, perſuading him to returne againe into the campe: and ſeeing him ſtay, by force of multitude thruſt him out of the city. Amida deceiued of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleaſant country of Martia betweene Vtica and the ruines of old Carthage. But Mahometes gouernor of the city, after he had repulſed Amida, got him with all ſpeed by water to Touarres K at Guletta, to know of him more aſſuredly, if any ſuch euill newes were brought from Sicilie of the death of the King; and to complaine of the raſhneſſe and intollerable preſumption of Amida. Where ſtaying ſomewhat long in diſcourſing with the Captaine, and afterwards returning to the citie, he was ſuſpected to haue practiſed with the captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in Guletta) King in his fathers ſtead; for ſo the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithleſſe people, haſtie, ſuſpicious, deſirous of newes, which true or falſe, they for the time interpret as ſerueth beſt their factions, whereunto they are exceedingly giuen. So at the firſt there roſe in the city a doubtfull rumor of the making of a new king; the ſuſpicion whereof more and more increaſing, ſet all the city on an vprore. By occaſion whereof, certaine of the citiſens to whom the very name of Muleaſſes was odious, ſpeedily certified Amida L (then in the gardens of Martia, ſighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how all ſtood, and that now was the time to do himſelfe good. He reuiued with that vnexpected newes, and encouraged by the perſuaſion of Bohamar and Adulzes, and other his followers; reſolued to take hold vpon that good offer of fortune, which would not alwaies frown, and to follow his good hap. So in haſt returning to Tunes, and entring in at the gate, which he then found open, ran preſently to the gouernors houſe, and finding him not at home, cruelly ſlew all his houſhold, and with his bloudie company went preſently to the caſtle: where Fares the Captaine ſeeking to haue kept him out, and boldly laid hands vpon his horſes bridle to haue thruſt him backe, was by a deſperat Æthyopian one of Amida his followers, thruſt thorow with a ſword and ſlaine: ouer whoſe bodie yet ſprawling, Amida forcing his horſe, brake into the caſtle with his friends, and finding Mahometes gouernor of the City, preſently ſlew him alſo. And ſo by this M meanes Amida in the ſpace of an houre (a little before, a man in diſpaire) obtained the city, the caſtle, and the kingdome togither. After that, he murthered his yonger brethren, and embrued with bloud, without ſhame polluted his fathers concubines. Muleaſſes landed (as we haue beforeſaid) at Guletta, with ſuch forces as he had brought with him out of Italy; was aduiſed by

A by Touarres the Spaniard, not to aduenture with ſuch a handfull of men to go to Tunes, before he were well aſſured of the good diſpoſition of the Citiſens towards him: and was the more earneſt with Loſredius not to go, becauſe the Viceroy had expreſly written, That he ſhould in no caſe go any further than Guletta, except the King according to his promiſe had a good ſtrength of the Numidians to ioyne with him. But certaine of the Noblemen amongſt the Moores, which vnder the colour of friendſhip were fled out of the Citie, and had after the ſolemne manner of their nation put their ſwords vnto their throats, and ſworne to be faithful vnto him, wonderfully prickt forward both the King and Loſredius (too haſtie of themſelues to their owne deſtinie) bearing them in hand, That Amida vpon the firſt ſight of his father would forſake the city, and betake himſelfe to flight. So without more ſtaying, Muleaſſes with Enſigne B diſplaied ſet forward towards Tunes, Loſredius cheerefully following him; Touarres requeſting them in vaine to beware of the Moores trecherie. Muleaſſes marching ſtill forward, was come ſo nigh the citie, that they might from the walls deſcrie him; when ſuddenly a ſtrong troupe of Moores ſallied out of the gate with a terrible crie, and fiercely aſſailed him; whom the Kings horſemen valiantly receiued, many falling on both ſides. Muleaſſes in this hot skirmiſh fighting couragiouſly againſt his enemies, was wounded in the face, and bled exdingly; which ſo diſcouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backes and fled: when preſently a wonderfull number of horſe and foot ſuddenly iſſuing out of the oliue gardens, had beſet Loſredius and his ſouldiers round: vpon whom the Italians diſcharged certaine field pieces: but after they had once diſcharged them, they had no leiſure to C charge them againe; for the barbarous enemy came on ſo thicke and ſo faſt, that the Italians ſeeing themſelues too weake, and compaſſed in round, ſet fall their weapons as men diſcouraged, and caſt themſelues into the lake, ſo by ſwimming and taking hold of the little boats, to ſaue themſelues from the enemies ſword: which boats ſtood thoſe diſtreſſed men in great ſtead, for being furniſhed with ſmall pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly purſued them euen into the lake with their horſes. Loſredius as a man amaſed with the ſudden comming of the enemy, tooke the lake with his horſe, and was there vnhorſed by the enemie and ſlaine, as were diuers with him. Some few there were that fought couragiouſly, chuſing rather honorably to die in the midſt of their enemies, than ſhamefully to be ſtrangled in the ſtinking lake. Muleaſſes ſoiled with his owne bloud and with the duſt, flying amongſt the D reſt, was knowne and taken: nothing more bewraying him than his odoriferous perfumes. In this conflict 1300 Italians were loſt; the reſt which eſcaped Touarres relieued, and ſhortly after ſhipped them ouer into Sicilie, from whence they trauelled home to Naples, but ſo poore, as well ſhewed the miſerie of their fortune. Amida hauing thus obtained the victory, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father vnfit for gouernment, which he did by cutting the ſight of both his eyes with a hot penknife: the like crueltie he vſed vpon Nahazar and Abdallas his brethren, then taken with his father. After that, he certified Touarres Captaine of Guletta, That he had taken a few youths priſoners, which hee would deliuer vnto him; and that he had bereft his father of his ſight, who had deſerued a worſe puniſhment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren, but had yet left him his life, as an example to other E tyrants, and to ſhew that he dealt not altogether vnmercifully with ſo perfideous a father: Laſt of all, he confirmed (vpon certaine conditions) the ſame league which his father had with him: which he well ſaw was to great purpoſe, eſpecially in the newneſſe of his kingdome. Neither did Touarres refuſe the ſame, as ſtanding with his preſent profit: for vpon this agreement, Amida was to giue him certaine money to pay his ſouldiers, and to deliuer him the priſoners he had taken, with the enſignes and bodie of Loſredius. For more aſſurance whereof he gaue Sebites his ſon then nine yeres old, in hoſtage, yet vpon condition, that if an aſſured peace could not be agreed vpon, but that they muſt needs enter into war, then Touarres ſhould forthwith reſtore him his ſonne Sebites in ſafetie. Theſe capitulations, although they ſeemed not vnreaſonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing F with the honour of the Emperor, that he ſhould enioy the kingdome, who by moſt horrible treaſon and deteſtable villanie had thruſt himſelfe thereinto without the Emperours leaue. Wherfore he entred into a new deuice to call in the rightfull heire, who might at the Emperors pleaſure (offended with the iniurie done by Amida) raigne in Tunes.

cetes fled to Barbaruſſa. Him, becauſe he was Muleaſſes naturall brother, Touarres ſent for, putting him in hope of the kingdome, ſupported by Anemſcha a great Prince amongſt the Numidians, who had all that long time curteouſly entertained him. Neither was Abdamelech ſlow to accept the occaſion preſented, eſpecially incouraged thereunto by the Numidian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Aſtrologers, who had foretold him, That he ſhould be king of Tunes. Which vain kinde of diuination hauing in it no manner of aſſurance, yet cauſeth great mindes oftentimes to vndertake great attempts beyond reaſon, which falling out with more hap than they were with reaſon foretold, giueth ſome credit to that vanitie, and cauſeth thoſe cold prophets to be of ſome accounted as great wiſards. And to worke this feat, ſuch a time was offered, as a better could not be wiſhed: for Amida hauing ſet all things in order as he pleaſed in the city, and caſting no perill, was gone to Biſerta, to take order for his Cuſtomes, which was there great vpon fiſhing. Wherefore Touarres to keepe his promiſe, ſent backe Sebites, Amida's ſon, in a boat to Tunes, and receiued Abdamelech: who trauelling moſt part by night, was ſecretly come to Guletta, and there reſting himſelf & his horſes a few howers, to preuent the fame of his comming, poſted in haſt with a troupe of his Numidian followers to Tunes, and paſſing thorow the city, went directly to the caſtle, which he entred without reſiſtance of the warders, ſuppoſing him to haue bin Amida come from Biſerta: for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Moores couered his face with a ſkarfe, as if it had bin to haue kept him from the Sun & the duſt, and by that happy ſlight got into the caſtle before it was known who he was.

Abdamelech by policy obtaineth the Kingdom of Tunes.

The warders perceiuing their errour, began as men amaſed now too late to betake themſelues to their weapons, for in making reſiſtance they were quickly ſlain by the Numidians which came in with Abdamelech: who thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle (the chiefe ſtrength of that kingdome) let in his friends, which were many in the city, by whome he was preſently ſaluted king: the reſt of the Citiſens either well-liking of the matter, or at leaſt not daring for feare to ſtir.

Abdamelech dieth, and Mahometes his ſonne is choſen King in his place.

But as in theſe worldly things, for which men ſo vainly toile, is no aſſurance, ſo this new king ſhortly after fel ſicke and died, when he had raigned but 26 daies, and was afterwards roially interred. After whoſe death, his mightie friends, with the chiefe of the citiſens (perſuaded & incouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) choſe Mahometes his ſon (a child ſcarce twelue yeres old) to raigne in his fathers place; appointing Abdalages Maniphæt (brother to him who Amida ſlew) Abdelchirinus Meſuar, Schyriffus (a great man in their Mahometan ſuperſtition) and Perellum a Chriſtian knight, to be his directers and gouernours: which foure ſwaied all at their pleaſure. But Abdelchirinus tendring the welfare of his country, and deuiſing out of ſeaſon how to ſet vp one of the roiall bloud that were of himſelfe able to gouerne the kingdome (ſaying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a child) was for his labour by his other three fellows ſuddenly ſlain, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whoſe death the other three erected a manner of Triumuirat gouernment, euery one of them laying hand vpon one part of the ſtate or other, as liked him beſt. Amida thus ſhut out of Tunes, and hauing loſt his kingdome, wandred vp and down to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, crauing aid of euery man to recouer his kingdome, miſerably rent in ſunder (as he ſaid) by moſt wicked men who inſolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of Tunes knew wel to be true; and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faithfull Counſellor and father of his country. Whileſt Amida is thus trudging vp and downe, crauing helpe of this and that prince, prouing his friends, and ſounding his ſubiects affection towards him; Muleaſſes grown miſerable with his long impriſonment & the calamity of his diſaſter fortune, obtained of the yong king his nephew ſo much fauour, as that he might ſometime go out of the caſtle to the church: vnder colour whereof he tooke ſanctuarie, a place in Tunes holden in ſuch reuerence amongſt the Moores, as that it was a moſt inuiolable refuge to all ſuch as fled thereunto.

Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres is ſent to Guletta.

Not long after, at ſuch time as Bernardinus Mendoza the Admirall of Spain came to Guletta with the Spaniſh fleet, Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres was conueyed out of the Sanctuarie to the Lake, and ſo by water to Guletta, there to be preſent at the conſultation there holden for the vtter ſubuerſion of Amida and the driuing out of the Turks out of ſuch cities as they yet held alongſt the ſea coaſt in Affrica. Muleaſſes had hardly before eſcaped the hands of certaine of his enemies in Tunes, who ſought after his life; preſerued by an old woman, who mooued with pitty, hid him from their furie vnder a great heape of garlike: and had he not now in good time eſcaped to Guletta, he had againe fallen into the hands of his

For the citiſens of Tunes wearie of the euill gouernment of ſuch as were in authority about the yong king, and not a little offended with the King himſelfe, for eſpouſing Melucca his couſin one of Muleaſſes his daughters, ſecretly encouraged Amida by letters, to repaire to the city, promiſing to aid him in recouering his kingdome. Whereupon he came in ſuch haſte, that the yong king had ſcarce time to get out of the citie: and Amida entring without reſiſtance, and holpen by his friends, eaſily obtained againe the kingdome, and exerciſed moſt exquiſit cruelty vpon his enemies: of whom he cauſed ſome to be torne in pieces and deuoured of fierce maſtiues kept hungrie for that purpoſe. Perellus he cauſed to be tortured, his ſecrets to be cut off, and himſelfe after- B wards burnt to aſhes in the market place.

Amida recouereth the Kingdome of Tunes, and takes ſharp reuenge vpon his enemies.

But Muleaſſes ſtaied not long at Guletta, offended with the couetouſneſſe of Tonarres, who (as he ſaid) had not faithfully reſtored ſuch things as he had before put him in truſt withall, but had auaritiouſly in his miſerie deceiued him of part of his rich houſholdſtuffe, with certaine notable precious ſtones, and ſome of his treaſure: whereof the blinde king ſo grieuouſly complained to Charles the Emperor, that for deciding the matter, they were both commanded to repaire vnto him into Germany: where in concluſion to end the ſtrife, Tonarres was diſcharged of his gouernment, and Muleaſſes ſent into Sicilie, there to be kept of the common charge of that rich Iſland. Muleaſſes by the way comming to Rome, was honourably feaſted by Cardinall Farneſius: at which time he ſhewed himſelfe both in his apparell and behauiour not for- C getfull of his better fortune: and being brought vnto the preſence of Paulus the great Biſhop, would do him no greater honor but to kiſſe his knee, accounting it too great an indignitie to haue kiſſed his foot. He was of ſtature tall, and of a princely diſpoſition, vnworthie of ſo hard a fortune, had he not in the like manner before vnmercifully dealt with his owne brethren.

Barbaruſſa wearie of his long lying to ſo ſmall purpoſe in Prouince, requeſted the French king either thorowly to imploy him, or elſe to giue him leaue to depart, offering if he ſo pleaſed, to ſpoile all alongſt the coaſt of Spaine, from the mountaine Pyrænei to Cadiz. But he not ignorant what hard ſpeeches ran of him alreadie in all parts of Chriſtendome, for bringing in the Turks, was loath to leaue vnto the memorie of all poſterity the foule remembrance of ſo wofull a ſlaughter: beſides that, he was aduiſed to diſburden his country of ſuch troubleſome D gueſts, who rouing about, did much harme in the prouince where they lay, and as it was reported, now and then ſnatcht vp one country peaſant or other, and chained them for ſlaues in their gallies. Wherefore in ſupply of the Turks that were dead, the king gaue vnto Barbaruſſa all the Mahometan ſlaues in his gallies, to the number of about foure hundred, and furniſhing him with all kinde of prouiſion, and beſtowing great gifts vpon him and his captaines, ſent him away; and with him Strozza with certaine gallies, his Embaſſador to Solyman. So the Turkes departing out of Prouince, kept alongſt the coaſt vntill they came neere vnto Sauona, whither the Germans ſent diuers preſents and freſh victuals to Barbaruſſa; which he tooke ſo thankfully, that he proteſted not to hurt any of their territorie. From thence he kept a right courſe to the Iſland of Elba belonging to the duke of Florence, ouer againſt Populona; where vnder- E ſtanding that one of the ſonnes of Sinan his old friend was there kept priſoner, hee writ vnto Appianus gouernor of the Iſland, for his deliuerance, to this effect:

I know that a young man a Turke ſerueth thee, the ſonne of Sinan ſirnamed the Iew (a famous Captaine) taken of late at Tunes: him I would haue thee friendly to reſtore: which gift I will make thee to vnderſtand to be vnto me moſt acceptable: for this our great fleet in paſſing by you ſhall faithfully forbeare to vſe any hoſtilitie. But if thou ſhalt in this ſo ſmall a matter refuſe to gratifie me, expect vpon the coaſt of thy country all the harmes that an angrie enemie can do.

Barbaruſſa his letters to Appianus Gouernor of Elba.

Whereunto Appianus (ſhewing his men vpon the wals, in token that he was not affraid) an- F ſwered, That the yong man was become a Chriſtian, and therfore might not in any caſe be deliuered to the Turks: but that he would in any other thing gratifie him in what he could, and for his ſake vſe the yong man as his ſon. And to mollifie the vnkindeneſſe of his anſwer, he ſent him freſh victuall with other preſents. But Barbaruſſa offended with the anſwer, landed his men round about the Iſland, and commanded them to make what ſpoile they could: which they performed accordingly, hunting the Iſland people vp and downe the rockes and mountaines G like hares; vntill that Appianus not without cauſe doubting the vtter ſpoile of the Iſland, redeemed his peace by deliuering the young man to Salec the pyrat, who brought him to Barbaruſſa gallantly attired after the Italian manner; of whome he was ioyfully receiued as the ſon of a moſt valiant Captaine his old friend: and thereupon Barbaruſſa ſtaied his ſouldiers from doing any further harme vpon the Iſland, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This young man Barbaruſſa honored with the command of ſeuen gallies, and afterwards ſent him to his father then lying at Suetia a port of the red ſea, Admirall againſt the Portingals, who greatly troubled thoſe ſeas. But the old Iew ouerioyed with the ſudden and vnexpected returne of his ſonne, whom he had for many yeares before giuen as loſt, in embracing of him fainted, and ſo preſently for ioy died. H

Sinan the Iew dieth for ioy.

Barbaruſſa in his returne toward Conſtantinople doeth much harm vpon the coaſt of Italy.

This man for valour was accounted little inferiour to Barbaruſſa, but for diſcretion and iuſt dealing far beyond him, nothing of ſo furious and waiward a diſpoſition as was he. Barbaruſſa departing from Elba, came into the bay of Telamon in Tuſcany, and in ſhort time tooke the city, which he ſpoiled and burnt, but eſpecially the houſe of Bartholomeus Telamonius; whoſe dead bodie but a little before buried, he cauſed to be pluckt out of the graue, and his bones to be ſcattered abroad, becauſe he being Admiral of the Biſhop of Rome's gallies, had in the Iſle of Lesbos waſted Barbaruſſa's fathers poore poſſeſſion: and marching by night eight miles farther into the land, ſurpriſed Montenum, and carried almoſt all the inhabitants away with him into captiuitie. The like miſchiefe he did at the port called Portus Herculis, but purpoſing to haue taken Orhatello, and there to haue fortified, he was by Luna & Vitellius (two valiant captaines before ſent thither, the one by the State of Siena, & the other by the duke of Florence) I repulſed. So though diſappointed of his purpoſe, yet hauing done great harme, and put the whole country of Tuſcany in exceeding feare, he departed from thence and landed againe at Igilium, now called Gigio, an Iſland about twelue miles diſtant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the towne, and carried a wonderfull number of all ſorts into miſerable captiuitie: keeping on his courſe, he paſſing the cape Linar, and comming ouer againſt Cantumcelle, had burnt that city for the ſame reaſon he did Telamon, had he not been otherwiſe perſuaded by Strozza the French Embaſſador, fearing to draw the French king into further obliquie. From thence he came with a direct courſe to the Iſland of Iſchia; where landing in the night, he intercepted moſt part of the Inhabitants of the Iſland, as they were flying into the K mountaines: and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceiued againſt Vaſtius at the ſiege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Panſa, and Varranium, three chiefe townes of that Iſland; but Pithacuſa the dwelling place of Vaſtius, ſtanding vpon a broken rocke ſomwhat diſtant from the ſea, he durſt not aduenture vpon. Then ſcraping along the Iſland Prochita with leſſe hurt, becauſe moſt part of the inhabitants were before fled to Pithacuſa, he put into the bay of Puteoli, and ſent Salec the pirat with part of his fleet, to make proofe if the citie of Puteoli might from ſea be battered. Salec drawing neere the citie, ſhot into it with his great ordnance, and by chance ſlew one Saiauedra a valiant Spaniard, vpon the walls, and put the Citiſens in a great feare leſt the whole fleet ſhould haue landed, they themſelues as then vnprouided: but the Viceroy L came preſently with a power both of horſe and foot from Naples: which Barbaruſſa diſcouering from ſea as they came downe the mountaines, called backe Salec; and leauing the Iſland of Capri, and paſſing by the promontorie Atheneum, was about to haue ſeiſed vpon Salernum, when a tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing diſperſed his Fleet, and draue him beyond the promontorie Palinurus vpon the coaſt of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harme, eſpecially at Carreato. From thence he departed to the Iſland of Lipari, betwixt Italie and Sicilie, which Iſland he miſerably ſpoiled, and with fortie great pieces ſo battered the Citie, that the citiſens were conſtarined for feare to yeeld, whom he carried away all priſoners about the number of ſeuen thouſand, of one ſort of people and other, and burnt the Citie. So loaded with the rich ſpoile of Italie and the Iſlands vpon the coaſt, he returned towards Conſtantinople with ſuch a multitude of poore Chriſtian captiues, ſhut vp ſo cloſe vnder hatches M amongſt the excrements of Nature, that all the way as he went almoſt euery houre ſome of them were caſt dead ouer boord: euerie man deteſting the endleſſe hatred betwixt the Emperour and the French King, the verie ground of all this and many thouſand other moſt woful and vndeſerued calamities of the poore ſubiects. With this rich prey and an in-

Barbaruſſa arriueth at Conſtantinople.

Solyman triumphing at Conſtantinople of the good ſucceſſe he had in Hungarie, in the middeſt of all his glorie, was aduertiſed of the death of Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, whom of all his children hee held deereſt: whoſe dead bodie was ſhortly after brought from Magneſia, and with wonderfull ſolemnitie, and no leſſe mourning, buried at Conſtantinople. How entirely Solyman loued this his ſonne, well appeared by the great ſorrow hee conceiued of his death; and not contented to haue built him a ſtately tombe, erected alſo in memorial of him a Mahometan Church, called the Church of Mahomet the Leſſer: for the difference of Mahomet the B the Great who woon Conſtantinople. Whereunto hee alſo annexed a monaſterie and a colledge, with many things moe after the groſſe maner of their ſuperſtition, for the health of his ſoule, as he vainely ſuppoſed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted manner, which was but euery ſecond or third yere to take in hand ſome notable expedition, ceaſed from wars by the ſpace of two yeres: in which time many of the great princes and worthie men of that age died; amongſt whom was Francis the French king. Hariadenus Barbaruſſa that famous Turke, of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken, who being of great yeares and no leſſe fame, left this life in the yeare 1547, and was buried at a houſe of his owne called Beſictas, neere vnto Boſphorus Thracius on Europe ſide, not farre from the mouth of Euxinum, about foure miles from Pera, where he had but few yeares before at one time ſold about ſixteene thouſand Chriſtian captiues, C taken out of Corcyra: and to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne coſt built there a Mahometan Temple, there yet with his ſepulchre to be ſeene: That place was in antient time called Iaſonium. About which time alſo, died of conceit that famous captaine Alphonſus Daualus Vaſtius, taken away by vntimely death when he had liued but fortie fiue yeares. At which time, Charles the Emperour by his embaſſadour Gerardus Veltuuich, concluded a peace with Solyman for fiue yeares, wherein King Ferdinand was alſo included: which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the requeſt of Henry the French king) broken.

Solyman had now almoſt three yeares taken his reſt, when it fortuned that Ercaſes Imirza, king of Siruan, moued with the often iniuries of Tamas his brother the great Perſian king, fled D to Solyman at Conſtantinople, to craue aid of him againſt his brother. Solyman glad of ſuch an occaſion to worke vpon, entertained him with all courteſie, and promiſed to take vpon him his quarrell, & to protect him againſt his vnnaturall brother. And when he had made al things readie for ſo great an expedition, paſſed ouer into Aſia, and after long and painfull trauell entred at laſt with a puiſſant armie into Armenia, & there in the borders of the Perſian kingdom, firſt beſieged the citie of Van, which after ten daies ſiege was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, that the Perſian ſouldiers there in garriſon, might with life and libertie depart with their armes as ſouldiers: which was at the firſt by Solyman granted, and ſo the citie ſurrendred.
From thence Solyman ſent his chiefe commanders with a great part of his army, to burne and ſpoile the the enemies countrey, which they for a time cheerfully performed; and running far E into the countrey, ſtriue as it were amongſt themſelues who ſhould doe moſt harme: where Imirza among the reſt, for whoſe ſake Solyman had vndertaken this war, was as forward as the beſt to waſt & ſpoile his brothers kingdome, ſparing nothing that came to hand; the beſt and richeſt things he got, he preſented to Solyman, to draw him on ſtill in that war. But that ſerued not his turne to recouer again his kingdome of Siruan: for Tamas, without ſhewing any power to withſtand the Turks, had after his wonted maner, cauſed his people to withdraw themſelues far into the mountain country, leauing nothing behind them in that waſt country to relieue thẽ but the bare ground: ſo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better ſucceſſe than ſuch as they had before to their loſſe made proofe of, in their former expeditions into that great kingdome. The conceit whereof ſo much pierced not the F common ſouldiers onely, but euen the captains themſelues; that to make an end of that long and vnprofitable warre, taken in hand for another mans good, they conſulted amongſt themſelues either to kill ImirZa, or elſe to diſgrace him with Solyman: Which they ſo cunningly wrought; ſome ſuggeſting falſe ſupitions of his trecherous dealing in the proceeding of that his moſt cruell enemy, who glad to haue the author of all his troubles with the Turks, deliue-red into his hands, caſt him in priſon : and that Solyman nor any other ſhould in his behalfe further proſecute the war, or by his meanes hope for victory, cauſed him to be in priſon murthe-red. In this expedition againſt the Perſian king, Solyman was occupied a yere and nine months, all which time the Turkes endured great troubles, and were oftentimes hardly diſtreſſed by the Perſians : vntill at laſt Solyman himſelfe wearie of that tedious warre, wherein he had got neither honour nor profit, thought it beſt ſo to make an end, and thereupon returned againe to H Dragut a famous pirat of the Turks poſſeſſeth certaine cities in Affricke.

In this meane time it fortuned, that one Dragut Raiſes a notable pyrat of the Turks, had craftily ſurpriſed the citie of Affrica in the kingdome of Tunes (called in antient time Aphrodiſeum) and alſo Leptis Parua (and now of the Moores called Mahamedia) and there ſeting him-ſelfe, as in a place both commodious and of good aſſurance, exceedingly troubled the Chriſtians both by ſea and land, eſpecially ſuch as traded in the Mediterranean. So that the Emperor, moued as wel with the manifold iniuries don by that arch-pyrat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaint of his poore ſubiects, commanded the Viceroy of Sicilie, and Auria his Admirall, to leuie a ſufficient power in time to repreſſe that pyrat, before he grew to farther ſtrength. Whereupon, they with a ſtrong fleet well manned and thorowly ap- I pointed for that purpoſe, and aided by the knights of Malta, paſſed ouer into Affricke, and landing their forces, by the ſpace of three moneths beſieged the citie before poſſeſſed by the py-rat, which with continual batterie they had at length made ſaultable. And hearing that Dragut was comming with a new ſupply to relieue it, they with all celeritie aſſailed it both by ſea and land, & in the ſpace of a few hours took it by force the 10 day of September in the yere 1550 in which aſſault many of the enemies were ſlaine, and the reſt taken. Auria hauing thus diſpoſeſſed the pyrat, and aduiſedly conſidering that the citie was not without an infinite charge to be holden by the Chriſtians, among ſo many of the Infidels, raſed it down to the ground, carrying away with him 7000 captiues, and all the ſpoile of the citie. And not ſo contented, did all the harme he could with fire and ſword all alongſt the coaſt of Affrica, to the intent that K the Turks ſhould there find no reliefe, and tooke 12 priſoners out of Monaſterium, a town not far from the citie of Affrica : and ſo hauing done what he came for, returned againe into Si-cilie. Dragut thus at once thruſt out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman to Conſtantinople, and ſo incenſed him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong done vnto him by the Chriſtians, that in reuenge thereof, he reſolued to make war both vpon the Emperor and king Ferdinand, notwithſtanding that the fiue yeares league hee had before taken with him at his going into Perſia, was not yet expired. So with cheerfull words and courteous entertainment comforting vp the deſperat pyrat, the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1551.) he furniſhed him with a great fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the iniurie done to him by Auria in Affricke. With this fleet in number 140 ſaile, Sinan one of the L Turks great Baſſaes, accompanied with Dragut the pyrat, by the appointment of Solyman, departed from Conſtantinople : and cutting thorow the ſeas, arriued at length in Sicilie, where they ſuddenly ſurpriſed the towne and caſtle of Auguſta, which they preſently ſacked. Departing thence, they came to the Iſland of Malta, and there landed their men in the port of Marza, otherwiſe called Moxet, neere vnto the caſtle, which they battered with certain pieces of great ordnance, but ſo as was to no great purpoſe. At which time diuers companies of the Turks running further into the Iſland, made hauocke of whatſoeuer came in their way. After they had thus few daies in vaine battered the caſtle, and ſaw themſelues both there valiantly repulſed, and in other places by ambuſhes and ſuch like meanes cut off by the ſouldiers and inhabitants of the Iſland, they remoued thence to the road of S. Paul, where they landed their M ordnance with purpoſe to haue beſieged the citie : but perceiuing by a little, what ſmall hope there was to preuaile, and ſeeing diuers of their men dying thorow the extremitie of the heat, they forſooke the Iſland and went to Gaules now called Goza, a little Iſland about 30 miles in compaſſe, fiue miles diſtant from Malta Weſtward, ſubiect vnto the knights of the Religion

A and there landing their men, miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland, and whatſoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one ſort of people and other ſix thouſand and three hundred captiues into moſt wofull bondage. With which bootie they put againe to ſea, and ſailed directly to Tripolis in Barbarie, called of old Leptis Magna: which citie Charles the Emperour had before giuen to the knights of Malta, and was at that time by them kept. This citie was the marke whereat the Baſſa and the pyrat ſhot; for taking whereof they landed their forces, and by long and winding trenches approched as neere the ſame as they could: Which they did not without great loſſe of their people; for they of the caſtle hauing good ſtore of great ordnance, and moſt expert canoniers, did with continuall ſhot ſo annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes inforced to retire; yet with much troubleſome labour and no leſſe perill, they B came at laſt within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Baſſa cauſed his gabions made of thicke plankes, to be placed in the night, and his batterie planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of Auguſt) the cannon began to play, which was againe anſwered from the caſtle with like, and euery houre ſome of the Turkes ſlaine, the great ſhot ſtill flying into their trenches, ſo as that day foure of the beſt canoniers in the armie were ſlain, with certaine other men of good account alſo: and the clerke generall of the armie, a man of great eſtimation and wel beloued of the Baſſa, had his hand ſhot off, and many other of the Ianizaries and common ſouldiers either ſlaine or hurt: moreouer they brake one of their beſt pieces, and diſmounted foure others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turkes approched yet neerer vnto the caſtle, vpon whom the Chriſtians in the breake of the day ſallied C out euen vnto their very trenches, and afterwards retired. With the riſing of the Sun (which the Turks haue in great reuerence) they renued their batterie with greater force than before; yet with ſuch euill ſucceſſe, that the Baſſa was almoſt mad for anger: for about the euening the fire by miſchance got into their pouder, wherwith thirty of the Turks were burnt, many hurt, and one piece broken. At length the Turkes were come ſo neere, that they had planted their batterie within 150 paces of the wall; which they continued with ſuch furie, that they had made a faire breach euen with the ditch: but what was beaten downe in the day time, the defendants repaired againe by night, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not to be aſſaulted. Yet in concluſion, a traiterous ſouldier of Prouince, before corrupted by the Turkes, found means to flie out D of the caſtle into the campe, where he declared vnto the Baſſa the weakeſt places of the caſtle, by which it might be moſt conueniently battered and ſooneſt taken: and eſpecially one place aboue the reſt which was againſt the Gouernors lodgings, which ſtanding towards the ditch, and hauing vnderneath it ſellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once batred, well be repaired againe or fortified. Which the Baſſa vnderſtanding, cauſed the batterie there to be planted, laying the pieces ſo low, that they did eaſily beat the ſellars and vaults in ſuch ſort, that in ſhort time the wals were ſo ſhaken, that the rampiers aboue thorow the continuall batterie, began greatly to ſinke: which ſo amazed the ſouldiers, ſeeing no conuenient meanes to repaire the ſame, that ſetting all honour aſide, they requeſted the Gouernor, That ſithence the matter began now to grow deſperat, and that the place was not longer to be holden, hee E would in time take ſome good order with the enemie for their ſafetie, before the walls were further endamaged. With which motion, Vallier the Gouernor (an ancient knight of Daulphinie, and one of the Order) was exceedingly troubled: which Peiſieu another of the knights, perceiuing, he as a man of great courage, & of all othets there preſent moſt antient, in the name of the other knights declared vnto them, That the breach was neither ſo great, nor ſo profitable for the enemy, but that it was defenſible enough, if they would as men of courage repaire the ſame, ſaying, That it was more honourable for worthy Knights and luſtie ſouldiers, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting againſt the Infidels for the maintenance of their law and Chriſtian religion, than ſo cowardly to yeeld themſelues to the mercie of thoſe, at whoſe hands nothing was to be looked for but moſt miſerarable ſeruitude, with all F kind of crueltie: and therefore perſuaded the Couernour to hold it out to the laſt. For all that, he ouercome with the importunitie of ſuch as would needs yeeld, who with all vehemencie vrged the imminent danger wherwith they were all like to be ouerwhelmed, and finding himſelfe bereft both of heart and fortune, and forſaken of his ſouldiers, without farther conſideration, conſented that a white enſigne ſhould bee diſplayed vpon the Walls, in token that they deſired parley: When a Turke preſenting himſelfe, they requeſted him to vnderſtand of the Baſſa, if he could be contented that ſome of them might come to intreat with him of ſome good order to be taken for the yeelding vp of the caſtle. Whereunto the Baſſa willingly conſenting, two of the knights were forthwith ſent out, to offer vnto him the caſtle with the artillerie and munition, ſo as he would furniſh them with ſhips to bring them with bag & baggage ſafely to Malta. Whereunto the Baſſa briefely anſwered, That (foraſmuch as they had as yet deſerued no grace, preſuming to keepe ſo ſmall a place againſt the army of the greateſt prince on earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the armie, he would condiſcend to their requeſt, or if they would not thereunto conſent, that for recompence, all they within the caſtle ſhould continue his ſlaues & priſoners: notwithſtanding if they incontinently and without delay did ſurrender the place, he would exempt out of them 300. Wherupon the meſſengers returning in deſpaire, were ſtaid by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flatting words and faire promiſes that they would ſo much as lay in them, perſuade the Baſſa to condiſcend to a more gratious compoſition, fearing indeed that the beſieged through deſpaire would reſolue (as their extreme refuge) to defend the place euen to the laſt man. Wherefore they went preſently to the Baſſa, to declare vnto him his ouerſight in refuſing them who voluntarily would haue put themſelues into his hands, whom reaſon would he ſhould with all courteſie haue receiued: for that after he had the caſtle and the men in his power, he might diſpoſe of them as he ſhould thinke good. The Baſſa liking well of his counſel, cauſed the meſſengers to be called again, & with fained & diſſembling words told them, That at the inſtance of Dragut & Salla Rais there preſent, he did diſcharge them of all the coſts & charges of the army, ſwearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his lord & his own, inuiolably to obſerue al that he had promiſed vnto them; which they too eaſily beleeued, & forthwith went to declare the ſame to the Gouernor, & others within the caſtle. The Baſſa, the better to come to the effect of his deſire, after theſe meſſengers ſent a craftie Turke, whom he charged expreſly to perſuade the gouernor to come with him into the camp, for the ful concluſion of the giuing vp of the caſtle, and for the appointing of ſuch veſſels as ſhould be needful for their ſafe conduct to Malta; and that if he made any doubt to come, he ſhould make ſhew as if he would there remaine in hoſtage for him, but aboue all things, to conſider of the ſtrength & aſſurance of the beſieged, and of the diſpoſition of all things there. Which the ſubtile Turke ſo finely handled, that the Gouernor by the counſell of thoſe who had perſuaded him to yeeld (notwithſtanding the reaſons of wars & duty of his office forbad him in ſuch maner to abandon the place of his charge) reſolued vpon ſo ſmall an aſſurance of the Baſſa, & gaue eare to the miſerable end of his fortune. So taking with him a knight of his houſhold (to ſend backe vnto thoſe of the caſtle, to declare vnto them how he ſped in the campe) vnder the conduct of the Turke that was come to fetch him, he went ſtraight to the tent of the Baſſa: who by the Turke that went firſt in, was aduertiſed of the ſmall courage of the defendants, which hee aſſured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to ſuch order & agreement as he would himſelfe. Vpon whoſe perſuaſion calling in the Gouernor Vallier, after he had rigorouſly reproued his raſhnes, ſaid vnto him, That foraſmuch as he had once giuen his word, if he would pay the charges of the army, he was content to let them go with bag & baggage, otherwiſe he would diſcharge but two hundred. Whereat the Gouernor greatly moued, anſwered, That that was not according to his laſt promiſe vnto the knights before ſent. But when he ſaw it would bee no better, he requeſted him that he might again returne to the caſtle to know the minds of the reſt: which the falſe Baſſa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to ſend back the knight that he had brought with him, to make report of theſe hard news to the beſieged: as for the Gouernor, he was ſent to the gallies with yrons on his heeles. When they of the caſtle vnderſtood what had paſſed betwixt the Baſſa & the Gouernor, they began exceedingly to feare the miſchiefe then at hand: yet took no other reſolution, but to return the ſaid knight to the Baſſa, to know whether they ſhould expect from him no better anſwer. Who as ſoone as he was come before him, the captain of the caſtle was brought in, of whom the Baſſa asked, Which of the two he would chuſe, either to pay the expences of the army, or els both he & all the reſt to remain his priſoners? Wherunto the Gouernor anſwered, That a ſlaue had no other authority than that which by his maſter was giuen him, & that hauing loſt (beſides his libertie) the power to command, if any thing were yet reſerued in him, could not counſel him to command others to agree vnto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before ſent.

Hard conditions offered by the Baſſa to the beſieged.

More eaſie conditions offered by the Baſſa, which he confirmeth by his oath.

The warie anſwer of the gouernour to the Baſſa.

A ſent. Which thing the Baſſa hearing, for feare that ſuch a reſolute anſwer ſhould come to the knowledge of the beſieged, & cauſe them to become deſperat; hauing taken counſell with his other captains, he tooke the Gouernour by the hand, and with a ſmiling and diſſembling countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promiſed; and that therfore without fearing any thng, he ſhould cauſe them all to come out of the caſtle. But the Gouernour, becauſe he had bin before deceiued, would not truſt to his word, but ſaid vnto him, That he might command him that was come from the caſtle, for that he knew they would now doe neuer a whit the more for him. So the Baſſa turning towards the other knight, commanded him forthwith to goe vnto them in the caſtle, and to cauſe them to come forth, ſwearing againe as before, by the head of his great lord, and his owne, That they ſhould all be deli- B uered and ſet at libertie, according to the conuentions firſt agreed vpon. Which the knight beleeuing, went to report to them this good newes: which they receiued with ſuch ioy, that without further care or conſideration of their miſhap ſo neere, they ran in preaſe with their wiues, children, and beſt mooueables, ſtriuing who ſhould firſt get out. But they were no ſooner iſſued, but they were by the enemies ſpoiled of all they had, and taken priſoners; part of the knights were ſent to the gallies, and the reſt to the Baſſa. Who being by the Gouernour put in remembrance of his faith twiſe giuen, anſwered, That there was no faith to be kept with dogs, and that they had firſt violated their oath with his great lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the Rhodes, they had (as he ſaid) ſworne neuer more to beare armes againſt the Turks. C The caſtle was forthwith taken and ſpoiled, and about two hundred Moores of that countrey that had ſerued the knights, cut in pieces, and thereupon, a great peale of ordnance diſcharged, with great cries and ſhouts in ſigne of their victorie. Thus the ſtrong caſtle and antient citie of Tripolis in Barbarie was deliuered vnto the Turkes the fifteenth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1551. Whileſt the Baſſa lay at this ſiege, the Lord of Arramont, who had many yeares lien embaſſadour from Francis the French king at Conſtantinople, and was now ſent again by Henry the ſecond, came to the Turkes campe, being requeſted ſo to doe by the great Maſter of the Rhodes, to haue diſſuaded the Baſſa from that ſiege: wherein he nothing preuailed. Yet now grieued to ſee how the faithleſſe Turk, contrary to his oath, moſt villanouſly intreated the Gouernor and the other Knights, lying at his feet as men halfe deſperat; was ſo bold as to put him D in mind of his promiſe, confirmed by his oath; which if hee would not keepe, that yet at the leaſt according to his owne voluntarie offer, he would releaſe two hundred of them: but hee excuſed himſelf as before, ſaying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had firſt broken their owne faith. Yet afterwards he condiſcended, that two hundred of the eldeſt and ſuch as were moſt vnfit for ſeruice (amongſt whom was comprehended the Gouernour and certain other old knights) ſhould be ſet at libertie; who were forthwith ſent aboord the French Embaſſadours gallies, and by him tranſported to Malta: where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had ſo cowardly ſurrendred a place, which they might much longer haue defended. The next day after the caſtle was deliuered, which was the 16 of Auguſt, the proud Baſſa for ioy of this victorie made a ſolemne dinner, whereunto he inuited the French embaſſa- E dour, and Vallier the late Gouernor: which they refuſed not to come vnto, in hope to recouer ſome moe priſoners. This great feaſt for the more magnificence was kept in the caſtle ditch againſt the breach, where were ſet vp two ſtately pauillions, the one for the Baſſa, and the other for the embaſſadour and his companie, where he was honourably feaſted with wonderfull plentie both of fleſh and fiſh and good wines, which they had found in the caſtle; which ſeruice was done with muſicke of diuers ſorts, and officers in number aboue a hundred, apparelled for moſt part in long gowns of fine cloth of gold, tuffed or fringed; and the other of veluet or damaske. The Baſſa was no ſooner ſet downe, but all the ordnance of the fleet was diſcharged with ſuch a noiſe and thundering, that it ſeemed the heauens and skies did ſhake. The table being taken vp, the embaſſador and the late Gouernour Vallier, entred into the pauillion F of the Baſſa, and beſide the two hundred men which he had promiſed, obtained twentie moe, vpon the embaſſadours promiſe, That he ſhould for them cauſe to be releaſed 30 Turks taken at Malta, at the landing of the armie there. The Turkes hauing in their hands an antient gunner of the caſtle, called Iohn de Chabas borne in Daulphine (to the end that this triumphant feaſt ſhould not be vnfurniſhed of ſome cruell ſacrifice of the Chriſtian bloud) for that hee had in time of the ſiege ſhot off the hand of the clerke generall of the armie, brought him into the towne, and when they had cut off his hands and his noſe, put him quicke into the ground to the waſt, and there for their pleaſure ſhot at him with their arrowes, and afterward to make an end of him cut his throat. The Baſſa ſhortly after departing out of Barbarie, left Dragut the pyrat Gouernor of Tripolis, honouring him with the title of the Sanzacke of that place, from whence hee many yeares after grieuouſly moleſted the Moores neere vnto him by land, and the Chriſtians by ſea. The ſame yeare 1551, Solyman notwithſtanding the fiue yeares peace before taken with king Ferdinand at his going into Perſia, ſent Achomates his lieutenant in Europe, with a great power into Hungarie, who with Haly the Baſſa of Buda inuaded the vpper part of Hungarie, and firſt tooke the city of Temeſware, and contrary to their faith giuen, ſlew the garriſon ſouldiers: after that, they tooke alſo the caſtle of Zolnok, forſaken by the Chriſtians, and certaine other ſmall caſtles. But laying ſiege to Erſam, they were partly by the valiantneſſe of the defendants, and partly by the comming on of Winter inforced to forſake the ſiege, and to get themſelues into their Wintering places.

Queene Iſabel, king Iohn his widdow, ſeeing the Turkes dayly encroching vpon that little they had left her, and that ſhe was not able by any means to defend Tranſiluania againſt them, by the aduice of George Biſhop of Veradium her old counſellor, agreed with king Ferdinand to deliuer vnto him the gouernment of the countrey, with all the royall dignity of Hungarie; for which ſhe was to haue of him Caſſouia, and a yerely penſion of an hundred thouſand duckats. Which agreement made and thorowly concluded by Baptiſta Caſtalius an Italian) whom Charles the Emperor had but a little before ſent to aid king Ferdinand) the Queene returned into Polonia, her natiue countrey: and ſo king Ferdinand by that means obtained almoſt al the prouince of Tranſyluania, and what elſe the queene had in Hungarie. But the Biſhop a little before made a Cardinall, being ſuſpected by Baptiſta the Italian, that he fauoured the Turkes faction more than king Ferdinand, and by that meanes ſought to get the gouernment to himſelfe, was by the Italians deuice ſuddenly murthered in his owne houſe at Veradium: an end good enough for ſo troubleſome a Prelat.

Haly the Baſſa of Buda proud of the good ſucceſſe he had the yeare before, vnderſtanding that diuers of the chiefe Hungarians had withdrawn themſelues into the caſtle of Agria, purpoſed in himſelfe with all his power to beſiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Chaſan, and other of the Turks Sanzackes and captaines by Solymans appointment readie at his call, he came with an army of 35000 Turks, and the 10 of September in the yere 1552, encamped round about the caſtle: where after he had placed his artillerie, he began a moſt furious batterie. But doubting to preuaile that way, he attempted alſo to vndermine the caſtle, omitting nothing that could be deuiſed for the taking thereof: but all in vaine, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their captaine, couragiouſly endured the ſiege, and very manfully repulſed the enemie. At length, the 29 of September the enemie with 28 enſignes of ſelect ſouldiers gaue a freſh aſſault to the caſtle, and were by the defendants enforced ſhamefully to retire: at which time foure and twentie barrels of gunpouder by miſchance caught fire, and beſides that it blew vp diuers captaines and ſouldiers, did much harme in the caſtle, to the great diſmaying of the defendants. After that, the Turks with incredible pertinacie the twelfth of October fiercely aſſaulted the caſtle from morning vntill night, and for deſire of reuenge and hope of ſpoile left nothing vnattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten backe, and with great loſſe enforced at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault. Thus the Baſſa nothing preuailing by force, attempted by great promiſes and large offers to haue brought them out: which he vnderſtanding to bee nothing regarded, and his letters ſcornfully burnt, brought on his ſouldiers again, & gaue vnto them in the caſtle a moſt furious aſſault, but with no better ſucceſſe than before: for hauing loſt many of his beſt ſouldiers, he was inforced to retire. So after he had in vaine ſix weekes beſieged the caſtle, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege, and to retire to Peſtum. After whoſe departure there was found twelue thouſand great ſhot, wherewith he had battered the wall. In this ſiege ſix thouſand Turks were ſlaine, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this victorie, made Stephanus the worthie captaine, Vayuod of Tranſyluania, and bountifully rewarded the other captaines and ſouldiers as they had well deſerued.

Lord

A lord of Aramont ſo wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the Emperor, he ſent a great fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuſcan ſea, which in the yeare 1553, and the yere following, did great harme vpon the coaſts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as alſo in the Iſlands of Elba, Corſica, Cerbe, and Maiorca, and ſuch like places on the frontiers of the Emperours dominions: yet were the Turks in moſt places notably againe repulſed by the people of thoſe Countries. The ſame yeare Solyman, ſeduced by Roxolana (ſometime his faire Concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Ruſtan Baſſa his ſonne in law, moſt vnnaturally murthered his eldeſt ſonne Muſtapha, the mirrour of the Othoman Familie: Which tragicall fact (the like wherof both for the trecherous contriuing and inhumane execution hath ſeldome times been heard of) I haue thought good here in due time to ſet downe, in ſuch ſort as it is by moſt cre-B dible Writers of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman Kings (who to auoid the participation of their ſo-ueraigntie, vſe not oftentimes to marrie, but otherwiſe to ſatisfie their pleaſure with ſuch beautifull Concubines as it pleaſeth them to make choice of out the faireſt captiues of all Nations, moſt daintily brought vp for that purpoſe in the Court) had by a Circaſſian bondwo-man a ſonne called Muſtapha, who for his wonderfull towardlineſſe and rare perfection, was amongſt the Turks had in ſuch expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themſelues more happie, than in the hope laid vp in him: whoſe noble carriage was ſuch, as thereby he ſo poſſeſſed the mindes of all men in generall, (but eſpecially of the men of war) that he was reputed the glorie of the Court, the floure of chiualrie, the hope of the ſouldiers, C and ioy of the people. Whileſt he thus grew, increaſing both in yeares and fauour, it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with men delighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of ſome called Roſa (but more truly Hazathya) by condition a captiue, but ſo graced with beauty and courtly behauiour, that in ſhort time ſhe became miſtreſſe of his thoughts, and comman-dreſſe of him that all commanded: and that which more eſtabliſhed her in poſſeſſion of his loue, ſhe had in time made him father of foure faire ſonnes, Mahomet, Selymus, Baiazet, and Tzihanger, and one daughter called Chameria married to Ruſtan or Ruſtemes the great Baſſa. In this height of worldly bliſſe nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Muſtapha Solymans eldeſt ſonne by the Circaſſian woman; who honoured of the greateſt, and beloued of the reſt, ſtood only in her light, imbarring her and hers (as ſhe thought) of the hope D of the Empire, which ſhe now aboue all things ſought to bring to one of her owne ſonnes: which the better to compaſſe, ſhe vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Muſtapha the young Prince and his mother ſhould as it were for their greater honour and ſtate, with a princely allowance be ſent into Caramania to gouerne that great countrey, farre from the Court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to paſſe: for that the Turkiſh Emperours vſually ſend their ſonnes after they come to any yeares of diſcretion, vnto ſuch prouin-ces as are far from the Court, attended vpon with one great Baſſa and ſome graue Doctor of their Law, ſo to acquaint them with the manner of gouernment; the Baſſa inſtructing them in matters of ciuile policie, and the Doctor in matters concerning their ſuperſtition: and yet by E ſending them a far off, to keepe them from aſpiring to the Empire by the fauor of the Court: (a thing of the Turkiſh Emperors not vnworthily feared euen in their owne and beloued children. Roxolana hauing at once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great competitors both of her loue and of the Empire (things of all others enduring no partners) reſted not ſo, but began ſtraitway to plot in her malicious head the vtter deſtruction of him, to whom all others wi-ſhed all happineſſe. This ſhe ſaw was not to be brought to paſſe without ſome complices: wherefore after ſhe had in her ſecret conceit diſcarded many, of whom at firſt ſhe had reaſona-ble good liking; at laſt ſhe made choice of Ruſtan Baſſa her ſonne in law, vpon whome ſhee would ſet vp her reſt. This Ruſtan was a man baſely borne in Epirus, altogether compoſed of diſſimulation and flatterie, euer ſeruing his owne turne, were it neuer ſo much to the hurt or F grieuance of others: by which meanes he, although none of the beſt ſouldiers, was yet by many degrees growne vp to be the greateſt man in the Court, and Solymans ſonne in law: him ſhe probably thought to wiſh the ſucceſſion of the Empire to one of her owne ſons, his wiues full brethren, rather than to Muſtapha her halfe brother. Beſide that, ſhe was not ignorant how that Ruſtan as one carefull of the Emperors profit (the readieſt way to preferment) had abridged the penſions and fees of the officers and ſeruitors in court: which he perceiuing to pleaſe the Emperour, proceeded ſo fartherein, that he attempted to haue cut off, if it had been poſſible, ſome part of Muſtapha his princely allowance: for which doing, ſhe knew how odious he was to all the Courtiers (whereof he made ſmall reckoning) but eſpecially to Muſtapha, inſomuch that it was thought he would not forget ſo notorious an iniurie, if euer he ſhould obtaine the Empire. Hereupon ſhe brake with Ruſtan vpon the matter, whom ſhe found readie ynough of himſelfe to do what in him lay to further her miſchieuous deſire. G Raxolana conſpireth with Ruſtan Baſſa her ſon in law, againſt Muſtapha.

Roxolana faineth her ſelfe religious.

To begin this intended tragedie, ſhe vpon the ſudden became very deuout, and being by the fauour of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had been vpon a deuout zeale for the health of her ſoule, after the manner of their Turkiſh ſuperſtition, to build an Abbey, with an Hoſpitall and a Church: which ſo godly a purpoſe ſhe imparted to the Muphti or chiefe Mahometan Prieſt, demanding of him, if ſuch workes of charitie were not acceptable vnto God, and auaileable for her ſoules health. H Wherunto the Muphti anſwered, That thoſe workes were no doubt gratious in the ſight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her ſoules health, being a bondwoman; yet very profitable for the ſoule of the great Emperour Solyman, vnto whom as vnto her Lord, both ſhe and all ſhe had appertained. With which anſwer of the great Prieſt ſhe ſeemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderfull penſiue and melancholie, her cheerefull countenance was replete with ſadneſſe, and her faire eyes flowed with teares, her mirth was mourning; and her ioy heauineſſe. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and ſorie to ſee his loue vpon conceit ſo to languiſh, ſent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort her ſelfe; promiſing in ſhort time to take ſuch a courſe I as ſhould eaſe her of all her griefes: which he forthwith did, ſolemnly manumiſing her from her bond eſtate. So great a fauour obtained, Roxolana with great cheerefulneſſe began thoſe meritorious workes by her before intended, as if ſhe had thought of nothing but heauen, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of hel. When ſhe had thus a good while buſied her ſelfe in pauing the way to heauen, as was ſuppoſed; Solyman not able longer to forbeare the companie of her, in whom his ſoule liued, after his wonted manner ſent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who ſhould haue brought her to his bed chamber. To whom ſhee with her eyes caſt vp to heauen, demurely anſwered, That her life and whatſoeuer els ſhe had was at her dread Soueraignes command, but againe to yeeld her bodie vnto his appetite ſhe might not in any caſe do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifeſt breach of his ſacred Lawes, which permitted her not now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he be- K fore without offence might command of his bondwoman: and becauſe ſhe would not ſeeme to vſe this as an excuſe, ſhe referred her ſelfe in all things to the graue iudgement of the learned and reuerend Muphti, with whom ſhe had before at full conferred. This ſhe did, preſuming of the ſoueraigntie ſhe had ouer that great Monarch, whome ſhe right well knew ſhe had ſo faſt bound in the pleaſing fetters of his affection towards her, as that ſhe was ſure ynough of him without a keeper. Solyman rauiſhed with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, ſent for the Muphti, requiring his iudgement in the matter: who before inſtructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had ſaid, aggrauating the heinouſneſſe of the fact, if hee ſhould proceed to enforce her as his ſlaue, who being now free, he might not without great L offence touch vnmarried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his deſires, became a freſh ſuter to her for marriage, whom he had ſo often before commanded: which his ſute eaſily obtained, (as the marke ſhe had all this while aimed at) he with all ſpeed to the great admiration of all men, and contrarie to the manner of the Mahometan Emperours, ſolemnly married her, appointing for her yearely dowrie fiue thouſand Sultanyns. But here before we proceed any farther, ſtay a while, and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch ſo much doted, as it is by the ſkilfull workemans hand moſt liuely expreſſed.

To faireſt lookes truſt not too farre, nor yet to beautie braue:
For hatefull thoughts ſo finely maskt, their deadly poyſon haue.

And cauſeth him with cruell hand his childrens bloud to ſpill.

This woman of late a ſlaue, but now become the greateſt Empreſſe of the Eaſt, flowing in all worldly felicitie, attended vpon with all the pleaſures her heart could deſire, wanted nothing ſhe could wiſh, but how to finde means that the Turkiſh empire might after the death of Solyman be brought to ſome one of her owne ſons. This was it that had (as is before ſaid) long troubled her aſpiring mind, and in the midſt of all her bliſſe, ſuffered her yet to take no reſt. Noble Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſon, and heire apparant of the Empire, although far abſent, was yet ſtill before her eyes preſent; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his perfections were all bars to her deſires: he was the only cloud that kept the ſunne from ſhining on her, if he by any means might be taken away, then wanted nothing that ſhe deſired. Which to bring to paſſe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans head no G ſmall ſuſpition of Muſtapha, That he being a yong man of a hauty ſpirit, deſirous of Soueraigntie, generally beloued, and ſwelling with the immoderat fauor of the men of war, which were all at his deuotion, left nothing elſe to be expected from him, but when he ſhould (as did his grandſier Selymus) lay hand vpon the Empire, and worke his aged fathers deſtruction. This miſchieuous plot by her deuiſed, was not a little furthred by Ruſtan the great Baſſa, by whom paſſed all great matters: who nothing omitted, that could be ſlily deuiſed for the diſgrace or confuſion of the yong Prince. For he as a great ſecret, craftily told all them that were ſent gouernors into Siria, that Muſtapha was ſecretly ſuſpected by his father, of aſpiring to the empire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obſerue all his actions, with the H manner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to aduertiſe him of whatſoeuer they ſhould ſee or heare; bearing them in hand, that the more ſuſpitiouſly or odiouſly they ſhould write of him, the more gratious and acceptable it would be vnto the great Sultan.

Wherfore he by theſe men oftentimes certified of the princely diſpoſition, courage, wiſdom, valor and bountie of Muſtapha, wherby he had woon all mens hearts, doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire: yet durſt he not for all that aduenture to temper with Solyman about that deteſtable conſpiracie againſt the innocent Prince, but ſtill deliuering the letters to the malicious woman, left the reſt by her vngratious head to be wrought. And ſhe ſtill as occaſion beſt ſerued her purpoſe, ceaſed not with pleaſing allurements and flatterie I (wherin ſhe was moſt excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that whenſoeuer he ſhould chance to haue any ſpeech of Muſtapha, ſhe might take the fitter occaſion to bring forth thoſe Letters.
Neither was ſhe in her drift deceiued, but hauing found a fit opportunitie, with tears trickling down her cheeks (which to ſerue their turnes ſubtill women ſeldome want) ſhe told the Emperor in what danger he ſtood: recounting amongſt other things, how Selymus his father had by ſuch means depriued Baiazet his grandfather, both of his life & Empire together: & therefore moſt inſtantly beſought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a carefull loue, by that example warned to looke to himſelfe. But theſe light arguments of ſuſpition ſeemed as they were indeed, vnto Solyman ſcarce probable; ſo that ſhe little preuailed thereby. Which thing ſhe well perceiuing, and inwardly grieued thereat, conuerted her cruell minde to other miſchieuous K deuices, and ſought by all meanes how to poiſon the yong Prince: neither wanted there wicked men, as it were vowed to all kinde of miſchiefe and villanie, readie to haue performed what ſhe deſired, had not Gods prouidence withſtood ſo horrible a practiſe. For whereas certaine rich apparell was by her ſent vnto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worſt, would not touch it before he had cauſed it to be worn by one of his ſeruants: by which curious warineſſe (as it was thought) he for that time preuented the treaſon of his wicked ſtepdame, and made her malicious practiſe manifeſt to the world. Yet reſted ſhee not ſo, but was ſtill plotting new deuices, tending all to one purpoſe: for being growne to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the means of Trongilla a Iew (as it was thought) hauing bewitched the minde of the Turkiſh Emperor, ſhe ſtill grew more and more in fauor, and obtained that her ſons might by turnes be ſtill preſent in Court: L of purpoſe, that by their daily preſence and continual flattery, they ſhould more & more procure their fathers loue; and if by chance Muſtapha ſhould come thither, ſhe might haue the better means to diſpatch him; if not, to expect ſome other fit time, when ſhe might by ſome one or other meane take him away. But Muſtapha neuer comming (for why, the Emperors ſons vſe not without their fathers leaue to go out of the prouinces aſſigned vnto them, or to come to Conſtantinople, but after the death of their father to receiue the Empire, attended vpon with a number of ſouldiers) ſhe eaſily deuiſed another practiſe, that her ſons ſhould wait vpon their father, not in the city only, but in the Prouinces alſo; ſo that Zihanger, ſyrnamed Crouchbacke, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Certain yeres thus ſpent, and ſhe ſtill hammering her miſchieuous deuices, at length fortune fauoring her wicked deſire, got from the Baſſa M which had the gouernment of Muſtapha and the prouince of Amaſia (for as we haue ſaid, euery one of the Kings ſons hath with him one Baſſa, which is as it were his lieutenant in adminiſtration of iuſtice and martiall affaires) certain ſuſpicious letters, wherein was contained, that there was a ſpeech of a marriage to be made betweene Muſtapha and the Perſian Kings daughter:

Ruſtan the great Baſſa furthereth the deuiſes of Roxolana.

Muſtapha in danger to haue beene poyſoned Roxolana.

A ter; which thing he thought good to giue knowledge of to the Counſell, that if any harme ſhould enſue therof, he might be out of all ſuſpition. Theſe letters being brought to Ruſtan, he thought he had now as good as halfe brought to paſſe the long deſired ruin of Muſtapha: ſo making no ſtay, he opened the matter to Roxolana, & afterwards both together went to the court, and declared all the matter to the Emperor: in doing wherof, they forced both their vngratious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull, with ſuſpicion, and to poſſeſſe his minde with the feare of his owne moſt dutifull ſon: ſaying, That he as a proud and ambitious young man, rauiſhed with the deſire of ſo glorious an empire, ſought againſt the laws both of God & nature, to take his father out of the way, that ſo he might with more ſpeed ſatisfie his aſpiring mind. And to giue the more credit to this their moſt falſe ſuggeſtion, they warned him of the alliance by B him purpoſed with the Perſian king the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors: wiſhing him to beware leſt Muſtapha ſupported by the ſtrength of Perſia, and the fauor of the Sanzacks and Ianizaries, whoſe loue he had by bountie purchaſed, ſhould in ſhort time when he feared leaſt, together depriue him both of his life and empire. With theſe and ſuch like accuſations they ſo preuailed with the aged man, whom they neuer ſuffered to reſt in quiet, that he at length reſolued to worke his ſafetie (as he ſuppoſed) by the death of his owne ſonne; in this ſort:

Roxolana and Ruſtan together put Solyman in feare of his ſon Muſtapha.

In the yeare 1552 he cauſed proclamation to be made almoſt in all the prouinces of his Empire, That foraſmuch as the Perſians without reſiſtance with a great army inuaded Syria, burning and deſtroying the countrey before them, he to repreſſe that their outragious inſolence, was inforced to ſend thither Ruſtan Baſſa with an army: which according to his appoint- C ment was in ſhort time raiſed. Now when all things were in readineſſe, as if it had beene for ſuch a war as was pretended, he commanded Ruſtan, with as much ſecrecie and as little tumult as was poſſible, to lay hands vpon Muſtapha, and to bring him bound to Conſtantinople: which if he could not conueniently effect, then by any other means to take him out of the way.

Solyman ſends Ruſtan Baſſa with an army to take Muſtapha.

With this wicked and cruell charge Ruſtan with a ſtrong armie marched towards Syria. Muſtapha vnderſtanding of his comming, without delay with 7000 of the beſt horſemen in all Turkie made towards Syria alſo: whereof Ruſtan hearing, and perceiuing that he could not (as he deſired) conueniently execute the cruell command of the vnnaturall father, forthwith turned his backe, and treading the ſame ſteps he came, returned with his armie to Conſtantinople D with ſuch ſpeed, that he endured not to behold the verie duſt raiſed by Muſtapha's horſmen, much leſſe his preſence: giuing it out, That he certainly vnderſtood that the prouince was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in ſecret, which he maliciouſly had deuiſed, That he by moſt apparant ſignes and manifeſt preſumptions had perceiued the whole armie ſo inclined towards Muſtapha, that if he ſhould haue attempted any thing againſt him by plaine force, he ſhould haue been vtterly forſaken, and had therefore in ſo dangerous a caſe left the matter as it was to his graue further direction. This tale ſuſpiciouſly told, raiſed in the wicked and vnnaturall father (nothing degenerating from the naturall crueltie of his anceſtors) new and great ſuſpicions, whereof to diſburden his diſquieted mind, he conceiued with himſelfe a moſt horrible deuice. Wherfore the yere follow- E ing, which was the yeare 1553, he raiſed a great armie; giuing it out, That the Perſians had with greater power than before inuaded Syria, and that therefore he for the loue of his Countrie, and defence of his empire, was determined to go thither with his army, and in perſon himſelfe to repreſſe the attempts of his enemies. Wherfore the army being aſſembled, & al things neceſſary orderly prouided, he commanded to ſet forward, and in few daies after followed himſelfe: who comming at length into Syria, preſently by truſty meſſengers commanded Muſtapha to come vnto him at Aleppo, for there he lay incamped. And yet for all theſe ſhadowes, the matter was not ſo cloſely by Solyman conueied (although he was exceeding carefull thereof) but that his mortall and deadly hatred againſt his ſon was perceiued by the Baſſa's & other great men about him: inſomuch that Achmat Baſſa by a ſecret and truſtie meſſenger gaue him warning thereof, that ſo he might in time the better prouide for the ſafegard of his life. Neither could Muſtapha himſelfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparant reaſon ſhould come ſo far with ſo great an army: yet truſting to his owne innocencie, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he reſolued (although it were with the extreme danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers command: for he thought it more commendable and honorable to incurre the danger of death, than liuing to fall into the foule ſuſpition of diſloyaltie.

diſloyaltie. In ſo great a peplexitie of mind, after he had with himſelfe much diſcourſed too G and fro, what courſe he were beſt to take, at length he boldly and reſolutely asked the doctor whom (as we haue before ſaid) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the Empire of the world, or a bleſſed life were of man more to be deſired? to whom the doctor frankly anſwered, That the empire of the world, to him that would enter into the due conſideration thereof, brought with it no felicitie, more than a vaine ſhew and vtter apparance of good, nothing being more fraile or vncertaine than worldly honor, bringing with it feare, vexation of mind, tribulation, ſuſpition, murder, wrong, wickedneſſe, ſpoile, ruin, and captiuitie, with infinit miſchiefes of like nature, not to be deſired of him that would attaine to true felicitie, by which means the bleſſed life was to be loſt and not gained: But they vnto whome God had giuen the grace rightly to conſider and weigh the fragilitie and ſhortneſſe of this our eſtate (which H the common ſort deemeth to be the only life) and to ſtriue againſt the vanities nf this world, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place aſſigned for them in heauen, and prepared by the great God, where they ſhould at length enioy life and bliſſe eternal. This anſwer of the great doctor wonderfully ſatisfied the troubled mind of the yong Prince, foreſeeing as it were the approch of his owne end: and ſo ſtaying not any longer diſcourſe, forthwith ſet forward towards his father, and making great haſt, came at length to his fathers campe, and not far off pitched his tents in the open field. But this his ſo haſtie comming the more increaſed the ſuſpition in the mind of his wicked father: neither ſpared Ruſtan in the meane time with his craftie and ſubtile deuices to augment the ſame: for by a ſigne giuen he cauſed the Ianizaries and chiefe men in the armie to go as if it had bin for honors ſake I to meet Muſtapha; which they all without delay preſently did at his command, and ſo all together ſet forward. In the meane time he the moſt craftie varlet, with troubled countenance (for he could notably diſſemble) as a man halfe diſmaied came in haſte into Solymans pauilion, and falſly told him, That the Ianizaries and almoſt all the beſt ſoldiers of the army were of themſelues without leaue gon to meet Muſtapha, and that he feared what would enſue thereof.
Which news ſo troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gon, eaſily beleeued all to be true that the falſe Baſſa had told him.
Neither wanted Muſtapha ſtrange warning of his end ſo neere at hand, for the third day before his ſetting forwards toward his father, falling aſleepe in the euening, he thought he ſaw his Prophet Mahomet in bright apparell to take him by the hand and lead him into a moſt pleaſant K place, beautified with moſt glorious and ſtately palaces, and moſt delicat and pleaſant gardens; aud pointing to euery thing with his finger, to ſay thus vnto him, Here reſt they for euer, which in this world haue led an vpright and godly life, following vertue, and deteſting vice: and after that turning his face to the other ſide, to haue ſhewed him two great and ſwift riuers, whereof the one boiled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling, ſome vp, ſome down, crying horribly for mercie: And there (ſaid he) are puniſhed all ſuch as in this fraile life haue bin the malicious workers of iniquity: the chief of whom (as he ſaid) were Emperors, kings, princes, and other great men of the world. Muſtapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholie dreame, called vnto him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the ſame might ſignifie? who ſtanding a great L while in a muſe (for the Mahometans are exceeding ſuperſtitious, attributing much to dreams) full of ſorrow and griefe at length anſwered, That this viſion (for ſo it pleaſed him to terme it) was vndoubtedly to be feared, as preſaging vnto him the extreame perill of his life, and therefore requeſted him to haue great care both of his life and honor. But Muſtapha as he was of a notable ſpirit and courage, regarding nothing that anſwer, ſtoutly replied, What, ſhall I ſuffer my ſelfe to be terrified and ouercome with childiſh & vain feare? why rather haſte I not couragiouſly & reſolutely to my father? and ſo much the more boldly, becauſe I know aſſuredly I haue alwaies (as reaſon was) reuerenced his Maieſtie, that againſt his will I neuer turned mine eyes or foot againſt his moſt roiall ſeat, much leſſe affected his empire, except the moſt high God had called him to a better life, neither then without the generall good liking & choiſe of M the whole army, that ſo I might at length without murder, without bloud, without tyrannie, wel & iuſtly raigne, and in loue & peace inuiolate liue with my brethren: for I haue ſet down with my ſelfe, and choſen, if it be my fathers pleaſure ſo, rather to die in his obedience, than raigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, eſpecially my competitors, a rebell or traitor.

Hauing

A Hauing thus ſaid, he came vnto his fathers campe, & pitching his tents (as we haue before ſaid) ſuted himſelfe all in white, in token of his innocencie, and writing certaine letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, vſe to write, and alwaies to carry with them, for they are wonderfull fooliſh in their ſuperſtition) and putting them in his boſome, attended vpon with a few of his moſt truſtie followers, came with great reuerence towards the tent of his father, fully reſoluing to haue kiſſed his hand, as their vſuall manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of the tent, remembring that he had yet his dagger girt to him, hee entred not vntill he had put it off; becauſe he would not come into his fathers ſight with any weapon, if happily ſo he might cleere himſelfe of his fathers needleſſe ſuſpition. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with ſuch honour as belonged B to his ſtate cheerfully receiued by his fathers Eunuchs. But ſeeing nothing elſe prouided but one ſeat whereon to ſit himſelfe alone, hee perplexed in mind, ſtood ſtill a while muſing; at length asked where the Emperor his father was? Whereunto they anſwered, That he ſhould by and by ſee him: and with that caſting his eye aſide, he ſaw ſeuen Muts (theſe are ſtrong men bereft of their ſpeech, whom the Turkiſh tyrants haue alwaies in readineſſe, the more ſecretly to execute their bloudie butcherie) comming from the other ſide of the tent towards him: at whoſe ſight ſtrucken with a ſudden terrour, ſaid no more, but Lo my death; and with that, ariſing, was about to haue fled: but in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the eunuch and Muts, and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death: where without further ſtay, the Muts caſt a bowſtring about his necke, he poore wretch ſtill ſtriuing, and requeſting that he might C ſpeake but two words to his father before he died. All which the murtherer (for no addition is ſufficient ſignificantly to expreſſe his vnnaturall villanie) both heard and ſaw by a trauers from the other ſide of the tent: but was ſo far from being moued with compaſſion, that thinking it long till he were diſpatched, with a moſt terrible and cruell voice he rated the villains enured to bloud; ſaying, Will you neuer diſpatch that I bid you? will you neuer make an end of this traitor, for whom I haue not reſted one night theſe ten yeares in quiet? Which horrible commanding ſpeeches, yet thundering in their eares, thoſe butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent Prince vpon the ground, and with the helpe of the Eunuches forcibly drawing the knotted bow ſtring both wayes, by the commandement of a moſt wicked father, ſtrangled him. With like barbarous crueltie, hee ſhortly after cauſed Mahomet his nephew (Muſtapha his ſonne) to be ſtrangled D alſo.

Muſtapha commeth to his fathers tent.

Muſtapha moſt cruelly ſtrangled in his fathers ſight.

Mahomet Muſtaphaes ſonne ſtrangled alſo.

This vnnatural & ſtrange murther committed, he preſently commanded the Baſſa of Amaſia Muſtaphaes Lieutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne preſence to be ſtrucke off. Which done, he ſent for Tzihanger the Crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in ſporting wiſe, as if he had don a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Muſtapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merrie and cheerefull countenance haſted to doe, as one glad of his brothers comming. But as ſoone as he came vnto the place where he ſaw his brother lying dead vpon the ground ſtrangled, it is not to be ſpoken how he was in mind tormented. Hee was ſcarcely come to the place where this deteſtable murther was committed, E when his father ſent vnto him certain of his ſeruants to offer vnto him al Muſtaphaes treaſure, horſes, ſeruants, jewels, tents, and withall, the gouernment of the Prouince of Amaſia: but Tzihanger filled with extreame heauineſſe for the vnmercifull death of his welbeloued brother, ſpake vnto them in this ſort. A wicked and vngodly Cain, traitor (I may not ſay father) take thou now the treaſures, the horſes, the ſeruants, the iewels, and the Prouince of Muſtapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell, and ſauage breaſt, ſo vngratiouſly and contrarie to all humanitie, I will not ſay the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthie, warlike, and noble ſonne, the mirrour of courteſie, and Prince of greateſt hope, the like of whome, the Othoman Familie neuer yet had, nor neuer ſhall? I will therefore my ſelfe prouide that thou, nor none for thee ſhall euer hereafter in ſuch ſort ſhamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch. And hauing thus much ſaid, ſtab'd himſelfe with his owne dagger into the bodie, whereof hee in ſhort time died: Which ſo ſoone as it F came to the old Tygres eares, it is hard to ſay how much hee grieued. His dead bodie was by his fathers commandement carried from Aleppo in Syria, to Conſtantinople, and afterwards honourably buried on the other ſide of the hauen at Pera. For all this bloudie tragedie, his couetous minde was not ſo troubled, but that hee could forthwith command all Muſtaphaes treaſures and riches to be brought to his tents which his ſouldiers in hope to haue

In the meane time the ſouldiers which were in Muſtaphaes campe, not knowing what was become of their maſter, ſeeing ſuch a multitude of ſouldiers thruſting into their campe without all order; to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolencie, ſtept out in their armour, and notably repulſed them, not without much bloudſhed.

At length, the noiſe of this ſtir was heard by the reſt of the kings ſouldiers, who ſeeing the tumult to increaſe more and more, ran in to helpe their fellowes; ſo that in ſhort time there began a hot skirmiſh and cruell fight on both ſides, inſomuch that two thouſand were ſlaine, and mo wounded: neither had the broile ſo ended, had not Achomat Baſſa a graue captaine, and for his long experience of no ſmall authority amongſt the ſouldiers, kept backe the Ianizaries, and ſtaied their furie; and turning likewiſe to Muſtaphaes ſouldiers, by gentle and mild words and courteous perſuaſions, in this manner appeaſed their rage. What? my brethren (ſaid hee) will you now (degenerating from your antient loyaltie, for which you haue beene for ſo many ages commended) impugne the command of the great Sultan our dread ſoueraigne? Truely I cannot ſufficiently maruell what thing ſhould mooue you, whom I haue hitherto prooued to haue beene moſt worthie and valiant ſoldiers, in this ciuill conflict to draw thoſe weapons againſt your fellowes and brethren, which you haue moſt fortunatly vſed againſt the enemies of the Othoman Kings: except you meane thereby to make your ſelues a ioyfull ſpectacle vnto your enemies, who grieuing to ſee themſelues ouercome by your victorious weapons, may yet reioyce among themſelues to ſee you turne the ſame one vpon another. Wherefore my ſonnes, for your antient honours ſake, be carefull that you doe not by this your inſolencie loſe the reputation of your wiſedome, loyaltie, and valour; for which you haue hitherto beene aboue all others commended: reſerue theſe your weapons which you haue now too too much vſed among your fellowes, againſt your enemies, of whom you may get more praiſe and honour. This ſpeech of the old Baſſa, ſo mollified the ſtout ſouldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Muſtaphaes tents to be carried to Solymans: but ſo ſoone as the death of Muſtapha was blowne into the eares of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the armie in Solymans campe, another tumult riſe among them worſe than the firſt. They were quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noiſe confuſed with tears and lamentation, as they were in rage and furie, brake violently into Solymans pauilion with their drawne ſwords: which ſtrucke the tyrant into ſuch a feare, that deſtitute of all counſell in himſelfe, he was about with the extreame perill of his life to haue fled: but being holden by his friends, and making a vertue of neceſſitie, vpon the ſudden aduentured to do that which at better leiſure hee would ſcarcely haue thought vpon: for going forth out of his tent, but with a pale and wan countenance, he ſpake vnto the enraged ſouldiers thus: What broile is this? what ſturre? what ſo great inſolencie? what meane your inflamed, fierce and angrie lookes? know you not your Soueraigne? aud him that hath power to command you? Haue you ſo reſolued to ſtaine the antient and inuincible honour of your ſelues and your anceſtours, with the bloud of your Lord and Emperour? Whileſt he was yet thus ſpeaking, the ſouldiers boldly anſwered, That they denied not, but that he was the man whom they many yeares before had choſen for their Emperour: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mightie Empire, and in like manner preſerued it; that was therefore of them done, that hee ſhould for the ſame gouerne them vertuonſly and iuſtly, and not to lay his boudy hands without diſcretion vpon euery iuſt man, and moſt wickedly embrue himſelfe with innocent bloud: and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they ſaid) moued with iuſt cauſe to reuenge the vnworthy death of guiltleſſe Muſtapha; and that for that matter, he had no iuſt cauſe to be angrie with them. Wherfore they required, that they might publickly cleere themſelues of the treaſon whereof they were accuſed by Muſtaphaes enemies, and that the accuſer might be brought forth to iuſtifie his accuſation: proteſting, that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuſer made his appearance in iudgement, and commenced his accuſation iudicially, vpon paine to endure the like puniſhment if he failed in proofe. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the hainouſneſſe of the late committed fact cauſed euery man to ſhed teares, ſo that Solyman himſelfe ſeemed to be ſorie for the murther ſo lately by himſelfe committed: wherefore he promiſed vnto the ſouldiers whatſoeuer they required, and did what he could to appeaſe their angrie minds. For all that, they in the meane time, leſt he ſhould craftily ſlip away and deceiue them of that he had promiſed, and of the expectation of ſuch things as they had required, with a maruellous care and diligence all kept watch and ward.

Ruſtan diſgraced by Solyman, flyeth to Conſtantinople.

Solyman to appeaſe this fury of the Ianizaries, depriued Ruſtan Baſſa of all his honours, and tooke from him his ſeale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates Baſſa. But Ruſtan worthily ſtrucken with feare and horrour, ſeeing himſelfe now in no ſafetie in his own tents, fled ſecretly to Achomates, asking his counſell what were beſt for him to doe, and what courſe to take in ſo doubtful and dangerous a caſe: To whom the Baſſa anſwered, that it were beſt for him to vſe the great Emperors aduiſe, and to do what he commanded. Which anſwer well ſatisfied Ruſtan: and ſo he which of late gaue other men acceſſe vnto the Emperor at his pleaſure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to preferre this poore ſute, To know his pleaſure what he would haue him to do: from whom he receiued this anſwer, That he ſhould incontinently without further delay get him out of his ſight, and out of the campe: which the Baſſa ſaid he could not conueniently do, being by his diſpleaſure and the ſouldiers rage diſfurniſhed of all things neceſſarie for his departure. Whereunto Solyman ſent him anſwere againe, That he could giue him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were beſt for him without more adoe to be gone for feare of further harme. Whereupon Ruſtan, guiltie in conſcience of moſt horrible villanie & treacherie, accompanied but with eight of his moſt faithfull friends in ſtead of his late world of followers, poſted in haſt to Conſtantinople, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriuers of the treaſon againſt Muſtapha, in great feare expected the euent of his fortune.

The miſerable end of Achomates the great Baſſa.

This yong prince Muſtapha thus ſhamefully murthered by his own father, was for his rare vertues generally beloued of the Turks: but of the ſouldiers moſt for his martiall diſpoſition, and readines for the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. The opinion they had conceiued of him was ſuch, and their loue ſo great, that they neuer thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected ſo much for the enlarging of their empire: inſomuch, that euer ſince, when in their priuate or publicke actions they faile of any great hope, they vſe this prouerbe euen at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Muſtapha, Sultan Muſtapha is dead: as who ſhould ſay, our hope is all loſt. Achomates Baſſa the great champion of the Turks, a man of exceeding courage, not ignorant of the ſmal aſſurance of the great honors of that ſtate, at ſuch time as he receiued the ſeale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly beſtow it vpon him, ſo he would at one time or other to his no leſſe diſgrace take it from him: to whom Solyman ſolemnly promiſed with an oath, not to diſplace him ſo long as he liued. For all that, hee had not long enioyed that honor, but that Solyman falling in diſlike with him, & willing againe to promote Ruſtan Baſſa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks court, which by reaſon of his oath hee could not doe ſo long as Achomates liued: To ſaue his oath, and to preferre his ſon in law (whom he had indeed diſplaced only no pleaſe the tumultuous Ianizaries) reſolued to haue Achomates put to death. Of which his purpoſe Achomates altogether ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Diuano in al his honour, vpon the ſudden receiued word from Solyman, that he muſt preſently die, & forthwith was the hangman readie to haue ſtrangled him, as was giuen him in charge: whom the ſtout Baſſa thruſt from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere in ſhew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, eſpied at laſt an honeſt man whom he had before many times pleaſured, whom hee moſt earneſtly requeſted for all the kindneſſe ſhewed vnto him, to do him that laſt fauour as to ſtrangle him with his owne hand, which ſhould be vnto him the greateſt good turne that he could poſſibly deuiſe, deteſting nothing more than to die with the hand of the executioner. Which thing, when he after much intreatie had vndertaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he ſhould not at one twitch ſtrangle him outright, but letting the bow ſtring ſlacke again, giue him leaue once to breath, & then to diſpatch him: which his requeſt was by his friend accordingly performed, and he in that ſort ſtrangled: wherein it ſeemeth, that he was deſirous, firſt to taſt of death, and not to die all at once. Immediatly after whoſe death, Ruſtan Baſſa was again reſtored to his place of chiefe Viſier, and had the great ſeale deliuered vnto him: which honor he enioyed about ſix yeares after, and ſo at laſt died of the dropſie. This was the end of theſe two great Baſſaes Achomates and Ruſtan, who in that time ſwaied that great Empire, vnder Solyman, and of whom we haue ſo much ſpoken. It is reported, that Solyman hauing appointed Achomates to die, ſhould ſay, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thouſand times, in ſeeing his honour taken from him and beſtowed vpon another.

1554

The Turks gallies by the ſolicitation of the French before brought down into the Tuſcan ſea, did much harme vpon the coaſts of Calabria and Sicilia in this yeare 1554, as they had the yeare before, and ſo did diuers yeares after. At which time alſo Pandulphus Contarenus the Venetian Admirall ſcouring alongſt the ſeas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian eſtate, chanced to meet with the Baſſa of Callipolis, who in the yere before had rifled certaine Venetian Merchants; in reuenge of which iniury he ſet vpon hhm, and after a great ſpoile made both of the Turks and their gallies, he ranſacked Dirrachium then one of the Turks port townes in Dalmatia.

1555

The next yeare 1555, the ſame Baſſa recouered his ſtrength, but not daring to be too buſie with the Venetians, ſurpriſed the Iſlands of Blumbis and Elba, ſubiect to the Duke of Florence, and withall ſent letters to Solyman, to perſuade him to take vp armes againſt the Venetians, as they which had broken the league.

1556

Zigeth beſieged by the Baſſa of Buda.

A terrible aſſault.

Zigeth notably defended.

At the ſame time, Haly the Baſſa of Buda by policie ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of Baboza in Hungarie: and was in good hope by the like fineneſſe to haue taken the towne and Caſtle of Zigeth, a place of great importance: but failing of his purpoſe, he came the next yere 1556, with a great armie, and the thirteenth day of Iune incamped before the towne, wherein was Gouernor Marcus Horwath a valiant captaine, with a garriſon of notable ſouldiers. Shortly after he began a moſt terrible batterie: during which time the Chriſtians ſallying out diuers times, ſlew many of his men; who for all that vſed ſuch diligence, that the twentith of Iune they woon the vttermoſt wall, and after fiue hot aſſaults were in hope at the ſixt to haue woon the caſtle alſo: but the Chriſtians perceiuing the danger, reſolutely ſallied out, and hauing ſlaine eight hundred of them, draue the reſt againe from the wall. Yet the Turks gaue it not ſo ouer, but with a great number of carts labored to haue filled vp the marriſh and ditches about the towne: which their attempt was by the induſtrie of the defendants alſo defeated. The Baſſa perceiuing how hardly the towne would be woon by force, attempted to haue perſuaded them to haue yeelded it vp by compoſition: but failing therein of his purpoſe, began againe the twelfth of Iuly to aſſault the citie, which aſſault he maintained fiue dayes together without intermiſſion, ſtill ſending in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or ſlaine: yet was the citie for all that by the valour of the Chriſtians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his forces, he raiſed his ſiege the one and twentieth day of Iuly and departed: but within ſix dayes after, he returned from the city Quinque Eccleſiæ, and aſſaulted the citie afreſh; but was at length glad to giue ouer the ſiege and be gone, when he had loſt of his beſt ſouldiers aboue two thouſand, and of the defendants ſlaine but a hundred and twentie. After his departure there was ten thouſand great ſhot found, wherewith he had battered the towne and the caſtle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceaſed not to do what harme they could in the Tuſcane ſea, and had againe miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland of Corſica: for withſtanding of whom the Biſhop of Rome exacted of his people a great ſubſidie, and finely ſtript the Iews of their money, and ſeiſed vpon their rich merchants goods in his territorie. At whoſe earneſt ſuit Solyman in their behalfe writ vnto the Biſhop as followeth:

Sultan Solyman, moſt mightie Emperour of Emperours, the ſonne of Selym, Emperour of Emperours, to whom God giue eternall victorie: to Pope Paulus the fourth, greeting.

Solymans Letters to the Pope in behalfe of the Iewes merchants.

*Moſt excellent and moſt mightie Lord of the Profeſſors of the Meſsias Ieſu, and Lord of Rome, the Almightie keepe thee. At ſuch time as thou ſhalt receiue our Seale, thou ſhalt vnderſtand by our Letters, that certaine Hebrewes haue come vnto vs, complaining that they are oppreſſed of thee with ſo grieuous exactions, when they come to traffique at Ancona: This burthen I requeſt thee to take from them, and to reſtore againe vnto them their goods, that thereby they may be able to pay to vs our Tribute: which if thou (as I hope thou wilt) ſhall doe, thou ſhalt feele our fauour. Farewell. From Conſtantinople the laſt of the bleſſed moneth * Rambeluch, in the yeare of our great Prophet* Mahomet, nine hundred threeſcore and foure.

* The ninth of March, Anno 1556.

Haly Baſſa beſiegeth Zigeth againe.

Haly Baſſa grieued with the late repulſe he had receiued at Zigeth, came againe the next yeare, A yeare, and beſieged it, at which time king Ferdinand ſent Nicholaus Polwiler and the county Serinus with a power raiſed in Sueuia and Auſtria, to recouer Baboza, a caſtle betwixt Zigeth and Stiria, before ſurpriſed by the Turkes: of whoſe comming the Baſſa hauing intelligence, riſe with his armie and departed from Zigeth, which he had for certaine moneths hardly beſieged, and not far from Baboza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who ioyning battell with him, after a hard and ſharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victory with the comming downe of young Ferdinand, king Ferdinands ſonne, Archduke of Auſtria with new ſupplies, ſo terrified the Turks in that part of Hungarie along the riuer Drauus, that they for feare forſooke Baboza, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and diuers other ſmal caſtles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Eccleſiæ.

Haly Baſſa ouerthrowne.

B The Gouernour of Zigeth encouraged herewith, ſallying out with his garriſon, ſlew many of the Turks in their flight towards Quinque Eccleſiæ, and meeting by chance with a troupe of horſemen which were bringing the Turks pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the money, and ſo with an exceeding rich prey returned to his caſtle. At which time alſo Adam the Gouernour of Rab, otherwiſe called Iauarinum, hauing burnt the ſuburbes of Alba Regalis, and driuen away many thouſands of cattell, at a towne called Sian ouerthrew fiue hundred Turkes, and as many fugitiue Chriſtians, and ſo with a great prey and little or no loſſe at all of his men returned.

Henry the French king at the ſame time in warres with Philip king of Spaine, and troubled with the loſſe of his armie ouerthrowne not farre from S. Quintins (at which time the duke C Montmorencie Conſtable of France and Generall of the armie, with his ſonne and diuers other of the nobilitie of France were taken priſoners) by his Embaſſadour Michael Condignac ſolicited Solyman to haue by ſea inuaded Naples and Sicilia, ſo to haue withdrawne the Spaniſh forces out of France, to defend their owne frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the inſolencie of the Embaſſadour, refuſed to doe: yet neuertheleſſe commanded his aduenturers all alongſt the coaſt of Affricke, to infeſt thoſe ſeas, and to doe what harme they could vpon the coaſt of Italie and Sicilia; which they ſo diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sicilia was faine for defence of thoſe countries to lie in readineſſe with his gallies in the ports of Caieta and Naples.

Henry the French king ſoliciteth Solyman to inuade the king of Spaine his territories.

In the meane time the Guiſe, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of S. Iohns in France (and D brother of Francis the duke of Guiſe, Generall of the French Kings armie in Italie, who vpon the ouerthrow receiued at S. Quintins, called out of Italie, ſhortly after tooke Calais) Admirall of the gallies of Malta, went out toward the Eaſt with foure gallies well appointed, to lie in wait for the Turks, and by fortune met with two great ſhips laded with the Turks merchandiſe, which he tooke; and by and by after, light vpon foure of the Turks gallies, with whome he had a great fight: yet at length hauing ſunke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victorie returning towards Malta to haue repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turks: who deſirous to reuenge the loſſe of their fellowes, ſet vpon him, and he ſeeing now no remedie, but that he muſt needs fight couragiouſly, encountered them. But foraſmuch as he had in the two fights E before loſt ſome of his men, and 72 of the knights in the gallies lay ſore wounded, he, by the counſell of the captaines retired towards Malta: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turkes, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the reſt and the prizes before taken, he recouered the Iſland of Malta, where hee ſtaied that Winter; and the next Spring ſailed into France to be partaker of thoſe troubles, which beginning ſhortly after, haue but of late taken end.

The Guiſe, Lord Grand Prior in France, Admirall of Malta, taketh certaine of the Turkes gallies.

The immoderat fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrarie to his deſire, than in the proofe of thoſe his children, of whom the world held the greateſt expectation. Muſtapha his eldeſt ſon, the mirrour of courteſie, and rare hope of the whole Turkiſh nation, the ſuſpitious tyrant had moſt vnnaturally cauſed to be murthered in his own preſence, F to the griefe of all his ſubiects in generall, as is before declared: poore Tzihanger was dead for ſorrow: and Mahometes his eldeſt ſonne by his beſt beloued the faire Roxolana, was departed this life alſo. So that now remained vnto him onely Selymus, the vnworthie heire of ſo great an empire, and Baiazet his younger brother, the liuely image of his father, both men growne, and the ſonnes of the ſame Roxolana: but ſo far differing the one from the other both in feature of bodie and diſpoſition of mind, as if they had not bin of the ſame kindred and line. Selymus the elder brother moſt like vnto his mother, was in the ſecret determination of the aged Emperor his father appointed heire of that moſt mightie empire. Baiazet much reſembling his father, was on the other ſide ſtrongly ſupported by the care and entire loue of his mother: which whether it proceeded of a ſecret commiſeration of his ineuitable deſtiny, or that hee had by loyaltie or other means ſo woon her fauor, is not knowne; but euery man ſaw, that if it had lien in her power, ſhe would vndoubtedly haue preferred him before his elder brother Selymus, & haue placed him in the empire: but ſhe muſt needs giue way to her old husbands will, firmly and irremouably ſet downe, that the Deſtinies ſo permitting, none ſhould raigne after him but his eldeſt ſon Selymus. Of which his purpoſe and reſolution Baiazet being not ignorant, began moſt circumſpectly to looke about him, if he could by any means fruſtrat that forcible neceſſitie, and exchange his certaine deſtruction with an empire: in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauor & loue of Roxolana his mother, & of Ruſtan the great Baſſa his brother in law, who together had in any other matter bin able to haue ouerruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he reſolutely ſet downe himſelfe, rather to end his daies by making proofe of his good or bad fortune, than vpon the death of his father (which by courſe of nature could not now be far off) to be as a ſacrifice baſely butchered by ſome vile hangman of his brothers. Baiazet ſo reſolued, and now already fallen out with his brother Selymus, tooke occaſion vpon the generall diſcontentment of the people & others, for the vnworthy death of Muſtapha their late ioy, to begin thoſe ſtirs which hee had before with himſelfe plotted, & ſo to make a head, whereunto he might afterward ioine the body alſo: for why, that worthy Muſtapha had left behind him ſo great deſire of himſelf, that now it wearied many to liue after him, they had ſo placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, vnto whom nothing was more deſired than to reuenge the wrong don vnto him, or els to run the ſame hard fortune with him: otherſome guilty of the immoderat affection they had born vnto him yet liuing, & fearing to be called to giue an account thereof, thought any ſtate better and more aſſured than that wherein they preſently ſtood, & therefore ſought all occaſions of new ſtirs, and how to ſet all on a hurly burly: onely a captaine was wanting, Muſtapha could not be again reuiued, yet might he be ſtrongly ſuppoſed to liue. This deuice pleaſed Baiazet, as beſt fitting his purpoſe, being not ignorant of this diſpoſition of the people. Wherefore by certaine of his moſt faithfull and truſtie followers he found out a certaine obſcure fellow of a notable audacitie, which ſhould take vpon him the name & perſon of Muſtapha, whoſe ſtature alſo & countenance and proportion of bodie differed not much from Muſtapha himſelfe: hee, as if hee had by chance eſcaped, firſt began to ſhew himſelfe in that part of Thracia, which is aboue Conſtantinople, & lieth toward Danubius, not far from the countries of Moldauia & Valachia, & was for that cauſe both fitteſt for rebellion, & alſo beſt ſtored with horſemen, who of all others moſt honored Muſtapha. Hither he comes as if it had bin from a long iourney, ſlenderly accompanied, and as if he had bin deſirous at the firſt not to haue bin known; his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearefully giue them that asked occaſion to gheſſe, than plainly to tell them, that it was Muſtapha: neither did he himſelfe much denie it: whereby the people became more and more deſirous to know him. Which beginning thus laied, he afterward began to reioice of his fortunat comming thither, & to giue God thanks for his ſafe arriuall there amongſt his friends: he tels them, That at ſuch time as he was ſent for by his father, hee durſt not come into his ſight, or commit himſelfe vnto him in his furie, but by the counſell of his friends to haue with great promiſes perſuaded one that was maruellous like vnto himſelfe to go in his ſtead; by whoſe danger he might make proofe of his fathers minde towards him: who before he was admitted to the ſpeech of his father, was without hearing miſerably ſtrangled, and ſo caſt out before his pauilion: at which time there was many (as he ſaid) which perceiued the deceit, but the greater part remained in errour, deceiued with the lineaments and countenance of the miſerable dead man, who was much altered with the terrible paines of death, and ſuppoſing it to haue been him indeed that was ſlaine. Which thing as ſoone as hee vnderſtood, he thought it not good longer to ſtay, but preſently to flie and to prouide for his owne ſafetie: and ſo flying with a few of his owne folowers, thereby the more ſecretly and ſafely to eſcape; and hauing paſſed aboue Pontus by the people of Boſphorus, was now come thither, where hee was in good hope to finde much helpe and comfort

A ſort in the fidelitie of his friends, whom he requeſted not now to forſake him, or to make leſſe account of him diſgraced by the malice of his ſtepmother, than they had before in time of his proſperitie. For that he was aminded to reuenge the iniurie done vnto him, and by force of armes to defend himſelfe: for what els he now left? being by no other meanes preſerued, but by the death of another man: that he had ſufficiently proued how his father ſtood affected towards him, and that he now liued by his miſtaking, not by his kindnes. The cauſe of all which his troubles was his ſtepdame, who (as he ſaid) with her inchantments led the ſilly old man (now almoſt doating for age, and mad for loue) whither ſhe would at her pleaſure, and by her agent Ruſtan Baſſa forced him forward headlong into all kinde of miſchiefe: but that God be thanked he wanted not his friends, by whoſe help he would finde a way out of theſe miſeries, B & take reuenge of his enemies: for why, he had as yet couragious hearts, & the Ianizaries with the greater part of his fathers family on his ſide, & that great multituds of people would flock vnto him vpon brute of his name: ſo that they which did now mourn for him as dead (in number many) would by heaps run to help him being aliue: ſo that they there preſent would only curteouſly receiue him as a gueſt, & protect him now diſtreſſed, til ſuch time as his welwillers & friends might repaire vnto him. And this at laſt he gaue out not in ſecret, but openly to all men whereſoeuer he came. The ſame things did they alſo report, whom he made the people to beleeue to haue been the companions of his flight: which was alſo confirmed by diuers of good account & authority, whom Baiazet had before dealt withall to that purpoſe. So that a C great number of men altogether vnknown to Baiazet, were by that means ſeduced: for this matter was ſo cunningly wrought, that many of them that had known Muſtapha aliue, & ſeen him laid dead before his fathers pauilion, yet liſted not greatly to beleeue that which they knew, but eaſily ſuffred themſelues to be perſuaded that this was the true Muſtapha. But the companions and followers of Muſtapha (in whoſe mindes the liuely countenance and remembrance of him was thorowly ingrauen) nothing could deceiue: yet blinded partly with feare, partly with griefe & deſire of reuenge, & wiſhing rather to aduenture any thing, than longer to liue without Muſtapha, were the firſt men that came to offer their ſeruice to this counterfeit Muſtapha: & would not ſuffer other men to doubt but that this was the very Muſtapha, which it was falſly reported to haue bin ſlain. As for the deceiuer himſelfe, he either kept with him, or D entertained them that came, ſome with faire promiſes, ſome with curteous ſpeeches, & many alſo with mony & rewards, which he made them beleeue he had reſerued of the relicks of his better fortune: for Baiazet had before notably prouided, that nothing ſhould in this behalfe be wanting vnto him for the countenancing of his credit. So within the ſpace of a few daies ſuch a multitude of men was reſorted vnto him, as might almoſt haue made a whole army. When Solyman vpon the ſudden was aduertiſed by the fearefull meſſengers & letters of the Sanzacks therabouts, what a danger was like to enſue by the concourſe of ſo great a multitude of people to this counterfeit Muſtapha: he preſently ſuſpecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the priuity of one of his ſons, thought it not a thing to be neglected, & therefore by his letters reproued the Sanzacks therby, that they had ſuffred the matter to run ſo far, & had E not in the beginning as their duty was ſuppreſſed the ſame, grieuouſly threatning them, if they did not with all ſpeed ſend vnto him in bonds that counterfeit companion with the reſt of his complices. Which that it might be the eaſilier by them performed, he promiſed to ſend one of the chief Baſſa's, namely Partan Baſſa (who had maried the widow of Mahometes the eldeſt ſon of Roxolana, of whom we haue before remembred) & with him a ſtrong power of the ſouldiers of the court: but if they would haue themſelues excuſed, that they ſhould of themſelues diſpatch the matter before the comming of that aid. This Partan led after him certain ſquadrons of ſoldiers, not ſo many in number, as notable for their fidelity: for Solyman had cauſed the moſt faithful of his colonels, captains, & corporals, to be culled out, wiſely doubting leſt his ſoldiers, either led with affection, or corrupted with reward, might take part with him againſt whom F they were ſent. For the common ſort of the Ianizaries ſtanding in ſuſpence at the fame of Muſtapha, & expectation of ſome great nouelty, fauored that broile, & wiſhed all on a hurlyburly: neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzackes after they had receiued this ſtrait charge from Solyman, conſidering how much it ſtood them vpon to make a ſpeedie diſpatch; began now to incourage one another to beſtir themſelues, to make all the ſpeed poſſible, and with all their power on euery ſide to oppoſe themſelues againſt the attempts of this new found Muſtapha, laboring to ſtay ſuch as were comming vnto him, and to diſperſe ſuch as G were already come, by ſhewing them the greatnes of the danger, & threatening them with all extremities. In the mean time Partan Baſſa came on with his army, & was not now far off: when (as in like caſe it oftentimes falleth out in things not yet ſufficiently confirmed, and by celeritie preuented) the ſouldiers of the counterfeit Muſtapha ſeeing themſelues beſet on euery ſide, began to feare, and at firſt ſome few to ſlip away; but afterwards all, without regard of ſhame or of their promiſe, to forſake their captaine and flie euery man whither he thought beſt. The captain ſeeking likewiſe to haue made ſhift for himſelfe, was with the chiefe of his counſellors and followers taken by the Sanzacks and deliuered to the Baſſa, who with a ſtrong guard ſent them all in bonds to Conſtantinople: where Solyman by moſt exquiſite torments drew from them all the ſecret deuices of his yong ſon Baiazet, and that he had purpoſed after ſuch a head H made by this ſuppoſed Muſtapha, as he thought conuenient, to haue vpon the ſudden ioyned himſelfe with a great power, and ſo as ſhould beſt ſerue for his purpoſe, to haue gone directly to Conſtantinople, or els againſt his brother Selymus. But whilſt he goeth ſomwhat too ſlowly about his buſineſſe, his vnripe counſels were by his fathers celeritie oppreſſed. Of all which matter Solyman now thorowly aſſured, cauſed the ſuppoſed Muſtapha and his companions at midnight to be drowned in the ſea; thinking it not good to haue theſe things commonly knowne, and to haue his domeſticall wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbor Princes. Neuertheles being mightily offended with Baiazet for ſo great an inſolencie, hee ceaſed not to caſt in his mind how to be reuenged vpon him; which his wife Roxolana, a woman of great wiſdome, was not ignorant of. Who after a few days, at ſuch time as the old mans I fury was ouerpaſt, falling of purpoſe into talke with him about the matter, ſhe laid together in her ſons behalfe, and alledged the indiſcreetneſſe of youth, the neceſſity of the fact, and the example of his anceſtors in like caſe, that it was ſo prouided for by nature, that euery man ſhould be carefull of himſelfe and his, and that all men did indifferently ſhun death, that young men were by euill counſell eaſily ſeduced and made to forget their dutie. That it were reaſon hee ſhould forgiue him this firſt fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the father to haue ſaued his ſon: but if he ſhould again fall into relapſe, there would not want time to puniſh him for both faults: And that if ſo be he would not pardon him for his own ſake; yet he would vouchſafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him for whom ſhe had before groaned, and not to be cruell vpon him, one of the pledges of their loue, in whome reſted the K bloud of them both: for in what wofull caſe ſhould ſhe be, if of thoſe two ſons (all that God had left her) the fathers ſeuerity ſhould bereaue her of the one? Wherfore ſhe requeſted him to moderat his anger, & to prefer his clemencie before his iuſt indignation: foraſmuch as God himſelfe of all power and might, did not alwaies deale with ſinners in ſeueritie, but for moſt part in mercie; whereas otherwiſe all mankind would not ſuffice his wrath. And would mercie in any place be more fitting, than in the father towards his child? Shee promiſed further, that Baiazet ſhould from thenceforth remain in moſt dutifull obedience towards his Maieſty; & vpon his ſo great clemencie, to conuert the feare wherin he now liued, into a world of dutie and deuotion. Honorable minds (ſhe ſaid) were retained with nothing more than with kindeneſſe and curteſie; that the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiueneſſe ſhould be a ſtay vnto L him, for euer doing the like againe: at laſt, that ſhe would promiſe for him, and take vpon her, that he ſhould for euer afterwards ſatisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of dutie & loyaltie.

Which words mingled with teares and other womanly geſtures, ſo wrought with Solyman, being otherwiſe too much in her power, that he reſolued to forgiue the fault: yet ſo, that hee ſhould come and ſubmit himſelfe, and receiue from him his charge. This carefull mother foreſlowes no time, but by letters ſecretly aduertiſed Baiazet not to feare to come vnto his father at ſuch time as he ſhould be ſent for: aſſuring him that there was no danger, for that his father was by her means appeaſed, and he againe brought into his fauor. With which good news Baiazet well comforted, reſolued to go at ſuch time as he was ſent for: yet full of feare, and oftentimes looking backe vnto his brother Muſtapha, whoſe dreadfull example ſufficiently warned M him what a danger he aduentured himſelfe vnto. Yet he came to the place appointed for the parley, which was in a common Inne at a place called Careſtran a few miles from Conſtantinople: for ſuch is the ſuſpicious manner of the Turkiſh Tyrants of theſe times, not to ſuffer any of their ſonnes that be men growne, to ſet their foot within the gates of Conſtantinople, Muſtapha and his companions drowned by night.

Roxalana intreteth Solymā for Baiazet her yonger ſon, and obtaineth his pardon.

Baiazet goeth to his Father in feare.

A nople, as dangerous for ſoliciting the ſoldiers of the court, and ſo conſequently for the altering of the State. Baiazet was no ſooner lighted from his horſe, but his fathers gard was preſently readie to receiue him, commanding him to lay aſide his ſword and dagger: which thing though it be a vſuall matter in others that are admitted to the preſence of the Turkiſh Emperour, yet might it then in the mind of his guiltie ſon raiſe a great feare. But his kind mother (who had before foreſeene in what feare and perplexitie he would come) had conueied her ſelfe into a chamber faſt by the entrance of the ſame houſe as Baiazet was to paſſe, where out at a little caſement couered with a thin linnen cloath, ſhee called vnto him in paſſing by, in theſe few words, Corcoma oglan, corcoma; which is as much to ſay, Feare not my ſon, feare not: with which ſhort ſpeech Baiazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. B But as ſoone as he was come into his fathers preſence, and had done his dutie, Solyman commanded him to ſit downe by him: then began the grim ſire grieuouſly to reproue him of raſhneſſe and want of diſcretion in taking vp armes, which he could not otherwiſe conceiue of but as taken vp againſt himſelfe. And admit they were as he would haue it, and the beſt that he could make of it, taken vp againſt his elder brother, yet was it neuertheleſſe a great preſumption and moſt wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole ſtate of the Mahometan religion (which at this day reſteth vpon the Othoman Family) had by his domeſticall diſcord bin ſore ſhaken, and brought in perill of vtter ruine, to the great iniurie, reproch, and contempt of his Maieſtie, a moſt deteſtable and horrible crime, which could not with condigne puniſhment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, & to ſhew himſelfe rather a kind C father, than a ſeuere judge; ſo that he would from thenceforth leaue the care of future things to God: foraſmuch as none of theſe things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes and monarchies are beſtowed as beſt pleaſeth him: ſo that if it were his deſtinie to enioy the Empire after his death, he ſhould be ſure thereof as of a thing that would of it ſelfe come vnto him, and was not by any mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him: but if it were otherwiſe appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labor in vain to ſtriue againſt the will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherfore he ſhould now as one well warned, ceaſe to rage and ſtorme, and not to moleſt his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he ſhould againe fall and raiſe new ſtirs, it would aſſuredly fall vpon his owne head, neither would any place of mercie be found for his ſecond offence, D and that he ſhould then find him not as now, his gentle father, but a moſt ſeuere and reuenging judge. Which when he had ſaid, and Baiazet had therunto briefly anſwered as the time would permit, rather crauing pardon for his treſpaſſe, than excuſing that was not to be excuſed; and promiſing from thenceforth to liue moſt loyally at his command; Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commanded to be giuen to Baiazet, who not daring to refuſe it, although he had rather haue ſo done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting leſt that ſhould haue bin his laſt: of which feare his father forthwith deliuered him by drinking a good draught of the ſame cup. So Baiazet, though guiltie, hauing with better ſucceſſe ſpoken with his father than had his brother Muſtapha, returned againe to the former place of his charge.

Roxolana comforteth her Son Baiazet.

Solyman reproueth Baiazet of diſloyaltie, and afterward pardoneth him.

Baiazet returneth to his charge.

E This hapned in the yeare 1555, from which time Baiazet ſo long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himſelfe with all dutifull & brother kindnes both towards his father & his brother; and that rather for to keepe her fauor, and not to cut off the hope which he had onely in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindnes, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the onely thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But ſhe dead about two yeres after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, & diſcharged of all bonds of dutie, fell to his former courſe, & began more grieuouſly than before, to reuiue the old grudges betwixt him and his brother, ſometime ſeeking by ſecret practiſes to haue him made away, and other ſomtimes by open force entring into his prouince, which was not far off, there euil intreated ſome of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their maF ſters ſake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the diſgrace of him whom of all other he wiſhed dead. He had alſo certain of his fauorits at Conſtantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by al means to gain the loue of the ſoldiers of the court, & doubted not as occaſion ſerued to paſſe ouer thither himſelf, and there to lurke in ſecret with ſuch as were of his faction, and priuie to his deſignements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but eſpecially by letters from Selymus, wherin he was alſo aduiſed to haue care of his own ſafety; G for that he was far deceiued, if he perceiued not, that theſe preambles of Baiazets wicked intentions, would at laſt turn vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, ſo that he might alone raigne: vnto whoſe vnruly deſires his fathers welfare was no leſſe a bar, than was his brothers, and therfore through his ſides was his life ſhot at. which treaſon had (as he ſaid) been of long time plotted, and now occaſion ſought to haue the ſame performed: wherfore he ſhould take heed that he were not by ſuch trecherie ouerwhelmed before he were aware therof: That for himſelfe he could eaſily beare with the iniuries of his brother Baiazet, yet could not chuſe but be moued with the greatneſſe of his fathers dangers. By which meanes Solymans hatred againſt Baiazet was ſtill more and more increaſed. Wherfore he by letters put him in remembrance of his dutie, how curteouſly he had vſed him, and again what he had on his part promiſed; H that there would not alwaies be place for forgiuenes; that he ſhould therefore ceaſe to wrong his brother and trouble his father; that he had but a ſhort time to liue, and that after his death God would aſſigne each of them their fortunes. But all this was to no purpoſe with Baiazet, fully ſet down to hazard whatſoeuer, rather than as a beaſt to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainely ſaw would betide him in the raigne of Selymus, as if it had bin euen then in execution. Yet he anſwered to his fathers commands not impertinently, but his deeds agreed not with his ſayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpoſe.

Which thing as ſoone as Solyman perceiued, he thought it beſt to take another courſe, and to remoue his ſons both farther from himſelfe, and alſo farther the one from the other. Wherefore I he gaue them to vnderſtand, That it was his pleaſure that both of them within a certaine prefixed time ſhould depart out of their gouernments (Baiazet being then gouernor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magneſia) and that now Baiazet ſhould remoue to Amaſia, and Selymus to Iconium.
Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in fauor with his father: yet becauſe no occaſion ſhould be giuen Baiazet to fall into extremities if he ſhould haue been remoued alone, Solyman to ſeeme indifferent, commanded them both to remoue: vnto which command it was adioined, that the farther they were off one from another, they ſhould be ſo much the neerer in mind and brotherly loue: foraſmuch as neereneſſe of dwelling of the Great, did manie times hinder their good agreement, whileſt by forwardneſſe of officers many things are on both ſides done to the grieuing of their maſters: and that they ſhould in any caſe doe as they K were commanded, and that he which ſtaied longeſt ſhould not be free from the ſuſpition of contempt. Selymus made no long ſtay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his ſake; but Baiazet hung backe, and being gone a little on his way, ſtaied, complaining of the vnlucky prouince of Amaſia, ſtained with the blond of his late brother the noble Muſtapha, to be aſſigned vnto him as ominous, and that he could be better contented with any prouince whatſoeuer, than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miſerable end of the neereſt to him in bloud, ſhould be euer before his eies, to the wounding of his heart: Wherefore he requeſted that he might at leaſt Winter in thoſe places, or els there from whence his brother was now departed: but Solyman would in no wiſe hearken vnto him. Now Selymus gon before certaine daies iournies with ſuch troups as his father had ſent him beſide his owne, for feare of Baiazet, L who yet ſtaid loitring and trifling on the time, ſuddenly returning and fetching a compaſſe about, ſhewed himſelfe at his brothers backe, marching towards Pruſa in Bythinia, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh kings; which he did not without the priuitie of his father, who liked not of the lingring of Baiazet: for what if he, hauing gained the good will of the Ianizaries, ſhould haue gon either to Pruſa, or directly to Conſtantinople? what a danger might haue growne therby to Selymus, yea vnto the whole ſtate in general? In this common feare, Solyman thought it beſt for Selymus there to ſtay, from whence they might moſt conueniently help one another, if Baiazet ſhould (as was feared) turne himſelfe vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus ſo ſtrong as to aduenture to ioine battell with his brother, whom he knew readie to put all to the hazard of one day. But when Baiazet (contrary to his expectation) ſaw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother ſhould be the vndoubted M heire of the empire if his father ſhould die, which was then by reaſon of his ſickly conſtitution of bodie daily more and more feared; he writ vnto his father, accuſing his brother, That he could not more manifeſtly in any thing declare how maliciouſly he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect courſe, to no other purpoſe but to aſpire vnto the Empire, and to haue

Solyman admoniſheth Baiazet of his dutie.

Solyman remoueth his two ſonnes farther aſunder.

Baiazet vnwilling to go to Amaſia, ſeeketh delaies.

A haue a ſhort cut ouer to Conſtantinople, if he ſhould haue any news of his fathers death, which he ſtil gaped after: which his longing, if his fathers longer life ſhould delay, then by the ſecret miniſters of his treaſon to diſpatch him, and by the murdering of him to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the empire: and yet neuertheleſſe, this man as a moſt dutifull and obedient ſonne, to be of him much made of, and as it were put in his boſome. Wheras he on the contrary part meaning wel, into whoſe conceit neuer any ſuch thought came, but was euer at command, was not had in any regard, but caſt off and contemned, whoſe greateſt requeſt was but to ſhun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. After that, he conuerted his ſtile to prayers, requeſting againe of his father, to gratifie him with ſome other prouince, if it were but that from which his brother was departed, or with any other whatſoeuer, ſo that it were more luckie than that of Amaſia: for anſwer B whereof he ſaid he would ſtay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his requeſt, hee ſhould not haue need further to retyre: but if he ſhould not obtaine his requeſt, that then he was readie to go whitherſoeuer his father ſhould command. It was not altogither for nought that Baiazet found fault with Amaſia; being the manner of the Turks, of the ſmalleſt things of all to diuine vpon the greateſt. But Solyman vnderſtood the matter otherwiſe, who not ignorant of his ſons teares, knew right well, that he in them ſought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raiſe new ſtirs in, than was Amaſia, ſo far diſtant from Conſtantinople. So Baiazet by many delaies did what he could to fruſtrat his fathers appointment, ceaſing not in the meane time to augment his ſtrength with new ſoldiers, to prouide armor, mony, and whatſoeuer els ſeruing for defence of himſelfe, and the impugning of his brother. Which C Solyman tooke in no other part, than as intended againſt his owne perſon: yet would he ſeeme as not to haue any ſuch vnderſtanding of the matter: for why, the warie old ſire would not by taking knowledge thereof, driue headlong his ſon, who was alreadie running too faſt of himſelfe. Beſides that, he was not ignorant that the eyes of all nations were bent vpon this diſcord of his two ſons; and therefore he deſired by all means, that theſe grudges might be with as little ſtir as was poſſible, appeaſed. Wherfore he anſwered Baiazet curteouſly, That concerning his gouernment of Amaſia, he could not alter it, as reſolutely ſet downe as well for his brother as himſelfe, and that therefore they ſhould do well to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the reſt, they ſhould be of good comfort, for that hee would take ſuch order, as that neither of them ſhould haue iuſt cauſe to complaine. Partan Baſſa the D fourth of the great Baſſa's of the court was appointed to go with this meſſage to Baiazet, and Mehemet third of the ſame great Baſſa's with like charge to Selymus, becauſe the matter ſhould ſeeme to be done with all indifferencie: and both of theſe great men commanded not to depart from them they were ſent vnto, before they were both come vnto the places of their gouernment whereunto they were aſſigned. Which Solyman wiſely did, to keepe them both within the compaſſe of dutie by the preſence of ſuch two graue counſellors. Which thing Selymus tooke in good part, but Baiazet not ſo: who hauing reſolued with himſelfe to ſet all on a hurly burly, thought nothing more vnfit for his deſignes, than to haue one of his fathers greateſt counſellors ſtill at his elbow as Cenſor of all his ſpeeches and doings: wherfore hauing curteouſly entertained him, and rewarded him according to his abilitie, he diſmiſſed him (though E vnwilling to depart) making this excuſe, That he would vſe him as his patron and defender with his father, foraſmuch as he had no other in court to defend his cauſe, promiſing not to be vnto him an vnworthie or vnthankfull client: and to carry word backe againe vnto his father, That he would aboue all things haue care of his command, if he might ſo do for his brother Selymus, whoſe iniuries and trecheries he had much adoe to brooke. Partan the great Baſſa ſo ſent away, aſſured Solyman what the very mind and purpoſe of his yonger ſon was. And albeit that Baiazet to make it ſeeme as if ſomthing had been done by that embaſſage, made ſhew as if he would haue preſently gone towards Amaſia: yet Solyman neuertheleſſe fearing the worſt, made al the preparation he could againſt him, commanding the Beglerbeg of Græce, although then ſicke of the gout, to make haſt, and with his horſemen to paſſe ouer with all ſpeed to aid F Selymus: and Mehemet Baſſa but lately returned, he ſent forthwith backe again for the ſame purpoſe to Selymus, with certain of the moſt truſtie companies of the Ianizaries; and the old man in readineſſe, made ſemblant as if he would himſelfe in perſon haue gone ouer alſo. But the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court came with euill will together, deteſting that warre betweene the brethren, as altogether abhominable: for againſt whom ſhould they draw their Solyman to bee ſure that his two ſons ſhould goe to their appointed Prouinces, ſendeth Partan and Mehemet, two of the Viſier Baſſa's, to ſee thē brought thither.

Baiazet ſendeth Partan Baſſa backe againe to his father.

Solyman makes preparation againſt Baiazet, and ſendeth aid to Selymus.

The Ianizaries vnwilling to go againſt Baiazet.

ſwords? was it not againſt the Emperors ſon, and happily the heire of the empire? Wherfore G this war might (as they ſaid) well enough be let alone, as altogither vnneceſſarie, and not they to be inforced to imbrue their hands one in anothers bloud, & to pollute themſelues with ſuch impietie: as for that which Baiazet did, was to be holden excuſed, as proceeding from neceſſitie.
Which ſpeeches of the Ianizaries being brought to Solymans eares, he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (who in all matters of doubt they flee vnto as vnto a moſt ſacred Oracle) demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, who of himſelfe preſumed whiles he yet liued, to leuie ſoldiers, raiſe an armie, ranſacke townes, and trouble the ſtate of the whole Empire? and what alſo he deemed of them that were his followers and tooke part with him: and laſt of all, of them alſo that refuſed to beare armes againſt him, and ſaid that he had in ſo doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Muphti anſwered, That both the man and his part-takers H were all worthy of death, & that ſuch as refuſed to take vp arms againſt him, were as prophane and irreligious men, to be accounted inteſtable. Which the great prieſts anſwer was publiſhed vnto the people, and by the chiefe Chiaus ſent to Baiazet, to ſee if he might be therewith moued.
Within a few days after, there came to Conſtantinople one of the Chiaus (whom Baiazet had intercepted, being ſent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Baiazet gaue his father to vnderſtand, That he was in all dutie his, and that he had not taken vp armes againſt him, neither refuſed to be vnto him in all things obedient; but that he had only to do with his brother, and with him to fight for his life, by whoſe ſword he muſt die, or els he by his, for that a miſchief was to be by one of them performed: which quarrel he was reſolued to trie whiles he yet liued, I and that therefore he ſhould do beſt not to meddle in the quarrell, or giue aid to either.
But if ſo be he would needs (as the report was) paſſe ouer the ſea to aid Selymus, he ſhould not thinke eaſily to get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the worſt came, how to eſcape and ſaue himſelfe, and would before he could get ouer into Aſia, make ſuch ſpoile with fire and ſword, as neuer had Tamerlane or other the crucleſt enemy of the Turks that euer was.
Which meſſage did not a little trouble Solyman. And withall it was reported, That the towne of Axuar, where one of Selymus his ſons ruled as Sanzacke, was alreadie taken by Baiazet and ſhamefully ſacked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was gon toward Amaſia, and now on his way as far as Ancyra, being out of all ſuſpition of danger which he feared vpon the way ſo long as his brother was yet lingring in thoſe quarters, haſted now towards Iconium, which K was with a ſtrong gariſon kept for him: for amongſt other cares wherwith Solyman was vexed, it was not the leaſt, That Baiazet intercepting Iconium, ſhould get into Syria, and from thence into Ægypt, an open countrey, and not yet thorowly eſtabliſhed vnder the Turkiſh gouernement, neither forgetfull of the old gouernment of the Mamalukes, and therefore deſirous of change: from whence it would haue been an hard matter to haue driuen Baiazet, eſpecially the Arabians being alwaies readie and at hand at euery light ſtir, where any hope of prey was: out of which prouince alſo in caſe of extremitie he might eaſily tranſport himſelfe into any of the Chriſtian kingdomes. Solyman therefore tooke great care, that this paſſage, which might ſeem the laſt refuge of Baiazets deuices, might be ſtopped vp; and concerning the ſame, had giuen commandement vnto moſt of his commanders in Aſia, to be alwaies in readines to aid Selymus L whenſoeuer he ſhould call. With them Selymus lay incamped vnder the walls of Iconium, attending euery ſtirring of Baiazet, reſoluing there to expect further aid from his father, and not by vntimely fight to commit his ſafetie to the hazard of one doubtfull battell. But Baiazet on the other ſide not vnmindfull what a matter he had taken in hand, ſlept not thereupon, but firſt entertained a valiant ſort of horſemen which the Turks call Chiurts, and are ſuppoſed to be of that people which were ſomtimes called Gordij, men for their knowne valour famous. He yet lay in the plain and open fields by Ancyra, of the commodities of which city (which were indeed great) he made great vſe: In the caſtle thereof he beſtowed his concubines & children; of the rich merchants he tooke vp mony to be repaid with the vſe vpon the good ſucceſſe of the war, and from thence he tooke whatſoeuer was needfull for the arming and furniſhing of his men. Beſides his own family, which was very great, and thoſe Chiurts which we ſpoke of, M many repaired vnto him which had bin in former time beholden to his mother, his ſiſter, and Ruſtan the great Baſſa, many alſo of the reliques of the valiant Muſtapha and Achmates the great Baſſa, valiant men and expert ſouldiers, who deſired to reuenge the vnworthie death of their Lords and Maſters, euen with their owne. Neither was there wanting an exceeding rablement

Baiazet his meſſage to his Father, requeſting him not to meddle betweene him and his brother.

Selymus departeth towards Iconium.

Baiazet ſtaieth at Ancyra, and there raiſeth his Forces.

A rablement of ſuch as wearie of their preſent ſtate, deſired ſome new innouation & change. The commiſeration alſo of the ſtate of the vnfortunat Baiazet, eaſily drew many to take part with him, whoſe whole truſt was in his valor: they fauored the yong prince, liuely reſembling his father: when as in Selymus appeared no likeneſſe of himſelfe, but the expreſſe lineaments of his mothers face and bodie, a woman whileſt ſhe liued generally hated of all the people: hee went heauily as ouercharged with his greaſie paunch, blub cheeked, and exceeding red faced, ſo that the ſouldiers in ſport would ſay, he was fed with greene mault: he was altogether giuen to his eaſe, and ſpent his time in drunkenneſſe & ſleep, neither was he courteous of ſpeech nor willing to deſerue well of any man; for he would not (as he ſaid) offend his father by being popular, ſo was he only of his father beloued, & of all other men hated: of all kind of men B he moſt miſliked of them that ſet all their hope in a bountifull & courageous prince. The ſame ſoldiers were alſo wont to call Baiazet, Softie (that is to ſay) a man giuen to quietneſſe & ſtudy: but after they ſaw him take vp arms, & for the ſafegard of himſelfe and his children ready to aduenture any thing, they began to admire him as a man of valor & courage: and to aske among themſelues, Why his father ſhould reiect him of ſuch worth, the expreſſe image of himſelfe, and preferre before him that gorbellied ſluggard, in whom no ſparke of his fathers valour was to be ſeen? This his entring into armes was no fault, being thereunto by neceſſitie enforced, for, had not Selymus their grandfather don the like? wherof no better example could be found; whom the force of neceſſity conſtrained not only to take vp armes againſt his brother, but al- C ſo to haſten the death of his father; and by ſo doing, purchaſed vnto himſelfe and his poſterity the empire: which ſo gotten, if Solyman did not vniuſtly poſſeſſe, why might not his ſon vſe the ſame courſe? why ſhould he ſo rigorouſly reuenge that in his ſon, that was ſo lawful in the grandfather? Although there was (as they ſaid) great difference betweene that Selymus & this Baiazet; for that this man intended no harme againſt his father, but wiſhed him long to liue; neither yet againſt his brother, if he might by his leaue but liue, if he would but once ceaſe to do him wrong: that it was alwaies accounted lawfull to repell force by force, & to ſhun preſent death, if the Deſtinies would ſo permit. By ſuch affections and motiues, Baiazet his power increaſed daily: which being now growne almoſt to the greatneſſe of a full armie, he thought it not beſt to vſe longer delay, but to march forthwith againſt his brother to fight with him D one battell for his life, ſtate, and empire: accounting it ſome commendation (although in vain) to haue attempted ſo great an enterpriſe. His purpoſe was (as Solyman feared) to get into Siria, which if he could bring to paſſe, he then doubted not of the reſt. Selymus ſtrengthned with his fathers power, lay waiting for his comming before Iconium, wel appointed of all warlike prouiſion: his army was exceeding ſtrong, and in it many notable commanders, martiall men of great experience, whom his father had ioined vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordnance planted in places moſt conuenient. But Baiazet nothing terrified therewith, as ſoone as he came within ſight of his brothers army, exhorted his ſouldiers in few words to play the men, for that now was come the time they wiſhed for, and place for them to ſhew their valour in: wherefore they ſhould ſhew themſelues couragious and valiant, and he would make them E all rich and fortunate: he told them, that their fortune was now in their owne hands, to frame it euery man as hee would himſelfe; ſo that if any of them were wearie of their preſent ſtate, there was the field wherein they might exchange it with better and therein lay downe the miſeries of their former liues: that of him they ſhould if they ouercame, expect riches, promotion, honours, and whatſoeuer elſe, the rewards of valiant men: that with the victorie of one battell, all their deſires ſhould be ſatisfied, were they neuer ſo great: which victorie was by the valor which reſted in them to be gotten, and his brothers army, the heartleſſe followers of a heartleſſe captain, ouerthrowne, for as his fathers ſouldiers that were with his brother, they were in bodie preſent, but in mind altogether on his ſide: that it was onely Selymus that withſtood his welfare and their felicity, whom they ſhould therefore valiantly ſeeke for in field as F their common enemie, and not to be afraid of his multitude, foraſmuch as victorie was to be gained, not by number, but by valour: and the moſt mightie God of heauen and earth was ſtill preſent, not with the moſt, but with the bee: Beſides that, he willed them to remember with what a cruell enemie they were to fight, who thirſted after nothing more than their bloud: And to conclude, he willed them all, not to looke vpon his words, but his deeds, and ſaid, If as you ſhall ſee me fighting for your profit, you ſhal likewiſe fight for mine honor, I dare then aſſure you of the victory. Which ſaid, hee with great courage charged the enemie, and fighting himſelfe long time amongſt the formoſt, and there performing all the parts of a valiant ſoldier, and worthie captaine, was for his notable valour no leſſe commended of his enemies, than of his owne ſouldiers. The battell was bloudy and terrible, and many fell on both ſides. But after that they with wonderfull obſtinacie had a great while fought with doubtfull victorie, ſo that fortie thouſand Turks lay there dead vpon the ground; at length the victory began to encline to that ſide whereon ſtood the greater ſtrength, the iuſter cauſe, and better counſell. Many of the enemies being ſlaine, and many of his owne people alſo loſt, Baiazet was enforced to retire; which he did ſo leiſurely, and without ſhew of any feare, that it ſeemed to the beholders, he had welneere as well gained as loſt the field: neither durſt Selymus purſue him, but ſtood ſtill faſt in the ſame place, neuer more glad of any thing, than to ſee his brothers backe. But Baiazet after he had in contempt of his fathers command thus run his owne courſe, and ſatisfied his owne deſire, though diſappointed of his purpoſe, and not able to performe the iourney by him intended into Syria, turned now his courſe, and began in good earneſt to goe to Amaſia his appointed prouince.

Solyman ſpeedily aduertiſed of the euent of this battell, forthwith paſſed ouer into Aſia: for as the great Baſſaes his counſellors thought it not conuenient for him to go ouer the ſtrait before the victory; ſo after it was certainly knowne, they thought it not good longer to ſtay, leſt the ouerthrow of Baiazet might giue occaſion to ſuch as ſecretly fauored his quarrel, to ſhew themſelues, and ſo to raiſe greater troubles. Beſides that, the fame of his paſſage ouer, would (as they ſaid) much auaile both to the diſcouragement of Baiazet, and the terrifying of his friends: and therefore it was by them thought good, haſtily to purſue him, now ouerthrown, and not to ſuffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Solymans father; who had bin more terribly vanquiſhed than when he ſtood in his whole ſtrength, and might ſeeme by that meanes to haue eſpecially preuailed, for that he was at firſt vnfortunatly ouerthrowne. Neither were theſe things without reaſon foreſeene; for it is almoſt incredible, what admiration and loue this battell (although vnfortunat) did get to Baiazet; men wondred that he durſt with ſo ſmall a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, encounter with his brother far better appointed, and alſo ſupported by his fathers ſtrength: not fearing either the diſaduantage of the place, or the furie of the great artillerie, and to haue behaued himſelfe in the battell not like a young ſouldier, but like an old and expert commander. Selymus might at his pleaſure boaſt of himſelfe as they ſaid (to his father) for the victory; but Baiazet was the man that deſerued to haue ouercome: and that Selymus might to any thing aſcribe the victorie, rather than to his owne valour.

Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, as they made Baiazet gratious amongſt the people generally, ſo doubled they his fathers cares, and increaſed his hatred, to wiſh him the rather dead. For why, he was reſolutely ſet downe, not to leaue any other heire of his empire than Selymus his eldeſt ſon, alwaies loiall & obedient vnto him: whereas the other hee abhorred as ſtubborne and rebellious, gaping after the empire whileſt he yet liued: of whom he was therfore ſo much the more to ſtand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valor, & for the aid he had now ſo openly giuen to Selymus. For theſe cauſes he paſſed ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, with purpoſe not to goe farre from the ſea coaſt, but as it were a far off with his fauorable aſpect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too neere with his armie, to endanger himſelfe by the ſudden reuolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

Augerius Buſbequius Epiſt. 3. legationis Turcicæ.

The order of the Turks campe.

I my ſelfe (ſaith the author of this hiſtorie) ſaw him departing out of Conſtantinople the firſt of Iune in the yere 1559, when as within a few daies after, I my ſelfe was alſo ſent for thither: for the Baſſaes thought it not amiſſe to haue me in the campe, and to vſe me courteouſly as their friend, for which cauſe I was aſſigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neere to the campe, where I lay very well. The Turks lay in the fields round about: but lying there three months I had good leiſure and opportunitie to ſee the manner of their campe, and in part to know the order of their martiall diſcipline. So I attiring my ſelfe in ſuch apparell as the Chriſtians commonly vſe in thoſe places, went vp and downe with one or two companions at my pleaſure vnknown. Firſt I ſaw the ſouldiers of all ſorts moſt orderly placed, and that, which he would ſcarcely beleeue that knoweth the maner of our war, there was in euery place great ſilence, & as a man may ſay, dumbe quietneſſe, no brawling, no inſolencie, no not ſo much as a word or laughter

A laughter paſſing in ſport or drunkenneſſe. Beſides that wonderfull cleanlineſſe,no dunghils,no excrements that might offend either the eyes or noſe,for all ſuch things the Turks doe either bury or carry them far out of ſight. They themſelues ſo oft as they are inforced to diſcharge the burthen of nature, dig an hole with a ſpade and bury it, ſo is all their camp without filth.
There was not to be ſeene any drinking or feaſting,no dicing (the great ſhame of our wars) the loſſe of mony or time at cards or dice,the Turks know not. I met only with a rough Hungarian and his companions,a ſouldier, who heauie himſelfe,to the Lute rather houled than ſung a doleful dittie,containing the laſt words of a fellow of his dying of his wounds vpon the greene banke of Danubius,wherein he requeſteth the riuer, becauſe it ran to the place where he was borne,to carrie newes to his friends and countrymen,that he died an honorable death,and not B vnreuenged,for the increaſe of his religion,and honor of his country: wherunto his fellowes ſighing,bare a foot, O happie and thrice happie wight, would Fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no mens ſoules go more ſpeedily to heauen, than of ſuch valiant men as die in battell, for whoſe welfare their maidens daily make prayers and vowes. I would alſo needs go through their butcherie, where their beaſts were killed, to ſee what fleſh was to be ſold; where I ſaw but foure,or at moſt fiue weathers hanging ready dreſſed,and that was the butcherie for the Ianizaries, which I deemed to be in that camp not fewer than foure thouſand. I maruelled that ſo little fleſh ſhould ſuffice ſo many men:but I was anſwered, That few of them did eat fleſh,for that moſt part of them had their victuals tranſported from Conſtantinople.
C Then I demanding what it was, they ſhewed me a Ianizarie ſitting by, who in an earthen diſh had killed a turnep,an onion,a head of garlike,a parſenep,and a cucumber, all ſauced with ſalt and vineger, or more truly to ſay, with hunger; whereon he fed as ſauorly, as if they had bin feaſants or partridges: his drinke was the common drinke of all liuing creatures, euen faire water. By which frugall kind of diet,they prouide both for the health of their bodies, and the ſpairing of their purſe: and that I maruelled the more at,it was the time that their great faſt, or to ſpeake after our faſhion, their Lent was at hand: at which time with vs Chriſtians, euen in well ordered cities,much more in camps,all rings with playing,dancing,ſinging, crying,quaffing, carouſing; and in briefe,with madding and phrenſie. So that it is not vainely reported, That a Turke ſent about that time embaſſadour into Germanie, comming home,reported, D That the Chriſtians on certaine daies did riot,and became mad,vntill they,beſprinckled with a certain kind of aſhes in the church,came to themſelues again, and ſo recouered;and that it was a wonderful thing to ſee,how much they were changed by the efficacie of that remedy, that they ſeemed not to be the ſame men:meaning indeed the diſordered maners of the Chriſtians at Shrouetide,and the ceremonies vſed on Aſhwedneſday: Which thing they to whom it was told,ſo much the more maruelled at, for that the Turks haue many medicines which cauſe madneſſe, but few or none which preſently eaſeth the ſame. And they vpon thoſe daies that goe before their great faſts, change nothing of their woonted manner of life to the worſe:but rather contrariewiſe prepare themſelues to abſtinence, by taking ſomewhat from their vſuall fare, the better to indure the ſudden change of their faſt: which they ſo preciſely E obſerue,that vpon their faſting dayes they will not ſo much as taſte a cup of water, or waſh their mouthes with water all the day long, before the ſtars appeare in the skie: which maketh their faſts,eſpecially in Summer when the daies be long & hot,to be vnto them very tedious.

The opinion the Turkes haue of them that die in their warres.

The ſpare diet of the Ianizaries.

The preciſe maner of the Turks in their faſts.

Whiles I thus lay in the campe, there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with certaine Preſents from the Emperor to Solyman,which were,certaine gilt plate,& a moſt curious clock, which was caried vpon an Eliphant like a caſtle,& ſome crowns to be diſperſed among the Baſſaes: which Solyman would needs haue preſented vnto him in the campe in the ſight of the whole armie, to make it the better knowne what friendſhip was betweene him and the Emperour, and that he needed not to feare any danger from the Chriſtian Princes.

Preſents ſent from the emperor Ferdinand to Solyman.

But to returne againe to Baiazet, from whom we haue a while digreſſed: he after the battell F at Iconium had retired himſelfe to Amaſia, the place of his gouernment, as though he would haue now there quietly liued, if his father would ſo giue him leaue. He had now ſatisfied his youthfull deſires & griefe, and ſeemed willing from thenceforth to ſatisfie his fathers better expectation:and therfore ceaſed not by letters & fit men to prooue his fathers mind. Neither did Solyman ſhew himſelfe ſtrange from ſuch a reconciliation:at firſt he eaſily gaue the meſſengers audience, read his ſons letters, & courteouſly returned anſwer; ſo that it was commonly reported

Baiazet goeth to Amaſia, and ſeeketh for his fathers fauour.

reported in the camp, that the father and the ſon would agree, and that the old man would pardon the youthfull pranke alreadie paſt, ſo that he would from thenceforth remaine dutifull. But al this was by the counſel of the Baſſaes, nothing but deep diſſimulation in the craftie old ſire, vntill he had ſhut vp Baiazet, and ſo got him aliue into his hand: for it was feared, leſt he deſpairing of pardon, ſhould with ſuch a power breake into the borders of Perſia (now the only place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants vpon thoſe frontiers: whom Solyman charged by continuall letters ſo to ſtop all the paſſages into Perſia, as that there ſhould not be any crany for Baiazet to flie out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were ſuſpected to haue taken part with Baiazet, or fauored his proceedings, thoſe he cauſed to be tortured & ſecretly made away, and among them ſome whom Baiazet had of purpoſe ſent to excuſe themſelues. For Solyman fearing leſt Tamas the Perſian king (more mindfull of his old quarrells than of the late inforced peace) ſhould hardly with much adoe ſuffer his ſonne to be got out of his hands if he ſhould flie thither, and ſo againe raiſe a long and dangerous war; did therefore what he poſſibly might to oppreſſe him before he ſhould come thither. Which his purpoſe although it was couered with al ſecrecie, yet was it not hidden from ſome of Baiazet his friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to truſt his father, but to beware of treaſon, and in any caſe ſpeedily to prouide for his owne ſafety. But Solyman thinking he had now ſo prouided as that he could by no means eſcape, and happily the more to deceiue his ſon, appointed to returne with his army to Conſtantinople the day after their Eaſter day. But Baiazet, vpon the very feaſt day hauing performed the ſolemnities thereof, commanded all his things to be truſſed vp at Amaſia, and ſo ſet forward vpon his vnfortunat iourney towards Perſia; knowing right well, that he went to the antient enemie of the Othoman Family, but yet fully reſolued to make proofe of any mans mercie, rather than to fall into the hands of his angrie father. Now were they all ſet forward, except ſuch weake ſoules as were not thought able to indure the labour of ſo long a iourney, among whom was left Solyman, Baiazet his yongeſt ſonne, but then newly borne; which guiltleſſe babe, with his mother, Baiazet thought better to leaue vnto the mercie of his grandfather, than to take him with him, a poore companion of his wofull and miſerable flight: whom Solyman as yet vncertain of his fathers fortune, commanded to be nurſed at Pruſa. Baiazet ſo gone from Amaſia, vſed ſuch celeritie in his trauell, that almoſt in euery place he preuented the fame of his comming, & light vpon many that were appointed to haue ſtaid his paſſage, before they were ready or aware of his comming. The Baſſa of Sebaſtia he thus deceiued: There was two waies, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his iourney, and that the Baſſa had already taken: wherefore he ſent certain, as if they had bin fugitiues, to tell the Baſſa that he was alreadie gone the other way. Which the Baſſa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and riſing with all his power to purſue him the other way, whereby it was told him he was gone, left that way free and open for him to paſſe by.

The Baſſa of Erzirum deceiued by Baiazet.

The Baſſa of Erzirum he deceiued alſo by another not much vnlike ſhift: from whom when he was not farre diſtant, and knowing that in paſſing through his countrey, he was to endure great danger, he ſet vpon him with a wile, ſending vnto him certain of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the yong princes calamity, to moue the Baſſa to pitty, at laſt requeſted that he would giue him leaue to ſhoo his horſes in his territorie; telling him, that he came vnprouided of all things, & therefore deſirous in that fruitfull country to refreſh his horſes a day or two, and to new ſhoo them. Whereunto the Baſſa courteouſly anſwered, That he would not let him to take whatſoeuer he needed. But whether it was for the compaſſion that he had vpon the ſtate of Baiazet, or for the ſecret loue he bare him, or that he thought by that means the eaſilier to entrap him, is doubtful; & happily preuented by Baiazets quick ſpeed, had not as yet ſufficient time to draw together his ſouldiers. He ſent alſo vnto Baiazet certain ſmall Preſents, ſeeming to be glad of his welfare & comming: who neuertheleſſe kept on his way, reſting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Baſſa of Erzirum vnderſtanding that Baiazet came ſtill on, made what haſt hee could alſo, and ioyned his power to the reſt of the Baſſaes which followed after: for many Baſſaes and Sanzackes hearing that Baiazet was fled from Amaſia, purſued faſt after him, being charged by Solyman vpon pain of their heads to bring him back either aliue or dead: but all in vaine, by reaſon of his ſpeedy departure, & for that he made more haſt to flie, than they did to follow. Yet it coſt no

A man deerer than this Baſſa of Erzirum, of whom we haue now ſpoken, whom Solyman for this cauſe diſplaced: and Selymus afterwards ſlew, with two of his ſonnes, young ſtriplings whom he had before in deſpight ſhamefully abuſed againſt nature. Yea Selymus himſelfe and Mahomet the great Baſſa, with the Berglerbeg of Grecia, followed alſo after Baiazet, though it were a far off. This his departure grieued Solyman aboue meaſure, aſſuring himſelf (as the truth was) that he was fled into Perſia: wherwith he was ſo much moued, that he could ſcarcely contain himſelfe, but would needs haue gone with all his power in all haſt againſt the Perſian, to haue terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious ſon. But theſe his raging fits his graue counſellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger hee ſhould aduenture himſelfe vnto, by reaſon of the doubtfull faith of his beſt ſouldiers. And what if Baiazet (as he was a deſperat B and ſudden man) ſhould in the meane time turne about aboue Pontus and the fens of Mœtis, and ſo fetching a compaſſe come to Conſtantinople, and proclaiming a generall libertie in his abſence, poſſeſſe himſelfe of the empire. By which wholſome perſuaſion Solyman ſtaid his ſo haſtie a iourney: but Baiazet all the way as he went, writ vpon the the gates and doores, That he would giue double pay to all ſuch as ſhould follow him: which cauſed Solymans captaines to haue their owne ſouldiers in diſtruſt, and the more for that they might oftentimes heare amongſt them, ſpeeches of great good will and loue towards Baiazet.

Solyman much grieued with the flight of his ſonne.

After long flying, hee was at length come to the Riuer Araxis, which ſeparated the Turkes kingdome from the Perſian; which hauing paſſed ouer, and yet not ſo in ſafetie, he left certaine of his followers vpon the banke of the riuer to keep the Sanzacks (who ſtill eagerly purC ſued him) from paſſing ouer: whom the Sanzacks eaſily repulſed, & ſo paſſing the riuer, entred a great way into the Perſian kingdome, vntill ſuch time as that they were met withall by certain of the nobilitie of Perſia with great troupes of horſemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they ſought for in another mans kingdome, were anſwered by the Turkes, That they purſued their kings fugitiue ſonne. To whom the Perſians replied, That they did not well, contrarie to the league with their Lord and Maſter, to come in armes beyond the bounds of their owne kingdome; and that there was a ſtrong league betweene king Tamas and Solyman, which it behoued them to regard: as for Baiazet, their king would conſider what was conuenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himſelfe: in the mean time they ſhould do well to get them out of that countrey wherein they had nothing to doe. Whereupon the D Turks forthwith left this purſuit and retired.

The eager purſuit of the Baſſaes and Sanzackes.

But by and by came meſſengers from the Perſian King to Baiazet to ſalute him, and to demand the cauſe of his comming, and alſo to ſee what ſtrength he brought with him, which as ſome account was about 20000. To whom Baiazet declared, That he by his brothers iniuries and fathers hard dealing, driuen out of his countrey, was fled vnto the ſacred maieſtie of the Perſian king, as his moſt aſſured refuge, who, as he wel hoped, in compaſſion of mans inſtabilitie, would not reiect him ſo diſtreſſed, & otherwiſe deſtitute of all helpe. Whereunto the Perſian replied, That he had done very vnwiſely to come vnto him that was in league and amity with his father; wherof one condition was, That they ſhould account the enemies of the one, the enemies of the other; and the friends of the one, the friends of the other. Which law to E breake, he accounted a thing vtterly vnlawful: neuertheleſſe ſeeing the matter was ſo faln out, he was welcome as vnto his friend, who in his behalfe would leaue nothing vnattempted to reconcile him to his father, which he deſpaired not to bring to paſſe. So Baiazet meeteth with the Perſian king, but in an euil houre, although at their firſt meeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, cheerfull lookes, mutuall kindneſſe, often conference, and great feaſting one of another; things whereby the ſecret thoughts of hollow hearts are beſt concealed: there was alſo a motion made of a ſtraighter bond of alliance, & one of the Perſian kings daughters promiſed to Orchanes one of Baiazets ſons; and he put in hope that the Perſian king would neuer reſt in quiet, vntill Solyman had made him Gouernour either of Meſopotamia, Babylon, or F Erzirum (which Gouernments were by the Perſians greatly extolled) and that he might there liue without feare of his brother, farre from him and his father alſo; where if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well, he might haue his brother the Perſian king a ſure refuge to retire vnto, and ſo ſafe from all danger. Which ſpeeches were happily giuen out, of purpoſe to auert aiazet his thought from the feeling of the preſent danger; who ſeemed vnto himſelfe ſo aſſured of the loue and friendſhip of Tamas the Perſian King, that at ſuch time as hee ſent his his embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman & him G (as was commonly ſuppoſed)he willed the ſame embaſſador to tell his father,that he had loſt a father at Conſtantinople,and found another in Perſia. But whether the Perſian delt ſincerely in this behalfe for Baiazet by his embaſſadors,which were many,may well be doubted. Like it is,that there was more fained ſhew of double diligence,than of true meaning therein;and the rather to feele the mind of Solyman,than to do any good to the poore diſtreſſed prince:& the rather, for that in the meane time all things were ſeriouſly plotted that might tend to his deſtruction.

Which were no ſooner growne to their full ripeneſſe, but there was of puroſe a motion made, That ſuch a multitude as followed this young Prince lay ſo cloſe together, that there was not in one place victuall ſufficient for them,and that it was therefore more conuenient H to haue them billited in the countrie thereabouts;which would be more commodious,as well for the better victualling of them, as for diuers other purpoſes alſo. Truth was,that Tamas the Perſian king,far vnlike his noble father Iſmael,ſtood in doubt leſt he brought vp a ſerpent in his boſome. Yet there were many which thought,that it was not the Perſians mind at firſt to haue deſtroied Baiazet, but to haue bin thereunto enforced by the practiſe of ſome of his familiars and followers; who not regarding the courteſie of the Perſian king,nor the lawes of hoſpitalitie,perſuaded Baiazet to thruſt him out of his kingdome: whereof there was many euident tokens. And among other things it was told king Tamas,that one of Baiazets chiefe captains ſhould ſay, What meane we? why ſtay we to kill this hereticall king, and to poſſeſſe his kingdome? for we ſhall no doubt by his trecherie all come to deſtruction. And that vpon I ſuch occaſion the king was conſtrained to condiſcend to a deuiſe more neceſſarie than honourable.
Baiazet had no great power,but moſt of them were valiant men, and ſouldiers of great experience,ready to aduenture vpon any thing: of whom the Perſian not without cauſe ſtood in ſome feare. He knew his kingdome to be neither antient nor yet well aſſured,as gotten by his father by the counterfeit ſhew of a reformed religion: and who could aſſure him, but hat amongſt ſo many nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many wearie of the preſent ſtate,and ſo deſirous of nouelties? vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the comming of Baiazet, a noble and valiant young gentleman; and that more was,deſperatly ſet: that as yet he himſelfe might of right rather ſeeme in the power of his gueſt,than he in his:
and that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his gueſt,but K to coupe him vp as a moſt dangerous wild beaſt. Which to do, the eaſieſt way was to diſperſe his power,and ſo to take him vnawares; for that he could not without much bloudſhed be openly taken in the midſt of his ſtrength,eſpecially by the dainty Perſian,of long time not vſed to war,and as yet not come together;againſt Baiazets ſoldiers, men of great actiuitie and experience.
So was the matter cunningly imparted vnto him for the diſperſing of his forces,and all the commodities to enſue thereof alledged: which Baiazet might not well gainſay, although many of his wiſe followers (men of great reach) did ſhrewdly ſuſpect the ſequell. But what could he refuſe,vpon whom neceſſitie lay ſo heauie? where no other hope was left? where he liued as it pleaſed another man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelitie of his hoaſt,might be imputed to him for the greateſt trecherie? So theſe moſt valiant ſouldiers, the L poore princes faithful followers,neuer again to ſee one another,are diſperſed into diuers countrey villages,and beſtowed where the Perſians thought good. Not many daies after, at a time pickt out for the purpoſe,they in number few,& diſperſed in a ſtrange country, were incloſed by many and ſlaine: their horſes,armor,apparell,and whatſoeuer els,became a prey vnto the murthorers, At the ſame inſtant was Baiazet and his ſonnes caſt in bonds alſo, and that to his greater griefe as many report, taken as he was ſitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Perſian king ſeemed to haue foreſeene much in this his hard dealing with Baiazet: as if that he, being a valiant and couragious young prince,and much better ſoldier than his brother,ſhould haue ſucceeded his father in his empire,much trouble and perill might haue grown thereby, both to himſelfe and his kingdome: and that it ſtood far better with the ſafetie of his eſtate, that Selymus (a man wholly giuen to voluptuouſneſſe and eaſe) ſhould raigne ouer the Turks; M in whoſe time he might as it were promiſe vnto himſelfe all peace and ſecuritie: and therfore it was thought that he would neuer let Baiazet goe aliue out of his hand, but rather make him away in priſon,as if he had there died for melancholy and griefe. Well he was aſſured,that after he had ſlaine his followers,and impriſoned himſelfe and his ſonnes, hee would neuer be friends with him that had ſo notably wronged him. Baiazet thus ſhamefully impriſoned, meſſengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongſt the reſt, the Perſian King ſent a ſolemne Embaſſadour vnto the Turke with Preſents, namely curious tents, coſtly carpets, an Alcaron containing the myſteries of their ſuperſtition, and certaine ſtrange beaſts. The cauſe of his comming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his Sonne; which Embaſſador was honourably entertained and feaſted by the great Baſſa's. Now was poore Baiazet in ſmall hope of life, his cruell father ſtill crauing to haue him deliuered into his hands to be ſlaine: and the Perſian yet denying to deliuer him, and ſeeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no meanes vnattempted to haue wrung him from the Perſian; ſometimes he ſpake him faire, putting him in mind of his league, wherein it was agreed, That they ſhould both haue the ſame friends and the ſame enemies: otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of war, except he would deliuer him his ſonne: he furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons all the frontiers of his dominion towards Perſia; he filled all Meſopotamia and the bankes of the riuer Euphrates with ſoldiers, eſpecially with them of his owne guard, and ſuch as hee had before vſed in the battell againſt Baiazet; ouer whom commanded Mehemet Baſſa the third of the Viſier Baſſa's, and Selymus the Beglerbeg of Græce (for Selymus was ſoone wearie of the field, and ſo betime returned home:) he alſo incited the Georgian people to take vp armes againſt the Perſians: who wiſely anſwered, That they had not ſuch confidence in their owne ſtrength, as to prouoke king Tamas; but let Solyman himſelfe come with his armie, and when they ſaw him preſent in the field, then they knew what they had to do, & that he ſhould then well ſee that they wanted neither diſcretion nor valour. And becauſe he would leaue nothing vnproued, he made ſhew as if he would in perſon himſelfe haue gon to Aleppo in Syria, and ſo haue on that ſide inuaded the Perſian: neither was the Perſian king altogether out of feare, hauing to his coſt many times prooued what Solyman was able to doe. But the vnwillingneſſe of the ſouldiers, and their mindes altogether eſtranged from that warre, eaſily ſtaied the raging Turke: they deteſted that warre, and forſooke their enſignes, a great number of whom (eſpecially horſemen) without leaue of their Captaines returned to Conſtantinople: and beeing commanded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with ſuch countenance and cheere as well declared how they were affected, & what they would do if occaſion ſerued for them to reuolt.

The Perſian king ſendeth Embaſſadors with preſents to Solyman.

For which cauſe, after that Solyman perceiued that Baiazet could not aliue be got from the Perſian (excuſing himſelfe by feare of reuenge by him whom he had ſo grieuouſly offended, if he ſhould by any meanes eſcape) he thought it beſt to follow that which was next, and to haue him there ſlaine; which he was in good hope to compaſſe, and the rather, for that the Perſian had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruell to ſee him deale ſo ſlenderly in a matter of ſo great importance: That he on his part had ſent him diuers embaſſadors, & that he on the other ſide had ſent him nothing but common meſſengers with papers, which cauſed him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he ſhould doe well to ſend vnto him men of account and place, with whom he might confer and conclude alſo according to the weightineſſe and exigence of the cauſe: beſides that, he was (as he ſaid) not a little in his debt, for that Baiazet and his followers had beene vnto him no ſmall charge before he could get him into his power: all which it were good reaſon he ſhould haue conſideration of. Whereby Solyman perceiued, that mony was the thing the Perſian king ſought after; and therefore rather than he would in an vnfit time of his life intangle himſelfe in a dangerous and vnneceſſarie war, he determined by the counſell of his Baſſa's, rather with money than with the ſword to fight with the Perſian king. Herupon was Haſſan Aga (one of the chiefe gentlemen of his chamber) appointed embaſſador into Perſia, with whom was ioined the Baſſa of Maras, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large commiſſion almoſt in the depth of Winter, with great ſpeed and wonderfull toile by thoſe long and difficult waies, arriued at laſt at Casbin the ſeat of the Perſian king, hauing by the way loſt diuers of their ſeruants and followers. Being come to the Court, the firſt thing they deſired was to ſee Baiazet, whome they found ſhut vp in a cloſe priſon, pale and wan as a man forlorne, with his haire and beard ſo long and ouergrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new trimmed; which done, then appeared the liuely reſemblance of his wonted countenance and fauor, ſo that Haſſan verily knew him to be him: for he had beene brought vp with him of a
